which the same Ruæus thus construes: Jupiter, after he had said this, immediately turns his eyes to the Rutulian fields, and beholds the duel. I have given this place another exposition, that he turn'd his eyes from the field of combat, that he might not behold a sight so displeasing to him. The word rejicit, I know, will admit of both senses; but Jupiter having confess'd that he could not alter fate, and being griev'd he could not, in consideration of Hercules, it seems to me that he should avert his eyes, rather than take pleasure in the spectacle. But of this I am not so confident as the other, tho' I think I have follow'd Virgil's sense.

What I have said, tho' it has the face of arrogance, yet is intended for the honor of my country; and therefore I will boldly own that this English translation has more of Virgil's spirit in it than either the French or the Italian. Some of our countrymen have translated episodes and other parts of Virgil with great success; as particularly your Lordship, whose version of Orpheus and Eurydice is eminently good. Amongst the dead authors, the Silenus of my Lord Roscommon cannot be too much commended. I say nothing of Sir John Denham, Mr. Waller, and Mr. Cowley; 't is the utmost of my ambition to be thought their equal, or not to be much inferior to them, and some others of the living. But 't is one thing to take pains on a fragment, and translate it perfectly; and another thing to have the weight of a whole author on my shoulders. They who believe the burthen light, let them attempt the Fourth, Sixth, or Eighth Pastoral; the First or Fourth Georgic; and, amongst the Æneids, the Fourth, the Fifth, the Seventh, the Ninth, the Tenth, the Eleventh, or the Twelfth; for in these I think I have succeeded best.

Long before I undertook this work, I was no stranger to the original. I had also studied Virgil's design, his disposition of it, his manners, his judicious management of the figures, the sober retrenchments of his sense, which always leaves somewhat to gratify our imagination, on which it may enlarge at pleasure; but, above all, the elegance of his expressions, and the harmony of his numbers. For, as I have said in a former dissertation, the words are in poetry what the colors are in painting. If the design be good, and the draught be true, the coloring is the first beauty that strikes the eye. Spenser and Milton are the nearest, in English, to Virgil and Horace in the Latin; and I have endeavor'd to form my style by imitating their masters. I will farther own to you, my Lord, that my chief ambition is to please those readers who have discernment enough to prefer Virgil before any other poet in the Latin tongue. Such spirits as he desir'd to please, such would I choose for my judges, and would stand or fall by them alone. Segrais has distinguish'd the readers of poetry, according to their capacity of judging, into three classes; (he might have said the same of writers too, if he had pleas'd.) In the lowest form he places those whom he calls les petits esprits; such things as are our upper-gallery audience in a playhouse, who like nothing but the husk and rind of wit; prefer a quibble, a conceit, an epigram, before solid sense and elegant expression; these are mob readers. If Virgil and Martial stood for Parliament-men, we know already who would carry it. But, tho' they make the greatest appearance in the field, and cry the loudest, the best on 't is, they are but a sort of French Huguenots, or Dutch boors, brought over in herds, but not naturaliz'd; who have not land of two pounds per annum in Parnasus, and therefore are not privileg'd to poll. Their authors are of the same level, fit to represent them on a mountebank's stage, or to be masters of the ceremonies in a bear garden. Yet these are they who have the most admirers. But it often happens, to their mortification, that, as their readers improve their stock of sense, (as they may by reading better books, and by conversation with men of judgment,) they soon forsake them; and when the torrent from the mountains falls no more, the swelling writer is reduc'd into his shallow bed, like the Mançanares at Madrid, with scarce water to moisten his own pebbles. There are a middle sort of readers, (as we hold there is a middle state of souls,) such as have a farther insight than the former, yet have not the capacity of judging right; for I speak not of those who are brib'd by a party, and know better, if they were not corrupted; but I mean a company of warm young men, who are not yet arriv'd so far as to discern the difference betwixt fustian, or ostentatious sentences, and the true sublime. These are above liking Martial, or Owen's Epigrams, but they would certainly set Virgil below Statius or Lucan. I need not say their poets are of the same paste with their admirers. They affect greatness in all they write: but 'tis a bladder'd greatness, like that of the vain man whom Seneca describes; an ill habit of body, full of humors, and swell'd with dropsy. Even these too desert their authors, as their judgment ripens. The young gentlemen themselves are commonly misled by their pædagogues at school, their tutor at the university, or their governor in their travels. And many of those three sorts are the most positive blockheads in the world. How many of those flatulent writers have I known who have sunk in their reputation after seven or eight editions of their works! for indeed they are poets only for young men. They had great success at their first appearance; but, not being of God, as a wit said formerly, they could not stand.

I have already nam'd two sorts of judges; but Virgil wrote for neither of them: and, by his example, I am not ambitious of pleasing the lowest or the middle form of readers.

He chose to please the most judicious, souls of the highest rank and truest understanding. These are few in number; but whoever is so happy as to gain their approbation can never lose it, because they never give it blindly. Then they have a certain magnetism in their judgment, which attracts others to their sense. Every day they gain some new proselyte, and in time become the Church. For this reason, a well-weigh'd judicious poem, which at its first appearance gains no more upon the world than to be just receiv'd, and rather not blam'd than much applauded, insinuates itself by insensible degrees into the liking of the reader: the more he studies it, the more it grows upon him; every time he takes it up, he discovers some new graces in it. And whereas poems which are produc'd by the vigor of imagination only, have a gloss upon them at the first which time wears off, the works of judgment are like the diamond; the more they are polish'd, the more luster they receive. Such is the difference betwixt Virgil's Æneis and Marini's Adone. And, if I may be allow'd to change the metaphor, I would say that Virgil is like the Fame which he describes:

Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo.

Such a sort of reputation is my aim, tho' in a far inferior degree, according to my motto in the title-page: Sequiturque patrem non passibus æquis: and therefore I appeal to the highest court of judicature, like that of the peers, of which your Lordship is so great an ornament.

Without this ambition which I own, of desiring to please the judices natos, I could never have been able to have done anything at this age, when the fire of poetry is commonly extinguish'd in other men. Yet Virgil has given me the example of Entellus for my encouragement: when he was well heated, the younger champion could not stand before him. And we find the elder contended not for the gift, but for the honor: nec dona moror. For Dampier has inform'd us, in his Voyages, that the air of the country which produces gold is never wholesome.

I had long since consider'd that the way to please the best judges is not to translate a poet literally, and Virgil least of any other. For, his peculiar beauty lying in his choice of words, I am excluded from it by the narrow compass of our heroic verse, unless I would make use of monosyllables only, and those clogg'd with consonants, which are the dead weight of our mother tongue. 'Tis possible, I confess, tho' it rarely happens, that a verse of monosyllables may sound harmoniously; and some examples of it I have seen. My first line of the Æneis is not harsh:

Arms, and the man I sing, who, forc'd by fate, &c.

But a much better instance may be given from the last line of Manilius, made English by our learned and judicious Mr. Creech:

Nor could the world have borne so fierce a
flame —

where the many liquid consonants are plac'd so artfully that they give a pleasing sound to the words, tho' they are all of one syllable.

'Tis true, I have been sometimes forc'd upon it in other places of this work; but I never did it out of choice: I was either in haste, or Virgil gave me no occasion for the ornament of words; for it seldom happens but a monosyllable line turns verse to prose; and even that prose is rugged and unharmonious. Philarchus, I remember, taxes Balzac for placing twenty monosyllables in file, without one dissyllable betwixt them. The way I have taken is not so strait as metaphor, nor so loose as paraphrase: some things too I have omitted, and sometimes have added of my own. Yet the omissions, I hope, are but of circumstances, and such as would have no grace in English; and the additions, I also hope, are easily deduc'd from Virgil's sense. They will seem (at least I have the vanity to think so) not stuck into him, but growing out of him. He studies brevity more than any other poet; but he had the advantage of a language wherein much may be comprehended in a little space. We, and all the modern tongues, have more articles and pronouns, besides signs of tenses and cases, and other barbarities on which our speech is built by the faults of our forefathers. The Romans founded theirs upon the Greek: and the Greeks, we know, were laboring many hundred years upon their language before they brought it to perfection. They rejected all those signs, and cut off as many articles as they could spare; comprehending in one word what we are constrain'd to express in two; which is one reason why we cannot write so concisely as they have done. The word pater, for example, signifies not only a father, but your father, my father, his or her father, all included in a word.

This inconvenience is common to all modern tongues; and this alone constrains us to employ more words than the ancients needed. But having before observ'd that Virgil endeavors to be short, and at the same time elegant, I pursue the excellence and forsake the brevity. For there he is like ambergris, a rich perfume, but of so close and glutinous a body that it must be open'd with inferior scents of musk or civet, or the sweetness will not be drawn out into another language.

On the whole matter, I thought fit to steer betwixt the two extremes of paraphrase and literal translation; to keep as near my author as I could, without losing all his graces, the most eminent of which are in the beauty of his words; and those words, I must add, are always figurative. Such of these as would retain their elegance in our tongue, I have endeavor'd to graff on it; but most of them are of necessity to be lost, because they will not shine in any but their own. Virgil has sometimes two of them in a line; but the scantiness of our heroic verse is not capable of receiving more than one; and that too must expiate for many others which have none. Such is the difference of the languages, or such my want of skill in choosing words. Yet I may presume to say, and I hope with as much reason as the French translator, that, taking all the materials of this divine author, I have endeavor'd to make Virgil speak such English as he would himself have spoken, if he had been born in England, and in this present age. I acknowledge, with Segrais, that I have not succeeded in this attempt according to my desire; yet I shall not be wholly without praise, if in some sort I may be allow'd to have copied the clearness, the purity, the easiness, and the magnificence of his style. But I shall have occasion to speak farther on this subject before I end the preface.

When I mention'd the Pindaric line, I should have added that I take another license in my verses; for I frequently make use of triplet rhymes, and for the same reason, because they bound the sense. And therefore I generally join these two licenses together, and make the last verse of the triplet a Pindaric: for, besides the majesty which it gives, it confines the sense within the barriers of three lines, which would languish if it were lengthen'd into four. Spenser is my example for both these privileges of English verses; and Chapman has follow'd him in his translation of Homer. Mr. Cowley has given in to them after both; and all succeeding writers after him. I regard them now as the Magna Charta of heroic poetry, and am too much an Englishman to lose what my ancestors have gain'd for me. Let the French and Italians value themselves on their regularity; strength and elevation are our standard. I said before, and I repeat it, that the affected purity of the French has unsinew'd their heroic verse. The language of an epic poem is almost wholly figurative; yet they are so fearful of a metaphor, that no example of Virgil can encourage them to be bold with safety. Sure they might warn themselves by that sprightly blaze, without approaching it so close as to singe their wings; they may come as near it as their master. Not that I would discourage that purity of diction in which he excels all other poets. But he knows how far to extend his franchises, and advances to the verge, without venturing a foot beyond it. On the other side, without being injurious to the memory of our English Pindar, I will presume to say that his metaphors are sometimes too violent, and his language is not always pure. But at the same time I must excuse him; for, thro' the iniquity of the times, he was forc'd to travel, at an age when, instead of learning foreign languages, he should have studied the beauties of his mother tongue, which, like all other speeches, is to be cultivated early, or we shall never write it with any kind of elegance. Thus by gaining abroad he lost at home; like the painter in the Arcadia, who, going to see a skirmish, had his arms lopp'd off, and return'd, says Sir Philip Sidney, well instructed how to draw a battle, but without a hand to perform his work.

There is another thing in which I have presum'd to deviate from him and Spenser. They both make hemistichs (or half verses) breaking off in the middle of a line. I confess there are not many such in the Fairy Queen; and even those few might be occasion'd by his unhappy choice of so long a stanza. Mr. Cowley had found out that no kind of staff is proper for a heroic poem, as being all too lyrical; yet, tho' he wrote in couplets, where rhyme is freer from constraint, he frequently affects half verses; of which we find not one in Homer, and I think not in any of the Greek poets, or the Latin, excepting only Virgil; and there is no question but he thought he had Virgil's authority for that license. But I am confident our poet never meant to leave him, or any other, such a precedent; and I ground my opinion on these two reasons. First, we find no example of a hemistich in any of his Pastorals or Georgics; for he had given the last finishing strokes to both these poems: but his Æneis he left so uncorrect, at least so short of that perfection at which he aim'd, that we know how hard a sentence he pass'd upon it. And, in the second place, I reasonably presume that he intended to have fill'd up all those hemistichs, because in one of them we find the sense imperfect:

Quem tibi jam Troja —

which some foolish grammarian has ended for him with a half line of nonsense:

— peperit fumante Creusa :

for Ascanius must have been born some years before the burning of that city; which I need not prove. On the other side, we find also that he himself fill'd up one line in the Sixth Æneid, the enthusiasm seizing him while he was reading to Augustus:

Misenum Æolidem, quo non præstantior alter Ære ciere viros —

to which he added, in that transport, Mar-temque accendere cantu: and never was any line more nobly finish'd; for the reasons which I have given in the Book of Painting. On these considerations I have shunn'd hemistichs; not being willing to imitate Virgil to a fault, like Alexander's courtiers, who affected to hold their necks awry, because he could not help it. I am confident your Lordship is by this time of my opinion, and that you will look on those half lines hereafter as the imperfect products of a hasty Muse; like the frogs and serpents in the Nile; part of them kindled into life, and part a lump of unform'd unanimated mud.

I am sensible that many of my whole verses are as imperfect as those halves, for want of time to digest them better; but give me leave to make the excuse of Boccace, who, when he was upbraided that some of his novels had not the spirit of the rest, return'd this answer, that Charlemagne, who made the paladins, was never able to raise an army of them. The leaders may be heroes, but the multitude must consist of common men.

I am also bound to tell your Lordship, in my own defense, that, from the beginning of the First Georgic to the end of the last Æneid, I found the difficulty of translation growing on me in every succeeding book: for Virgil, above all poets, had a stock, which I may call almost inexhaustible, of figurative, elegant, and sounding words. I, who inherit but a small portion of his genius, and write in a language so much inferior to the Latin, have found it very painful to vary phrases, when the same sense returns upon me. Even he himself, whether out of necessity or choice, has often express'd the same thing in the same words, and often repeated two or three whole verses which he had us'd before. Words are not so easily coin'd as money; and yet we see that the credit not only of banks, but of exchequers, cracks, when little comes in and much goes out. Virgil call'd upon me in every line for some new word, and I paid so long, that I was almost bankrupt; so that the latter end must needs be more burdensome than the beginning or the middle; and, consequently, the Twelfth Æneid cost me double the time of the First and Second. What had become of me, if Virgil had tax'd me with another book? I had certainly been reduc'd to pay the public in hammer'd money, for want of mill'd; that is, in the same old words which I had us'd before; and the receivers must have been forc'd to have taken anything, where there was so little to be had.

Besides this difficulty (with which I have struggled, and made a shift to pass it over) there is one remaining, which is insuperable to all translators. We are bound to our author's sense, tho' with the latitudes already mention'd; for I think it not so sacred, as that one iota must not be added or diminish'd, on pain of an anathema. But slaves we are, and labor on another man's plantation; we dress the vineyard, but the wine is the owner's: if the soil be sometimes barren, then we are sure of being scourg'd; if it be fruitful, and our care succeeds, we are not thank'd; for the proud reader will only say the poor drudge has done his duty. But this is nothing to what follows; for, being oblig'd to make his sense intelligible, we are forc'd to untune our own verses, that we may give his meaning to the reader. He who invents is master of his thoughts and words: he can turn and vary them as he pleases, till he renders them harmonious. But the wretched translator has no such privilege: for, being tied to the thoughts, he must make what music he can in the expression; and for this reason it cannot always be so sweet as that of the original. There is a beauty of sound, as Segrais has observ'd, in some Latin words, which is wholly lost in any modern language. He instances in that mollis amaracus, on which Venus lays Cupid, in the First Æneid. If I should translate it sweet marjoram, as the word signifies, the reader would think I had mistaken Virgil: for those village words, as I may call them, give us a mean idea of the thing; but the sound of the Latin is so much more pleasing, by the just mixture of the vowels with the consonants, that it raises our fancies to conceive somewhat more noble than a common herb, and to spread roses under him, and strew lilies over him; a bed not unworthy the grandson of the goddess.

If I cannot copy his harmonious numbers, how shall I imitate his noble flights, where his thoughts and words are equally sublime?

*Quem quisquis studet æmulari,
..... coratis ope Dædalea
Nititur pennis, vitreo daturus Nomina ponto.*

What modern language, or what poet, can express the majestic beauty of this one verse, amongst a thousand others!

Aule, hospes, contemnere opes, et te quoque dignum Finge deo. —

For my part, I am lost in the admiration of it: I condemn the world when I think on it, and myself when I translate it.

Lay by Virgil, I beseech your Lordship, and all my better sort of judges, when you take up my version; and it will appear a passable beauty when the original Muse is absent. But, like Spenser's false Florimel made of snow, it melts and vanishes when the true one comes in sight. I will not excuse, but justify myself for one pretended crime, with which I am liable to be charg'd by false critics, not only in this translation, but in many of my original poems — that I Latinize too much. 'Tis true that, when I find an English word significant and sounding, I neither borrow from the Latin or any other language; but, when I want at home, I must seek abroad.

If sounding words are not of our growth and manufacture, who shall hinder me to import them from a foreign country? I carry not out the treasure of the nation, which is never to return; but what I bring from Italy, I spend in England: here it remains, and here it circulates; for, if the coin be good, it will pass from one hand to another. I trade both with the living and the dead, for the enrichment of our native language. We have enough in England to supply our necessity; but, if we will have things of magnificence and splendor, we must get them by commerce. Poetry requires ornament; and that is not to be had from our old Teuton monosyllables: therefore, if I find any elegant word in a classic author, I propose it to be naturaliz'd, by using it myself; and, if the public approves of it, the bill passes. But every man cannot distinguish betwixt pedantry and poetry: every man, therefore, is not fit to innovate. Upon the whole matter, a poet must first be certain that the word he would introduce is beautiful in the Latin; and is to consider, in the next place, whether it will agree with the English idiom. After this, he ought to take the opinion of judicious friends, such as are learned in both languages; and, lastly, since no man is infallible, let him use this license very sparingly; for, if too many foreign words are pour'd in upon us, it looks as if they were design'd not to assist the natives, but to conquer them.

I am now drawing towards a conclusion, and suspect your Lordship is very glad of it. But permit me first to own what helps I have had in this undertaking. The late Earl of Lauderdale sent me over his new translation of the Æneis, which he had ended before I ingag'd in the same design. Neither did I then intend it; but, some proposals being afterwards made me by my bookseller, I desir'd his Lordship's leave that I might accept them, which he freely granted; and I have his letter yet to shew for that permission. He resolv'd to have printed his work; which he might have done two years before I could publish mine; and had perform'd it, if death had not prevented him. But having his manuscript in my hands, I consulted it as often as I doubted of my author's sense; for no man understood Virgil better than that learned nobleman. His friends, I hear, have yet another and more correct copy of that translation by them, which had they pleas'd to have given the public, the judges must have been convinc'd that I have not flatter'd him. Besides this help, which was not inconsiderable, Mr. Congreve has done me the favor to review the Æneis, and compare my version with the original. I shall never be ashamed to own that this excellent young man has shew'd me many faults, which I have endeavor'd to correct. 'Tis true, he might have easily found more, and then my translation had been more perfect.

Two other worthy friends of mine, who desire to have their names conceal'd, seeing me straiten'd in my time, took pity on me, and gave me the Life of Virgil, the two Prefaces to the Pastorals and the Georgics, and all the arguments in prose to the whole translation; which, perhaps, has caus'd a report that the two first poems are not mine. If it had been true that I had taken their verses for my own, I might have gloried in their aid; and, like Terence, have farther'd the opinion that Scipio and Lælius join'd with me. But the same style being continued thro' the whole, and the same laws of versification observ'd, are proofs sufficient that this is one man's work; and your Lordship is too well acquainted with my manner to doubt that any part of it is another's.

That your Lordship may see I was in earnest when I promis'd to hasten to an end, I will not give the reasons why I writ not always in the proper terms of navigation, land service, or in the cant of any profession. I will only say that Virgil has avoided those proprieties, because he writ not to mariners, soldiers, astronomers, gard'ners, peasants, &c., but to all in general, and in particular to men and ladies of the first quality, who have been better bred than to be too nicely knowing in the terms. In such cases, 't is enough for a poet to write so plainly, that he may be understood by his readers; to avoid impropriety, and not affect to be thought learn'd in all things.

I have omitted the four preliminary lines of the First Æneid, because I think them inferior to any four others in the whole poem, and consequently believe they are not Virgil's. There is too great a gap betwixt the adjective vicina in the second line, and the substantive arva in the latter end of the third, which keeps his meaning in obscurity too long, and is contrary to the clearness of his style.

Ut quamvis avidis

is too ambitious an ornament to be his; and

Gratum opus agricolis

are all words unnecessary, and independent of what he had said before.

Horrentia Martis arma

is worse than any of the rest. Horrentia is such a flat epithet as Tully would have given us in his verses. 'T is a mere filler, to stop a vacancy in the hexameter, and connect the preface to the work of Virgil. Our author seems to sound a charge, and begins like the clangor of a trumpet:

Arma virumque cano, Troja qui primus ab oris —

scarce a word without an r, and the vowels for the greater part sonorous. The prefacer began with Ille ego, which he was constrain'd to patch up in the fourth line with at nunc, to make the sense cohere; and if both those words are not notorious botches, I am much deceiv'd, tho' the French translator thinks otherwise. For my own part, I am rather of the opinion that they were added by Tucca and Varius, than retrench'd.

I know it may be answer'd by such as think Virgil the author of the four lines, that he asserts his title to the Æneis in the beginning of this work, as he did to the two former in the last lines of the Fourth Georgic. I will not reply otherwise to this than by desiring them to compare these four lines with the four others, which we know are his, because no poet but he alone could write them. If they cannot distinguish creeping from flying, let them lay down Virgil, and take up Ovid de Ponto in his stead. My master needed not the assistance of that preliminary poet to prove his claim. His own majestic mien discovers him to be the king, amidst a thousand courtiers. It was a superfluous office; and therefore I would not set those verses in the front of Virgil, but have rejected them to my own preface.

I, who before, with shepherds in the groves,
Sung to my oaten pipe their rural loves,
And, issuing thence, compell'd the neighb'ring
field

A plenteous crop of rising corn to yield, Manur'd the glebe, and stock'd the fruitful
plain,

(A poem grateful to the greedy swain) &c.

If there be not a tolerable line in all these six, the prefacer gave me no occasion to write better. This is a just apology in this place, but I have done great wrong to Virgil in the whole translation. Want of time, the inferiority of our language, the inconvenience of rhyme, and all the other excuses I have made, may alleviate my fault, but cannot justify the boldness of my undertaking. What avails it me to acknowledge freely that I have not been able to do him right in any line? For even my own confession makes against me; and it will always be return'd upon me: "Why then did you attempt it?" To which no other answer can be made, than that I have done him less injury than any of his former libelers.

What they call'd his picture had been drawn at length, so many times, by the daubers of almost all nations, and still so unlike him, that I snatch'd up the pencil with disdain; being satisfied beforehand that I could make some small resemblance of him, tho' I must be content with a worse likeness. A Sixth Pastoral, a Pharmaceutria, a single Orpheus, and some other features, have been exactly taken; but those holiday authors writ for pleasure, and only shew'd us what they could have done, if they would have taken pains to perform the whole.

Be pleas'd, my Lord, to accept with your wonted goodness this unworthy present which I make you. I have taken off one trouble from you, of defending it, by acknowledging its imperfections; and, tho' some part of them are cover'd in the verse,

(as Erichthonius rode always in a chariot, to hide his lameness,) such of them as cannot be conceal'd, you will please to connive at, tho', in the strictness of your judgment, you cannot pardon. If Homer was allow'd to nod sometimes in so long a work, it will be no wonder if I often fall asleep. You took my Aureng-Zebe into your protection, with all his faults; and I hope here cannot be so many, because I translate an author who gives me such examples of correctness. What my jury may be, I know not; but 't is good for a criminal to plead before a favorable judge. If I had said partial, would your Lordship have forgiven me? Or will you give me leave to acquaint the world that I have many times been oblig'd to your bounty since the Revolution? Tho' I never was reduc'd to beg a charity, nor ever had the impudence to ask one, either of your Lordship, or your noble kinsman the Earl of Dorset, much less of any other; yet, when I least expected it, you have both remember'd me. So inherent it is in your family not to forget an old servant. It looks rather like ingratitude on my part, that, where I have been so often oblig'd, I have appear'd so seldom to return my thanks, and where I was also so sure of being well receiv'd. Somewhat of laziness was in the case, and somewhat too of modesty, but nothing of disrespect or of unthankfulness. I will not say that your Lordship has encourag'd me to this presumption, lest, if my labors meet with no success in public, I may expose your judgment to be censur'd. As for my own enemies, I shall never think them worth an answer; and, if your Lordship has any, they will not dare to arraign you for want of knowledge in this art, till they can produce somewhat better of their own than your Essay on Poetry. 'T was on this consideration that I have drawn out my preface to so great a length. Had I not address'd to a poet, and a critic of the first magnitude, I had myself been tax'd for want of judgment, and sham'd my patron for want of understanding. But neither will you, my Lord, so soon be tir'd as any other, because the discourse is on your art; neither will the learned reader think it tedious, because it is ad clerum. At least, when he begins to be weary, the church doors are open. That I may pursue the allegory with a short prayer after a long sermon:

May you live happily and long, for the service of your country, the encouragement of good letters, and the ornament of poetry; which cannot be wish'd more earnestly by any man, than by

Your Lordship's most humble,
Most oblig'd, and most obedient Servant,
JOHN DRYDEN.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

The Trojans, after a seven years' voyage, set sail for Italy, but are overtaken by a dreadful storm, which Æolus raises at Juno's request. The tempest sinks one, and scatters the rest. Neptune drives off the Winds, and calms the sea. Æneas, with his own ship, and six more, arrives safe at an African port. Venus complains to Jupiter of her son's misfortunes. Jupiter comforts her, and sends Mercury to procure him a kind reception among the Carthaginians. Æneas, going out to discover the country, meets his mother in the shape of an huntress, who conveys him in a cloud to Carthage, where he sees his friends whom he thought lost, and receives a kind entertainment from the queen. Dido, by a device of Venus, begins to have a passion for him, and, after some discourse with him, desires the history of his adventures since the siege of Troy, which is the subject of the two following books.

ARMS, and the man I sing, who, forc'd by fate,

And haughty Juno's unrelenting hate,
Expell'd and exil'd, left the Trojan shore.
Long labors, both by sea and land, he bore,
And in the doubtful war, before he won
The Latian realm, and built the destin'd town;

His banish'd gods restor'd to rites divine,
And settled sure succession in his line,
From whence the race of Alban fathers come,

And the long glories of majestic Rome. 10
O Muse! the causes and the crimes relate;

What goddess was provok'd, and whence her hate;

For what offense the Queen of Heav'n began
To persecute so brave, so just a man;
Involv'd his anxious life in endless cares,

Expos'd to wants, and hurried into wars !
Can heav'nly minds such high resentment
show,

Or exercise their spite in human woe ?

Against the Tiber's mouth, but far away,
An ancient town was seated on the sea; ²⁰
A Tyrian colony; the people made Stout for the war, and studious of their trade:

Carthage the name; belov'd by Juno more Than her own Argos, or the Samian shore.
Here stood her chariot; here, if Heav'n were kind,

The seat of awful empire she design'd.
Yet she had heard an ancient rumor fly,
(Long cited by the people of the sky,)
That times to come should see the Trojan
race

Her Carthage ruin, and her tow'rs deface; Nor thus confin'd, the yoke of sov'reign sway ³¹

Should on the necks of all the nations lay.
She ponder'd this, and fear'd it was in
fate;

Nor could forget the war she wag'd of
late

For conqu'ring Greece against the Trojan
state.

Besides, long causes working in her mind,
And secret seeds of envy, lay behind:
Deep graven in her heart the doom re-
main'd

Of partial Paris, and her form disdain'd;
The grace bestow'd on ravish'd Ganymed,
Electra's glories, and her injur'd bed. ⁴¹

Each was a cause alone; and all combin'd
To kindle vengeance in her haughty mind.
For this, far distant from the Latian coast
She drove the remnants of the Trojan host;
And sev'n long years th' unhappy wand'ring
train

Were toss'd by storms, and scatter'd thro'
the main.

Such time, such toil, requir'd the Roman
name,

Such length of labor for so vast a frame.

Now scarce the Trojan fleet, with sails and oars, ⁵⁰

Had left behind the fair Sicilian shores, Ent'ring with cheerful shouts the wat'ry
reign,

And plowing frothy furrows in the main;
When, lab'ring still with endless discon-
tent,

The Queen of Heav'n did thus her fury vent:

"Then am I vanquish'd? must I yield?"
said she,

"And must the Trojans reign in Italy?
So Fate will have it, and Jove adds his
force;

Nor can my pow'r divert their happy course.
Could angry Pallas, with revengeful spleen, ⁶⁰

The Grecian navy burn, and drown the men?
She, for the fault of one offending foe,
The bolts of Jove himself presum'd to throw:

With whirlwinds from beneath she toss'd
the ship,

And bare expos'd the bosom of the deep;
Then, as an eagle gripes the trembling game,
The wretch, yet hissing with her father's
flame,

She strongly seiz'd, and with a burning
wound

Transfix'd, and naked, on a rock she bound.
But I, who walk in awful state above, ⁷⁰
The majesty of heav'n, the sister wife of Jove,

For length of years, my fruitless force employ

Against the thin remains of ruin'd Troy!
What nations now to Juno's pow'r will pray,

Or off'rings on my slighted altars lay?"

Thus rag'd the goddess; and, with fury fraught,

The restless regions of the storms she
sought,

Where, in a spacious cave of living stone,
The tyrant Æolus, from his airy throne,
With pow'r imperial curbs the struggling winds, ⁸⁰

And sounding tempests in dark prisons binds.

This way and that th' impatient captives
tend,

And, pressing for release, the mountains
rend.

High in his hall th' undaunted monarch
stands,

And shakes his scepter, and their rage commands;

Which did he not, their unresisted sway Would sweep the world before them in their way;

Earth, air, and seas thro' empty space would roll,

And heav'n would fly before the driving soul.

In fear of this, the Father of the Gods ⁹⁰
 Confin'd their fury to those dark abodes,
 And lock'd 'em safe within, oppress'd with mountain loads;

Impos'd a king, with arbitrary sway,
 To loose their fetters, or their force allay.
 To whom the suppliant queen her pray'rs
 address'd,

And thus the tenor of her suit express'd:
 "O Æolus! for to thee the King of Heav'n
 The pow'r of tempests and of winds has giv'n;

Thy force alone their fury can restrain,
 And smooth the waves, or swell the troubled main — ¹⁰⁰

A race of wand'ring slaves, abhorr'd by me,
 With prosp'rous passage cut the Tuscan sea;
 To fruitful Italy their course they steer,
 And for their vanquish'd gods design new temples there.

Raise all thy winds; with night involve the
 skies;

Sink or disperse my fatal enemies.
 Twice sev'n, the charming daughters of the
 main,

Around my person wait, and bear my train:
 Succeed my wish, and second my design;
 The fairest, Deiopeia, shall be thine, ¹¹⁰
 And make thee father of a happy line."

To this the god: "'Tis yours, O queen, to will

The work which duty binds me to fulfil.
 These airy kingdoms, and this wide command,

Are all the presents of your bounteous
 hand:

Yours is my sov'reign's grace; and, as your guest,

I sit with gods at their celestial feast;
 Raise tempests at your pleasure, or subdue;
 Dispose of empire, which I hold from you."

He said, and hurl'd against the mountain side ¹²⁰

His quiv'ring spear, and all the god applied.

The raging winds rush thro' the hollow
 wound,

And dance aloft in air, and skim along the
 ground;

Then, settling on the sea, the surges sweep, Raise liquid mountains, and disclose the deep.

South, East, and West with mix'd confusion roar,

And roll the foaming billows to the shore.

The cables crack; the sailors' fearful
 cries
 Ascend; and sable night involves the
 skies;

And heav'n itself is ravish'd from their eyes. ¹³⁰

Loud peals of thunder from the poles ensue;

Then flashing fires the transient light renew;

The face of things a frightful image bears,
 And present death in various forms appears.

Struck with unusual fright, the Trojan
 chief,

With lifted hands and eyes, invokes relief;
 And, "Thrice and four times happy those,"
 he cried,

"That under Ilian walls before their parents
 died!

Tydides, bravest of the Grecian train!
 Why could not I by that strong arm be slain, ¹⁴⁰

And lie by noble Hector on the plain,
 Or great Sarpedon, in those bloody fields Where Simois rolls the bodies and the shields

Of heroes, whose dismember'd hands yet
 bear

The dart aloft, and clench the pointed spear!"

Thus while the pious prince his fate be-wails,

Fierce Boreas drove against his flying sails,
 And rent the sheets; the raging billows
 rise,

And mount the tossing vessel to the skies:
 Nor can the shiv'ring oars sustain the blow; ¹⁵⁰

The galley gives her side, and turns her
 prow;

While those astern, descending down the steep,

Thro' gaping waves behold the boiling deep.
 Three ships were hurried by the southern blast,

And on the secret shelves with fury cast.
 Those hidden rocks th' Ausonian sailors
 knew:

They call'd them Altars, when they rose in
 view,

And show'd their spacious backs above the
 flood.

Three more fierce Eurys, in his angry
 mood,

Dash'd on the shallows of the moving sand, ¹⁶⁰

And in mid ocean left them moor'd aland.
Orontes' bark, that bore the Lycian crew,
(A horrid sight!) ev'n in the hero's view,
From stem to stern by waves was over-
borne:

The trembling pilot, from his rudder torn,
Was headlong hurl'd; thrice round the ship was toss'd,

Then bulg'd at once, and in the deep was
lost;

And here and there above the waves were
seen

Arms, pictures, precious goods, and floating
men.

The stoutest vessel to the storm gave way,
And suck'd thro' loosen'd planks the rushing sea. ¹⁷¹

Ilioneus was her chief: Alethes old,
Achates faithful, Abas young and bold, Endur'd not less; their ships, with gaping
seams,

Admit the deluge of the briny streams.

Meantime imperial Neptune heard the
sound

Of raging billows breaking on the ground.
Displeas'd, and fearing for his wat'ry reign,
He rear'd his awful head above the main,
Serene in majesty; then roll'd his eyes ¹⁸⁰
Around the space of earth, and seas, and
skies.

He saw the Trojan fleet dispers'd, dis-
tress'd,

By stormy winds and wintry heav'n op-
press'd.

Full well the god his sister's envy knew,
And what her aims and what her arts pursue.

He summon'd Eurus and the western blast,
And first an angry glance on both he cast;
Then thus rebuk'd: "Audacious winds!
from whence

This bold attempt, this rebel insolence?
Is it for you to ravage seas and land, ¹⁹⁰
Unauthoriz'd by my supreme command?
To raise such mountains on the troubled

main?

Whom I — but first 't is fit the billows to restrain;

And then you shall be taught obedience to my reign.

Hence! to your lord my royal mandate
bear —

The realms of ocean and the fields of air

Are mine, not his. By fatal lot to me
The liquid empire fell, and trident of the sea.

His pow'r to hollow caverns is confin'd:
There let him reign, the jailer of the wind,
With hoarse commands his breathing subjects call, ²⁰¹

And boast and bluster in his empty hall."
He spoke; and, while he spoke, he smooth'd
the sea,

Dispell'd the darkness, and restor'd the day.
Cymothoe, Triton, and the sea-green train
Of beauteous nymphs, the daughters of the
main,

Clear from the rocks the vessels with
their hands:

The god himself with ready trident
stands,

And opes the deep, and spreads the moving sands;

Then heaves them off the shoals. Wheree'er he guides ²¹⁰

His finny coursers and in triumph rides,
The waves unruffle and the sea subsides.

As, when in tumults rise th' ignoble crowd,
Mad are their motions, and their tongues are loud;

And stones and brands in rattling volleys
fly,

And all the rustic arms that fury can supply:

If then some grave and pious man appear,
They hush their noise, and lend a list'ning
ear;

He soothes with sober words their angry
mood,

And quenches their innate desire of blood:
So, when the Father of the Flood appears, ²²¹

And o'er the seas his sov'reign trident
rears,

Their fury falls: he skims the liquid
plains,

High on his chariot, and, with loosen'd
reins,

Majestic moves along, and awful peace maintains.

The weary Trojans ply their shatter'd oars
To nearest land, and make the Libyan shores.

Within a long recess there lies a bay:
An island shades it from the rolling sea,

And forms a port secure for ships to ride; ²³⁰

Broke by the jutting land, on either side,
In double streams the briny waters glide.

Betwixt two rows of rocks a sylvan scene
Appears above, and groves for ever green:
A grot is form'd beneath, with mossy seats,
To rest the Nereids, and exclude the heats.
Down thro' the crannies of the living walls
The crystal streams descend in murm'ring
falls:

No haulsers need to bind the vessels here, Nor bearded anchors; for no storms they
fear. 240

Sev'n ships within this happy harbor meet,
The thin remainders of the scatter'd fleet.
The Trojans, worn with toils, and spent with woes,

Leap on the welcome land, and seek their wish'd repose.

First, good Achates, with repeated strokes

Of clashing flints, their hidden fire provokes:
Short flame succeeds; a bed of wither'd
leaves

The dying sparkles in their fall receives:
Caught into life, in fiery fumes they rise,
And, fed with stronger food, invade the
skies. 250

The Trojans, dropping wet, or stand around
The cheerful blaze, or lie along the ground:
Some dry their corn, infected with the brine,

Then grind with marbles, and prepare to dine.

Æneas climbs the mountain's airy brow,
And takes a prospect of the seas below,
If Capys thence, or Antheus he could spy,
Or see the streamers of Caius fly.
No vessels were in view; but, on the plain,
Three beamy stags command a lordly train
Of branching heads: the more ignoble
throng 261

Attend their stately steps, and slowly graze
along.

He stood; and, while secure they fed below,
He took the quiver and the trusty bow
Achates us'd to bear: the leaders first
He laid along, and then the vulgar pierc'd;
Nor ceas'd his arrows, till the shady plain Sev'n mighty bodies with their blood distain.

For the sev'n ships he made an equal share,
And to the port return'd, triumphant from
the war. 270

The jars of gen'rous wine (Acestes' gift,
When his Trinacrian shores the navy left)
He set abroach, and for the feast prepar'd,
In equal portions with the ven'son shar'd.

Thus while he dealt it round, the pious
chief

With cheerful words allay'd the common
grief:

"Endure, and conquer! Jove will soon dispose

To future good our past and present woes.
With me, the rocks of Scylla you have tried;

Th' inhuman Cyclops and his den defied. 280
What greater ills hereafter can you bear?
Resume your courage and dismiss your
care.

An hour will come, with pleasure to relate
Your sorrows past, as benefits of Fate.

Thro' various hazards and events, we
move

To Latium and the realms foredoom'd by Jove.

Call'd to the seat (the promise of the skies)
Where Trojan kingdoms once again may
rise,

Endure the hardships of your present state;
Live, and reserve yourselves for better
fate." 290

These words he spoke, but spoke not from his heart;

His outward smiles conceal'd his inward
smart.

The jolly crew, unmindful of the past,
The quarry share, their plenteous dinner
haste.

Some strip the skin; some portion out
the spoil;

The limbs, yet trembling, in the cal-
drons boil;

Some on the fire the reeking entrails broil.

Stretch'd on the grassy turf, at ease they
dine,

Restore their strength with meat, and cheer their souls with wine.

Their hunger thus appeas'd, their care
attends 300

The doubtful fortune of their absent
friends:

Alternate hopes and fears their minds possess,

Whether to deem 'em dead, or in distress.
Above the rest, Æneas mourns the fate

Of brave Orontes, and th' uncertain state
Of Gyas, Lyeus, and of Amycus.

The day, but not their sorrows, ended thus.

When, from aloft, almighty Jove surveys

Earth, air, and shores, and navigable seas,
At length on Libyan realms he fix'd his eyes — ³¹⁰

Whom, pond'ring thus on human miseries,
When Venus saw, she with a lowly look,
Not free from tears, her heav'nly sire bespoke:

“O King of Gods and Men! whose awful hand

Disperses thunder on the seas and land,
Disposing all with absolute command;
How could my pious son thy pow'r incense?
Or what, alas! is vanish'd Troy's offense?
Our hope of Italy not only lost,
On various seas by various tempests
toss'd, ³²⁰

But shut from ev'ry shore, and barr'd from ev'ry coast.

You promis'd once, a progeny divine
Of Romans, rising from the Trojan line,
In after times should hold the world in awe,
And to the land and ocean give the law.
How is your doom revers'd, which eas'd
my care

When Troy was ruin'd in that cruel war?
Then fates to fates I could oppose; but now,

When Fortune still pursues her former
blow,

What can I hope? What worse can still succeed? ³³⁰

What end of labors has your will decreed?
Antenor, from the midst of Grecian hosts,
Could pass secure, and pierce th' Illyrian coasts,

Where, rolling down the steep, Timavus
raves

And thro' nine channels disembogues his waves.

At length he founded Padua's happy seat,
And gave his Trojans a secure retreat;
There fix'd their arms, and there renew'd their name,

And there in quiet rules, and crown'd with
fame.

But we, descended from your sacred line,
Entitled to your heav'n and rites divine, ³⁴¹
Are banish'd earth; and, for the wrath of
one,

Remov'd from Latium and the promis'd
throne.

Are these our scepters? these our due rewards?

And is it thus that Jove his plighted faith regards?”

To whom the Father of th' immortal
race,

Smiling with that serene indulgent face,
With which he drives the clouds and clears
the skies,

First gave a holy kiss; then thus replies:

“Daughter, dismiss thy fears: to thy desire ³⁵⁰

The fates of thine are fix'd, and stand entire.

Thou shalt behold thy wish'd Lavinian
walls;

And, ripe for heav'n, when fate Æneas calls,
Then shalt thou bear him up, sublime, to
me:

No councils have revers'd my firm decree.
And, lest new fears disturb thy happy
state,

Know, I have search'd the mystic rolls of
Fate:

Thy son (nor is th' appointed season far)

In Italy shall wage successful war,

Shall tame fierce nations in the bloody field, ³⁶⁰

And sov'reign laws impose, and cities build,
Till, after ev'ry foe subdued, the sun

Thrice thro' the signs his annual race shall
run:

This is his time prefix'd. Ascanius then,

Now call'd Iulus, shall begin his reign.

He thirty rolling years the crown shall wear,

Then from Lavinium shall the seat transfer,
And, with hard labor, Alba Longa build.

The throne with his succession shall be fill'd

Three hundred circuits more: then shall be seen ³⁷⁰

Ilia the fair, a priestess and a queen,

Who, full of Mars, in time, with kindly throes,

Shall at a birth two goodly boys disclose.

The royal babes a tawny wolf shall drain:

Then Romulus his grandsire's throne shall
gain,

Of martial tow'rs the founder shall become,
The people Romans call, the city Rome.

To them no bounds of empire I assign,

Nor term of years to their immortal line.

Ev'n haughty Juno, who, with endless
broils, ³⁸⁰

Earth, seas, and heav'n, and Jove himself
turmoils;

At length aton'd, her friendly pow'r shall
join,

To cherish and advance the Trojan line.
The subject world shall Rome's dominion
own,

And, prostrate, shall adore the nation of the gown.

An age is ripening in revolving fate
When Troy shall overturn the Grecian
state,

And sweet revenge her conqu'ring sons shall call,

To crush the people that conspir'd her fall.
Then Cæsar from the Julian stock shall
rise,

Whose empire ocean, and whose fame the skies ³⁹⁰

Alone shall bound; whom, fraught with eastern spoils,

Our heav'n, the just reward of human toils,
Securely shall repay with rites divine;
And incense shall ascend before his sacred shrine.

Then dire debate and impious war shall
cease,

And the stern age be soften'd into peace:
Then banish'd Faith shall once again return,

And Vestal fires in hallow'd temples burn;
And Remus with Quirinus shall sustain ⁴⁰⁰
The righteous laws, and fraud and force restrain.

Janus himself before his fane shall wait,
And keep the dreadful issues of his gate,
With bolts and iron bars: within remains Imprison'd Fury, bound in brazen chains;
High on a trophy rais'd, of useless arms,
He sits, and threats the world with vain
alarms."

He said, and sent Cyllenius with command
To free the ports, and ope the Punic land
To Trojan guests; lest, ignorant of fate,
The queen might force them from her town and state. ⁴¹¹

Down from the steep of heav'n Cyllenius
flies,

And cleaves with all his wings the yielding
skies.

Soon on the Libyan shore descends the god,
Performs his message, and displays his rod:
The surly murmurs of the people cease;
And, as the fates requir'd, they give the
peace:

The queen herself suspends the rigid laws,
The Trojans pities, and protects their cause.

Meantime, in shades of night Æneas lies: ⁴²⁰

Care seiz'd his soul, and sleep forsook his eyes.

But, when the sun restor'd the cheerful
day,

He rose, the coast and country to survey,
Anxious and eager to discover more.

It look'd a wild uncultivated shore;
But, whether humankind, or beasts alone
Possess'd the new-found region, was unknown.

Beneath a ledge of rocks his fleet he hides:

Tall trees surround the mountain's shady
sides;

The bending brow above a safe retreat provides. ⁴³⁰

Arm'd with two pointed darts, he leaves
his friends,

And true Achates on his steps attends.

Lo! in the deep recesses of the wood,
Before his eyes his goddess mother stood:

A huntress in her habit and her mien;
Her dress a maid, her air confess'd a queen.

Bare were her knees, and knots her garments bind;

Loose was her hair, and wanton'd in the
wind;

Her hand sustain'd a bow; her quiver hung behind.

She seem'd a virgin of the Spartan blood: ⁴⁴⁰

With such array Harpalyce bestrode Her Thracian courser and outstripp'd the rapid flood.

"Ho, strangers! have you lately seen,"
she said,

"One of my sisters, like myself array'd,
Who cross'd the lawn, or in the forest
stray'd?"

A painted quiver at her back she bore;
Varied with spots, a lynx's hide she wore;
And at full cry pursued the tusky boar."

Thus Venus: thus her son replied again:
"None of your sisters have we heard or seen, ⁴⁵⁰

O virgin! or what other name you bear
Above that style — O more than mortal
fair!

Your voice and mien celestial birth betray!
If, as you seem, the sister of the day,

Or one at least of chaste Diana's train,
Let not an humble suppliant sue in vain;

But tell a stranger, long in tempests toss'd,
What earth we tread, and who commands
the coast?

Then on your name shall wretched mortals
call,

And offer'd victims at your altars fall." 460
"I dare not," she replied, "assume the
name

Of goddess, or celestial honors claim:
For Tyrian virgins bows and quivers bear,
And purple buskins o'er their ankles wear.
Know, gentle youth, in Libyan lands you are —

A people rude in peace, and rough in war.
The rising city, which from far you see,
Is Carthage, and a Tyrian colony.

Phœnician Dido rules the growing state,
Who fled from Tyre, to shun her brother's
hate. 470

Great were her wrongs, her story full of
fate;

Which I will sum in short. Sichæus,
known

For wealth, and brother to the Punic throne,
Possess'd fair Dido's bed; and either heart
At once was wounded with an equal dart.
Her father gave her, yet a spotless maid;
Pygmalion then the Tyrian scepter sway'd:
One who contemn'd divine and human laws.
Then strife ensued, and cursed gold the cause.

The monarch, blinded with desire of wealth,
With steel invades his brother's life by stealth; 481

Before the sacred altar made him bleed,
And long from her conceal'd the cruel deed.
Some tale, some new pretense, he daily
coin'd,

To soothe his sister, and delude her mind.
At length, in dead of night, the ghost
appears

Of her unhappy lord: the specter stares,
And, with erected eyes, his bloody bosom
bares.

The cruel altars and his fate he tells,
And the dire secret of his house reveals, 490
Then warns the widow, with her household
gods,

To seek a refuge in remote abodes.
Last, to support her in so long a way,
He shows her where his hidden treasure lay.
Admonish'd thus, and seiz'd with mortal
fright,

The queen provides companions of her
flight:

They meet, and all combine to leave the
state,

Who hate the tyrant, or who fear his hate.

They seize a fleet, which ready rigg'd they
find;

Nor is Pygmalion's treasure left behind. 500
The vessels, heavy laden, put to sea
With prosp'rous winds; a woman leads the
way.

I know not, if by stress of weather driv'n,
Or was their fatal course dispos'd by Heav'n;

At last they landed, where from far your
eyes

May view the turrets of new Carthage rise;
There bought a space of ground, which (Byrsa call'd,

From the bull's hide) they first inclos'd, and wall'd.

But whence are you? what country claims your birth?

What seek you, strangers, on our Libyan
earth?" 510

To whom, with sorrow streaming from
his eyes,

And deeply sighing, thus her son replies:
"Could you with patience hear, or I re-
late,

O nymph, the tedious annals of our fate!
Thro' such a train of woes if I should run,
The day would sooner than the tale be done!
From ancient Troy, by force expell'd, we
came —

If you by chance have heard the Trojan
name.

On various seas by various tempests toss'd,
At length we landed on your Libyan coast.
The good Æneas am I call'd — a name, 521 While Fortune favor'd, not unknown to
fame.

My household gods, companions of my woes,

With pious care I rescued from our foes.
To fruitful Italy my course was bent;
And from the King of Heav'n is my descent.

With twice ten sail I cross'd the Phrygian
sea;

Fate and my mother goddess led my way.
Scarce sev'n, the thin remainders of my fleet,

From storms preserv'd, within your harbor
meet. 530

Myself distress'd, an exile, and unknown, Debarr'd from Europe, and from Asia
thrown,

In Libyan deserts wander thus alone." }
His tender parent could no longer bear;

But, interposing, sought to soothe his care.
 "Whoe'er you are — not unbelov'd by Heav'n,
 Since on our friendly shore your ships are
 driv'n —

Have courage: to the gods permit the rest,
 And to the queen expose your just request.
 Now take this earnest of success, for more:
 Your scatter'd fleet is join'd upon the shore;
 The winds are chang'd, your friends from danger free; 542

Or I renounce my skill in augury.
 Twelve swans behold in beauteous order
 move,

And stoop with closing pinions from above;
 Whom late the bird of Jove had driv'n
 along,

And thro' the clouds pursued the scatt'ring
 throng:

Now, all united in a goodly team,
 They skim the ground, and seek the quiet stream.

As they, with joy returning, clap their wings, 550

And ride the circuit of the skies in rings;
 Not otherwise your ships, and ev'ry friend,
 Already hold the port, or with swift sails descend.

No more advice is needful; but pursue
 The path before you, and the town in view."

Thus having said, she turn'd, and made appear

Her neck refulgent, and dishevel'd hair,
 Which, flowing from her shoulders, reach'd
 the ground,

And widely spread ambrosial scents around:
 In length of train descends her sweeping gown; 560

And, by her graceful walk, the Queen of Love is known.

The prince pursued the parting deity
 With words like these: "Ah! whither do you fly?

Unkind and cruel! to deceive your son
 In borrow'd shapes, and his embrace to shun;

Never to bless my sight, but thus unknown;
 And still to speak in accents not your
 own."

Against the goddess these complaints he
 made,

But took the path, and her commands
 obey'd.

They march obscure; for Venus kindly shrouds 570

With mists their persons, and involves in clouds,

That, thus unseen, their passage none might
 stay,

Or force to tell the causes of their way.
 This part perform'd, the goddess flies sublime

To visit Paphos and her native clime;
 Where garlands, ever green and ever fair,
 With vows are offer'd, and with solemn
 pray'r:

A hundred altars in her temple smoke;
 A thousand bleeding hearts her pow'r invoke.

They climb the next ascent, and, looking
 down, 580

Now at a nearer distance view the town.

The prince with wonder sees the stately
 tow'rs,

Which late were huts and shepherds'
 homely bow'rs,

The gates and streets; and hears, from ev'ry part,

The noise and busy concourse of the mart.
 The toiling Tyrians on each other call

To ply their labor: some extend the wall;
 Some build the citadel; the brawny throng
 Or dig, or push unwieldy stones along.

Some for their dwellings choose a spot of
 ground, 590

Which, first design'd, with ditches they surround.

Some laws ordain; and some attend the choice

Of holy senates, and elect by voice.
 Here some design a mole, while others
 there

Lay deep foundations for a theater;
 From marble quarries mighty columns
 hew,

For ornaments of scenes, and future view.
 Such is their toil, and such their busy
 pains,

As exercise the bees in flow'ry plains,
 When winter past, and summer scarce
 begun, 600

Invites them forth to labor in the sun;
 Some lead their youth abroad, while some condense

Their liquid store, and some in cells dispense;

Some at the gate stand ready to receive
 The golden burthen, and their friends relieve;

All, with united force, combine to drive

The lazy drones from the laborious hive:
With envy stung, they view each other's deeds;

The fragrant work with diligence proceeds.
"Thrice happy you, whose walls already rise!" ⁶¹⁰

Æneas said, and view'd, with lifted eyes,
Their lofty tow'rs; then, ent'ring at the gate,

Conceal'd in clouds (prodigious to relate)
He mix'd, unmark'd, among the busy
throng,

Borne by the tide, and pass'd unseen along.
Full in the center of the town there
stood,

Thick set with trees, a venerable wood.
The Tyrians, landing near this holy ground,
And digging here, a prosp'rous omen
found:

From under earth a courser's head they drew, ⁶²⁰

Their growth and future fortune to fore-shew.

This fated sign their foundress Juno gave,
Of a soil fruitful, and a people brave.

Sidonian Dido here with solemn state
Did Juno's temple build, and consecrate, Enrich'd with gifts, and with a golden
shrine;

But more the goddess made the place
divine.

On brazen steps the marble threshold rose,
And brazen plates the cedar beams inclose:
The rafters are with brazen cov'rings
crown'd; ⁶³⁰

The lofty doors on brazen hinges sound.
What first Æneas in this place beheld,
Reviv'd his courage, and his fear expell'd.
For while, expecting there the queen, he rais'd

His wond'ring eyes, and round the temple
gaz'd,

Admir'd the fortune of the rising town,
The striving artists, and their arts' renown;
He saw, in order painted on the wall,
Whatever did unhappy Troy befall:

The wars that fame around the world had blown, ⁶⁴⁰

All to the life, and ev'ry leader known.
There Agamemnon, Priam here, he spies,
And fierce Achilles, who both kings defies.
He stopp'd, and weeping said: "O friend!
ev'n here

The monuments of Trojan woes appear!
Our known disasters fill ev'n foreign lands:

See there, where old unhappy Priam stands!
Ev'n the mute walls relate the warrior's fame, ⁶⁴⁸

And Trojan griefs the Tyrians' pity claim."
He said (his tears a ready passage find),
Devouring what he saw so well design'd,
And with an empty picture fed his mind:
For there he saw the fainting Grecians
yield,

And here the trembling Trojans quit the
field,

Pursued by fierce Achilles thro' the plain,
On his high chariot driving o'er the slain.
The tents of Rhesus next his grief renew,
By their white sails betray'd to nightly
view;

And wakeful Diomede, whose cruel sword
The sentries slew, nor spar'd their slumb'ring lord, ⁶⁶⁰

Then took the fiery steeds, ere yet the food
Of Troy they taste, or drink the Xanthian
flood.

Elsewhere he saw where Troilus defied Achilles, and unequal combat tried;
'Then, where the boy disarm'd, with loosen'd
reins,

Was by his horses hurried o'er the plains,
Hung by the neck and hair, and dragg'd
around:

The hostile spear, yet sticking in his
wound,

With tracks of blood inscrib'd the dusty
ground.

Meantime the Trojan dames, oppress'd with woe, ⁶⁷⁰

To Pallas' fane in long procession go,
In hopes to reconcile their heav'nly foe.
They weep, they beat their breasts, they rend their hair,

And rich embroider'd vests for presents
bear;

But the stern goddess stands unmov'd with pray'r.

Thrice round the Trojan walls Achilles
drew

The corpse of Hector, whom in fight he slew.

Here Priam sues; and there, for sums of
gold,

The lifeless body of his son is sold.

So sad an object, and so well express'd, ⁶⁸⁰
Drew sighs and groans from the griev'd hero's breast,

To see the figure of his lifeless friend,
And his old sire his helpless hand extend.

Himself he saw amidst the Grecian train,
 Mix'd in the bloody battle on the plain;
 And swarthy Memnon in his arms he knew,
 His pompous ensigns, and his Indian crew.
 Penthisilea there, with haughty grace,
 Leads to the wars an Amazonian race:
 In their right hands a pointed dart they wield;

The left, for ward, sustains the lunar shield.⁶⁹⁰ Athwart her breast a golden belt she } throws,

Amidst the press alone provokes a thousand foes,
 And dares her maiden arms to manly force oppose.

Thus while the Trojan prince employs
 his eyes,

Fix'd on the walls with wonder and surprise,
 The beauteous Dido, with a num'rous train
 And pomp of guards, ascends the sacred fane.

Such on Eurotas' banks, or Cynthus' height,
 Diana seems; and so she charms the sight,
 When in the dance the graceful goddess leads

The choir of nymphs, and overtops their heads:

Known by her quiver, and her lofty mien,
 She walks majestic, and she looks their
 queen;

Latona sees her shine above the rest,
 And feeds with secret joy her silent breast.
 Such Dido was; with such becoming state, Amidst the crowd, she walks serenely great.

Their labor to her future sway she speeds,
 And passing with a gracious glance proceeds;

Then mounts the throne, high plac'd before the shrine:

In crowds around, the swarming people
 join.

She takes petitions, and dispenses laws,
 Hears and determines ev'ry private cause;
 Their tasks in equal portions she divides,
 And, where unequal, there by lots decides.
 Another way by chance Æneas bends
 His eyes, and unexpected sees his friends, Antheus, Sergestus grave, Cloanthus strong,
 And at their backs a mighty Trojan throng, Whom late the tempest on the billows
 toss'd,

And widely scatter'd on another coast.⁷²¹
 The prince, unseen, surpris'd with wonder
 stands,

And longs, with joyful haste, to join their
 hands;

But, doubtful of the wish'd event, he stays,
 And from the hollow cloud his friends surveys,

Impatient till they told their present state,
 And where they left their ships, and what their fate,

And why they came, and what was their request;

For these were sent, commission'd by the
 rest,

To sue for leave to land their sickly men,
 And gain admission to the gracious queen.
 Ent'ring, with cries they fill'd the holy
 fane;

Then thus, with lowly voice, Ilioneus began:

"O queen! indulg'd by favor of the gods

To found an empire in these new abodes,
 To build a town, with statutes to restrain
 The wild inhabitants beneath thy reign,
 We wretched Trojans, toss'd on ev'ry shore,
 From sea to sea, thy clemency implore.⁷⁴⁰
 Forbid the fires our shipping to deface!
 Receive th' unhappy fugitives to grace,
 And spare the remnant of a pious race!
 We come not with design of wasteful prey,
 To drive the country, force the swains
 away:

Nor such our strength, nor such is our desire;
 The vanquish'd dare not to such thoughts
 aspire.

A land there is, Hesperia nam'd of old;
 The soil is fruitful, and the men are bold —
 Th' Ænотrians held it once — by common
 fame

Now call'd Italia, from the leader's name.⁷⁵⁰
 To that sweet region was our voyage bent,
 When winds and ev'ry warring element Disturb'd our course, and, far from sight of
 land,

Cast our torn vessels on the moving sand:
 The sea came on; the South, with mighty
 roar,

Dispers'd and dash'd the rest upon the rocky shore.

Those few you see escap'd the storm, and
 fear,

Unless you interpose, a shipwreck here.
 What men, what monsters, what inhuman
 race,

What laws, what barb'rous customs of the
 place,

Shut up a desert shore to drowning men,
And drive us to the cruel seas again ?
If our hard fortune no compassion draws,
Nor hospitable rights, nor human laws,
The gods are just, and will revenge our
cause.

Æneas was our prince: a juster lord,
Or nobler warrior, never drew a sword;
Observant of the right, religious of his word.

If yet he lives, and draws this vital air, ⁷⁷⁰
Nor we, his friends, of safety shall despair;
Nor you, great queen, these offices repent,
Which he will equal, and perhaps augment.

We want not cities, nor Sicilian coasts,
Where King Acestes Trojan lineage boasts.
Permit our ships a shelter on your shores, Refitted from your woods with planks and
oars,

That, if our prince be safe, we may renew
Our destin'd course, and Italy pursue.
But if, O best of men, the Fates ordain ⁷⁸⁰
That thou art swallow'd in the Libyan
main,

And if our young Iulus be no more,
Dismiss our navy from your friendly shore,
That we to good Acestes may return,
And with our friends our common losses
mourn."

Thus spoke Ilioneus: the Trojan crew
With cries and clamors his request renew.

The modest queen a while, with downcast
eyes,
Ponder'd the speech; then briefly thus replies:

"Trojans, dismiss your fears; my cruel fate, ⁷⁹⁰

And doubts attending an unsettled state, Force me to guard my coast from foreign foes.

Who has not heard the story of your woes,
The name and fortune of your native place,
The fame and valor of the Phrygian race ?
We Tyrians are not so devoid of sense,
Nor so remote from Phœbus' influence.

Whether to Latian shores your course is bent,

Or, driv'n by tempests from your first intent,

You seek the good Acestes' government,
Your men shall be receiv'd, your fleet repair'd, ⁸⁰¹

And sail, with ships of convoy for your guard:

Or, would you stay, and join your friendly pow'rs

To raise and to defend the Tyrian
tow'rs,

My wealth, my city, and myself are yours.

And would to Heav'n, the storm, you felt,
would bring

On Carthaginian coasts your wand'ring
king.

My people shall, by my command, explore
The ports and creeks of ev'ry winding
shore,

And towns, and wilds, and shady woods, in quest ⁸¹⁰

Of so renown'd and so desir'd a guest."

Rais'd in his mind the Trojan hero
stood,

And long'd to break from out his ambient
cloud:

Achates found it, and thus urg'd his way:

"From whence, O goddess-born, this long
delay ?

What more can you desire, your welcome
sure,

Your fleet in safety, and your friends secure ?

One only wants; and him we saw in vain Oppose the storm, and swallow'd in the
main.

Orontes in his fate our forfeit paid; ⁸²⁰
The rest agrees with what your mother
said."

Scarce had he spoken, when the cloud gave way,

The mists flew upward and dissolv'd in day.

The Trojan chief appear'd in open sight,

August in visage, and serenely bright.

His mother goddess, with her hands divine,
Had form'd his curling locks, and made his temples shine,

And giv'n his rolling eyes a sparkling
grace,

And breath'd a youthful vigor on his face;

Like polish'd iv'ry, beauteous to behold, ⁸³⁰

Or Parian marble, when enchas'd in gold:

Thus radiant from the circling cloud he broke,

And thus with manly modesty he spoke:

"He whom you seek am I; by tempests
toss'd,

And sav'd from shipwreck on your Libyan
coast;

Presenting, gracious queen, before your
throne,

A prince that owes his life to you alone.
Fair majesty, the refuge and redress
Of those whom fate pursues, and wants oppress,

You, who your pious offices employ ⁸⁴⁰
To save the relics of abandon'd Troy;
Receive the shipwreck'd on your friendly
shore,

With hospitable rites relieve the poor;
Associate in your town a wand'ring train,
And strangers in your palace entertain:
What thanks can wretched fugitives return,
Who, scatter'd thro' the world, in exile
mourn?

The gods, if gods to goodness are inclin'd;
If acts of mercy touch their heav'nly mind,
And, more than all the gods, your gen'rous heart, ⁸⁵⁰

Conscious of worth, requite its own desert!
In you this age is happy, and this earth,
And parents more than mortal gave you birth.

While rolling rivers into seas shall run,
And round the space of heav'n the radiant
sun;

While trees the mountain tops with shades
supply,
Your honor, name, and praise shall never
die.

Whate'er abode my fortune has assign'd,
Your image shall be present in my mind."
Thus having said, he turn'd with pious haste, ⁸⁶⁰
And joyful his expecting friends em-
brac'd:

With his right hand Ilioneus was grac'd,
Serestus with his left; then to his breast
Cloanthus and the noble Gyas press'd;
And so by turns descended to the rest.

The Tyrian queen stood fix'd upon his
face,

Pleas'd with his motions, ravish'd with his
grace;

Admir'd his fortunes, more admir'd the
man;

Then recollected stood, and thus began:

"What fate, O goddess-born! what angry
pow'rs ⁸⁷⁰

Have cast you shipwreck'd on our barren
shores?

Are you the great Æneas, known to fame,
Who from celestial seed your lineage
claim?

The same Æneas whom fair Venus bore
To fam'd Anchises on th' Idæan shore?

It calls into my mind, tho' then a child,
When Teucer came, from Salamis exil'd,
And sought my father's aid, to be restor'd:
My father Belus then with fire and sword
Invaded Cyprus, made the region bare, ⁸⁸⁰
And, conqu'ring, finish'd the successful
war.

From him the Trojan siege I understood,
The Grecian chiefs, and your illustrious
blood.

Your foe himself the Dardan valor prais'd,
And his own ancestry from Trojans rais'd.
Enter, my noble guest, and you shall find,
If not a costly welcome, yet a kind:
For I myself, like you, have been dis-
tress'd,

Till Heav'n afforded me this place of rest;
Like you, an alien in a land unknown, ⁸⁹⁰
I learn to pity woes so like my own."

She said, and to the palace led her guest;
Then offer'd incense, and proclaim'd a feast.
Nor yet less careful for her absent friends,
Twice ten fat oxen to the ships she sends;
Besides a hundred boars, a hundred lambs,
With bleating cries, attend their milky dams;

And jars of gen'rous wine and spacious bowls

She gives, to cheer the sailors' drooping souls.

Now purple hangings clothe the palace walls, ⁹⁰⁰

And sumptuous feasts are made in splendid halls:

On Tyrian carpets, richly wrought, they
dine;

With loads of massy plate the sideboards
shine,

And antique vases, all of gold emboss'd
(The gold itself inferior to the cost),
Of curious work, where on the sides were
seen

The fights and figures of illustrious men,
From their first founder to the present
queen.

The good Æneas, whose paternal care
Iulus' absence could no longer bear, ⁹¹⁰
Dispatch'd Achates to the ships in haste,
To give a glad relation of the past,
And, fraught with precious gifts, to bring the boy,

Snatch'd from the ruins of unhappy Troy:
A robe of tissue, stiff with golden wire;
An upper vest, once Helen's rich attire,
From Argos by the fam'd adulteress brought,

With golden flow'rs and winding foliage
wrought,

Her mother Leda's present, when she came
To ruin Troy and set the world on flame;
The scepter Priam's eldest daughter bore,
Her orient necklace, and the crown she wore; 922

Of double texture, glorious to behold,
One order set with gems, and one with
gold.

Instructed thus, the wise Achates goes,
And in his diligence his duty shows.

But Venus, anxious for her son's affairs,
New counsels tries, and new designs prepares:

That Cupid should assume the shape and
face

Of sweet Ascanius, and the sprightly grace;
Should bring the presents, in her nephew's
stead, 931

And in Eliza's veins the gentle poison shed:
For much she fear'd the Tyrians, double-tongued,

And knew the town to Juno's care be-long'd.

These thoughts by night her golden slumbers
broke,

And thus alarm'd, to winged Love she
spoke:

"My son, my strength, whose mighty pow'r
alone

Controls the Thund'rer on his awful
throne,

To thee thy much-afflicted mother flies,
And on thy succor and thy faith relies. 940

Thou know'st, my son, how Jove's revengeful wife,

By force and fraud, attempts thy brother's
life;

And often hast thou mourn'd with me his
pains.

Him Dido now with blandishment de-
tains;

But I suspect the town where Juno
reigns.

For this 't is needful to prevent her art,
And fire with love the proud Phœnician's
heart:

A love so violent, so strong, so sure,
As neither age can change, nor art can cure.

How this may be perform'd, now take my
mind: 950

Ascanius by his father is design'd
To come, with presents laden, from the port,

To gratify the queen, and gain the court.
I mean to plunge the boy in pleasing sleep,
And, ravish'd, in Idalian bow'rs to keep,
Or high Cythera, that the sweet deceit May pass unseen, and none prevent the cheat.

Take thou his form and shape. I beg the grace

But only for a night's revolving space:
Thyself a boy, assume a boy's dissembled
face; 960

That when, amidst the fervor of the feast,
The Tyrian hugs and fonds thee on her
breast,

And with sweet kisses in her arms con-
strains,

Thou may'st infuse thy venom in her veins."

The God of Love obeys, and sets aside
His bow and quiver, and his plummy pride;
He walks Iulus in his mother's sight,
And in the sweet resemblance takes delight.

The goddess then to young Ascanius
flies,

And in a pleasing slumber seals his eyes: 970
Lull'd in her lap, amidst a train of Loves,
She gently bears him to her blissful groves,

Then with a wreath of myrtle crowns his
head,

And softly lays him on a flow'ry bed.
Cupid meantime assum'd his form and
face,

Foll'wing Achates with a shorter pace,
And brought the gifts. The queen already sate

Amidst the Trojan lords, in shining state,
High on a golden bed: her princely guest Was next her side; in order sate the
rest. 980

Then canisters with bread are heap'd
on high;

Th' attendants water for their hands supply,

And, having wash'd, with silken towels
dry.

Next fifty handmaids in long order bore
The censers, and with fumes the gods adore:

Then youths, and virgins twice as many,
join

To place the dishes, and to serve the wine.
The Tyrian train, admitted to the feast,

Approach, and on the painted couches rest.
All on the Trojan gifts with wonder gaze, 990

But view the beauteous boy with more amaze,

His rosy-color'd cheeks, his radiant eyes,
His motions, voice, and shape, and all the god's disguise;

Nor pass unprais'd the vest and veil divine,
Which wand'ring foliage and rich flow'rs entwine.

But, far above the rest, the royal dame,
(Already doom'd to love's disastrous flame,)
With eyes insatiate, and tumultuous joy,
Beholds the presents, and admires the boy.

The guileful god about the hero long, ¹⁰⁰⁰
With children's play, and false embraces,
hung;

Then sought the queen: she took him to her arms

With greedy pleasure, and devour'd his charms.

Unhappy Dido little thought what guest,
How dire a god, she drew so near her
breast;

But he, not mindless of his mother's
pray'r,

Works in the pliant bosom of the fair,
And molds her heart anew, and blots
her former care. }

The dead is to the living love resign'd;
And all Æneas enters in her mind. ¹⁰¹⁰

Now, when the rage of hunger was ap-peas'd,

The meat remov'd, and ev'ry guest was pleas'd,

The golden bowls with sparkling wine are
crown'd,

And thro' the palace cheerful cries resound.
From gilded roofs depending lamps display
Nocturnal beams, that emulate the day.

A golden bowl, that shone with gems
divine, }

The queen commanded to be crown'd with wine: }

The bowl that Belus us'd, and all the Tyrian line. }

Then, silence thro' the hall proclaim'd, she spoke: ¹⁰²⁰

"O hospitable Jove! we thus invoke,
With solemn rites, thy sacred name and
pow'r;

Bless to both nations this auspicious hour!
So may the Trojan and the Tyrian line
In lasting concord from this day combine.
Thou, Bacchus, god of joys and friendly
cheer,

And gracious Juno, both be present here!

And you, my lords of Tyre, your vows address

To Heav'n with mine, to ratify the peace."
The goblet then she took, with nectar
crown'd, ¹⁰³⁰

(Sprinkling the first libations on the ground,)
And rais'd it to her mouth with sober grace;
Then, sipping, offer'd to the next in place.

'T was Bitias whom she call'd, a thirsty
soul;

He took the challenge, and embrac'd the bowl,

With pleasure swill'd the gold, nor ceas'd to draw,

Till he the bottom of the brimmer saw.
The goblet goes around: Iopas brought

His golden lyre, and sung what ancient Atlas taught: ¹⁰³⁹

The various labors of the wand'ring moon,
And whence proceed th' eclipses of the sun;
Th' original of men and beasts; and whence }

The rains arise, and fires their warmth dispend, }

And fix'd and erring stars dispose their influence; }

What shakes the solid earth; what cause delays

The summer nights and shortens winter days.

With peals of shouts the Tyrians praise the
song;

Those peals are echo'd by the Trojan throng.
Th' unhappy queen with talk prolong'd the
night,

And drank large draughts of love with vast delight; ¹⁰⁵⁰

Of Priam much enquir'd, of Hector more;
Then ask'd what arms the swarthy Memnon wore, }

What troops he landed on the Trojan
shore; }

The steeds of Diomed varied the discourse,
And fierce Achilles, with his matchless
force;

At length, as fate and her ill stars requir'd,
To hear the series of the war desir'd.

"Relate at large, my godlike guest," she
said,

"The Grecian stratagems, the town be-
tray'd:

The fatal issue of so long a war, ¹⁰⁶⁰
Your flight, your wand'rings, and your woes, declare;

For, since on ev'ry sea, on ev'ry coast,

Your men have been distress'd, your navy
toss'd,
Sev'n times the sun has either tropic view'd,
The winter banish'd, and the spring re-
new'd."

THE SECOND BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

Æneas relates how the city of Troy was taken, after a ten years' siege, by the treachery of Sinon, and the stratagem of a wooden horse. He declares the fix'd resolution he had taken not to survive the ruins of his country, and the various adventures he met with in the defense of it. At last, having been before advis'd by Hector's ghost, and now by the appearance of his mother Venus, he is prevail'd upon to leave the town, and settle his household gods in another country. In order to this, he carries off his father on his shoulders, and leads his little son by the hand, his wife following him behind. When he comes to the place appointed for the general rendezvous, he finds a great confluence of people, but misses his wife, whose ghost afterwards appears to him, and tells him the land which was design'd for him.

ALL were attentive to the godlike man,
When from his lofty couch he thus began:
"Great queen, what you command me to relate

Renews the sad remembrance of our fate:
An empire from its old foundations rent,
And ev'ry woe the Trojans underwent;
A peopled city made a desert place;
All that I saw, and part of which I was:
Not ev'n the hardest of our foes could
hear,

Nor stern Ulysses tell without a tear. 10
And now the latter watch of wasting night,
And setting stars, to kindly rest invite;
But, since you take such int'rest in our
woe,

And Troy's disastrous end desire to know,
I will restrain my tears, and briefly tell
What in our last and fatal night befell.

"By destiny compell'd, and in despair,
The Greeks grew weary of the tedious
war,

And by Minerva's aid a fabric rear'd,
Which like a steed of monstrous height
appear'd: 20

The sides were plank'd with pine; they feign'd it made

For their return, and this the vow they paid.
Thus they pretend, but in the hollow side
Selected numbers of their soldiers hide:
With inward arms the dire machine they load,

And iron bowels stuff the dark abode.

In sight of Troy lies Tenedos, an isle (While Fortune did on Priam's empire smile)

Renown'd for wealth; but, since, a faithless bay,

Where ships expos'd to wind and weather
lay.

There was their fleet conceal'd. We thought, for Greece 30

Their sails were hoisted, and our fears release.

The Trojans, coop'd within their walls so long,

Unbar their gates, and issue in a throng,
Like swarming bees, and with delight survey

The camp deserted, where the Grecians
lay:

The quarters of the sev'ral chiefs they
show'd;

Here Phoenix, here Achilles, made abode; }
Here join'd the battles; there the navy rode.

Part on the pile their wond'ring eyes employ: 40

The pile by Pallas rais'd to ruin Troy.

Thymætès first ('t is doubtful whether hir'd,

Or so the Trojan destiny requir'd)

Mov'd that the ramparts might be broken
down,

To lodge the monster fabric in the town.

But Capys, and the rest of sounder mind,

The fatal present to the flames design'd,

Or to the wat'ry deep; at least to bore

The hollow sides, and hidden frauds explore.

The giddy vulgar, as their fancies guide, 50
With noise say nothing, and in parts divide.

Laocoon, follow'd by a num'rous crowd,

Ran from the fort, and cried, from far,
aloud:

'O wretched countrymen! what fury reigns?
What more than madness has possess'd your brains?

Think you the Grecians from your coasts are gone?

And are Ulysses' arts no better known?
 This hollow fabric either must inclose,
 Within its blind recess, our secret foes;
 Or 'tis an engine rais'd above the town, 60
 T' o'erlook the walls, and then to batter
 down.

Somewhat is sure design'd, by fraud or
 force:

Trust not their presents, nor admit the horse.'

Thus having said, against the steed he threw

His forceful spear, which, hissing as it flew, Pierc'd thro' the yielding planks of jointed
 wood,

And trembling in the hollow belly stood.
 The sides, transpierc'd, return a rattling
 sound,

And groans of Greeks inclos'd come issuing thro' the wound.

And, had not Heav'n the fall of Troy de-
 sign'd, 70

Or had not men been fated to be blind, Enough was said and done t' inspire a better mind.

Then had our lances pierc'd the treach'rous
 wood,

And Ilian tow'rs and Priam's empire stood.
 Meantime, with shouts, the Trojan shepherds bring

A captive Greek, in bands, before the king; Taken, to take; who made himself their
 prey,

T' impose on their belief, and Troy betray;
 Fix'd on his aim, and obstinately bent
 To die undaunted, or to circumvent. 80

About the captive, tides of Trojans flow;
 All press to see, and some insult the foe.

Now hear how well the Greeks their wiles
 disguis'd;

Behold a nation in a man compris'd.
 Trembling the misereant stood, unarm'd and bound;

He star'd, and roll'd his haggard eyes
 around,

Then said: 'Alas! what earth remains, what
 sea

Is open to receive unhappy me?
 What fate a wretched fugitive attends,

Scorn'd by my foes, abandon'd by my
 friends?' 90

He said, and sigh'd, and cast a rueful eye:
 Our pity kindles, and our passions die.

We cheer the youth to make his own defense,

And freely tell us what he was, and whence:
 What news he could impart, we long to
 know,

And what to credit from a captive foe.

"His fear at length dismiss'd, he said:
 'Whate'er

My fate ordains, my words shall be sincere:
 I neither can nor dare my birth disclaim;

Greece is my country, Sinon is my name. 100
 Tho' plung'd by Fortune's pow'r in misery,

'Tis not in Fortune's pow'r to make me lie.
 If any chance has hither brought the name

Of Palamedes, not unknown to fame,
 Who suffer'd from the malice of the times,

Accus'd and sentenc'd for pretended crimes,
 Because these fatal wars he would prevent;

Whose death the wretched Greeks too late lament —

Me, then a boy, my father, poor and bare }
 Of other means, committed to his care, 110 }

His kinsman and companion in the war. }
 While Fortune favor'd, while his arms support

The cause, and rul'd the counsels, of the court,

I made some figure there; nor was my
 name

Obscure, nor I without my share of fame.
 But when Ulysses, with fallacious arts,

Had made impression in the people's hearts,
 And forg'd a treason in my patron's name

(I speak of things too far divulg'd by fame),
 My kinsman fell. Then I, without support, 120

In private mourn'd his loss, and left the court.

Mad as I was, I could not bear his fate
 With silent grief, but loudly blam'd the
 state,

And curs'd the direful author of my woes.
 'T was told again; and hence my ruin rose.

I threaten'd, if indulgent Heav'n once
 more

Would land me safely on my native shore, }
 His death with double vengeance to restore. }

This mov'd the murderer's hate; and soon ensued

Th' effects of malice from a man so proud. 130 Ambiguous rumors thro' the camp he
 spread,

And sought, by treason, my devoted head;
 New crimes invented; left unturn'd no
 stone,

To make my guilt appear, and hide his own;

Till Calchas was by force and threat'ning
wrought —

But why — why dwell I on that anxious
thought ?

If on my nation just revenge you seek,
And 't is t' appear a foe, t' appear a Greek;
Already you my name and country know; Assuage your thirst of blood, and strike the
blow: 140

My death will both the kingly brothers
please,

And set insatiate Ithacus at ease.'

This fair unfinished tale, these broken starts,

Rais'd expectations in our longing
hearts;

Unknowing as we were in Grecian arts.

His former trembling once again renew'd,
With acted fear, the villain thus pursued:

“‘Long had the Grecians (tir'd with fruitless care,

And wearied with an unsuccessful war)

Resolv'd to raise the siege, and leave the
town; 150

And, had the gods permitted, they had gone;

But oft the wintry seas and southern winds Withstood their passage home, and chang'd their minds.

Portents and prodigies their souls amaz'd;
But most, when this stupendous pile was
rais'd:

Then flaming meteors, hung in air, were
seen,

And thunders rattled thro' a sky serene.

Dismay'd, and fearful of some dire event,
Eurypylos t' enquire their fate was sent.

He from the gods this dreadful answer
brought: 160

“O Grecians, when the Trojan shores
you sought,

Your passage with a virgin's blood was bought:

So must your safe return be bought again,
And Grecian blood once more atone the
main.”

The spreading rumor round the people ran;
All fear'd, and each believ'd himself the
man.

Ulysses took th' advantage of their fright;
Call'd Calchas, and produc'd in open sight:
Then bade him name the wretch, ordain'd
by fate

The public victim, to redeem the state. 170
Already some presag'd the dire event,

And saw what sacrifice Ulysses meant.

For twice five days the good old seer with-
stood

Th' intended treason, and was dumb to
blood,

Till, tir'd with endless clamors and pursuit
Of Ithacus, he stood no longer mute;

But, as it was agreed, pronounc'd that I

Was destin'd by the wrathful gods to die.

All prais'd the sentence, pleas'd the storm should fall

On one alone, whose fury threaten'd all. 180

The dismal day was come; the priests
prepare

Their heaven'd cakes, and fillets for my
hair.

I follow'd nature's laws, and must avow

I broke my bonds and fled the fatal blow.

Hid in a weedy lake all night I lay,

Secure of safety when they sail'd away.

But now what further hopes for me re-
main,

To see my friends, or native soil, again;

My tender infants, or my careful sire, 189

Whom they returning will to death require;

Will perpetrate on them their first design,

And take the forfeit of their heads for mine ?

Which, O ! if pity mortal minds can move,

If there be faith below, or gods above,

If innocence and truth can claim desert,

Ye Trojans, from an injur'd wretch avert.'

“False tears true pity move; the king commands

To loose his fetters, and unbind his hands:

Then adds these friendly words: ‘Dismiss thy fears;

Forget the Greeks; be mine as thou wert
theirs. 200

But truly tell, was it for force or guile,

Or some religious end, you rais'd the pile ?’

Thus said the king. He, full of fraudulent arts,

This well-invented tale for truth imparts:

‘Ye lamps of heav'n !’ he said, and lifted
high

His hands now free, ‘thou venerable sky !

Inviolable pow'rs, ador'd with dread !

Ye fatal fillets, that once bound this
head !

Ye sacred altars, from whose flames I fled !

Be all of you adjur'd; and grant I may, 210

Without a crime, th' ungrateful Greeks betray,

Reveal the secrets of the guilty state,
And justly punish whom I justly hate!
But you, O king, preserve the faith you gave,

If I, to save myself, your empire save.
The Grecian hopes, and all th' attempts they
made,

Were only founded on Minerva's aid.
But from the time when impious Diomede,
And false Ulysses, that inventive head,
Her fatal image from the temple drew, ²²⁰
The sleeping guardians of the castle slew,
Her virgin statue with their bloody hands
Polluted, and profan'd her holy bands;
From thence the tide of fortune left their
shore,

And ebb'd much faster than it flow'd before:

Their courage languish'd, as their hopes decay'd;

And Pallas, now averse, refus'd her aid.
Nor did the goddess doubtfully declare
Her alter'd mind and alienated care.

When first her fatal image touch'd the ground, ²³⁰

She sternly cast her glaring eyes around,
That sparkled as they roll'd, and seem'd to threat:

Her heav'nly limbs distill'd a briny sweat.
Thrice from the ground she leap'd, was seen to wield

Her brandish'd lance, and shake her horrid
shield.

Then Calchas bade our host for flight prepare,

And hope no conquest from the tedious
war,

Till first they sail'd for Greece; with pray'rs besought

Her injur'd pow'r, and better omens
brought.

And now their navy plows the wat'ry
main, ²⁴⁰

Yet soon expect it on your shores again,
With Pallas pleas'd; as Calchas did or-dain.

But first, to reconcile the blue-ey'd maid
For her stol'n statue and her tow'r betray'd,

Warn'd by the seer, to her offended name
We rais'd and dedicate this wondrous frame,

So lofty, lest thro' your forbidden gates
It pass, and intercept our better fates:

For, once admitted there, our hopes are lost;
And Troy may then a new Palladium boast;

For so religion and the gods ordain, ²⁵¹

That, if you violate with hands profane Minerva's gift, your town in flames shall burn,

(Which omen, O ye gods, on Græcia turn!)
But if it climb, with your assisting hands,
The Trojan walls, and in the city stands;
Then Troy shall Argos and Mycenæ burn,
And the reverse of fate on us return.'

"With such deceits he gain'd their easy
hearts,

Too prone to credit his perfidious arts. ²⁶⁰

What Diomede, nor Thetis' greater son,
A thousand ships, nor ten years' siege,
had done—

False tears and fawning words the city
won.

"A greater omen, and of worse por-
tent,

Did our unwary minds with fear torment,
Concurring to produce the dire event.

Laocoon, Neptune's priest by lot that year,
With solemn pomp then sacrific'd a steer;

When, dreadful to behold, from sea we spied

Two serpents, rank'd abreast, the seas
divide, ²⁷⁰

And smoothly sweep along the swelling
tide.

Their flaming crests above the waves they
show;

Their bellies seem to burn the seas below;
Their speckled tails advance to steer their
course,

And on the sounding shore the flying billows
force.

And now the strand, and now the plain they
held;

Their ardent eyes with bloody streaks were
fill'd;

Their nimble tongues they brandish'd as they came,

And lick'd their hissing jaws, that sputter'd
flame.

We fled amaz'd; their destin'd way they take, ²⁸⁰

And to Laocoon and his children make;
And first around the tender boys they
wind,

Then with their sharpen'd fangs their limbs and bodies grind.

The wretched father, running to their aid
With pious haste, but vain, they next invade;

Twice round his waist their winding volumes roll'd;

And twice about his gasping throat they fold.
 The priest thus doubly chok'd, their crests
 divide,
 And tow'ring o'er his head in triumph ride.
 With both his hands he labors at the knots; ²⁹⁰
 His holy fillets the blue venom blots;
 His roaring fills the flitting air around.
 Thus, when an ox receives a glancing
 wound,
 He breaks his hands, the fatal altar flies,
 And with loud bellowings breaks the yielding skies.
 Their tasks perform'd, the serpents quit
 their prey,
 And to the tow'r of Pallas make their way:
 Couch'd at her feet, they lie protected there
 By her large buckler and protended spear.
 Amazement seizes all; the gen'ral cry ³⁰⁰
 Proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die, Whose hand the will of Pallas had with-
 stood,
 And dar'd to violate the sacred wood.
 All vote t' admit the steed, that vows be paid
 And incense offer'd to th' offended maid.
 A spacious breach is made: the town lies
 bare;
 Some hoisting-levers, some the wheels prepare
 And fasten to the horse's feet; the rest
 With cables haul along th' unwieldy beast.
 Each on his fellow for assistance calls; ³¹⁰
 At length the fatal fabric mounts the
 walls,
 Big with destruction. Boys with chaplets
 crown'd,
 And choirs of virgins, sing and dance
 around.
 Thus rais'd aloft, and then descending
 down,
 It enters o'er our heads, and threats the
 town.
 O sacred city, built by hands divine !
 O valiant heroes of the Trojan line !
 Four times he struck: as oft the clashing
 sound
 Of arms was heard, and inward groans re-
 bound.
 Yet, mad with zeal, and blinded with our fate, ³²⁰
 We haul along the horse in solemn state;
 Then place the dire portent within the tow'r.

Cassandra cried, and curs'd th' unhappy
 hour;
 Foretold our fate; but, by the god's decree,
 All heard, and none believ'd the prophecy.
 With branches we the fanes adorn, and
 waste,
 In jollity, the day ordain'd to be the last.
 Meantime the rapid heav'ns roll'd down
 the light,
 And on the shaded ocean rush'd the night;
 Our men, secure, nor guards nor sentries held, ³³⁰
 But easy sleep their weary limbs compell'd.
 The Grecians had embark'd their naval pow'rs
 From Tenedos, and sought our well-known
 shores,
 Safe under covert of the silent night,
 And guided by th' imperial galley's light;
 When Sinon, favor'd by the partial gods, Unlock'd the horse, and op'd his dark
 abodes;
 Restor'd to vital air our hidden foes,
 Who joyful from their long confinement
 rose.
 Tysander bold, and Sthenelus their guide,
 And dire Ulysses down the cable slide: ³⁴¹
 Then Thoas, Athamas, and Pyrrhus haste;
 Nor was the Podalirian hero last,
 Nor injur'd Menelaüs, nor the fam'd
 Epeius, who the fatal engine fram'd.
 A nameless crowd succeed; their forces
 join T' invade the town, oppress'd with sleep and
 wine.
 Those few they find awake first meet their
 fate;
 Then to their fellows they unbar the gate.
 " 'T was in the dead of night, when sleep repairs ³⁵⁰
 Our bodies worn with toils, our minds with cares,
 When Hector's ghost before my sight appears:
 A bloody shroud he seem'd, and bath'd in
 tears;
 Such as he was, when, by Pelides slain, Thessalian coursers dragg'd him o'er the
 plain.
 Swoln were his feet, as when the thongs were thrust
 Thro' the bor'd holes; his body black with dust;
 Unlike that Hector who return'd from toils
 Of war, triumphant, in Æacian spoils,

Or him who made the fainting Greeks retire,
And launch'd against their navy Phrygian fire.

His hair and beard stood stiffen'd with his gore;

And all the wounds he for his country bore
Now stream'd afresh, and with new purple ran.

I wept to see the visionary man,
And, while my trance continued, thus began:

'O light of Trojans, and support of Troy,
Thy father's champion, and thy country's joy!

O, long expected by thy friends! from whence

Art thou so late return'd for our defense?
Do we behold thee, wearied as we are
With length of labors, and with toils of war?

After so many fun'rals of thy own
Art thou restor'd to thy declining town?
But say, what wounds are these? What new disgrace

Deforms the manly features of thy face?' 'To this the specter no reply did frame,

But answer'd to the cause for which he came,

And, groaning from the bottom of his breast,
This warning in these mournful words express'd:

'O goddess-born! escape, by timely flight,
The flames and horrors of this fatal night.
The foes already have possess'd the wall;

Troy nods from high, and totters to her fall.
Enough is paid to Priam's royal name,

More than enough to duty and to fame.
If by a mortal hand my father's throne

Could be defended, 't was by mine alone.
Now Troy to thee commends her future state,

And gives her gods companions of thy fate:
From their assistance happier walls expect,
Which, wand'ring long, at last thou shalt erect.'

He said, and brought me, from their blest abodes,

The venerable statues of the gods,
With ancient Vesta from the sacred choir,
The wreaths and relics of th' immortal fire.

'Now peals of shouts come thund'ring from afar,

Cries, threats, and loud laments, and mingled war:

The noise approaches, tho' our palace stood aloof from streets, encompass'd with a wood.

Louder, and yet more loud, I hear th' alarms
Of human cries distinct, and clashing arms.

Fear broke my slumbers; I no longer stay,

But mount the terrace, thence the town survey,

And hearken what the frightful sounds convey.

Thus, when a flood of fire by wind is borne,
Crackling it rolls, and mows the standing corn;

Or deluges, descending on the plains,
Sweep o'er the yellow year, destroy the pains

Of lab'ring oxen and the peasant's gains;

Unroot the forest oaks, and bear away flocks, folds, and trees, an undistinguish'd prey:

The shepherd climbs the cliff, and sees from far

The wasteful ravage of the wat'ry war.
Then Hector's faith was manifestly clear'd,

And Grecian frauds in open light appear'd.
The palace of Deiphobus ascends

In smoky flames, and catches on his friends.
Ucalegon burns next: the seas are bright

With splendor not their own, and shine with Trojan light.

New clamors and new clangors now arise,
The sound of trumpets mix'd with fighting cries.

With frenzy seiz'd, I run to meet th' alarms,
Resolv'd on death, resolv'd to die in arms,

But first to gather friends, with them t' oppose

(If fortune favor'd) and repel the foes;
Spurr'd by my courage, by my country fir'd,

With sense of honor and revenge inspir'd.
'Pantheus, Apollo's priest, a sacred name,

Had scap'd the Grecian swords, and pass'd the flame:

With relics loaden, to my doors he fled,
And by the hand his tender grandson led.

'What hope, O Pantheus? whither can we run?

Where make a stand? and what may yet be done?'

Scarcely had I said, when Pantheus, with a groan:

'Troy is no more, and Ilium was a town !
The fatal day, th' appointed hour, is come,
When wrathful Jove's irrevocable doom
Transfers the Trojan state to Grecian hands.
The fire consumes the town, the foe commands; 440

And armed hosts, an unexpected force,
Break from the bowels of the fatal horse.
Within the gates, proud Simon throws about
The flames; and foes for entrance press without,

With thousand others, whom I fear to name,
More than from Argos or Mycenæ came.
To sev'ral posts their parties they divide;
Some block the narrow streets, some scour
the wide:

The bold they kill, th' unwary they surprise;

Who fights finds death, and death finds him who flies. 450

The warders of the gate but scarce maintain
Th' unequal combat, and resist in vain.'

"I heard; and Heav'n, that well-born souls inspires,

Prompts me thro' lifted swords and rising
fires

To run where clashing arms and clamor calls,

And rush undaunted to defend the walls.
Ripheus and Iph'itus by my side engage,
For valor one renown'd, and one for age.
Dymas and Hypanis by moonlight knew My motions and my mien, and to my party
drew; 460

With young Corœbus, who by love was led
To win renown and fair Cassandra's bed,
And lately brought his troops to Priam's
aid,

Forewarn'd in vain by the prophetic maid.
Whom when I saw resolv'd in arms to fall,
And that one spirit animated all:

'Brave souls!' said I, — 'but brave, alas !
in vain —

Come, finish what our cruel fates ordain.
You see the desp'rate state of our affairs,
And heav'n's protecting pow'rs are deaf to
pray'rs. 470

The passive gods behold the Greeks defile
Their temples, and abandon to the spoil
Their own abodes: we, feeble few, conspire
To save a sinking town, involv'd in fire.

Then let us fall, but fall amidst our foes:
Despair of life the means of living shows.'
So bold a speech encourag'd their desire
Of death, and added fuel to their fire.

"As hungry wolves, with raging appetite, Scour thro' the fields, nor fear the stormy
night — 480

Their whelps at home expect the promis'd
food,

And long to temper their dry chaps in
blood —

So rush'd we forth at once; resolv'd to die,
Resolv'd, in death, the last extremes to try.
We leave the narrow lanes behind, and
dare

Th' unequal combat in the public square:
Night was our friend; our leader was despair.

What tongue can tell the slaughter of that
night?

What eyes can weep the sorrows and
affright?

An ancient and imperial city falls; 490

The streets are fill'd with frequent funerals;

Houses and holy temples float in blood,
And hostile nations make a common flood.

Not only Trojans fall; but, in their turn,
The vanquish'd triumph, and the victors
mourn.

Ours take new courage from despair and
night:

Confus'd the fortune is, confus'd the fight.
All parts resound with tumults, plaints, and
fears;

And grisly Death in sundry shapes appears.
Androgeos fell among us, with his band, 500
Who thought us Grecians newly come to
land.

'From whence,' said he, 'my friends, this long delay?

You loiter, while the spoils are borne away:
Our ships are laden with the Trojan store;
And you, like truants, come too late ashore.'

He said, but soon corrected his mistake, Found, by the doubtful answers which we make:

Amaz'd, he would have shunn'd th' unequal
fight;

But we, more num'rous, intercept his
flight. 509

As when some peasant, in a bushy brake,
Has with unwary footing press'd a snake;
He starts aside, astonish'd, when he spies

His rising crest, blue neck, and rolling
eyes;

So from our arms surpris'd Androgeos
flies.

In vain; for him and his we compass'd
 round,
 Possess'd with fear, unknowing of the
 ground,
 And of their lives an easy conquest found.
 Thus Fortune on our first endeavor smil'd.
 Corcebus then, with youthful hopes beguil'd,
 Sworn with success, and of a daring mind,
 This new invention fatally design'd. ⁵²¹
 'My friends,' said he, 'since Fortune shows
 the way,
 'Tis fit we should th' auspicious guide
 obey.
 For what has she these Grecian arms
 bestow'd,
 But their destruction, and the Trojans'
 good?
 Then change we shields, and their devices
 bear:
 Let fraud supply the want of force in war.
 They find us arms.' This said, himself he
 dress'd
 In dead Androgeos' spoils, his upper vest,
 His painted buckler, and his plumed
 crest. ⁵³⁰
 Thus Ripheus, Dymas, all the Trojan train, Lay down their own attire, and strip the
 slain.
 Mix'd with the Greeks, we go with ill
 presage,
 Flatter'd with hopes to glut our greedy
 rage;
 Unknown, assaulting whom we blindly
 meet,
 And strew with Grecian carcasses the street.
 Thus while their straggling parties we defeat,
 Some to the shore and safer ships retreat;
 And some, oppress'd with more ignoble
 fear,
 Remount the hollow horse, and pant in secret there. ⁵⁴⁰
 "But, ah! what use of valor can be
 made,
 When heav'n's propitious pow'rs refuse their aid!
 Behold the royal prophetess, the fair
 Cassandra, dragg'd by her dishevel'd hair, Whom not Minerva's shrine, nor sacred
 bands,
 In safety could protect from sacrilegious
 hands:
 On heav'n she cast her eyes, she sigh'd,
 she cried—

'T was all she could—her tender arms were tied.
 So sad a sight Corcebus could not bear;
 But, fir'd with rage, distracted with despair, ⁵⁵⁰
 Amid the barb'rous ravishers he flew:
 Our leader's rash example we pursue.
 But storms of stones, from the proud temple's height,
 Pour down, and on our batter'd helms
 alight:
 We from our friends receiv'd this fatal
 blow,
 Who thought us Grecians, as we seem'd in show.
 They aim at the mistaken crests, from
 high;
 And ours beneath the pond'rous ruin lie.
 Then, mov'd with anger and disdain, to
 see
 Their troops dispers'd, the royal virgin free, ⁵⁶⁰
 The Grecians rally, and their pow'rs unite,
 With fury charge us, and renew the fight.
 The brother kings with Ajax join their
 force,
 And the whole squadron of Thessalian
 horse.
 "Thus, when the rival winds their quarrel try,
 Contending for the kingdom of the sky,
 South, east, and west, on airy coursers
 borne;
 The whirlwind gathers, and the woods are torn:
 Then Nereus strikes the deep; the billows
 rise,
 And, mix'd with ooze and sand, pollute the skies. ⁵⁷⁰
 The troops we squander'd first again appear
 From sev'ral quarters, and enclose the rear.
 They first observe, and to the rest betray,
 Our diff'rent speech; our borrow'd arms survey.
 Oppress'd with odds, we fall; Corcebus
 first,
 At Pallas' altar, by Peneleus pierc'd.
 Then Ripheus follow'd, in th' unequal
 fight;
 Just of his word, observant of the right:
 Heav'n thought not so. Dymas their fate
 attends,
 With Hypanis, mistaken by their friends.

Nor, Pantheus, thee, thy miter, nor the
bands 581
Of awful Phœbus, sav'd from impious
hands.

Ye Trojan flames, your testimony bear,
What I perform'd, and what I suffer'd there;
No sword avoiding in the fatal strife,
Expos'd to death, and prodigal of life!
Witness, ye heav'ns! I live not by my fault:

I strove to have deserv'd the death I
sought.

But, when I could not fight, and would have died,

Borne off to distance by the growing tide,
Old Iphitus and I were hurried thence, 591
With Pelias wounded, and without defense.

New clamors from th' invested palace ring:
We run to die, or disengage the king.
So hot th' assault, so high the tumult rose,
While ours defend, and while the Greeks oppose,

As all the Dardan and Argolic race
Had been contracted in that narrow space;
Oras all Ilium else were void of fear,
And tumult, war, and slaughter, only
there. 600

Their targets in a tortoise cast, the foes,
Secure advancing, to the turrets rose:
Some mount the scaling ladders; some,
more bold,

Swerve upwards, and by posts and pillars
hold;

Their left hand gripes their bucklers in th' ascent,

While with the right they seize the battle-
ment.

From their demolish'd tow'rs the Trojans
throw

Huge heaps of stones, that, falling, crush
the foe;

And heavy beams and rafters from the
sides 601

(Such arms their last necessity provides)
And gilded roofs, come tumbling from on
high,

The marks of state and ancient royalty.
The guards below, fix'd in the pass, attend
The charge undaunted, and the gate defend.
Renew'd in courage with recover'd breath,
A second time we ran to tempt our death,
To clear the palace from the foe, succeed
The weary living, and revenge the dead.

"A postern door, yet unobserv'd and free,

Join'd by the length of a blind gallery, 620
To the king's closet led: a way well known To Hector's wife, while Priam held the
throne,

Thro' which she brought Astyanax, unseen,
To cheer his grandsire and his grandsire's
queen.

Thro' this we pass, and mount the tow'r,
from whence

With unavailing arms the Trojans make defense.

From this the trembling king had oft de-seried

The Grecian camp, and saw their navy ride.
Beams from its lofty height with swords
we hew,

Then, wrenching with our hands, th' assault
renew; 630

And, where the rafters on the columns meet,
We push them headlong with our arms and feet.

The lightning flies not swifter than the fall,
Nor thunder louder than the ruin'd wall:

Down goes the top at once; the Greeks beneath

Are piecemeal torn, or pounded into death.
Yet more succeed, and more to death are
sent;

We cease not from above, nor they below
relent.

Before the gate stood Pyrrhus, threat'ning
loud,

With glitt'ring arms conspicuous in the
crowd. 640

So shines, renew'd in youth, the crested snake,

Who slept the winter in a thorny brake,
And, casting off his slough when spring returns,

Now looks aloft, and with new glory burns;
Restor'd with pois'nous herbs, his ardent
sides

Reflect the sun; and rais'd on spires he rides;
High o'er the grass, hissing he rolls along,

And brandishes by fits his forked tongue.
Proud Periphas, and fierce Automedon,

His father's charioteer, together run 650
To force the gate; the Scyrian infantry
Rush on in crowds, and the barr'd passage
free.

Ent'ring the court, with shouts the skies
they rend;

And flaming firebrands to the roofs ascend.
Himself, among the foremost, deals his
blows,

And with his ax repeated strokes bestows
On the strong doors; then all their shoulders
ply,

Till from the posts the brazen hinges fly.
He hews apace; the double bars at length
Yield to his ax and unresisted strength. 660
A mighty breach is made: the rooms conceal'd

Appear, and all the palace is reveal'd;
The halls of audience, and of public state,
And where the lonely queen in secret sate.
Arm'd soldiers now by trembling maids
are seen,

With not a door, and scarce a space, between.

The house is fill'd with loud laments and
cries,

And shrieks of women rend the vaulted
skies;

The fearful matrons run from place to place,
And kiss the thresholds, and the posts embrace. 670

The fatal work inhuman Pyrrhus plies,
And all his father sparkles in his eyes;
Nor bars, nor fighting guards, his force sustain:

The bars are broken, and the guards are
slain.

In rush the Greeks, and all the apartments fill;

Those few defendants whom they find, they kill.

Not with so fierce a rage the foaming flood Roars, when he finds his rapid course withstood;

Bears down the dams with unresisted sway,
And sweeps the cattle and the cots away. 680
These eyes beheld him when he march'd between

The brother kings: I saw th' unhappy queen,
The hundred wives, and where old Priam
stood,

To stain his hallow'd altar with his blood.
The fifty nuptial beds (such hopes had he,
So large a promise, of a progeny),
The posts, of plated gold, and hung with spoils,

Fell the reward of the proud victor's toils.
Where'er the raging fire had left a space,
The Grecians enter and possess the place.

"Perhaps you may of Priam's fate enquire. 691

He, when he saw his regal town on fire,
His ruin'd palace, and his ent'ring foes,
On ev'ry side inevitable woes,

In arms, disus'd, invests his limbs, decay'd,
Like them, with age; a late and useless
aid.

His feeble shoulders scarce the weight
sustain;

Loaded, not arm'd, he creeps along with
pain,

Despairing of success, ambitious to be
slain!

Uncover'd but by heav'n, there stood in
view 700

An altar; near the hearth a laurel grew, Dodder'd with age, whose boughs encompass round

The household gods, and shade the holy
ground.

Here Hecuba, with all her helpless train
Of dames, for shelter sought, but sought in vain.

Driv'n like a flock of doves along the sky,
Their images they hug, and to their altars
fly.

The queen, when she beheld her trembling
lord,

And hanging by his side a heavy sword,
'What rage,' she cried, 'has seiz'd my husband's mind? 710

What arms are these, and to what use de-
sign'd?

These times want other aids! Were Hector here,

Ev'n Hector now in vain, like Priam, would appear.

With us, one common shelter thou shalt
find,

Or in one common fate with us be join'd.'
She said, and with a last salute embrac'd

The poor old man, and by the laurel plac'd.
Behold! Polites, one of Priam's sons,

Pursued by Pyrrhus, there for safety runs.
Thro' swords and foes, amaz'd and hurt, he
flies 720

Thro' empty courts and open galleries.

Him Pyrrhus, urging with his lance, pursues,
And often reaches, and his thrusts renews.

The youth, transfix'd, with lamentable
cries,

Expires before his wretched parent's eyes:
Whom gasping at his feet when Priam saw,
The fear of death gave place to nature's law;

And, shaking more with anger than with
age,

'The gods,' said he, 'requite thy brutal
rage!

As sure they will, barbarian, sure they must,

If there be gods in heav'n, and gods be just — ⁷³⁰

Who tak'st in wrongs an insolent delight;
With a son's death t' infect a father's
sight.

Not he, whom thou and lying fame conspire

To call thee his — not he, thy vaunted sire, Thus us'd my wretched age: the gods he
fear'd,

The laws of nature and of nations heard.
He cheer'd my sorrows, and, for sums of
gold,

The bloodless carcass of my Hector sold;
Pitied the woes a parent underwent, ⁷⁴⁰
And sent me back in safety from his tent.'

"This said, his feeble hand a javelin
threw,
Which, flutt'ring, seem'd to loiter as it flew:

Just, and but barely, to the mark it held,
And faintly tinkled on the brazen shield.

"Then Pyrrhus thus: 'Go thou from me to fate,

And to my father my foul deeds relate.

Now die!' With that he dragg'd the trembling sire,

Slidd'ring thro' clotter'd blood and holy mire,

(The mingled paste his murder'd son had made,) ⁷⁵⁰

Haul'd from beneath the violated shade,
And on the sacred pile the royal victim
laid.

His right hand held his bloody fauchion
bare,

His left he twisted in his hoary hair;
Then, with a speeding thrust, his heart he
found:

The lukewarm blood came rushing thro'
the wound,

And sanguine streams distain'd the sacred
ground.

Thus Priam fell, and shar'd one common
fate

With Troy in ashes, and his ruin'd state:
He, who the scepter of all Asia sway'd, ⁷⁶⁰ Whom monarchs like domestic slaves
obey'd.

On the bleak shore now lies th' abandon'd
king,

A headless carcass, and a nameless thing.*

* This whole line is taken from Sir John Denham

"Then, not before, I felt my cruddled
blood

Congeval with fear, my hair with horror
stood:

My father's image fill'd my pious mind,
Lest equal years might equal fortune find.
Again I thought on my forsaken wife,
And trembled for my son's abandon'd life.
I look'd about, but found myself alone, ⁷⁷⁰ Deserted at my need! My friends were gone.

Some spent with toil, some with despair
oppress'd,

Leap'd headlong from the heights; the flames consum'd the rest.

Thus, wand'ring in my way, without a
guide,

The graceless Helen in the porch I spied
Of Vesta's temple; there she lurk'd alone;
Muffled she sate, and, what she could,
unknown:

But, by the flames that cast their blaze
around,

That common bane of Greece and Troy I
found.

For Ilium burnt, she dreads the Trojan
sword;

More dreads the vengeance of her injur'd lord; ⁷⁸⁰

Ev'n by those gods who refug'd her abhor'd.

Trembling with rage, the strumpet I regard,
Resolv'd to give her guilt the due reward:
'Shall she triumphant sail before the wind,
And leave in flames unhappy Troy behind?
Shall she her kingdom and her friends
review,

In state attended with a captive crew,
While unreveng'd the good old Priam
falls,

And Grecian fires consume the Trojan
walls?

For this the Phrygian fields and Xanthian flood ⁷⁹⁰

Were swell'd with bodies, and were drunk with blood?

'T is true, a soldier can small honor gain,
And boast no conquest, from a woman
slain:

Yet shall the fact not pass without applause,
Of vengeance taken in so just a cause;
The punish'd crime shall set my soul at ease,

And murmur'ing manes of my friends
appease.'

Thus while I rave, a gleam of pleasing
light Spread o'er the place; and, shining heav'nly bright, ⁸⁰⁰
My mother stood reveal'd before my
sight.

Never so radiant did her eyes appear;
Not her own star confess'd a light so clear:
Great in her charms, as when on gods
above

She looks, and breathes herself into their
love.

She held my hand, the destin'd blow to break;

Then from her rosy lips began to speak:
'My son, from whence this madness, this neglect

Of my commands, and those whom I protect?

Why this unmanly rage? Recall to mind Whom you forsake, what pledges leave behind. ⁸¹¹

Look if your helpless father yet survive,
Or if Ascanius or Creüsa live.

Around your house the greedy Grecians
err;

And these had perish'd in the nightly
war,

But for my presence and protecting care.
Not Helen's face, nor Paris, was in fault;
But by the gods was this destruction
brought.

Now cast your eyes around, while I dissolve
The mists and films that mortal eyes involve, ⁸²⁰

Purge from your sight the dross, and make you see

The shape of each avenging deity.
Enlighten'd thus, my just commands fulfil,
Nor fear obedience to your mother's will.
Where yon disorder'd heap of ruin lies, Stones rent from stones; where clouds of dust arise —

Amid that smother Neptune holds his
place,
Below the wall's foundation drives his mace,
And heaves the building from the solid base.

Look where, in arms, imperial Juno stands ⁸³⁰

Full in the Scæan gate, with loud commands,

Urging on shore the tardy Grecian
bands.

See! Pallas, of her snaky buckler proud, Bestrides the tow'r, refulgent thro' the
cloud:

See! Jove new courage to the foe supplies,
And arms against the town the partial deities.

Haste hence, my son; this fruitless labor
end:

Haste, where your trembling spouse and sire attend:

Haste; and a mother's care your passage shall befriend.'

She said, and swiftly vanish'd from my sight, ⁸⁴⁰

Obscure in clouds and gloomy shades of
night.

I look'd, I listen'd; dreadful sounds I
hear;

And the dire forms of hostile gods appear.
Troy sunk in flames I saw (nor could prevent),

And Ilium from its old foundations rent;
Rent like a mountain ash, which dar'd the winds,

And stood the sturdy strokes of lab'ring hinds.

About the roots the cruel ax resounds;
The stumps are pierc'd with oft-repeated
wounds:

The war is felt on high; the nodding crown ⁸⁵⁰

Now threatens a fall, and throws the leafy honors down.

To their united force it yields, tho' late,
And mourns with mortal groans th' approaching fate:

The roots no more their upper load sus-tain;

But down she falls, and spreads a ruin thro'
the plain.

"Descending thence, I scape thro' foes and fire:

Before the goddess, foes and flames retire.
Arriv'd at home, he, for whose only sake,
Or most for his, such toils I undertake,
The good Anchises, whom, by timely flight,
I purpos'd to secure on Ida's height, ⁸⁶¹
Refus'd the journey, resolute to die
And add his fun'ral to the fate of Troy,
Rather than exile and old age sustain.

'Go you, whose blood runs warm in ev'ry vein.

Had Heav'n decreed that I should life enjoy,

Heav'n had decreed to save unhappy Troy.

'T is, sure, enough, if not too much, for
 one,
 Twice to have seen our Ilium overthrown.
 Make haste to save the poor remaining crew, ⁸⁷⁰
 And give this useless corpse a long adieu.
 These weak old hands suffice to stop my
 breath;
 At least the pitying foes will aid my
 death,
 To take my spoils, and leave my body
 bare:
 As for my sepulcher, let Heav'n take care.
 'T is long since I, for my celestial wife Loath'd by the gods, have dragg'd a ling'ring life;
 Since ev'ry hour and moment I expire,
 Blasted from heav'n by Jove's avenging
 fire.'
 This oft repeated, he stood fix'd to die: ⁸⁸⁰
 Myself, my wife, my son, my family, Intreat, pray, beg, and raise a doleful
 cry —
 'What, will he still persist, on death resolve,
 And in his ruin all his house involve !'
 He still persists his reasons to maintain;
 Our pray'rs, our tears, our loud laments,
 are vain.
 "Urg'd by despair, again I go to try
 The fate of arms, resolv'd in fight to die:
 'What hope remains, but what my death must give ?
 Can I, without so dear a father, live ? ⁸⁹⁰
 You term it prudence, what I baseness call:
 Could such a word from such a parent
 fall ?
 If Fortune please, and so the gods or-
 dain,
 That nothing should of ruin'd Troy re-
 main,
 And you conspire with Fortune to be
 slain,
 The way to death is wide, th' approaches
 near:
 For soon relentless Pyrrhus will appear, Reeking with Priam's blood — the wretch who slew
 The son (inhuman) in the father's view,
 And then the sire himself to the dire altar drew. ⁹⁰⁰
 O goddess mother, give me back to Fate;
 Your gift was undesir'd, and came too
 late !

Did you, for this, unhappy me convey Thro' foes and fires, to see my house a
 prey ?
 Shall I my father, wife, and son behold, Welt'ring in blood, each other's arms in-
 fold ?
 Haste ! gird my sword, tho' spent and overcome:
 'T is the last summons to receive our doom.
 I hear thee, Fate; and I obey thy call !
 Not unreveng'd the foe shall see my fall.
 Restore me to the yet unfinish'd fight: ⁹¹¹
 My death is wanting to conclude the night.'
 Arm'd once again, my glitt'ring sword I
 wield,
 While th' other hand sustains my weighty
 shield,
 And forth I rush to seek th' abandon'd
 field.
 I went; but sad Creüsa stopp'd my way,
 And cross the threshold in my passage lay, Embrac'd my knees, and, when I would have gone,
 Shew'd me my feeble sire and tender son:
 'If death be your design, at least,' said
 she, ⁹²⁰
 'Take us along to share your destiny.
 If any farther hopes in arms remain,
 This place, these pledges of your love,
 maintain.
 To whom do you expose your father's life,
 Your son's, and mine, your now forgotten
 wife !'
 While thus she fills the house with clam'rous
 cries,
 Our hearing is diverted by our eyes:
 For, while I held my son, in the short
 space
 Betwixt our kisses and our last embrace;
 Strange to relate, from young Iulus'
 head ⁹³⁰
 A lambent flame arose, which gently
 spread Around his brows, and on his temples
 fed.
 Amaz'd, with running water we prepare To quench the sacred fire, and slake his
 hair;
 But old Anchises, vers'd in omens, rear'd
 His hands to heav'n, and this request pre-ferr'd:
 'If any vows, almighty Jove, can bend
 Thy will; if piety can pray'rs commend, Confirm the glad presage which thou art pleas'd to send.'

Scarce had he said, when, on our left, we
hear 940

A peal of rattling thunder roll in air:
There shot a streaming lamp along the
sky,

Which on the winged lightning seem'd to
fly;

From o'er the roof the blaze began to
move,

And, trailing, vanish'd in th' Idæan grove.
It swept a path in heav'n, and shone a
guide,

Then in a steaming stench of sulphur died.

"The good old man with suppliant hands implor'd

The gods' protection, and their star ador'd.
'Now, now,' said he, 'my son, no more de-
lay! 950

I yield, I follow where Heav'n shews the
way.

Keep, O my country gods, our dwelling
place,

And guard this relic of the Trojan race,
This tender child! These omens are your
own,

And you can yet restore the ruin'd town.

At least accomplish what your signs fore-
show:

I stand resign'd, and am prepar'd to go.'

"He said. The crackling flames appear
on high,

And driving sparkles dance along the sky.
With Vulcan's rage the rising winds conspire, 960

And near our palace roll the flood of fire.

'Haste, my dear father, ('tis no time to wait,)

And load my shoulders with a willing freight.

Whate'er befalls, your life shall be my
care;

One death, or one deliv'rance, we will
share.

My hand shall lead our little son; and
you,

My faithful consort, shall our steps pursue.

Next, you, my servants, heed my strict
commands:

Without the walls a ruin'd temple stands,
To Ceres hallow'd once; a cypress nigh 970

Shoots up her venerable head on high,
By long religion kept; there bend your
feet,

And in divided parties let us meet.

Our country gods, the relics, and the
bands,

Hold you, my father, in your guiltless
hands:

In me 't is impious holy things to bear, Red as I am with slaughter, new from
war,

Till in some living stream I cleanse the guilt

Of dire debate, and blood in battle spilt.'
Thus, ord'ring all that prudence could provide, 980

I clothe my shoulders with a lion's hide
And yellow spoils; then, on my bending back,

The welcome load of my dear father take;
While on my better hand Ascanius hung,
And with unequal paces tripp'd along.

Creüsa kept behind; by choice we stray
Thro' ev'ry dark and ev'ry devious way.

I, who so bold and dauntless, just before,
The Grecian darts and shock of lances
bore, 989

At ev'ry shadow now am seiz'd with fear,
Not for myself, but for the charge I bear;

Till, near the ruin'd gate arriv'd at last,
Secure, and deeming all the danger past,
A frightful noise of trampling feet we
hear.

My father, looking thro' the shades, with
fear,

Cried out: 'Haste, haste, my son, the foes
are nigh;

Their swords and shining armor I descry.'
Some hostile god, for some unknown offense,

Had sure bereft my mind of better sense;
For, while thro' winding ways I took my
flight, 1000

And sought the shelter of the gloomy
night,

Alas! I lost Creüsa: hard to tell

If by her fatal destiny she fell,

Or weary sate, or wander'd with affright;

But she was lost for ever to my sight.

I knew not, or reflected, till I meet

My friends, at Ceres' now deserted seat.

We met: not one was wanting; only she Deceiv'd her friends, her son, and wretched
me.

"What mad expressions did my tongue refuse! 1010

Whom did I not, of gods or men, accuse!
This was the fatal blow, that pain'd me
more

Than all I felt from ruin'd Troy before.
Stung with my loss, and raving with despair,

Abandoning my now forgotten care,
Of counsel, comfort, and of hope bereft,
My sire, my son, my country gods I left.
In shining armor once again I sheathe
My limbs, not feeling wounds, nor fearing death.

Then headlong to the burning walls I run,
And seek the danger I was forc'd to shun.
I tread my former tracks; thro' night explore

Each passage, ev'ry street I cross'd before.
All things were full of horror and affright,
And dreadful ev'n the silence of the night.
Then to my father's house I make repair.
With some small glimpse of hope to find her there.

Instead of her, the cruel Greeks I met;
The house was fill'd with foes, with flames beset.

Driv'n on the wings of winds, whole sheets of fire,

Thro' air transported, to the roofs aspire.
From thence to Priam's palace I resort,
And search the citadel and desert court.

Then, unobserv'd, I pass by Juno's church:
A guard of Grecians had possess'd the porch;
There Phœnix and Ulysses watch the prey,
And thither all the wealth of Troy convey:
The spoils which they from ransack'd houses brought,

And golden bowls from burning altars caught,

The tables of the gods, the purple vests,
The people's treasure, and the pomp of priests.

A rank of wretched youths, with pinion'd hands,

And captive matrons, in long order stands.
Then, with ungovern'd madness, I proclaim,
Thro' all the silent street, Creüsa's name:
Creüsa still I call; at length she hears,
And sudden thro' the shades of night appears —

Appears, no more Creüsa, nor my wife,
But a pale specter, larger than the life.
Aghast, astonish'd, and struck dumb with fear,

I stood; like bristles rose my stiffen'd hair.
Then thus the ghost began to soothe my grief:

'Nor tears, nor cries, can give the dead relief.

Desist, my much-lov'd lord, t' indulge your pain;

You bear no more than what the gods ordain.

My fates permit me not from hence to fly;
Nor he, the great controller of the sky.

Long wand'ring ways for you the pow'rs decree;

On land hard labors, and a length of sea.

Then, after many painful years are past,
On Latium's happy shore you shall be cast,

Where gentle Tiber from his bed beholds
The flow'ry meadows, and the feeding folds.
There end your toils; and there your fates provide

A quiet kingdom, and a royal bride:
There fortune shall the Trojan line restore,
And you for lost Creüsa weep no more.

Fear not that I shall watch, with servile shame,

Th' imperious looks of some proud Grecian dame;

Or, stooping to the victor's lust, disgrace
My goddess mother, or my royal race.

And now, farewell! The parent of the gods
Restrains my fleeting soul in her abodes:
I trust our common issue to your care.

She said, and gliding pass'd unseen in air.
I strove to speak: but horror tied my tongue;

And thrice about her neck my arms I flung,

And, thrice deceiv'd, on vain embraces hung.

Light as an empty dream at break of day,
Or as a blast of wind, she rush'd away.

"Thus having pass'd the night in fruitless pain,

I to my longing friends return again,
Amaz'd th' augmented number to behold,
Of men and matrons mix'd, of young and old;

A wretched exil'd crew together brought,
With arms appointed, and with treasure fraught,

Resolv'd, and willing, under my command,
To run all hazards both of sea and land.

The Morn began, from Ida, to display
Her rosy cheeks; and Phosphor led the day:

Before the gates the Grecians took their post,

And all pretense of late relief was lost.

I yield to Fate, unwillingly retire,
And, loaded, up the hill convey my sire."

THE THIRD BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

Æneas proceeds in his relation: he gives an account of the fleet with which he sail'd, and the success of his first voyage to Thrace. From thence he directs his course to Delos, and asks the oracle what place the gods had appointed for his habitation. By a mistake of the oracle's answer, he settles in Crete; his household gods give him the true sense of the oracle, in a dream. He follows their advice, and makes the best of his way for Italy. He is cast on several shores, and meets with very surprising adventures, till at length he lands on Sicily, where his father Anchises dies. This is the place which he was sailing from, when the tempest rose, and threw him upon the Carthaginian coast.

"WHEN Heav'n had overturn'd the Trojan state

And Priam's throne, by too severe a fate;
When ruin'd Troy became the Grecians' prey,

And Ilium's lofty tow'rs in ashes lay;
Warn'd by celestial omens, we retreat,
To seek in foreign lands a happier seat.
Near old Antandros, and at Ida's foot,
The timber of the sacred groves we cut,
And build our fleet; uncertain yet to find
What place the gods for our repose assign'd.

Friends daily flock; and scarce the kindly spring

Began to clothe the ground, and birds to sing,

When old Anchises summon'd all to sea:
The crew my father and the Fates obey.

With sighs and tears I leave my native shore,

And empty fields, where Ilium stood before.

My sire, my son, our less and greater gods,
All sail at once, and cleave the briny floods.

"Against our coast appears a spacious land,

Which once the fierce Lycurgus did command.

(Thracia the name — the people bold in war;

Vast are their fields, and tillage is their care,)

A hospitable realm while Fate was kind,
With Troy in friendship and religion join'd.

I land; with luckless omens then adore
Their gods, and draw a line along the shore;

I lay the deep foundations of a wall,
And Ænos, nam'd from me, the city call.

To Dionean Venus vows are paid,
And all the pow'rs that rising labors aid;

A bull on Jove's imperial altar laid.

Not far, a rising hillock stood in view;
Sharp myrtles on the sides, and cornels grew.

There, while I went to crop the sylvan scenes,

And shade our altar with their leafy greens,

I pull'd a plant — with horror I relate
A prodigy so strange and full of fate.

The rooted fibers rose, and from the wound
Black bloody drops distill'd upon the ground.

Mute and amaz'd, my hair with terror stood;

Fear shrunk my sinews, and congeal'd my blood.

Mann'd once again, another plant I try:
That other gush'd with the same sanguine dye.

Then, fearing guilt for some offense unknown,

With pray'rs and vows the Dryads I atone,
With all the sisters of the woods, and most
The God of Arms, who rules the Thracian coast,

That they, or he, these omens would avert,
Release our fears, and better signs impart.
Clear'd, as I thought, and fully fix'd at length

To learn the cause, I tugg'd with all my strength:

I bent my knees against the ground; once more

The violated myrtle ran with gore.

Scarce dare I tell the sequel: from the womb

Of wounded earth, and caverns of the tomb,

A groan, as of a troubled ghost, renew'd

My fright, and then these dreadful words ensued:

"Why dost thou thus my buried body rend?

O spare the corpse of thy unhappy friend !
Spare to pollute thy pious hands with
blood: 60

The tears distil not from the wounded
wood;

But ev'ry drop this living tree contains
Is kindred blood, and ran in Trojan veins.
O fly from this unhospitable shore,
Warn'd by my fate; for I am Polydore !
Here loads of lances, in my blood embued,
Again shoot upward, by my blood renew'd.

"My falt'ring tongue and shiv'ring limbs declare

My horror, and in bristles rose my hair.

When Troy with Grecian arms was closely pent, 70

Old Priam, fearful of the war's event,
This hapless Polydore to Thracia sent:

Loaded with gold, he sent his darling,
far

From noise and tumults, and destructive
war,

Committed to the faithless tyrant's care;
Who, when he saw the pow'r of Troy decline,

Forsook the weaker, with the strong to
join;

Broke ev'ry bond of nature and of truth,
And murder'd, for his wealth, the royal youth.

O sacred hunger of pernicious gold ! 80
What bands of faith can impious lucre
hold ?

Now, when my soul had shaken off her
fears,

I call my father and the Trojan peers;
Relate the prodigies of Heav'n, require
What he commands, and their advice desire.

All vote to leave that execrable shore,
Polluted with the blood of Polydore;

But, ere we sail, his fun'ral rites prepare,
Then, to his ghost, a tomb and altars rear.

In mournful pomp the matrons walk the
round, 90

With baleful cypress and blue fillets
crown'd,

With eyes dejected, and with hair un-
bound.

Then bowls of tepid milk and blood we pour,

And thrice invoke the soul of Polydore.

"Now, when the raging storms no longer
reign,

But southern gales invite us to the main,

We launch our vessels, with a prosp'rous
wind,

And leave the cities and the shores behind.

"An island in th' Ægean main appears;
Neptune and wat'ry Doris claim it theirs.

It floated once, till Phœbus fix'd the
sides 100

To rooted earth, and now it braves the tides.

Here, borne by friendly winds, we come
ashore,

With needful ease our weary limbs re-
store,

And the Sun's temple and his town adore.

"Anius, the priest and king, with laurel
crown'd,

His hoary locks with purple fillets bound,
Who saw my sire the Delian shore ascend,

Came forth with eager haste to meet his
friend;

Invites him to his palace; and, in sign 110
Of ancient love, their plighted hands they
join.

Then to the temple of the god I went,
And thus, before the shrine, my vows pre-
sent:

'Give, O Thymbræus, give a resting place
To the sad relics of the Trojan race;

A seat secure, a region of their own,
A lasting empire, and a happier town.

Where shall we fix ? where shall our labors
end ?

Whom shall we follow, and what fate attend ?

Let not my pray'rs a doubtful answer
find; 120

But in clear auguries unveil thy mind.'

Scarcely had I said: he shook the holy
ground,

The laurels, and the lofty hills around;
And from the tripods rush'd a bellowing
sound.

Prostrate we fell; confess'd the present
god,

Who gave this answer from his dark abode:
'Undaunted youths, go, seek that mother
earth

From which your ancestors derive their birth.

The soil that sent you forth, her ancient
race

In her old bosom shall again embrace. 130

Thro' the wide world th' Æneian house shall reign,

And children's children shall the crown
sustain.'

Thus Phœbus did our future fates disclose:
A mighty tumult, mix'd with joy, arose.

"All are concern'd to know what place
the god

Assign'd, and where determin'd our abode.
My father, long revolving in his mind
The race and lineage of the Trojan kind,
Thus answer'd their demands: 'Ye princes,
hear

Your pleasing fortune, and dispel your fear.
The fruitful isle of Crete, well known to fame, ¹⁴¹

Sacred of old to Jove's imperial name,
In the mid ocean lies, with large command,
And on its plains a hundred cities stand.

Another Ida rises there, and we
From thence derive our Trojan ancestry.
From thence, as 't is divulg'd by certain
fame,

To the Rhœtean shores old Teucus came;
There fix'd, and there the seat of empire
chose,

Ere Ilium and the Trojan tow'rs arose. ¹⁵⁰
In humble vales they built their soft
abodes,

Till Cybele, the mother of the gods,
With tinkling cymbals charm'd th' Idæan
woods. }

She secret rites and ceremonies taught,
And to the yoke the salvage lions brought.
Let us the land which Heav'n appoints, explore;

Appease the winds, and seek the Gnosian
shore.

If Jove assists the passage of our fleet,
The third propitious dawn discovers Crete.'

Thus having said, the sacrifices, laid ¹⁶⁰
On smoking altars, to the gods he paid:

A bull, to Neptune an oblation due,
Another bull to bright Apollo slew;
A milk-white ewe, the western winds to
please,

And one coal-black, to calm the stormy seas.
Ere this, a flying rumor had been spread
That fierce Idomeneus from Crete was fled,
Expell'd and exil'd; that the coast was free
From foreign or domestic enemy.

"We leave the Delian ports, and put to sea; ¹⁷⁰

By Naxos, fam'd for vintage, make our
way;

Then green Donyssa pass; and sail in sight
Of Paros' isle, with marble quarries white.

We pass the scatter'd isles of Cyclades,
That, scarce distinguish'd, seem to stud the seas.

The shouts of sailors double near the shores;
They stretch their canvas, and they ply their oars.

'All hands aloft! for Crete! for Crete!'
they cry,

And swiftly thro' the foamy billows fly.
Full on the promis'd land at length we bore,
With joy descending on the Cretan shore. ¹⁸¹
With eager haste a rising town I frame,
Which from the Trojan Pergamus I name:
The name itself was grateful; I exhort
To found their houses, and erect a fort.
Our ships are haul'd upon the yellow
strand;

The youth begin to till the labor'd land;
And I myself new marriages promote,
Give laws, and dwellings I divide by lot;
When rising vapors choke the wholesome air, ¹⁹⁰

And blasts of noisome winds corrupt the year;

The trees devouring caterpillars burn;
Parch'd was the grass, and blighted was the corn:

Nor scape the beasts; for Sirius, from on
high,
With pestilential heat infects the sky:
My men — some fall, the rest in fevers
fry. }

Again my father bids me seek the shore
Of sacred Delos, and the god implore,
To learn what end of woes we might expect, ¹⁹⁹

And to what clime our weary course direct.
" 'T was night, when ev'ry creature, void of cares,

The common gift of balmy slumber shares:
The statues of my gods (for such they seem'd),

Those gods whom I from flaming Troy re-
deem'd,

Before me stood, majestically bright,
Full in the beams of Phœbe's ent'ring light.
Then thus they spoke, and eas'd my troubled mind:

'What from the Delian god thou go'st to
find,

He tells thee here, and sends us to relate.
Those pow'rs are we, companions of thy fate, ²¹⁰

Who from the burning town by thee were
brought,

Thy fortune follow'd, and thy safety wrought.

Thro' seas and lands as we thy steps attend,
So shall our care thy glorious race befriend.
An ample realm for thee thy fates ordain,
A town that o'er the conquer'd world shall reign.

Thou, mighty walls for mighty nations build;

Nor let thy weary mind to labors yield:
But change thy seat; for not the Delian god,

Nor we, have giv'n thee Crete for our abode. 220

A land there is, Hesperia call'd of old,
(The soil is fruitful, and the natives bold —
Th' Ænotrians held it once,) by later fame
Now call'd Italia, from the leader's name.
Iasius there and Dardanus were born;
From thence we came, and thither must return.

Rise, and thy sire with these glad tidings greet.

Search Italy; for Jove denies thee Crete.
"Astonish'd at their voices and their sight,

(Nor were they dreams, but visions of the night; 230

I saw, I knew their faces, and descried,
In perfect view, their hair with fillets tied;) I started from my couch; a clammy sweat
On all my limbs and shiv'ring body sate.
To heav'n I lift my hands with pious haste,
And sacred incense in the flames I cast.

Thus to the gods their perfect honors done,
More cheerful, to my good old sire I run,
And tell the pleasing news. In little space
He found his error of the double race; 240

Not, as before he deem'd, deriv'd from Crete;

No more deluded by the doubtful seat:
Then said: 'O son, turmoil'd in Trojan fate!

Such things as these Cassandra did relate.
This day revives within my mind what she Foretold of Troy renew'd in Italy.

And Latian lands; but who could then have thought

That Phrygian gods to Latium should be brought,

Or who believ'd what mad Cassandra taught?

Now let us go where Phœbus leads the way. 250

"He said; and we with glad consent obey,

Forsake the seat, and, leaving few behind,
We spread our sails before the willing wind.
Now from the sight of land our galleys move,

With only seas around and skies above;
When o'er our heads descends a burst of rain,

And night with sable clouds involves the main;

The ruffling winds the foamy billows raise;
The scatter'd fleet is forc'd to sev'ral ways;
The face of heav'n is ravish'd from our eyes, 260

And in doubled peals the roaring thunder flies.

Cast from our course, we wander in the dark;

No stars to guide, no point of land to mark.
Ev'n Palinurus no distinction found

Betwixt the night and day; such darkness reign'd around.

Three starless nights the doubtful navy strays,

Without distinction, and three sunless days;
The fourth renews the light, and, from our shrouds,

We view a rising land, like distant clouds;
The mountain-tops confirm the pleasing sight, 270

And curling smoke ascending from their height.

The canvas falls; their oars the sailors ply;
From the rude strokes the whirling waters fly.

At length I land upon the Strophades,
Safe from the danger of the stormy seas.

Those isles are compass'd by th' Ionian main,

The dire abode where the foul Harpies reign,
Fore'd by the winged warriors to repair

To their old homes, and leave their costly fare.

Monsters more fierce offended Heav'n ne'er sent 280

From hell's abyss, for human punishment:
With virgin faces, but with wombs ob- scene,

Foul paunches, and with ordure still unclean;

With claws for hands, and looks for ever lean.

"We landed at the port, and soon beheld Fat herds of oxen graze the flow'ry field,

And wanton goats without a keeper stray'd.
With weapons we the welcome prey invade,

Then call the gods for partners of our feast,
And Jove himself, the chief invited guest.
We spread the tables on the greensward
ground; 291
We feed with hunger, and the bowls go
round;
When from the mountain-tops, with hideous
cry,
And clatt'ring wings, the hungry Harpies
fly:
They snatch the meat, defiling all they find,
And, parting, leave a loathsome stench
behind.
Close by a hollow rock, again we sit,
New dress the dinner, and the beds refit,
Secure from sight, beneath a pleasing shade,
Where tufted trees a native arbor made.
Again the holy fires on altars burn; 301
And once again the rav'nous birds return,
Or from the dark recesses where they lie,
Or from another quarter of the sky;
With filthy claws their odious meal repeat,
And mix their loathsome ordures with their meat.
I bid my friends for vengeance then
prepare,
And with the hellish nation wage the war.
They, as commanded, for the fight provide,
And in the grass their glitt'ring weapons
hide; 310
Then, when along the crooked shore we
hear
Their clatt'ring wings, and saw the foes
appear,
Misenus sounds a charge: we take th'
alarm,
And our strong hands with swords and bucklers arm.
In this new kind of combat all employ
Their utmost force, the monsters to destroy.
In vain—the fated skin is proof to wounds;
And from their plumes the shining sword rebounds.
At length rebuff'd, they leave their mangled
prey,
And their stretch'd pinions to the skies
display. 320
Yet one remain'd—the messenger of
Fate:
High on a craggy cliff Cæno sate,
And thus her dismal errand did relate:

'What! not contented with our oxen slain, Dare you with Heav'n an impious war
maintain,
And drive the Harpies from their native
reign?'
Heed therefore what I say; and keep in
mind
What Jove decrees, what Phœbus has de-
sign'd,
And I, the Furies' queen, from both re-
late—
You seek th' Italian shores, foredoom'd by
fate: 330
Th' Italian shores are granted you to find,
And a safe passage to the port assign'd.
But know, that ere your promis'd walls you build,
My curses shall severely be fulfill'd.
Fierce famine is your lot for this misdeed,
Reduc'd to grind the plates on which you feed.'
She said, and to the neighb'ring forest flew.
Our courage fails us, and our fears renew.
Hopeless to win by war, to pray'rs we fall,
And on th' offended Harpies humbly
call, 340
And whether gods or birds obscene they were,
Our vows for pardon and for peace prefer.
But old Anchises, off'ring sacrifice,
And lifting up to heav'n his hands and
eyes,
Ador'd the greater gods: 'Avert,' said he,
'These omens; render vain this prophecy,
And from th' impending curse a pious people free!'
"Thus having said, he bids us put to sea;
We loose from shore our haulsers, and
obey,
And soon with swelling sails pursue the wat'ry way. 350
Amidst our course, Zacynthian woods
appear;
And next by rocky Neritos we steer:
We fly from Ithaca's detested shore,
And curse the land which dire Ulysses
bore.
At length Leucate's cloudy top appears,
And the Sun's temple, which the sailor
fears.
Resolv'd to breathe a while from labor
past,
Our crooked anchors from the prow we
cast,
And joyful to the little city haste.

Here, safe beyond our hopes, our vows we pay ³⁶⁰
 To Jove, the guide and patron of our way.
 The customs of our country we pursue,
 And Trojan games on Actian shores renew.
 Our youth their naked limbs besmear with oil,
 And exercise the wrestlers' noble toil;
 Pleas'd to have sail'd so long before the
 wind,
 And left so many Grecian towns behind.
 The sun had now fulfill'd his annual course,
 And Boreas on the seas display'd his
 force:
 I fix'd upon the temple's lofty door ³⁷⁰
 The brazen shield which vanquish'd Abas
 bore;
 The verse beneath my name and action
 speaks:
 'These arms Æneas took from conqu'ring Greeks.'
 Then I command to weigh; the seamen ply
 Their sweeping oars; the smoking billows
 fly.
 The sight of high Phæacia soon we lost,
 And skimm'd along Epirus' rocky coast.
 "Then to Chaonia's port our course we
 bend,
 And, landed, to Buthrotus' heights ascend.
 Here wondrous things were loudly blaz'd
 by fame: ³⁸⁰
 How Helenus reviv'd the Trojan name,
 And reign'd in Greece; that Priam's captive son
 Succeeded Pyrrhus in his bed and throne;
 And fair Andromache, restor'd by fate,
 Once more was happy in a Trojan mate.
 I leave my galleys riding in the port,
 And long to see the new Dardanian court.
 By chance, the mournful queen, before the
 gate,
 Then solemniz'd her former husband's fate.
 Green altars, rais'd of turf, with gifts
 she crown'd, ³⁹⁰
 And sacred priests in order stand around,
 And thrice the name of hapless Hector
 sound.
 The grove itself resembles Ida's wood;
 And Simois seem'd the well-dissembled
 flood.
 But when at nearer distance she beheld
 My shining armor and my Trojan shield,
 Astonish'd at the sight, the vital heat Forsakes her limbs; her veins no longer
 beat:

She faints, she falls, and scarce recov'ring
 strength,
 Thus, with a falt'ring tongue, she speaks at length:
 "'Are you alive, O goddess-born?' she
 said,
 'Or if a ghost, then where is Hector's
 shade?'
 At this, she cast a loud and frightful cry.
 With broken words I made this brief reply:
 'All of me that remains appears in sight;
 I live, if living be to loathe the light.
 No phantom; but I drag a wretched life,
 My fate resembling that of Hector's wife.
 What have you suffer'd since you lost your
 lord?
 By what strange blessing are you now
 restor'd? ⁴¹⁰
 Still are you Hector's? or is Hector fled,
 And his remembrance lost in Pyrrhus'
 bed?'
 With eyes dejected, in a lowly tone,
 After a modest pause she thus begun:
 "'O only happy maid of Priam's race, Whom death deliver'd from the foes'
 embrace!
 Commanded on Achilles' tomb to die, }
 Not forc'd, like us, to hard captivity, }
 Or in a haughty master's arms to lie. }
 In Grecian ships unhappy we were borne, Endur'd the victor's lust, sustain'd the scorn: ⁴²¹
 Thus I submitted to the lawless pride
 Of Pyrrhus, more a handmaid than a bride.
 Cloy'd with possession, he forsook my bed,
 And Helen's lovely daughter sought to
 wed;
 Then me to Trojan Helenus resign'd,
 And his two slaves in equal marriage join'd;
 Till young Orestes, pierc'd with deep }
 despair, }
 And longing to redeem the promis'd fair, }
 Before Apollo's altar slew the ravisher. }
 By Pyrrhus' death the kingdom we re-gain'd: ⁴³¹
 At least one half with Helenus remain'd.
 Our part, from Chaon, he Chaonia calls,
 And names from Pergamus his rising
 walls.
 But you, what fates have landed on our
 coast?
 What gods have sent you, or what storms have toss'd?
 Does young Ascanius life and health enjoy,
 Sav'd from the ruins of unhappy Troy?

O tell me how his mother's loss he bears,
 What hopes are promis'd from his blooming years, 440
 How much of Hector in his face appears ? }

She spoke; and mix'd her speech with mournful cries,
 And fruitless tears came trickling from her
 eyes.

"At length her lord descends upon the
 plain,

In pomp, attended with a num'rous train;
 Receives his friends, and to the city leads,
 And tears of joy amidst his welcome sheds.
 Proceeding on, another Troy I see,
 Or, in less compass, Troy's epitome.

A riv'let by the name of Xanthus ran, 450
 And I embrace the Scæan gate again.

My friends in porticoes were entertain'd,
 And feasts and pleasures thro' the city
 reign'd.

The tables fill'd the spacious hall around,
 And golden bowls with sparkling wine were
 crown'd.

Two days we pass'd in mirth, till friendly
 gales,

Blown from the south, supplied our swelling sails.

Then to the royal seer I thus began:

'O thou, who know'st, beyond the reach of
 man,

The laws of heav'n, and what the stars
 decree; 460

Whom Phœbus taught unerring prophecy, }

From his own tripod, and his holy tree;
 Skill'd in the wing'd inhabitants of air,
 What auspices their notes and flights declare:

O say — for all religious rites portend
 A happy voyage, and a prosp'rous end;

And ev'ry pow'r and omen of the sky
 Direct my course for destin'd Italy;

But only dire Celeno, from the gods,
 A dismal famine fatally forebodes — 470

O say what dangers I am first to shun,
 What toils to vanquish, and what course to
 run.'

"The prophet first with sacrifice adores
 The greater gods; their pardon then im-
 plores;

Unbinds the fillet from his holy head;
 To Phœbus, next, my trembling steps he
 led, }

Full of religious doubts and awful dread. }

Then, with his god possess'd, before the
 shrine,

These words proceeded from his mouth
 divine:

'O goddess-born, (for Heav'n's appointed
 will, 480

With greater auspices of good than ill, Foreshows thy voyage, and thy course directs;

Thy fates conspire, and Jove himself protects,)

Of many things some few I shall explain, Teach thee to shun the dangers of the
 main, }

And how at length the promis'd shore to
 gain.

The rest the fates from Helenus conceal,
 And Juno's angry pow'r forbids to tell.

First, then, that happy shore, that seems so nigh, }

Will far from your deluded wishes fly; 490
 Long tracts of seas divide your hopes from Italy:

For you must cruise along Sicilian shores,
 And stem the currents with your struggling

oars;

Then round th' Italian coast your navy
 steer;

And, after this, to Circe's island veer;
 And, last, before your new foundations

rise,
 Must pass the Stygian lake, and view the nether skies.

Now mark the signs of future ease and
 rest,

And bear them safely treasur'd in thy
 breast.

When, in the shady shelter of a wood, 500
 And near the margin of a gentle flood,

Thou shalt behold a sow upon the ground,
 With thirty sucking young encompass'd

round;

The dam and offspring white as falling snow — }

These on thy city shall their name bestow,

And there shall end thy labors and thy
 woe. }

Nor let the threaten'd famine fright thy
 mind,

For Phœbus will assist, and Fate the way will find.

Let not thy course to that ill coast be bent,
 Which fronts from far th' Epirian continent:

Those parts are all by Grecian foes possess'd;

The salvage Locrians here the shores infest;
There fierce Idomeneus his city builds,
And guards with arms the Salentinian fields;

And on the mountain's brow Petilia stands,
Which Philoctetes with his troops commands.

Ev'n when thy fleet is landed on the shore,
And priests with holy vows the gods adore,
Then with a purple veil involve your eyes,
Lest hostile faces blast the sacrifice. ⁵²⁰

These rites and customs to the rest commend,

That to your pious race they may descend.

"When, parted hence, the wind, that ready waits

For Sicily, shall bear you to the straits
Where proud Pelorus opes a wider way,
Tack to the larboard, and stand off to sea:
Veer starboard sea and land. Th' Italian shore

And fair Sicilia's coast were one, before
An earthquake caus'd the flaw: the roaring tides

The passage broke that land from land divides; ⁵³⁰

And where the lands retir'd, the rushing ocean rides.

Distinguish'd by the straits, on either hand,
Now rising cities in long order stand,
And fruitful fields: so much can time invade

The mold'ring work that beauteous Nature made.

Far on the right, her dogs foul Scylla hides:

Charybdis roaring on the left presides,
And in her greedy whirlpool sucks the tides;

Then spouts them from below: with fury driv'n,

The waves mount up and wash the face of heav'n. ⁵⁴⁰

But Scylla from her den, with open jaws,
The sinking vessel in her eddy draws,
Then dashes on the rocks. A human face,
And virgin bosom, hides her tail's disgrace:
Her parts obscene below the waves descend,
With dogs inclos'd, and in a dolphin end.

'T is safer, then, to bear aloof to sea,
And coast Pachynus, tho' with more delay,
Than once to view misshapen Scylla near,
And the loud yell of wat'ry wolves to hear.

"Besides, if faith to Helenus be due,
And if prophetic Phœbus tell me true, ⁵⁵²
Do not this precept of your friend forget,
Which therefore more than once I must repeat:

Above the rest, great Juno's name adore;
Pay vows to Juno; Juno's aid implore.
Let gifts be to the mighty queen design'd,
And mollify with pray'rs her haughty mind.
Thus, at the length, your passage shall be free,

And you shall safe descend on Italy. ⁵⁶⁰
Arriv'd at Cumæ, when you view the flood
Of black Avernus, and the sounding wood,
The mad prophetic Sibyl you shall find,
Dark in a cave, and on a rock reclin'd.
She sings the fates, and, in her frantic fits,
The notes and names, inscrib'd, to leaf commits.

What she commits to leafs, in order laid,
Before the cavern's entrance are display'd:
Unmov'd they lie; but, if a blast of wind
Without, or vapors issue from behind, ⁵⁷⁰
The leafs are borne aloft in liquid air,
And she resumes no more her museful care,
Nor gathers from the rocks her scatter'd verse,

Nor sets in order what the winds disperse.
Thus, many not succeeding, most upbraid
The madness of the visionary maid,
And with loud curses leave the mystic shade.

"Think it not loss of time a while to stay,

Tho' thy companions chide thy long delay;
Tho' summon'd to the seas, tho' pleasing gales ⁵⁸⁰

Invite thy course, and stretch thy swelling sails:

But beg the sacred priestess to relate
With willing words, and not to write thy fate.

The fierce Italian people she will show,
And all thy wars, and all thy future woe,
And what thou may'st avoid, and what must undergo.

She shall direct thy course, instruct thy mind,

And teach thee how the happy shores to find.
This is what Heav'n allows me to relate:

Now part in peace; pursue thy better fate, ⁵⁹⁰
And raise, by strength of arms, the Trojan state.'

"This when the priest with friendly voice
 declar'd,
 He gave me license, and rich gifts prepar'd:
 Bounteous of treasure, he supplied my want
 With heavy gold, and polish'd elephant;
 Then Dodonæan caldrons put on board,
 And ev'ry ship with sums of silver stor'd.
 A trusty coat of mail to me he sent,
 Thrice chain'd with gold, for use and ornament;
 The helm of Pyrrhus added to the rest, ⁶⁰⁰
 That flourish'd with a plume and waving crest.
 Nor was my sire forgotten, nor my friends;
 And large recruits he to my navy sends:
 Men, horses, captains, arms, and warlike stores;
 Supplies new pilots, and new sweeping oars.
 Meantime, my sire commands to hoist our sails,
 Lest we should lose the first auspicious gales.
 "The prophet bless'd the parting crew,
 and last,
 With words like these, his ancient friend embrac'd: ⁶⁰⁹
 'Old happy man, the care of gods above,
 Whom heav'nly Venus honor'd with her love,
 And twice preserv'd thy life, when Troy was lost,
 Behold from far the wish'd Ausonian coast:
 There land; but take a larger compass round,
 For that before is all forbidden ground.
 The shore that Phœbus has design'd for you,
 At farther distance lies, conceal'd from view.
 Go happy hence, and seek your new abodes,
 Blest in a son, and favor'd by the gods:
 For I with useless words prolong your stay, ⁶²⁰
 When southern gales have summon'd you away.'
 "Nor less the queen our parting thence deplor'd,
 Nor was less bounteous than her Trojan lord.

A noble present to my son she brought,
 A robe with flow'rs on golden tissue wrought,
 A Phrygian vest; and loads with gifts beside
 Of precious texture, and of Asian pride.
 'Accept,' she said, 'these monuments of love,
 Which in my youth with happier hands I wove:
 Regard these trifles for the giver's sake; ⁶³⁰
 'Tis the last present Hector's wife can make.
 Thou call'st my lost Astyanax to mind;
 In thee his features and his form I find:
 His eyes so sparkled with a lively flame;
 Such were his motions; such was all his frame;
 And ah! had Heav'n so pleas'd, his years had been the same.'
 "With tears I took my last adieu, and said:
 'Your fortune, happy pair, already made,
 Leaves you no farther wish. My diff'rent state, Avoiding one, incurs another fate. ⁶⁴⁰
 To you a quiet seat the gods allow:
 You have no shores to search, no seas to plow,
 Nor fields of flying Italy to chase:
 (Deluding visions, and a vain embrace!)
 You see another Simois, and enjoy
 The labor of your hands, another Troy,
 With better auspice than her ancient tow'rs,
 And less obnoxious to the Grecian pow'rs.
 If e'er the gods, whom I with vows adore,
 Conduct my steps to Tiber's happy shore;
 If ever I ascend the Latian throne, ⁶⁵¹
 And build a city I may call my own;
 As both of us our birth from Troy derive,
 So let our kindred lines in concord live,
 And both in acts of equal friendship strive.
 Our fortunes, good or bad, shall be the same:
 The double Troy shall differ but in name;
 That what we now begin may never end,
 But long to late posterity descend.'
 "Near the Ceraunian rocks our course
 we bore; ⁶⁶⁰
 The shortest passage to th' Italian shore.
 Now had the sun withdrawn his radiant light,

And hills were hid in dusky shades of night:

We land, and, on the bosom of the ground,
A safe retreat and a bare lodging found.

Close by the shore we lay; the sailors keep
Their watches, and the rest securely sleep.

The night, proceeding on with silent
pace,
Stood in her noon, and view'd with equal face

Her steepy rise and her declining race.

Then wakeful Palinurus rose, to spy ⁶⁷¹

The face of heav'n, and the nocturnal
sky;

And listen'd ev'ry breath of air to try;

Observes the stars, and notes their sliding
course,

The Pleiads, Hyads, and their wat'ry force;

And both the Bears is careful to behold,

And bright Orion, arm'd with burnish'd
gold.

Then, when he saw no threat'ning tempest
nigh,

But a sure promise of a settled sky,

He gave the sign to weigh; we break our sleep, ⁶⁸⁰

Forsake the pleasing shore, and plow the deep.

"And now the rising morn with rosy
light

Adorns the skies, and puts the stars to
flight;

When we from far, like bluish mists, desery

The hills, and then the plains, of Italy.

Achates first pronounc'd the joyful sound;

Then, 'Italy!' the cheerful crew rebound.

My sire Anchises crown'd a cup with wine,

And, off'ring, thus implor'd the pow'rs
divine:

'Ye gods, presiding over lands and seas,

And you who raging winds and waves appease, ⁶⁹¹

Breathe on our swelling sails a prosp'rous
wind,

And smooth our passage to the port as-
sign'd!

The gentle gales their flagging force renew,

And now the happy harbor is in view.

Minerva's temple then salutes our sight,

Plac'd, as a landmark, on the mountain's
height.

We furl our sails, and turn the prows to
shore;

The curling waters round the galleys roar.

The land lies open to the raging east, ⁷⁰⁰

Then, bending like a bow, with rocks com-
press'd,

Shuts out the storms; the winds and waves
complain,

And vent their malice on the cliffs in vain.

The port lies hid within; on either side

Two tow'ring rocks the narrow mouth
divide.

The temple, which aloft we view'd before,
To distance flies, and seems to shun the
shore.

Scarce landed, the first omens I beheld

Were four white steeds that cropp'd the flow'ry field.

'War, war is threaten'd from this foreign ground,' ⁷¹⁰

My father cried, 'where warlike steeds are found.

Yet, since reclaim'd to chariots they submit,

And bend to stubborn yokes, and champ
the bit,

Peace may succeed to war.' Our way we bend

To Pallas, and the sacred hill ascend;

There prostrate to the fierce virago pray,

Whose temple was the landmark of our
way.

Each with a Phrygian mantle veil'd his
head,

And all commands of Helenus obey'd,

And pious rites to Grecian Juno paid. ⁷²⁰

These dues perform'd, we stretch our sails, and stand

To sea, forsaking that suspected land.

"From hence Tarentum's bay appears in
view,

For Hercules renown'd, if fame be true.

Just opposite, Lacinian Juno stands;

Caulonian tow'rs, and Scylacæan strands,

For shipwrecks fear'd. Mount Ætna thence we spy,

Known by the smoky flames which cloud
the sky.

Far off we hear the waves with surly
sound

Invalidate the rocks, the rocks their groans rebound. ⁷³⁰

The billows break upon the sounding strand,

And roll the rising tide, impure with sand.

Then thus Anchises, in experience old:

'Tis that Charybdis which the seer foretold,

And those the promis'd rocks ! Bear off to
sea !

With haste the frightened mariners obey.
First Palinurus to the larboard veer'd;
Then all the fleet by his example steer'd.
To heav'n aloft on ridgy waves we ride,
Then down to hell descend, when they
divide;

And thrice our galleys knock'd the stony
ground,

And thrice the hollow rocks return'd the
sound,

And thrice we saw the stars, that stood with dews around.

The flagging winds forsook us, with the sun;
And, wearied, on Cyclopiian shores we run.
The port capacious, and secure from wind,
Is to the foot of thund'ring Ætna join'd.

By turns a pitchy cloud she rolls on high;
By turns hot embers from her entrails
fly,

And flakes of mounting flames, that lick
the sky.

Oft from her bowels massy rocks are
thrown,

And, shiver'd by the force, come piecemeal
down.

Oft liquid lakes of burning sulphur flow,
Fed from the fiery springs that boil below.
Enceladus, they say, transfix'd by Jove,
With blasted limbs came tumbling from
above;

And, where he fell, th' avenging father
drew

This flaming hill, and on his body threw.
As often as he turns his weary sides,
He shakes the solid isle, and smoke the heavens hides.

In shady woods we pass the tedious
night,

Where bellowing sounds and groans our souls affright,

Of which no cause is offer'd to the sight;
For not one star was kindled in the sky,
Nor could the moon her borrow'd light
supply;

For misty clouds involv'd the firmament,
The stars were muffled, and the moon was pent.

"Scarce had the rising sun the day re-
veal'd,

Scarce had his heat the pearly dews dis-
pell'd,

When from the woods there bolts, before our sight,

Somewhat betwixt a mortal and a sprite,
So thin, so ghastly meager, and so wan,
So bare of flesh, he scarce resembled man.
This thing, all tatter'd, seem'd from far
t' implore

Our pious aid, and pointed to the shore.
We look behind, then view his shaggy
beard;

His clothes were tagg'd with thorns, and filth his limbs besmear'd;

The rest, in mien, in habit, and in face,
Appear'd a Greek, and such indeed he was.
He cast on us, from far, a frightful view,

Whom soon for Trojans and for foes he
knew;

Stood still, and paus'd; then all at once
began

To stretch his limbs, and trembled as he ran.

Soon as approach'd, upon his knees he falls,
And thus with tears and sighs for pity
calls:

'Now, by the pow'rs above, and what we
share

From Nature's common gift, this vital air,
O Trojans, take me hence ! I beg no more;
But bear me far from this unhappy shore.

'Tis true, I am a Greek, and farther own, 790
Among your foes besieg'd th' imperial town.

For such demerits if my death be due,
No more for this abandon'd life I sue;

This only favor let my tears obtain,
To throw me headlong in the rapid main:
Since nothing more than death my crime demands,

I die content, to die by human hands.'
He said, and on his knees my knees em-
brac'd:

I bade him boldly tell his fortune past,
His present state, his lineage, and his name,
Th' occasion of his fears, and whence he
came.

The good Anchises rais'd him with his
hand;

Who, thus encourag'd, answer'd our de-
mand:

'From Ithaca, my native soil, I came
To Troy; and Achæmenides my name.

Me my poor father with Ulysses sent;
(O had I stay'd, with poverty content !)

But, fearful for themselves, my country-
men

Left me forsaken in the Cyclops' den.
The cave, tho' large, was dark; the dismal floor

Was pav'd with mangled limbs and putrid
gore.

Our monstrous host, of more than human size,

Erects his head, and stares within the skies;
Bellowing his voice, and horrid is his hue.

Ye gods, remove this plague from mortal
view!

The joints of slaughter'd wretches are his
food;

And for his wine he quaffs the streaming
blood.

These eyes beheld, when with his spacious
hand

He seiz'd two captives of our Grecian band; Stretch'd on his back, he dash'd against the stones S20

Their broken bodies, and their crackling bones:

With spouting blood the purple pavement
swims,

While the dire glutton grinds the trembling limbs.

“Not unreveng'd Ulysses bore their fate,
Nor thoughtless of his own unhappy state;
For, gorg'd with flesh, and drunk with human
wine,

While fast asleep the giant lay supine,
Snoring aloud, and belching from his maw
His indigested foam, and morsels raw;

We pray; we cast the lots, and then surround S30

The monstrous body, stretch'd along the
ground:

Each, as he could approach him, lends a
hand

To bore his eyeball with a flaming brand.
Beneath his frowning forehead lay his eye;

For only one did the vast frame supply —
But that a globe so large, his front it fill'd,

Like the sun's disk or like a Grecian shield.
The stroke succeeds; and down the pupil
bends:

This vengeance follow'd for our slaugh-
ter'd friends.

But haste, unhappy wretches, haste to fly! S40
Your cables cut, and on your oars rely!

Such, and so vast as Polypheme appears,
A hundred more this hated island bears:

Like him, in caves they shut their woolly
sheep;

Like him, their herds on tops of mountains keep;

Like him, with mighty strides, they stalk from steep to steep.

And now three moons their sharpen'd horns
renew,

Since thus, in woods and wilds, obscure from view,

I drag my loathsome days with mortal
fright,

And in deserted caverns lodge by night; S50
Oft from the rocks a dreadful prospect
see

Of the huge Cyclops, like a walking tree:
From far I hear his thund'ring voice re-
sound,

And trampling feet that shake the solid
ground.

Cornels and salvage berries of the wood,
And roots and herbs, have been my meager
food.

While all around my longing eyes I cast,
I saw your happy ships appear at last.
On those I fix'd my hopes, to these I run;

'Tis all I ask, this cruel race to shun; S60
What other death you please, yourselves bestow.'

“Scarce had he said, when on the mountain's brow

We saw the giant shepherd stalk before His following flock, and leading to the
shore:

A monstrous bulk, deform'd, depriv'd of
sight;

His staff a trunk of pine, to guide his steps
aright.

His pond'rous whistle from his neck descends;

His woolly care their pensive lord attends:
This only solace his hard fortune sends. }

Soon as he reach'd the shore and touch'd
the waves, S70

From his bor'd eye the gutt'ring blood he
laves:

He gnash'd his teeth, and groan'd; thro'
seas he strides,

And scarce the topmost billows touch'd his
sides.

“Seiz'd with a sudden fear, we run to
sea,

The cables cut, and silent haste away;
The well-deserving stranger entertain;

Then, buckling to the work, our oars divide
the main.

The giant harken'd to the dashing sound:
But, when our vessels out of reach he found,

He strided onward, and in vain essay'd S80
Th' Ionian deep, and durst no farther
wade.

With that he roar'd aloud: the dreadful
cry
Shakes earth, and air, and seas; the bil-lows fly
Before the bellowing noise to distant Italy.
The neighb'ring Ætna trembling all around,
The winding caverns echo to the sound.
His brother Cyclops hear the yelling roar,
And, rushing down the mountains, crowd
the shore.
We saw their stern distorted looks, from
far,
And one-eye'd glance, that vainly threaten'd
war: 890
A dreadful council, with their heads on
high;
(The misty clouds about their foreheads
fly;)
Not yielding to the tow'ring tree of Jove,
Or tallest cypress of Diana's grove.
New pangs of mortal fear our minds
assail;
We tug at ev'ry oar, and hoist up ev'ry
sail,
And take th' advantage of the friendly
gale.
Forewarn'd by Helenus, we strive to shun
Charybdis' gulf, nor dare to Scylla run.
An equal fate on either side appears: 900
We, tacking to the left, are free from
fears;
For, from Pelorus' point, the North arose,
And drove us back where swift Pantagias flows.
His rocky mouth we pass, and make our
way
By Thapsus and Megara's winding bay.
This passage Achæmenides had shown, Tracing the course which he before had
run.
"Right o'er against Plemmyrium's wat'ry strand,
There lies an isle, once call'd th' Ortygian
land.
Alpheüs, as old fame reports, has found From Greece a secret passage under
ground, 911
By love to beauteous Arethusa led;
And, mingling here, they roll in the same sacred bed.
As Helenus enjoin'd, we next adore
Diana's name, protectress of the shore.
With prosperous gales we pass the quiet
sounds
Of still Elorus, and his fruitful bounds.

Then, doubling Cape Pachynus, we survey
The rocky shore extended to the sea.
The town of Camarine from far we see,
And fenny lake, undrain'd by fate's decree. 921
In sight of the Geloan fields we pass,
And the large walls, where mighty Gela was;
Then Agragas, with lofty summets crown'd,
Long for the race of warlike steeds re-
nown'd.
We pass'd Selinus, and the palmy land,
And widely shun the Lilybæan strand, Unsafe, for secret rocks and moving sand. }
At length on shore the weary fleet ar-riv'd, 929
Which Drepanum's unhappy port receiv'd.
Here, after endless labors, often toss'd
By raging storms, and driv'n on ev'ry
coast, }
My dear, dear father, spent with age, I
lost:
Ease of my cares, and solace of my pain,
Sav'd thro' a thousand toils, but sav'd in
vain.
The prophet, who my future woes re-
veal'd,
Yet this, the greatest and the worst, con-
ceal'd;
And dire Celeno, whose foreboding skill
Denounc'd all else, was silent of this ill.
This my last labor was. Some friendly
god 940
From thence convey'd us to your blest abode."
Thus, to the list'ning queen, the royal guest
His wand'ring course and all his toils ex-
press'd;
And here concluding, he retir'd to rest.

THE FOURTH BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

Dido discovers to her sister her passion for Æneas, and her thoughts of marrying him.
She prepares a hunting match for his entertainment. Juno, by Venus's consent, raises a storm, which separates the hunters, and drives Æneas and Dido into the same cave, where their marriage is suppos'd to be completed. Jupiter dispatches Mercury to Æneas, to warn him from Carthage. Æneas secretly prepares for his voyage. Dido finds out his design, and, to put a stop to it, makes use of her own and her sister's entreaties, and discovers all the variety of passions that are incident to a neglected lover. When nothing would prevail upon him, she contrives her own death, with which this book concludes.

BUT anxious cares already seiz'd the queen:

She fed within her veins a flame unseen;
The hero's valor, acts, and birth inspire
Her soul with love, and fan the secret fire.
His words, his looks, imprinted in her heart,
Improve the passion, and increase the smart.

Now, when the purple morn had chas'd away

The dewy shadows, and restor'd the day,
Her sister first with early care she sought,
And thus in mournful accents eas'd her thought:

"My dearest Anna, what new dreams affright

My lab'ring soul! what visions of the night
Disturb my quiet, and distract my breast
With strange ideas of our Trojan guest!
His worth, his actions, and majestic air,
A man descended from the gods declare.
Fear ever argues a degenerate kind;
His birth is well asserted by his mind.
Then, what he suffer'd, when by Fate betray'd!

What brave attempts for falling Troy he made!

Such were his looks, so gracefully he spoke,
That, were I not resolv'd against the yoke
Of hapless marriage, never to be curst
With second love, so fatal was my first,
To this one error I might yield again;
For, since Sichæus was untimely slain,
This only man is able to subvert
The fix'd foundations of my stubborn heart.

And, to confess my frailty, to my shame,
Somewhat I find within, if not the same,
Too like the sparkles of my former flame.
But first let yawning earth a passage rend,
And let me thro' the dark abyss descend;
First let avenging Jove, with flames
from high,

Drive down this body to the nether sky,
Condemn'd with ghosts in endless night
to lie,

Before I break the plighted faith I gave!
No! he who had my vows shall ever have;

For, whom I lov'd on earth, I worship in the grave."

She said: the tears ran gushing from her eyes,
And stopp'd her speech. Her sister thus replies:

"O dearer than the vital air I breathe,
Will you to grief your blooming years
bequeath,

Condemn'd to waste in woes your lonely
life,

Without the joys of mother or of wife?

Think you these tears, this pompous train
of woe,

Are known or valued by the ghosts below?
I grant that, while your sorrows yet were
green,

It well became a woman, and a queen,
The vows of Tyrian princes to neglect,

To scorn Hyarbas, and his love reject,

With all the Libyan lords of mighty name;

But will you fight against a pleasing flame!

This little spot of land, which Heav'n bestows,

On ev'ry side is hemm'd with warlike foes;
Gætulian cities here are spread around,

And fierce Numidians there your frontiers
bound;

Here lies a barren waste of thirsty land,
And there the Syrtes raise the moving
sand;

Barcæan troops besiege the narrow shore,
And from the sea Pygmalion threatens
more.

Propitious Heav'n, and gracious Juno, lead
This wand'ring navy to your needful aid:

How will your empire spread, your city rise,
From such a union, and with such allies!

Implore the favor of the pow'rs above,

And leave the conduct of the rest to love.

Continue still your hospitable way,

And still invent occasions of their stay, Till storms and winter winds shall cease to
threat,

And planks and oars repair their shatter'd
fleet."

These words, which from a friend and sister came,

With ease resolv'd the scruples of her
fame,

And added fury to the kindled flame.

Inspir'd with hope, the project they pursue;

On ev'ry altar sacrifice renew:
A chosen ewe of two years old they pay
To Ceres, Bacchus, and the God of Day;
Preferring Juno's pqw'r, for Juno ties
The nuptial knot and makes the marriage
joys. 80

The beauteous queen before her altar
stands,

And holds the golden goblet in her hands.
A milk-white heifer she with flow'rs
adorns,

And pours the ruddy wine betwixt her
horns;

And, while the priests with pray'r the gods
invoke,

She feeds their altars with Sabæan smoke,
With hourly care the sacrifice renews,
And anxiously the panting entrails views.
What priestly rites, alas! what pious art,
What vows avail to cure a bleeding
heart! 90

A gentle fire she feeds within her veins,
Where the soft god secure in silence
reigns.

Sick with desire, and seeking him she loves,

From street to street the raving Dido roves.

So when the watchful shepherd, from the blind,

Wounds with a random shaft the careless
hind,

Distracted with her pain she flies the woods,
Bounds o'er the lawn, and seeks the silent
floods,

With fruitless care; for still the fatal dart Sticks in her side, and rankles in her
heart. 100

And now she leads the Trojan chief along
The lofty walls, amidst the busy throng;
Displays her Tyrian wealth, and rising
town,

Which love, without his labor, makes his
own.

This pomp she shows, to tempt her wand'ring guest;

Her falt'ring tongue forbids to speak the
rest.

When day declines, and feasts renew the
night,

Still on his face she feeds her famish'd
sight;

She longs again to hear the prince relate
His own adventures and the Trojan
fate. 110

He tells it o'er and o'er; but still in vain,
For still she begs to hear it once again.
The hearer on the speaker's mouth depends,

And thus the tragic story never ends.

Then, when they part, when Phœbe's paler light

Withdraws, and falling stars to sleep invite,

She last remains, when ev'ry guest is gone,
Sits on the bed he press'd, and sighs alone;

Absent, her absent hero sees and hears;
Or in her bosom young Ascanius bears, 120

And seeks the father's image in the child,
If love by likeness might be so beguil'd.

Meantime the rising tow'rs are at a
stand;

No labors exercise the youthful band,
Nor use of arts, nor toils of arms they
know;

The mole is left unfinish'd to the foe;
The mounds, the works, the walls, neglected lie,

Short of their promis'd heighth, that seem'd to threat the sky.

But when imperial Juno, from above,
Saw Dido fetter'd in the chains of love, 130 Hot with the venom which her veins in-flam'd,

And by no sense of shame to be reclaim'd,
With soothing words to Venus she begun:
"High praises, endless honors, you have

won,
And mighty trophies, with your worthy
son!

Two gods a silly woman have undone!
Nor am I ignorant, you both suspect
This rising city, which my hands erect:

But shall celestial discord never cease?
'T is better ended in a lasting peace. 140
You stand possess'd of all your soul
desir'd:

Poor Dido with consuming love is fir'd.
Your Trojan with my Tyrian let us join;
So Dido shall be yours, Æneas mine: }
One common kingdom, one united line. }

Eliza shall a Dardan lord obey,
And lofty Carthage for a dow'r convey."
Then Venus, who her hidden fraud de-
scried, }

Which would the scepter of the world
misguide }

To Libyan shores, thus artfully replied:
"Who, but a fool, would wars with Juno
choose, 150

And such alliance and such gifts refuse,
If Fortune with our joint desires comply?
The doubt is all from Jove and destiny;
Lest he forbid, with absolute command,
To mix the people in one common land—
Or will the Trojan and the Tyrian line
In lasting leagues and sure succession
join?

But you, the partner of his bed and throne,
May move his mind; my wishes are your
own." 160

"Mine," said imperial Juno, "be the
care;

Time urges, now, to perfect this affair:
Attend my counsel, and the secret share.
When next the Sun his rising light displays,

And gilds the world below with purple rays,

The queen, Æneas, and the Tyrian court Shall to the shady woods, for sylvan game, resort.

There, while the huntsmen pitch their toils
around,

And cheerful horns from side to side re-
sound,

A pitchy cloud shall cover all the plain 170
With hail, and thunder, and tempestuous
rain;

The fearful train shall take their speedy
flight,

Dispers'd, and all involv'd in gloomy night;
One cave a grateful shelter shall afford
To the fair princess and the Trojan lord.

I will myself the bridal bed prepare,
If you, to bless the nuptials, will be there:
So shall their loves be crown'd with due delights,

And Hymen shall be present at the rites."
The Queen of Love consents, and closely smiles 180

At her vain project, and discover'd wiles.

The rosy morn was risen from the main,
And horns and hounds awake the princely
train:

They issue early thro' the city gate,
Where the more wakeful huntsmen ready
wait,

With nets, and toils, and darts, beside the
force

Of Spartan dogs, and swift Massylian
horse.

The Tyrian peers and officers of state
For the slow queen in antechambers wait;
Her lofty courser, in the court below, 190

Who his majestic rider seems to know, Proud of his purple trappings, paws the
ground,

And champs the golden bit, and spreads
the foam around.

The queen at length appears; on either
hand

The brawny guards in martial order stand.
A flow'r'd simar with golden fringe she
wore,

And at her back a golden quiver bore;
Her flowing hair a golden caul restrains,
A golden clasp the Tyrian robe sustains.
Then young Ascanius, with a sprightly
grace. 200

Leads on the Trojan youth to view the chase.
But far above the rest in beauty shines

The great Æneas, when the troop he joins;
Like fair Apollo, when he leaves the frost
Of wint'ry Xanthus, and the Lycian coast,
When to his native Delos he resorts,
Ordains the dances, and renews the sports;
Where painted Scythians, mix'd with Cretan
bands,

Before the joyful altars join their hands:
Himself, on Cynthus walking, sees below 210
The merry madness of the sacred show.

Green wreaths of bays his length of hair inclose;

A golden fillet binds his awful brows;
His quiver sounds: not less the prince is
seen

In manly presence, or in lofty mien.
Now had they reach'd the hills, and storm'd the seat

Of salvage beasts, in dens, their last retreat.

The cry pursues the mountain goats: they
bound

From rock to rock, and keep the craggy
ground;

Quite otherwise the stags, a trembling }
train, 220

In herds unsingled, scour the dusty plain,
And a long chase in open view maintain. }

The glad Ascanius, as his courser guides, Spurs thro' the vale, and these and those outrides.

His horse's flanks and sides are forc'd to feel

The clanking lash, and goading of the steel.
Impatiently he views the feeble prey,
Wishing some nobler beast to cross his way,
And rather would the tusky boar attend,
Or see the tawny lion downward bend. 230

Meantime, the gath'ring clouds obscure
the skies:

From pole to pole the forky lightning flies;
The rattling thunders roll; and Juno pours
A wintry deluge down, and sounding show'rs.

The company, dispers'd, to coverts ride,
And seek the homely cots, or mountain's hollow side.

The rapid rains, descending from the hills,
To rolling torrents raise the creeping rills.
The queen and prince, as love or fortune
guides,

One common cavern in her bosom hides. ²⁴⁰
Then first the trembling earth the signal
gave,

And flashing fires enlighten all the cave;
Hell from below, and Juno from above,
And howling nymphs, were conscious to their love.

From this ill-omen'd hour in time arose
Debate and death, and all succeeding woes.

The queen, whom sense of honor could not move,

No longer made a secret of her love,
But call'd it marriage, by that specious
name

To veil the crime and sanctify the shame. ²⁵⁰

The loud report thro' Libyan cities goes.
Fame, the great ill, from small beginnings grows:

Swift from the first; and ev'ry moment brings

New vigor to her flights, new pinions to her
wings.

Soon grows the pigmy to gigantic size;
Her feet on earth, her forehead in the
skies.

Inrag'd against the gods, revengeful Earth
Produc'd her last of the Titanian birth.

Swift is her walk, more swift her winged
haste:

A monstrous phantom, horrible and vast. ²⁶⁰
As many plumes as raise her lofty flight,
So many piercing eyes enlarge her sight;
Millions of opening mouths to Fame be-
long,

And ev'ry mouth is furnish'd with a
tongue,

And round with list'ning ears the flying plague is hung.

She fills the peaceful universe with cries;
No slumbers ever close her wakeful eyes;
By day, from lofty tow'rs her head she shews,

And spreads thro' trembling crowds disastrous news;

With court informers haunts, and royal spies; ²⁷⁰

Things done relates, not done she feigns, and mingles truth with lies.

Talk is her business, and her chief delight
To tell of prodigies and cause affright.

She fills the people's ears with Dido's name,
Who, lost to honor and the sense of shame,
Admits into her throne and nuptial bed

A wand'ring guest, who from his country
fled:

Whole days with him she passes in delights,
And wastes in luxury long winter nights,
Forgetful of her fame and royal trust, ²⁸⁰
Dissolv'd in ease, abandon'd to her lust.

The goddess widely spreads the loud report,

And flies at length to King Hyarba's court.
When first possess'd with this unwelcome
news,

Whom did he not of men and gods accuse?

This prince, from ravish'd Garamantis born,
A hundred temples did with spoils adorn,
In Ammon's honor, his celestial sire;

A hundred altars fed with wakeful fire;
And, thro' his vast dominions, priests or-dain'd, ²⁹⁰

Whose watchful care these holy rites main-
tain'd.

The gates and columns were with garlands
crown'd,

And blood of victim beasts enrich'd the
ground.

He, when he heard a fugitive could move
The Tyrian princess, who disdain'd his love,
His breast with fury burn'd, his eyes with
fire,

Mad with despair, impatient with desire;
Then on the sacred altars pouring wine,
He thus with pray'rs implor'd his sire
divine:

"Great Jove! propitious to the Moorish race, ³⁰⁰

Who feast on painted beds, with off'rings
grace

Thy temples, and adore thy pow'r divine
With blood of victims, and with sparkling
wine,

Seest thou not this? or do we fear in vain
Thy boasted thunder, and thy thoughtless reign?

Do thy broad hands the forky lightnings
lance?

Thine are the bolts, or the blind work of chance ?

A wand'ring woman builds, within our state,
A little town, bought at an easy rate;
She pays me homage, and my grants allow
A narrow space of Libyan lands to plow; ³¹¹
Yet, scorning me, by passion blindly led,
Admits a banish'd Trojan to her bed !
And now this other Paris, with his train
Of conquer'd cowards, must in Afric reign !
(Whom, what they are, their looks and garb confess,

Their locks with oil perfum'd, their Lydian dress.)

He takes the spoil, enjoys the princely
dame;

And I, rejected I, adore an empty name."

His vows, in haughty terms, he thus pre-ferr'd, ³²⁰

And held his altar's horns. The mighty Thund'rer heard;

Then cast his eyes on Carthage, where he
found

The lustful pair in lawless pleasure
drown'd,

Lost in their loves, insensible of shame,
And both forgetful of their better fame.
He calls Cyllenius, and the god attends,
By whom his menacing command he sends:
"Go, mount the western winds, and cleave
the sky;

Then, with a swift descent, to Carthage
fly:

There find the Trojan chief, who wastes his days ³³⁰

In slothful riot and inglorious ease,
Nor minds the future city, giv'n by fate.
To him this message from my mouth
relate:

'Not so fair Venus hop'd, when twice she
won

Thy life with pray'rs, nor promis'd such a
son.

Hers was a hero, destin'd to command
A martial race, and rule the Latian land,
Who should his ancient line from Teucer
draw,

And on the conquer'd world impose the
law.'

If glory cannot move a mind so mean, ³⁴⁰
Nor future praise from fading pleasure
wean,

Yet why should he defraud his son of fame,
And grudge the Romans their immortal
name !

What are his vain designs ! what hopes he
more

From his long ling'ring on a hostile shore,
Regardless to redeem his honor lost,
And for his race to gain th' Ausonian coast !
Bid him with speed the Tyrian court forsake;

With this command the slumb'ring warrior wake."

Hermes obeys; with golden pinions binds
His flying feet, and mounts the western winds: ³⁵¹

And, whether o'er the seas or earth he
flies,

With rapid force they bear him down the
skies.

But first he grasps within his awful hand
The mark of sov'reign pow'r, his magic wand;
With this he draws the ghosts from hollow graves;

With this he drives them down the Stygian
waves;

With this he seals in sleep the wakeful
sight,

And eyes, tho' clos'd in death, restores to
light.

Thus arm'd, the god begins his airy race, ³⁶⁰
And drives the racking clouds along the liquid space;

Now sees the tops of Atlas, as he flies,
Whose brawny back supports the starry
skies;

Atlas, whose head, with piny forests crown'd,
Is beaten by the winds, with foggy vapors
bound.

Snows hide his shoulders; from beneath his chin

The founts of rolling streams their race
begin;

A beard of ice on his large breast depends.
Here, pois'd upon his wings, the god de-
scends:

Then, rested thus, he from the tow'ring height ³⁷⁰

Plung'd downward, with precipitated flight, Lights on the seas, and skims along the
flood.

As waterfowl, who seek their fishy food,
Less, and yet less, to distant prospect show;
By turns they dance aloft, and dive below:
Like these, the steerage of his wings he
plies,

And near the surface of the water flies,
Till, having pass'd the seas, and cross'd the sands,

He clos'd his wings, and stoop'd on Libyan lands:

Where shepherds once were hous'd in homely sheds, ³⁸⁰

Now tow'rs within the clouds advance their heads.

Arriving there, he found the Trojan prince
New ramparts raising for the town's defense.

A purple scarf, with gold embroider'd o'er, (Queen Dido's gift,) about his waist he
wore;

A sword, with glitt'ring gems diversified,
For ornament, not use, hung idly by his
side.

Then thus, with winged words, the god
began,

Resuming his own shape: "Degenerate man,
Thou woman's property, what mak'st thou here, ³⁹⁰

These foreign walls and Tyrian tow'rs to
rear,

Forgetful of thy own? All-pow'rful Jove.
Who sways the world below and heav'n
above,

Has sent me down with this severe command:
What means thy ling'ring in the Libyan
land?

If glory cannot move a mind so mean,
Nor future praise from flitting pleasure
wean,

Regard the fortunes of thy rising heir:
The promis'd crown let young Ascanius
wear,

To whom th' Ausonian scepter, and the state ⁴⁰⁰

Of Rome's imperial name is ow'd by fate."
So spoke the god; and, speaking, took his
flight,

Involv'd in clouds, and vanish'd out of sight.
The pious prince was seiz'd with sudden
fear;

Mute was his tongue, and upright stood his
hair.

Revolving in his mind the stern command,
He longs to fly, and loathes the charming
land.

What should he say? or how should he
begin?

What course, alas! remains to steer between

Th' offended lover and the pow'rful queen? ⁴¹⁰

This way and that he turns his anxious
mind,

And all expedients tries, and none can find.
Fix'd on the deed, but doubtful of the means,

After long thought, to this advice he leans:
Three chiefs he calls, commands them to repair

The fleet, and ship their men with silent
care;

Some plausible pretense he bids them find,
To color what in secret he design'd.

Himself, meantime, the softest hours would
choose,

Before the love-sick lady heard the news;
And move her tender mind, by slow degrees, ⁴²¹

To suffer what the sov'reign pow'r decrees:
Jove will inspire him, when, and what to say.

They hear with pleasure, and with haste
obey.

But soon the queen perceives the thin disguise:

(What arts can blind a jealous woman's eyes!)

She was the first to find the secret fraud,
Before the fatal news was blaz'd abroad.

Love the first motions of the lover hears,
Quick to presage, and ev'n in safety fears.

Nor impious Fame was wanting to report
The ships repair'd, the Trojans' thick resort, ⁴³²

And purpose to forsake the Tyrian court.
Frantic with fear, impatient of the wound,
And impotent of mind, she roves the city
round.

Less wild the Bacchanalian dames ap-
pear,

When, from afar, their nightly god they
hear,

And howl about the hills, and shake the wreathy spear.

At length she finds the dear perfidious man;
Prevents his form'd excuse, and thus began:
"Base and ungrateful! could you hope to fly, ⁴⁴¹

And undiscover'd scape a lover's eye?
Nor could my kindness your compassion

move,
Nor plighted vows, nor dearer bands of
love?

Or is the death of a despairing queen
Not worth preventing, tho' too well fore-
seen?

Ev'n when the wintry winds command your
stay,

You dare the tempests, and defy the sea.
False as you are, suppose you were not bound

To lands unknown, and foreign coasts to sound;

Were Troy restor'd, and Priam's happy reign,

Now durst you tempt, for Troy, the raging main?

See whom you fly! am I the foe you shun?
Now, by those holy vows, so late begun,
By this right hand, (since I have nothing more

To challenge, but the faith you gave before;)

I beg you by these tears too truly shed,
By the new pleasures of our nuptial bed;
If ever Dido, when you most were kind,
Were pleading in your eyes, or touch'd your mind;

By these my pray'rs, if pray'rs may yet have place,

Pity the fortunes of a falling race.

For you I have provok'd a tyrant's hate,
Incens'd the Libyan and the Tyrian state;

For you alone I suffer in my fame,
Bereft of honor, and expos'd to shame.

Whom have I now to trust, ungrateful guest?

(That only name remains of all the rest!)

What have I left? or whither can I fly?

Must I attend Pygmalion's cruelty,

Or till Hyarba shall in triumph lead

A queen that proudly scorn'd his proffer'd bed?

Had you deferr'd, at least, your hasty flight,

And left behind some pledge of our delight,

Some babe to bless the mother's mournful sight,

Some young Æneas, to supply your place,
Whose features might express his father's face;

I should not then complain to live bereft
Of all my husband, or be wholly left."

Here paus'd the queen. Unmov'd he holds his eyes,

By Jove's command; nor suffer'd love to rise,

Tho' heaving in his heart; and thus at length replies:

"Fair queen, you never can enough repeat
Your boundless favors, or I own my debt;
Nor can my mind forget Eliza's name,

While vital breath inspires this mortal frame.

This only let me speak in my defense:

I never hop'd a secret flight from hence,

Much less pretended to the lawful claim

Of sacred nuptials, or a husband's name.

For, if indulgent Heav'n would leave me free,

And not submit my life to fate's decree,

My choice would lead me to the Trojan shore,

Those relics to review, their dust adore,
And Priam's ruin'd palace to restore.

But now the Delphian oracle commands,

And fate invites me to the Latian lands.

That is the promis'd place to which I steer,

And all my vows are terminated there.

If you, a Tyrian, and a stranger born,

With walls and tow'rs a Libyan town adorn,

Why may not we—like you, a foreign race—

Like you, seek shelter in a foreign place?

As often as the night obscures the skies

With humid shades, or twinkling stars arise,

Anchises' angry ghost in dreams appears,

Chides my delay, and fills my soul with fears;

And young Ascanius justly may complain

Of his defrauded fate and destin'd reign.

Ev'n now the herald of the gods appear'd:

Waking I saw him, and his message heard.

From Jove he came commission'd, heav'nly bright

With radiant beams, and manifest to sight

(The sender and the sent I both attest):

These walls he enter'd, and those words express'd.

Fair queen, oppose not what the gods command;

Forc'd by my fate, I leave your happy land."

Thus while he spoke, already she began,

With sparkling eyes, to view the guilty man;

From head to foot survey'd his person o'er,

Nor longer these outrageous threats forbore:

"False as thou art, and, more than false, forsworn!

Not sprung from noble blood, nor goddess-born,

But hewn from harden'd entrails of a rock !
And rough Hyrcanian tigers gave thee suck !

Why should I fawn ? what have I worse to fear ?

Did he once look, or lent a list'ning ear, Sigh'd when I sobb'd, or shed one kindly tear ? —

All symptoms of a base ungrateful mind,
So foul, that, which is worse, 't is hard to
find.

Of man's injustice why should I complain ?
The gods, and Jove himself, behold in
vain

Triumphant treason; yet no thunder
flies,

Nor Juno views my wrongs with equal
eyes;

Faithless is earth, and faithless are the
skies !

Justice is fled, and Truth is now no more !
I sav'd the shipwreck'd exile on my shore;
With needful food his hungry Trojans
fed;

I took the traitor to my throne and bed:
Fool that I was — 't is little to repeat ⁵⁴⁰
The rest — I stor'd and rigg'd his ruin'd fleet.

I rave, I rave ! A god's command he pleads,
And makes Heav'n accessory to his deeds.
Now Lycian lots, and now the Delian god,
Now Hermes is employ'd from Jove's abode,
To warn him hence; as if the peaceful
state

Of heav'nly pow'rs were touch'd with human
fate !

But go ! thy flight no longer I detain — Go seek thy promis'd kingdom thro' the
main !

Yet, if the heav'ns will hear my pious vow, ⁵⁵⁰

The faithless waves, not half so false as thou,

Or secret sands, shall sepulchers afford
To thy proud vessels, and their perjur'd
lord.

Then shalt thou call on injur'd Dido's
name:

Dido shall come in a black sulph'ry flame,
When death has once dissolv'd her mortal
frame;

Shall smile to see the traitor vainly weep:
Her angry ghost, arising from the deep,
Shall haunt thee waking, and disturb thy sleep.

At least my shade thy punishment shall know, ⁵⁶⁰

And Fame shall spread the pleasing news
below."

Abruptly here she stops; then turns away
Her loathing eyes, and shuns the sight of
day.

Amaz'd he stood, revolving in his mind
What speech to frame, and what excuse to
find.

Her fearful maids their fainting mistress
led,

And softly laid her on her iv'ry bed.

But good Æneas, tho' he much desir'd
To give that pity which her grief requir'd; Tho' much he mourn'd, and labor'd with his love, ⁵⁷⁰

Resolv'd at length, obeys the will of Jove;
Reviews his forces: they with early care
Unmoor their vessels, and for sea prepare.

The fleet is soon afloat, in all its pride,
And well-calk'd galleys in the harbor ride.
Then oaks for oars they fell'd; or, as they
stood,

Of its green arms despoil'd the growing
wood,

Studious of flight. The beach is cover'd
o'er

With Trojan bands, that blacken all the
shore:

On ev'ry side are seen, descending down, ⁵⁸⁰ Thick swarms of soldiers, loaden from the
town.

Thus, in battalia, march embodied ants,
Feanful of winter, and of future wants,
T' invade the corn, and to their cells convey

The plunder'd forage of their yellow prey.
The sable troops, along the narrow tracks, Scarce bear the weighty burthen on their backs:

Some set their shoulders to the pond'rous
grain;

Some guard the spoil; some lash the lagging train;

All ply their sev'ral tasks, and equal toil sustain. ⁵⁹⁰

What pangs the tender breast of Dido
tore,

When, from the tow'r, she saw the cov-
er'd shore,

And heard the shouts of sailors from afar,
Mix'd with the murmurs of the wat'ry war!
All-pow'rful Love ! what changes canst thou
cause

In human hearts, subjected to thy laws !
Once more her haughty soul the tyrant
bends:

To pray'r's and mean submissions she descends.

No female arts or aids she left untried,
Nor counsels unexplor'd, before she died. 600
"Look, Anna ! look ! the Trojans crowd to
sea;

They spread their canvas, and their anchors
weigh.

The shouting crew their ships with garlands
bind,

Invoke the sea gods, and invite the wind.
Could I have thought this threat'ning blow
so near,

My tender soul had been forewarn'd to
bear.

But do not you my last request deny;
With yon perfidious man your int'rest
try,
And bring me news, if I must live or
die.

You are his fav'rite; you alone can find 610
The dark recesses of his inmost mind:

In all his trusted secrets you have part,
And know the soft approaches to his heart.
Haste then, and humbly seek my haughty
foe;

Tell him, I did not with the Grecians go,
Nor did my fleet against his friends employ,

Nor swore the ruin of unhappy Troy,
Nor mov'd with hands profane his father's dust:

Why should he then reject a suit so just !
Whom does he shun, and whither would he fly ! 620

Can he this last, this only pray'r deny !
Let him at least his dang'rous flight delay,
Wait better winds, and hope a calmer sea.
The nuptials he disclaims I urge no more:
Let him pursue the promis'd Latian shore.
A short delay is all I ask him now;
A pause of grief, an interval from woe,
Till my soft soul be temper'd to sustain Accustom'd sorrows, and inur'd to pain.
If you in pity grant this one request, 630
My death shall glut the hatred of his
breast."

This mournful message pious Anna bears,
And seconds with her own her sister's
tears:

But all her arts are still employ'd in vain;
Again she comes, and is refus'd again.

His harden'd heart nor pray'r's nor threat'n-ings move;

Fate, and the god, had stopp'd his ears to
love.

As, when the winds their airy quarrel
try,

Justling from ev'ry quarter of the sky,
This way and that the mountain oak they
bend, 640

His boughs they shatter, and his branches
rend;

With leaves and falling mast they spread
the ground;

The hollow valleys echo to the sound:
Unmov'd, the royal plant their fury
mocks,

Or, shaken, clings more closely to the rocks;

Far as he shoots his tow'ring head on high,
So deep in earth his fix'd foundations lie.

No less a storm the Trojan hero bears; Thick messages and loud complaints he hears,

And banded words, still beating on his ears. 650

Sighs, groans, and tears proclaim his inward pains;

But the firm purpose of his heart remains.
The wretched queen, pursued by cruel
fate,

Begins at length the light of heav'n to
hate,

And loathes to live. Then dire portents
she sees,

To hasten on the death her soul decrees:
Strange to relate ! for when, before the
shrine,

She pours in sacrifice the purple wine,
The purple wine is turn'd to putrid blood,
And the white offer'd milk converts to
mud. 660

This dire presage, to her alone reveal'd,
From all, and ev'n her sister, she con-
ceal'd.

A marble temple stood within the grove,
Sacred to death, and to her murder'd
love;

That honor'd chapel she had hung around
With snowy fleeces, and with garlands
crown'd:

Oft, when she visited this lonely dome,
Strange voices issued from her husband's tomb;

She thought she heard him summon her
away,

Invite her to his grave, and chide her stay.
Hourly 't is heard, when with a boding
note 671

The solitary screech owl strains her throat,
And, on a chimney's top, or turret's height,
With songs obscene disturbs the silence of the night.

Besides, old prophecies augment her fears;
And stern Æneas in her dreams appears,
Disdainful as by day: she seems, alone,
To wander in her sleep, thro' ways un-
known,

Guideless and dark; or, in a desert plain,
To seek her subjects, and to seek in vain:
Like Pentheus, when, distracted with his
fear, 681

He saw two suns, and double Thebes, appear;

Or mad Orestes, when his mother's ghost
Full in his face infernal torches toss'd,
And shook hers snaky locks: he shuns the
sight,

Flies o'er the stage, surpris'd with mortal fright;

The Furies guard the door and intercept his flight.

Now, sinking underneath a load of grief,
From death alone she seeks her last relief;
The time and means resolv'd within her
breast, 690

She to her mournful sister thus address'd (Dissembling hope, her cloudy front she clears,

And a false vigor in her eyes appears):
"Rejoice!" she said. "Instructed from
above,

My lover I shall gain, or lose my love.
Nigh rising Atlas, next the falling sun,
Long tracts of Ethiopian climates run:
There a Massylian priestess I have found,
Honor'd for age, for magic arts renown'd:
Th' Hesperian temple was her trusted care;
'T was she supplied the wakeful dragon's fare. 701

She poppy seeds in honey taught to steep, Reclaim'd his rage, and sooth'd him into sleep.

She watch'd the golden fruit; her charms unbind

The chains of love, or fix them on the
mind:

She stops the torrents, leaves the channel
dry,

Repels the stars, and backward bears the
sky.

The yawning earth rebellows to her call,
Pale ghosts ascend, and mountain ashes
fall.

Witness, ye gods, and thou my better part,
How loth I am to try this impious art! 711
Within the secret court, with silent care,
Erect a lofty pile, expos'd in air:
Hang on the topmost part the Trojan vest,
Spoils, arms, and presents, of my faithless
guest.

Next, under these, the bridal bed be plac'd,
Where I my ruin in his arms embrac'd:
All relics of the wretch are doom'd to fire;
For so the priestess and her charms require."

Thus far she said, and farther speech for-
bears; 720

A mortal paleness in her face appears:

Yet the mistrustless Anna could not find
The secret fun'ral in these rites de-
sign'd;
Nor thought so dire a rage possess'd her
mind.

Unknowing of a train conceal'd so well,
She fear'd no worse than when Sichæus fell;
Therefore obeys. The fatal pile they rear,
Within the secret court, expos'd in air.
The cloven holms and pines are heap'd on
high,

And garlands on the hollow spaces lie. 730 Sad cypress, vervain, yew, compose the wreath,

And ev'ry baleful green denoting death.

The queen, determin'd to the fatal deed,
The spoils and sword he left, in order
spread,

And the man's image on the nuptial bed.

And now (the sacred altars plac'd
around)

The priestess enters, with her hair un-
bound,

And thrice invokes the pow'rs below the
ground.

Night, Erebus, and Chaos she proclaims,
And threefold Hecate, with her hundred names, 740

And three Dianas: next, she sprinkles
round

With feign'd Avernian drops the hallow'd
ground;

Culls hoary simples, found by Phœbe's
light,

With brazen sickles reap'd at noon of night;
Then mixes baleful juices in the bowl,
And cuts the forehead of a newborn foal,

Robbing the mother's love. The destin'd
queen

Observes, assisting at the rites obscene;
A leaven'd cake in her devoted hands ⁷⁴⁹
She holds, and next the highest altar stands:
One tender foot was shod, her other bare;
Girt was her gather'd gown, and loose her
hair.

Thus dress'd, she summon'd, with her dying
breath,

The heav'n's and planets conscious of her
death,

And ev'ry pow'r, if any rules above,
Who minds, or who revenges, injur'd love.

'T was dead of night, when weary bodies
close

Their eyes in balmy sleep and soft repose:
The winds no longer whisper thro' the woods,

Nor murm'ring tides disturb the gentle
floods. ⁷⁶⁰

The stars in silent order mov'd around;
And Peace, with downy wings, was brooding on the ground.

The flocks and herds, and party-color'd fowl,

Which haunt the woods, or swim the weedy pool,

Stretch'd on the quiet earth, securely lay,
Forgetting the past labors of the day.

All else of nature's common gift partake:
Unhappy Dido was alone awake.

Nor sleep nor ease the furious queen can
find;

Sleep fled her eyes, as quiet fled her mind.
Despair, and rage, and love divide her heart; ⁷⁷¹

Despair and rage had some, but love the greater part.

Then thus she said within her secret
mind:

"What shall I do? what succor can I
find?

Become a suppliant to Hyarba's pride,
And take my turn, to court and be denied?
Shall I with this ungrateful Trojan go,
Forsake an empire, and attend a foe?

Himself I refug'd, and his train reliev'd —
'T is true — but am I sure to be receiv'd?

Can gratitude in Trojan souls have place!
Laomedon still lives in all his race! ⁷⁸²

Then, shall I seek alone the churlish crew,
Or with my fleet their flying sails pursue?

What force have I but those whom scarce
before

I drew reluctant from their native shore?
Will they again embark at my desire, Once more sustain the seas, and quit their second Tyre?

Rather with steel thy guilty breast invade,
And take the fortune thou thyself hast made. ⁷⁹⁰

Your pity, sister, first seduc'd my mind,
Or seconded too well what I design'd.

These dear-bought pleasures had I never
known,

Had I continued free, and still my own;
Avoiding love, I had not found despair,
But shar'd with salvage beasts the common
air.

Like them, a lonely life I might have led,
Not mourn'd the living, nor disturb'd the
dead."

These thoughts she brooded in her anxious
breast.

On board, the Trojan found more easy rest. ⁸⁰⁰

Resolv'd to sail, in sleep he pass'd the
night;

And order'd all things for his early flight.
To whom once more the winged god

appears;
His former youthful mien and shape
he wears,

And with this new alarm invades his ears:
"Sleep'st thou, O goddess-born! and canst
thou drown

Thy needful cares, so near a hostile town, Beset with foes; nor hear'st the western
gales

Invite thy passage, and inspire thy sails?
She harbors in her heart a furious hate, ⁸¹⁰

And thou shalt find the dire effects too
late;

Fix'd on revenge, and obstinate to die.

Haste swiftly hence, while thou hast pow'r
to fly.

The sea with ships will soon be cover'd o'er,
And blazing firebrands kindle all the shore.
Prevent her rage, while night obscures the
skies,

And sail before the purple morn arise.

Who knows what hazards thy delay may bring?

Woman's a various and a changeful thing." Thus Hermes in the dream; then took his flight ⁸²⁰

Aloft in air unseen, and mix'd with night.

Twice warn'd by the celestial messenger,
The pious prince arose with hasty fear;

Then rous'd his drowsy train without delay:
 "Haste to your banks; your crooked anchors weigh,
 And spread your flying sails, and stand to
 sea.
 A god commands: he stood before my
 sight,
 And urg'd us once again to speedy flight.
 O sacred pow'r, what pow'r soe'er thou art,
 To thy blest orders I resign my heart. ⁸³⁰ Lead thou the way; protect thy Trojan
 bands,
 And prosper the design thy will commands."
 He said; and, drawing forth his flaming
 sword,
 His thund'ring arm divides the many-twisted cord.
 An emulating zeal inspires his train:
 They run; they snatch; they rush into the
 main.
 With headlong haste they leave the desert
 shores,
 And brush the liquid seas with lab'ring
 oars.
 Aurora now had left her saffron bed,
 And beams of early light the heav'ns o'er-spread, ⁸⁴⁰
 When, from a tow'r, the queen, with wake-
 ful eyes,
 Saw day point upward from the rosy skies.
 She look'd to seaward; but the sea was void,
 And scarce in ken the sailing ships de-
 scried.
 Stung with despise, and furious with despair,
 She struck her trembling breast, and tore her hair.
 "And shall th' ungrateful traitor go," she
 said,
 "My land forsaken, and my love be-
 tray'd?
 Shall we not arm? not rush from ev'ry street, ⁸⁴⁹
 To follow, sink, and burn his perjur'd fleet?
 Haste, haul my galleys out! pursue the
 foe!
 Bring flaming brands! set sail, and swiftly
 row!
 What have I said? where am I? Fury turns
 My brain; and my distemper'd bosom burns.
 Then, when I gave my person and my
 throne,

This hate, this rage, had been more timely shown.
 See now the promis'd faith, the vaunted
 name,
 The pious man, who, rushing thro' the
 flame,
 Preserv'd his gods, and to the Phrygian
 shore
 The burthen of his feeble father bore! ⁸⁶⁰
 I should have torn him piecemeal; strow'd in floods
 His scatter'd limbs, or left expos'd in woods; Destroy'd his friends and son; and, from the fire,
 Have set the reeking boy before the sire.
 Events are doubtful, which on battles wait:
 Yet where's the doubt, to souls secure of
 fate?
 My Tyrians, at their injur'd queen's command,
 Had toss'd their fires amid the Trojan band;
 At once extinguish'd all the faithless
 name;
 And I myself, in vengeance of my shame,
 Had fall'n upon the pile, to mend the fun'ral flame. ⁸⁷¹
 Thou Sun, who view'st at once the world
 below;
 Thou Juno, guardian of the nuptial vow;
 Thou Hecate, hearken from thy dark
 abodes!
 Ye Furies, fiends, and violated gods,
 All pow'rs invoc'd with Dido's dying breath,
 Attend her curses and avenge her death!
 If so the Fates ordain, and Jove commands,
 Th' ungrateful wretch should find the Latian lands,
 Yet let a race untam'd, and haughty foes,
 His peaceful entrance with dire arms oppose: ⁸⁸¹
 Oppress'd with numbers in th' unequal
 field,
 His men discourag'd, and himself expell'd,
 Let him for succor sue from place to place,
 Torn from his subjects, and his son's embrace.
 First, let him see his friends in battle slain,
 And their untimely fate lament in vain;
 And when, at length, the cruel war shall
 cease,
 On hard conditions may he buy his peace:
 Nor let him then enjoy supreme command; ⁸⁹⁰
 But fall, untimely, by some hostile hand,
 And lie unburied on the barren sand!

These are my pray'rs, and this my dying will;

And you, my Tyrians, ev'ry curse fulfil.
Perpetual hate and mortal wars proclaim,
Against the prince, the people, and the name.

These grateful off'rings on my grave bestow;

Nor league, nor love, the hostile nations know !

Now, and from hence, in ev'ry future age,
When rage excites your arms, and strength supplies the rage,

Rise some avenger of our Libyan blood,
With fire and sword pursue the perjurd brood;

Our arms, our seas, our shores, oppos'd to theirs;

And the same hate descend on all our heirs !"

This said, within her anxious mind she weighs

The means of cutting short her odious days.
Then to Sichæus' nurse she briefly said
(For, when she left her country, hers was dead):

"Go, Barce, call my sister. Let her care
The solemn rites of sacrifice prepare; ⁹¹⁰
The sheep, and all th' atoning off'rings, bring,

Sprinkling her body from the crystal spring
With living drops; then let her come, and thou

With sacred fillets bind thy hoary brow.
Thus will I pay my vows to Stygian Jove,
And end the cares of my disastrous love;
Then cast the Trojan image on the fire,
And, as that burns, my passion shall expire."

The nurse moves onward, with officious care, ⁹¹⁹

And all the speed her aged limbs can bear.
But furious Dido, with dark thoughts involv'd,

Shook at the mighty mischief she resolv'd.
With livid spots distinguish'd was her face;
Red were her rolling eyes, and discompos'd her pace;

Ghastly she gaz'd, with pain she drew her breath,

And nature shiver'd at approaching death.

Then swiftly to the fatal place she pass'd,
And mounts the fun'ral pile with furious haste;

Unsheathes the sword the Trojan left behind

(Not for so dire an enterprise design'd). ⁹³⁰
But when she view'd the garments loosely spread,

Which once he wore, and saw the conscious bed,

She paus'd, and with a sigh the robes embrac'd;

Then on the couch her trembling body cast,

Repress'd the ready tears, and spoke her last:

"Dear pledges of my love, while Heav'n's so pleas'd,

Receive a soul, of mortal anguish eas'd:

My fatal course is finish'd; and I go,
A glorious name, among the ghosts below.

A lofty city by my hands is rais'd, ⁹⁴⁰
Pygmalion punish'd, and my lord appeas'd.

What could my fortune have afforded more,
Had the false Trojan never touch'd my shore !"

Then kiss'd the couch; and, "Must I die," she said,

"And unreveng'd ? 'Tis doubly to be dead !

Yet ev'n this death with pleasure I receive:
On any terms, 't is better than to live.

These flames, from far, may the false Trojan view;

These boding omens his base flight pursue !"

She said, and struck; deep enter'd in her side ⁹⁵⁰

The piercing steel, with reeking purple dyed:

Clogg'd in the wound the cruel weapon stands;

The spouting blood came streaming on her hands.

Her sad attendants saw the deadly stroke,
And with loud cries the sounding palace shook.

Distracted, from the fatal sight they fled,
And thro' the town the dismal rumor spread.

First from the frightened court the yell began;

Redoubled, thence from house to house it ran:

The groans of men, with shrieks, laments, and cries ⁹⁶⁰

Of mixing women, mount the vaulted skies.
Not less the clamor, than if — ancient

Tyre,
Or the new Carthage, set by foes on fire —

The rolling ruin, with their lov'd abodes,
Involv'd the blazing temples of their gods.

Her sister hears; and, furious with despair,
She beats her breast, and rends her yellow hair,
And, calling on Eliza's name aloud,
Runs breathless to the place, and breaks the crowd.

"Was all that pomp of woe for this prepar'd;
These fires, this fun'ral pile, these altars rear'd?"

Was all this train of plots contriv'd," said she,

"All only to deceive unhappy me?
Which is the worst? Didst thou in death pretend

To scorn thy sister, or delude thy friend?
Thy summon'd sister, and thy friend, had come;

One sword had serv'd us both, one common tomb:

Was I to raise the pile, the pow'rs invoke,
Not to be present at the fatal stroke?
At once thou hast destroy'd thyself and me,

Thy town, thy senate, and thy colony!
Bring water; bathe the wound; while I in death

Lay close my lips to hers, and catch the flying breath."

This said, she mounts the pile with eager haste,

And in her arms the gasping queen embrac'd;

Her temples chaf'd; and her own garments tore,

To stanch the streaming blood, and cleanse the gore.

Thrice Dido tried to raise her drooping head,
And, fainting thrice, fell grov'ling on the bed;

Thrice op'd her heavy eyes, and sought the light,

But, having found it, sicken'd at the sight,
And clos'd her lids at last in endless night.

Then Juno, grieving that she should sustain

A death so ling'ring, and so full of pain,
Sent Iris down, to free her from the strife
Of lab'ring nature, and dissolve her life.
For since she died, not doom'd by Heav'n's decree,

Or her own crime, but human casualty,
And rage of love, that plung'd her in despair,

The Sisters had not cut the topmost hair,

Which Proserpine and they can only know;
Nor made her sacred to the shades below.

Downward the various goddess took her flight,

And drew a thousand colors from the light;

Then stood above the dying lover's head,
And said: "I thus devote thee to the dead.

This off'ring to th' infernal gods I bear." }
Thus while she spoke, she cut the fatal hair:

The struggling soul was loos'd, and life dissolv'd in air. }

THE FIFTH BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

Æneas, setting sail from Afric, is driven by a storm on the coasts of Sicily, where he is hospitably receiv'd by his friend Acestes, king of part of the island, and born of Trojan parentage. He applies himself to celebrate the memory of his father with divine honors, and accordingly institutes funeral games, and appoints prizes for those who should conquer in them. While the ceremonies were performing, Juno sends Iris to persuade the Trojan women to burn the ships, who, upon her instigation, set fire to them; which burnt four, and would have consum'd the rest, had not Jupiter, by a miraculous shower, extinguish'd it. Upon this, Æneas, by the advice of one of his generals, and a vision of his father, builds a city for the women, old men, and others, who were either unfit for war, or weary of the voyage, and sails for Italy. Venus procures of Neptune a safe voyage for him and all his men, excepting only his pilot Palinurus, who is unfortunately lost.

MEANTIME the Trojan cuts his wat'ry way,
Fix'd on his voyage, thro' the curling sea;
Then, casting back his eyes, with dire amaze,

Sees on the Punic shore the mounting blaze.
The cause unknown; yet his presaging mind

The fate of Dido from the fire divin'd;
He knew the stormy souls of womankind, }

What secret springs their eager passions
 move,
 How capable of death for injur'd love.
 Dire auguries from hence the Trojans draw; ¹⁰
 Till neither fires nor shining shores they saw.
 Now seas and skies their prospect only
 bound;
 An empty space above, a floating field
 around.
 But soon the heav'ns with shadows were
 o'erspread;
 A swelling cloud hung hov'ring o'er their
 head:
 Livid it look'd, the threat'ning of a storm;
 Then night and horror ocean's face deform.
 The pilot, Palinurus, cried aloud:
 "What gusts of weather from that gath'ring cloud
 My thoughts presage! Ere yet the tempest roars, ²⁰
 Stand to your tackle, mates, and stretch your oars;
 Contract your swelling sails, and luff to
 wind."
 The frightened crew perform the task assign'd.
 Then, to his fearless chief: "Not Heav'n,"
 said he,
 "Tho' Jove himself should promise Italy,
 Can stem the torrent of this raging sea."
 Mark how the shifting winds from west
 arise,
 And what collected night involves the skies!
 Nor can our shaken vessels live at sea,
 Much less against the tempest force their way. ³⁰
 'T is fate diverts our course, and fate we must obey.
 Not far from hence, if I observ'd aright
 The southing of the stars, and polar light,
 Sicilia lies, whose hospitable shores
 In safety we may reach with struggling
 oars."
 Æneas then replied: "Too sure I find
 We strive in vain against the seas and wind:
 Now shift your sails; what place can please me more
 Than what you promise, the Sicilian shore, Whose hallow'd earth Anchises' bones contains, ⁴⁰
 And where a prince of Trojan lineage
 reigns?"
 The course resolv'd, before the western
 wind

They seud amain, and make the port as-
 sign'd.

Meantime Acestes, from a lofty stand,
 Beheld the fleet descending on the land;
 And, not unmindful of his ancient race,
 Down from the cliff he ran with eager
 pace,

And held the hero in a strict embrace.
 Of a rough Libyan bear the spoils he wore,
 And either hand a pointed jav'lin bore. ⁵⁰
 His mother was a dame of Dardan blood;
 His sire Crinisis, a Sicilian flood.
 He welcomes his returning friends ashore
 With plenteous country cates and homely
 store.

Now, when the following morn had chas'd
 away

The flying stars, and light restor'd the day,
 Æneas call'd the Trojan troops around,
 And thus bespoke them from a rising
 ground:

"Offspring of heav'n, divine Dardanian race!
 The sun, revolving thro' th' ethereal space,
 The shining circle of the year has fill'd, ⁶⁰
 Since first this isle my father's ashes held:
 And now the rising day renews the year;
 A day for ever sad, for ever dear.

This would I celebrate with annual games,
 With gifts on altars pil'd, and holy flames,
 Tho' banish'd to Gætulia's barren sands,
 Caught on the Grecian seas, or hostile lands:
 But since this happy storm our fleet has
 driv'n

(Not, as I deem, without the will of Heav'n) Upon these friendly shores and flow'ry plains, ⁷⁰

Which hide Anchises and his blest remains,
 Let us with joy perform his honors due,
 And pray for prosp'rous winds, our voyage
 to renew;

Pray, that in towns and temples of our
 own,

The name of great Anchises may be
 known,

And yearly games may spread the gods'
 renown.

Our sports Acestes, of the Trojan race,
 With royal gifts ordain'd, is pleas'd to grace:
 Two steers on ev'ry ship the king bestows;
 His gods and ours shall share your equal vows. ⁸⁰

Besides, if, nine days hence, the rosy morn
 Shall with unclouded light the skies adorn,
 That day with solemn sports I mean to
 grace:

Light galleys on the seas shall run a wat'ry
 race;
 Some shall in swiftness for the goal contend,
 And others try the twanging bow to bend;
 The strong, with iron gauntlets arm'd, shall stand

Oppos'd in combat on the yellow sand.
 Let all be present at the games prepar'd,⁹⁰
 And joyful victors wait the just reward.
 But now assist the rites, with garlands crown'd."

He said, and first his brows with myrtle bound.

Then Helymus, by his example led,
 And old Æcestes, each adorn'd his head;
 Thus young Ascanius, with a sprightly grace,

His temples tied, and all the Trojan race.

Æneas then advanc'd amidst the train,
 By thousands follow'd thro' the flow'ry plain,

To great Anchises' tomb; which when he found,¹⁰⁰

He pour'd to Bacchus, on the hallow'd ground,

Two bowls of sparkling wine, of milk two more,

And two (from offer'd bulls) of purple gore.
 With roses then the sepulcher he strow'd,
 And thus his father's ghost bespoke aloud:

"Hail, O ye holy manes! hail again,
 Paternal ashes, now review'd in vain!
 The gods permitted not, that you, with me,

Should reach the promis'd shores of Italy,

Or Tiber's flood, what flood soe'er it be."¹¹⁰

Scarce had he finish'd, when, with speckled pride,

A serpent from the tomb began to glide;
 His huge bulk on sev'n high volumes roll'd;
 Blue was his breadth of back, but streak'd with scaly gold:

Thus riding on his curls, he seem'd to pass
 A rolling fire along, and singe the grass.

More various colors thro' his body run,
 Than Iris when her bow imbibes the sun.

Betwixt the rising altars, and around,
 The sacred monster shot along the ground;

With harmless play amidst the bowls he pass'd,¹²¹

And with his lolling tongue assay'd the taste:

Thus fed with holy food, the wondrous guest

Within the hollow tomb retir'd to rest.

The pious prince, surpris'd at what he view'd,

The fun'ral honors with more zeal renew'd,

Doubtful if this the place's genius were,
 Or guardian of his father's sepulcher.

Five sheep, according to the rites, he slew;

As many swine, and steers of sable hue;¹³⁰
 New gen'rous wine he from the goblets pour'd,

And call'd his father's ghost, from hell restor'd.

The glad attendants in long order come,
 Off'ring their gifts at great Anchises' tomb:

Some add more oxen; some divide the spoil;

Some place the chargers on the grassy soil;

Some blow the fires, and offer'd entrails broil.

Now came the day desir'd. The skies were bright

With rosy luster of the rising light:

The bord'ring people, rous'd by sounding fame¹⁴⁰

Of Trojan feasts and great Æcestes' name,
 The crowded shore with acclamations fill,

Part to behold, and part to prove their skill.

And first the gifts in public view they place,

Green laurel wreaths, and palm, the victors' grace:

Within the circle, arms and tripods lie,

Ingots of gold and silver, heap'd on high,

And vests embroider'd, of the Tyrian dye.

The trumpet's clangor then the feast proclaims,

And all prepare for their appointed games.
 Four galleys first, which equal rowers bear,¹⁵¹

Advancing, in the wat'ry lists appear.
 The speedy Dolphin, that outstrips the wind,

Bore Mnesteus, author of the Memmian kind:

Gyas the vast Chimæra's bulk commands,
 Which rising, like a tow'ring city stands;

Three Trojans tug at ev'ry lab'ring oar;
 Three banks in three degrees the sailors
 bore;
 Beneath their sturdy strokes the billows
 roar.
 Sergesthus, who began the Sergian race,
 In the great Centaur took the leading
 place;
 Cloanthus on the sea-green Scylla stood,
 From whom Cluentius draws his Trojan
 blood.
 Far in the sea, against the foaming
 shore,
 There stands a rock: the raging billows
 roar
 Above his head in storms; but, when 't is clear,
 Uncurl their ridgy backs, and at his foot
 appear.
 In peace below the gentle waters run;
 The cormorants above lie basking in the sun.
 On this the hero fix'd an oak in sight,
 The mark to guide the mariners aright.
 To bear with this, the seamen stretch their
 oars;
 Then round the rock they steer, and seek the former shores.
 The lots decide their place. Above the rest,
 Each leader shining in his Tyrian vest;
 The common crew with wreaths of poplar boughs
 Their temples crown, and shade their sweaty brows:
 Besmear'd with oil, their naked shoulders
 shine.
 All take their seats, and wait the sounding sign:
 They gripe their oars; and ev'ry panting
 breast
 Is rais'd by turns with hope, by turns with fear depress'd.
 The clangor of the trumpet gives the sign;
 At once they start, advancing in a line:
 With shouts the sailors rend the starry
 skies;
 Lash'd with their oars, the smoky billows
 rise;
 Sparkles the briny main, and the vex'd ocean fries.
 Exact in time, with equal strokes they row:
 At once the brushing oars and brazen
 prow
 Dash up the sandy waves, and ope the depths below.

Not fiery coursers, in a chariot race,
 Invade the field with half so swift a pace;
 Not the fierce driver with more fury lends
 The sounding lash, and, ere the stroke
 descends,
 Low to the wheels his pliant body bends.
 The partial crowd their hopes and fears
 divide,
 And aid with eager shouts the favor'd side.
 Cries, murmurs, clamors, with a mixing
 sound,
 From woods to woods, from hills to hills
 rebound.
 Amidst the loud applauses of the shore,
 Gyas outstripp'd the rest, and sprung
 before:
 Cloanthus, better mann'd, pursued him
 fast,
 But his o'er-masted galley check'd his
 haste.
 The Centaur and the Dolphin brush the
 brine
 With equal oars, advancing in a line;
 And now the mighty Centaur seems to lead,
 And now the speedy Dolphin gets ahead;
 Now board to board the rival vessels row,
 The billows lave the skies, and ocean groans below.
 They reach'd the mark. Proud Gyas and his train
 In triumph rode, the victors of the main;
 But, steering round, he charg'd his pilot
 stand
 More close to shore, and skim along the sand —
 "Let others bear to sea!" Menœtes
 heard;
 But secret shelves too cautiously he
 fear'd,
 And, fearing, sought the deep; and still aloof he steer'd.
 With louder cries the captain call'd again:
 "Bear to the rocky shore, and shun the
 main."
 He spoke, and, speaking, at his stern he saw
 The bold Cloanthus near the shelvings
 draw.
 Betwixt the mark and him the Scylla
 stood,
 And in a closer compass plow'd the flood.
 He pass'd the mark; and, wheeling, got
 before:

Gyas blasphem'd the gods, devoutly swore,
 Cried out for anger, and his hair he tore.
 Mindless of others' lives (so high was grown
 His rising rage) and careless of his own,
 The trembling dotard to the deck he drew;
 Then hoisted up, and overboard he threw:
 This done, he seiz'd the helm; his fellows
 cheer'd,
 Turn'd short upon the shelves, and madly
 steer'd. 230

Hardly his head the plunging pilot rears, Clogg'd with his clothes, and cumber'd with his years:

Now dropping wet, he climbs the cliff with
 pain.

The crowd, that saw him fall and float again,
 Shout from the distant shore; and loudly
 laugh'd,

To see his heaving breast disgorge the briny draught.

The following Centaur, and the Dolphin's
 crew,

Their vanish'd hopes of victory renew;
 While Gyas lags, they kindle in the race,
 To reach the mark. Sergesthus takes the
 place; 240

Mnestheus pursues; and, while around they
 wind,

Comes up, not half his galley's length behind;

Then, on the deck, amidst his mates appear'd,

And thus their drooping courages he
 cheer'd:

"My friends, and Hector's followers heretofore,

Exert your vigor; tug the lab'ring oar;
 Stretch to your strokes, my still unconquer'd
 crew,

Whom from the flaming walls of Troy I
 drew.

In this, our common int'rest, let me find That strength of hand, that courage of the
 mind, 250

As when you stemm'd the strong Malean
 flood,

And o'er the Syrtes' broken billows row'd.
 I seek not now the foremost palm to gain;
 Tho' yet — but, ah! that haughty wish is
 vain!

Let those enjoy it whom the gods ordain.
 But to be last, the lags of all the race! —
 Redeem yourselves and me from that dis-
 grace."

Now, one and all, they tug amain; they row

At the full stretch, and shake the brazen
 prow.

The sea beneath 'em sinks; their lab'ring
 sides 260

Are swell'd, and sweat runs gutt'ring down in tides.

Chance aids their daring with unhop'd success:

Sergesthus, eager with his beak to press
 Betwixt the rival galley and the rock,
 Shuts up th' unwieldy Centaur in the lock.
 The vessel struck; and, with the dreadful
 shock,

Her oars she shiver'd, and her head she
 broke.

The trembling rowers from their banks
 arise,

And, anxious for themselves, renounce the
 prize.

With iron poles they heave her off the
 shores, 270

And gather from the sea their floating oars.
 The crew of Mnestheus, with elated minds, Urge their success, and call the willing
 winds;

Then ply their oars, and cut their liquid way
 In larger compass on the roomy sea.

As, when the dove her rocky hold forsakes, Rous'd in a fright, her sounding wings she
 shakes;

The cavern rings with clatt'ring; out she
 flies,

And leaves her callow care, and cleaves
 the skies:

At first she flutters; but at length she
 springs 280

To smoother flight, and shoots upon her
 wings:

So Mnestheus in the Dolphin cuts the sea;
 And, flying with a force, that force assists
 his way.

Sergesthus in the Centaur soon he pass'd, Wedg'd in the rocky shoals, and sticking fast.

In vain the victor he with cries implores,
 And practices to row with shatter'd oars.

Then Mnestheus bears with Gyas, and out-
 flies: 283

The ship, without a pilot, yields the prize.
 Unvanquish'd Scylla now alone remains;
 Her he pursues, and all his vigor strains.
 Shouts from the fav'ring multitude arise;
 Applauding Echo to the shouts replies;
 Shouts, wishes, and applause run rattling thro' the skies.

These clamors with disdain the Scylla
 heard,
 Much grudg'd the praise, but more the robb'd reward:
 Resolv'd to hold their own, they mend their
 pace,
 All obstinate to die, or gain the race.
 Rais'd with success, the Dolphin swiftly
 ran;
 For they can conquer, who believe they
 can. ³⁰⁰
 Both urge their oars, and fortune both supplies,
 And both perhaps had shar'd an equal
 prize;
 When to the seas Cloanthus holds his
 hands,
 And succor from the wat'ry pow'rs demands:
 "Gods of the liquid realms, on which I
 row!
 If, giv'n by you, the laurel bind my
 brow,
 Assist to make me guilty of my vow!
 A snow-white bull shall on your shore be
 slain;
 His offer'd entrails cast into the main,
 And ruddy wine, from golden goblets thrown, ³¹⁰
 Your grateful gift and my return shall
 own."
 The choir of nymphs, and Phorcus, from
 below,
 With virgin Panopea, heard his vow;
 And old Portunus, with his breadth of hand,
 Push'd on, and sped the galley to the land.
 Swift as a shaft, or winged wind, she flies,
 And, darting to the port, obtains the prize.
 The herald summons all, and then proclaims
 Cloanthus conqu'ror of the naval games.
 The prince with laurel crowns the victor's head, ³²⁰
 And three fat steers are to his vessel led,
 The ship's reward; with gen'rous wine
 beside,
 And sums of silver, which the crew divide.
 The leaders are distinguish'd from the
 rest;
 The victor honor'd with a nobler vest,
 Where gold and purple strive in equal
 rows,
 And needlework its happy cost bestows.
 There Ganymede is wrought with living
 art,

Chasing thro' Ida's groves the trembling
 hart: ³²⁹
 Breathless he seems, yet eager to pursue;
 When from aloft descends, in open view,
 The bird of Jove, and, sousing on his prey,
 With crooked talons bears the boy away.
 In vain, with lifted hands and gazing
 eyes,
 His guards behold him soaring thro' the
 skies,
 And dogs pursue his flight with imitated
 cries.
 Mnestheus the second victor was de-
 clar'd;
 And, summon'd there, the second prize he shar'd.
 A coat of mail, which brave Demoleüs
 bore,
 More brave Æneas from his shoulders
 tore, ³⁴⁰
 In single combat on the Trojan shore:
 This was ordain'd for Mnestheus to possess;
 In war for his defense, for ornament in
 peace.
 Rich was the gift, and glorious to behold,
 But yet so pond'rous with its plates of gold,
 That scarce two servants could the weight
 sustain;
 Yet, loaded thus, Demoleüs o'er the
 plain Pursued and lightly seiz'd the Trojan
 train.
 The third, succeeding to the last reward,
 Two goodly bowls of massy silver shar'd, ³⁵⁰
 With figures prominent, and richly wrought,
 And two brass caldrons from Dodona
 brought.
 Thus all, rewarded by the hero's hands,
 Their conqu'ring temples bound with purple
 bands;
 And now Sergesthus, clearing from the rock,
 Brought back his galley shatter'd with the
 shock.
 Forlorn she look'd, without an aiding oar,
 And, houted by the vulgar, made to shore.
 As when a snake, surpris'd upon the road,
 Is crush'd athwart her body by the load ³⁶⁰
 Of heavy wheels; or with a mortal wound
 Her belly bruis'd, and trodden to the
 ground:
 In vain, with loosen'd curls, she crawls
 along;
 Yet, fierce above, she brandishes her
 tongue;

Glares with her eyes, and bristles with her scales;

But, groveling in the dust, her parts unsound she trails:

So slowly to the port the Centaur tends,
But, what she wants in oars, with sails amends.

Yet, for his galley sav'd, the grateful prince
Is pleas'd th' unhappy chief to recompense. 370

Pholoe, the Cretan slave, rewards his care,
Beauteous herself, with lovely twins as fair.

From thence his way the Trojan hero bent
Into the neighb'ring plain, with mountains pent,

Whose sides were shaded with surrounding wood.

Full in the midst of this fair valley stood
A native theater, which, rising slow
By just degrees, o'erlook'd the ground below. 378

High on a sylvan throne the leader sate;
A num'rous train attend in solemn state.
Here those that in the rapid course delight,
Desire of honor and the prize invite.

The rival runners without order stand;
The Trojans mix'd with the Sicilian band.
First Nisus, with Euryalus, appears;
Euryalus a boy of blooming years,
With sprightly grace and equal beauty crown'd;

Nisus, for friendship to the youth renown'd.
Diores next, of Priam's royal race,
Then Salius, join'd with Patron, took their place; 390

(But Patron in Arcadia had his birth,
And Salius his from Acarnanian earth;)
Then two Sicilian youths — the names of these,

Swift Helymus, and lovely Panopes:
Both jolly huntsmen, both in forests bred,
And owning old Acestes for their head;
With sev'ral others of ignobler name,
Whom time has not deliver'd o'er to fame.

To these the hero thus his thoughts explain'd,

In words which gen'ral approbation gain'd:
"One common largess is for all design'd, 401
(The vanquish'd and the victor shall be join'd,)

Two darts of polish'd steel and Gnosian wood,

A silver-studded ax, alike bestow'd.
The foremost three have olive wreaths decreed:

The first of these obtains a stately steed,
Adorn'd with trappings; and the next in fame,

The quiver of an Amazonian dame,
With feather'd Thracian arrows well supplied:

A golden belt shall gird his manly side, 410
Which with a sparkling diamond shall be tied.

The third this Grecian helmet shall content."

He said. To their appointed base they went;
With beating hearts th' expected sign receive,

And, starting all at once, the barrier leave.
Spread out, as on the winged winds, they flew,

And seiz'd the distant goal with greedy view.
Shot from the crowd, swift Nisus all o'erpass'd;

Nor storms, nor thunder, equal half his haste.

The next, but, tho' the next, yet far disjoint'd, 420

Came Salius, and Euryalus behind;
Then Helymus, whom young Diores plied,
Step after step, and almost side by side,
His shoulders pressing; and, in longer space,
Had won, or left at least a dubious race.

Now, spent, the goal they almost reach at last,

When eager Nisus, hapless in his haste,
Slipp'd first, and, slipping, fell upon the plain,

Soak'd with the blood of oxen newly slain.
The careless victor had not mark'd his way; 430

But, treading where the treach'rous puddle lay,

His heels flew up; and on the grassy floor
He fell, besmear'd with filth and holy gore.
Not mindless then, Euryalus, of thee,
Nor of the sacred bonds of amity,
He strove th' immediate rival's hope to cross,

And caught the foot of Salius as he rose.

So Salius lay extended on the plain;
Euryalus springs out, the prize to gain,
And leaves the crowd: applauding peals attend 440

The victor to the goal, who vanquish'd by his friend.

Next Helymus; and then Diores came,
By two misfortunes made the third in fame.

But Salius enters, and, exclaiming loud
For justice, deafens and disturbs the crowd;
Urges his cause may in the court be heard;
And pleads the prize is wrongfully conferr'd.

But favor for Euryalus appears;
His blooming beauty, with his tender tears,
Had brib'd the judges for the promis'd prize. ⁴⁵⁰

Besides, Dioreas fills the court with cries,
Who vainly reaches at the last reward,
If the first palm on Salius be conferr'd.
Then thus the prince: "Let no disputes arise:

Where fortune plac'd it, I award the prize.
But fortune's errors give me leave to mend,
At least to pity my deserving friend."

He said, and, from among the spoils, he draws (Pond'rous with shaggy mane and golden paws)

A lion's hide: to Salius this he gives. ⁴⁶⁰
Nisus with envy sees the gift, and grieves.
"If such rewards to vanquish'd men are due,"

He said, "and falling is to rise by you,
What prize may Nisus from your bounty claim,

Who merited the first rewards and fame?
In falling, both an equal fortune tried;
Would fortune for my fall so well provide!"
With this he pointed to his face, and show'd
His hands and all his habit smear'd with blood.

Th' indulgent father of the people smil'd, ⁴⁷⁰
And caus'd to be produc'd an ample shield,
Of wondrous art, by Didymaon wrought,
Long since from Neptune's bars in triumph brought.

This giv'n to Nisus, he divides the rest,
And equal justice in his gifts express'd.

The race thus ended, and rewards bestow'd,

Once more the prince bespeaks th' attentive crowd:

"If there be here whose dauntless courage dare

In gauntlet-fight, with limbs and body bare,

His opposite sustain in open view, ⁴⁸⁰
Stand forth the champion, and the games renew.

Two prizes I propose, and thus divide:
A bull with gilded horns, and fillets tied,
Shall be the portion of the conqu'ring chief;

A sword and helm shall cheer the loser's grief."

Then haughty Dares in the lists appears;
Stalking he strides, his head erected bears:
His nervous arms the weighty gauntlet wield,

And loud applauses echo thro' the field.
Dares alone in combat us'd to stand ⁴⁹⁰
The match of mighty Paris, hand to hand;
The same, at Hector's fun'rals, undertook Gigantic Butes, of th' Amycian stock,
And, by the stroke of his resistless hand,
Stretch'd the vast bulk upon the yellow sand.

Such Dares was; and such he strode along,
And drew the wonder of the gazing throng.

His brawny back and ample breast he shows;
His lifted arms around his head he throws,
And deals in whistling air his empty blows. ⁵⁰⁰

His match is sought; but, thro' the trembling band,
Not one dares answer to the proud demand.
Presuming of his force, with sparkling eyes
Already he devours the promis'd prize.
He claims the bull with awless insolence,
And having seiz'd his horns, accosts the prince:

"If none my matchless valor dares oppose,

How long shall Dares wait his dastard foes?

Permit me, chief, permit without delay,
To lead this uncontended gift away." ⁵¹⁰
The crowd assents, and with redoubled cries

For the proud challenger demands the prize.

Acestes, fir'd with just disdain, to see
The palm usurp'd without a victory, Reproach'd Entellus thus, who sate beside,
And heard and saw, unmov'd, the Trojan's pride:

"Once, but in vain, a champion of renown,
So tamely can you bear the ravish'd crown,
A prize in triumph borne before your sight,
And shun, for fear, the danger of the fight? ⁵²⁰

Where is our Eryx now, the boasted name,
The god who taught your thund'ring arm the game?

Where now your baffled honor? Where the spoil

That fill'd your house, and fame that fill'd our isle?"

Entellus, thus: "My soul is still the same,
Unmov'd with fear, and mov'd with martial fame;

But my chill blood is curdled in my veins,
And scarce the shadow of a man remains.
O could I turn to that fair prime again,
That prime of which this boaster is so
vain, 530

The brave, who this decrepid age defies,
Should feel my force, without the promis'd
prize."

He said; and, rising at the word, he threw
Two pond'rous gauntlets down in open
view;

Gauntlets which Eryx wont in fight to
wield,
And sheathe his hands with in the listed
field.

With fear and wonder seiz'd, the crowd beholds

The gloves of death, with sev'n distinguish'd folds

Of tough bull hides; the space within is
spread

With iron, or with loads of heavy lead: 540
Dares himself was daunted at the sight, Renounc'd his challenge, and refus'd to
fight.

Astonish'd at their weight, the hero stands,
And pois'd the pond'rous engines in his
hands.

"What had your wonder," said Entellus, "been,
Had you the gauntlets of Alcides seen,
Or view'd the stern debate on this unhappy green!"

These which I bear your brother Eryx
bore,

Still mark'd with batter'd brains and mingled gore.

With these he long sustain'd th' Herculean arm; 550

And these I wielded while my blood was warm,

This languish'd frame while better spirits
fed,

Ere age unstrung my nerves, or time o'ersnow'd my head.

But if the challenger these arms refuse,
And cannot wield their weight, or dare not
use;

If great Æneas and Acestes join
In his request, these gauntlets I resign;

Let us with equal arms perform the fight,
And let him leave to fear, since I resign
my right."

This said, Entellus for the strife prepares; 560

Stripp'd of his quilted coat, his body
bares;

Compos'd of mighty bones and brawn he
stands,

A goodly tow'ring object on the sands.
Then just Æneas equal arms supplied,
Which round their shoulders to their wrists
they tied.

Both on the tiptoe stand, at full extent,
Their arms aloft, their bodies inly bent;
Their heads from aiming blows they bear
afar;

With clashing gauntlets then provoke the
war.

One on his youth and pliant limbs relies; 570

One on his sinews and his giant size.
The last is stiff with age, his motion
slow;

He heaves for breath, he staggers to and fro,
And clouds of issuing smoke his nostrils loudly blow.

Yet equal in success, they ward, they strike;

Their ways are diff'rent, but their art alike.

Before, behind, the blows are dealt;
around

Their hollow sides the rattling thumps
resound.

A storm of strokes, well meant, with fury
flies,

And errs about their temples, ears, and
eyes. 580

Nor always errs; for oft the gauntlet draws

A sweeping stroke along the crackling
jaws.

Heavy with age, Entellus stands his
ground,

But with his warping body wards the
wound.

His hand and watchful eye keep even
pace;

While Dares traverses and shifts his
place,

And, like a captain who beleaguers round
Some strong-built castle on a rising
ground,

Views all th' approaches with observing
 eyes:
 This and that other part in vain he tries, ⁵⁹⁰
 And more on industry than force relies.
 With hands on high, Entellus threatens
 the foe;
 But Dares watch'd the motion from below,
 And slipp'd aside, and shunn'd the long descending blow.
 Entellus wastes his forces on the wind,
 And, thus deluded of the stroke design'd,
 Headlong and heavy fell; his ample breast
 And weighty limbs his ancient mother
 press'd.
 So falls a hollow pine, that long had stood
 On Ida's height, or Erymanthus' wood, ⁶⁰⁰ Torn from the roots. The diff'ring nations
 rise,
 And shouts and mingled murmurs rend
 the skies.
 Acestes runs with eager haste, to raise
 The fall'n companion of his youthful days.
 Dauntless he rose, and to the fight re-
 turn'd;
 With shame his glowing cheeks, his eyes with fury burn'd.
 Disdain and conscious virtue fir'd his breast,
 And with redoubled force his foe he
 press'd.
 He lays on load with either hand, amain,
 And headlong drives the Trojan o'er the plain; ⁶¹⁰
 Nor stops, nor stays; nor rest nor breath allows;
 But storms of strokes descend about his
 brows,
 A rattling tempest, and a hail of blows.
 But now the prince, who saw the wild increase
 Of wounds, commands the combatants to cease,
 And bounds Entellus' wrath, and bids
 the peace.
 First to the Trojan, spent with toil, he
 came,
 And sooth'd his sorrow for the suffer'd
 shame.
 "What fury seiz'd my friend? The gods,"
 said he,
 "To him propitious, and averse to thee, ⁶²⁰
 Have giv'n his arm superior force to thine.
 'Tis madness to contend with strength
 divine."

The gauntlet fight thus ended, from the
 shore
 His faithful friends unhappy Dares bore:
 His mouth and nostrils pour'd a purple
 flood,
 And pounded teeth came rushing with his
 blood.
 Faintly he stagger'd thro' the hissing
 throng,
 And hupp'd his head, and trail'd his legs
 along.
 The sword and casque are carried by his train; ⁶²⁹
 But with his foe the palm and ox remain.
 The champion, then, before Æneas came,
 Proud of his prize, but prouder of his
 fame:
 "O goddess-born, and you, Dardanian
 host,
 Mark with attention, and forgive my boast;
 Learn what I was, by what remains; and
 know
 From what impending fate you sav'd my
 foe."
 Sternly he spoke, and then confronts the bull;
 And, on his ample forehead aiming full,
 The deadly stroke, descending, pierc'd
 the skull.
 Down drops the beast, nor needs a second wound, ⁶⁴⁰
 But sprawls in pangs of death, and spurns
 the ground.
 Then, thus: "In Dares' stead I offer this.
 Eryx, accept a nobler sacrifice;
 Take the last gift my wither'd arms can
 yield:
 Thy gauntlets I resign, and here renounce
 the field."
 This done, Æneas orders, for the close,
 The strife of archers with contending bows.
 The mast Sergesthus' shatter'd galley bore
 With his own hands he raises on the shore.
 A flutt'ring dove upon the top they tie, ⁶⁵⁰
 The living mark at which their arrows fly.
 The rival archers in a line advance,
 Their turn of shooting to receive from
 chance.
 A helmet holds their names; the lots are drawn:
 On the first scroll was read Hippocoön.
 The people shout. Upon the next was found Young Mnestheus, late with naval honors
 crown'd.

The third contain'd Eurytion's noble name,
Thy brother, Pandarus, and next in fame, Whom Pallas urg'd the treaty to con-
found, 660

And send among the Greeks a feather'd
wound.

Acestes in the bottom last remain'd,
Whom not his age from youthful sports
restrain'd.

Soon all with vigor bend their trusty bows,
And from the quiver each his arrow chose.
Hippocöön's was the first: with forceful
sway

It flew, and, whizzing, cut the liquid way.
Fix'd in the mast the feather'd weapon
stands:

The fearful pigeon flutters in her bands,
And the tree trembled, and the shouting
cries 670

Of the pleas'd people rend the vaulted skies.
Then Mnestheus to the head his arrow
drove,

With lifted eyes, and took his aim above,
But made a glancing shot, and miss'd the dove;

Yet miss'd so narrow, that he cut the cord
Which fasten'd by the foot the flitting bird.
The captive thus releas'd, away she flies,
And beats with clapping wings the yielding
skies.

His bow already bent, Eurytion stood; 679
And, having first invok'd his brother god,
His winged shaft with eager haste he sped.
The fatal message reach'd her as she fled:
She leaves her life aloft; she strikes the
ground,

And renders back the weapon in the wound.
Acestes, grudging at his lot, remains,
Without a prize to gratify his pains.

Yet, shooting upward, sends his shaft, to
show

An archer's art, and boast his twanging bow.
The feather'd arrow gave a dire portent,
And latter augurs judge from this event. 690
Chaf'd by the speed, it fir'd; and, as it flew,
A trail of following flames ascending drew:
Kindling they mount, and mark the shiny
way;

Across the skies as falling meteors play,
And vanish into wind, or in a blaze decay. }
The Trojans and Sicilians wildly stare, And, trembling, turn their wonder into
pray'r.

The Dardan prince put on a smiling face,
And strain'd Acestes with a close embrace;

Then, hon'ring him with gifts above the
rest, 700

Turn'd the bad omen, nor his fears con-
fess'd.

"The gods," said he, "this miracle have
wrought,

And order'd you the prize without the lot.
Accept this goblet, rough with figur'd gold,
Which Thracian Cisseus gave my sire of
old:

This pledge of ancient amity receive,
Which to my second sire I justly give."

He said, and, with the trumpets' cheerful
sound,

Proclaim'd him victor, and with laurel
crown'd.

Nor good Eurytion envied him the prize, 710
Tho' he transfix'd the pigeon in the skies.

Who cut the line, with second gifts was
grac'd;

The third was his whose arrow pierc'd the mast.

The chief, before the games were wholly
done,

Call'd Periphantes, tutor to his son,
And whisper'd thus: "With speed Ascanius
find;

And, if his childish troop be ready join'd,
On horseback let him grace his grandsire's
day,

And lead his equals arm'd in just array."
He said; and, calling out, the cirque he clears. 720

The crowd withdrawn, an open plain appears.

And now the noble youths, of form divine, }
Advance before their fathers, in a line:
The riders grace the steeds; the steeds } with glory shine.

Thus marching on in military pride, Shouts of applause resound from side to
side.

Their casques adorn'd with laurel wreaths
they wear,

Each brandishing aloft a cornel spear.
Some at their backs their gilded quivers
bore;

Their chains of burnish'd gold hung down
before. 730

Three graceful troops they form'd upon
the green;

Three graceful leaders at their head were
seen;

Twelve follow'd ev'ry chief, and left a space between. }

The first young Priam led; a lovely boy, Whose grandsire was th' unhappy king of Troy;

His race in after times was known to
fame,
New honors adding to the Latian name;
And well the royal boy his Thracian steed became.

White were the fetlocks of his feet before,
And on his front a snowy star he bore. 740
Then beauteous Atys, with Iulus bred,
Of equal age, the second squadron led.
The last in order, but the first in place,
First in the lovely features of his face,
Rode fair Ascanius on a fiery steed,
Queen Dido's gift, and of the Tyrian breed.
Sure coursers for the rest the king ordains,
With golden bits adorn'd, and purple reins.

The pleas'd spectators peals of shouts
renew,
And all the parents in the children view; 750
Their make, their motions, and their sprightly grace,

And hopes and fears alternate in their face.

Th' unflieg'd commanders and their martial train

First make the circuit of the sandy plain Around their sires, and, at th' appointed
sign,

Drawn up in beauteous order, form a line.
The second signal sounds, the troop divides
In three distinguish'd parts, with three distinguish'd guides.

Again they close, and once again disjoin;
In troop to troop oppos'd, and line to line.
They meet; they wheel; they throw their darts afar 761

With harmless rage and well-dissembled
war.

Then in a round the mingled bodies run:
Flying they follow, and pursuing shun; Broken, they break; and, rallying, they
renew

In other forms the military shew.

At last, in order, undiscern'd they join,
And march together in a friendly line.
And, as the Cretan labyrinth of old,
With wand'ring ways and many a winding
fold, 770

Involv'd the weary feet, without redress,
In a round error, which denied recess;
So fought the Trojan boys in warlike play, Turn'd and return'd, and still a different
way.

Thus dolphins in the deep each other chase

In circles, when they swim around the wat'ry race.

This game, these carousels, Ascanius taught;
And, building Alba, to the Latins brought;
Shew'd what he learn'd: the Latin sires im-
part

To their succeeding sons the graceful art;
From these imperial Rome receiv'd the
game, 781

Which Troy, the youths the Trojan troop, they name.

Thus far the sacred sports they celebrate:

But Fortune soon resum'd her ancient hate;
For, while they pay the dead his annual dues,

Those envied rites Saturnian Juno views;
And sends the goddess of the various
bow,

To try new methods of revenge below;
Supplies the winds to wing her airy way,
Where in the port secure the navy lay. 790

Swiftly fair Iris down her arch descends,
And, undiscern'd, her fatal voyage ends.

She saw the gath'ring crowd; and, gliding thence,

The desert shore, and fleet without defense.

The Trojan matrons, on the sands alone,
With sighs and tears Anchises' death be-
moan:

Then, turning to the sea their weeping
eyes,

Their pity to themselves renews their cries.
"Alas!" said one, "what oceans yet re-
main

For us to sail! what labors to sustain!"
All take the word, and, with a gen'ral groan, 801

Implore the gods for peace, and places of their own.

The goddess, great in mischief, views
their pains,
And in a woman's form her heav'nly limbs
restrains.

In face and shape old Beroe she became,
Doryclus' wife, a venerable dame,
Once blest with riches, and a mother's
name.

Thus chang'd, amidst the crying crowd she
ran,

Mix'd with the matrons, and these words
began:

"O wretched we, whom not the Grecian
pow'r, 810

Nor flames, destroy'd, in Troy's unhappy hour!

O wretched we, reserv'd by cruel fate,
Beyond the ruins of the sinking state!
Now sev'n revolving years are wholly run,
Since this improsp'rous voyage we begun;
Since, toss'd from shores to shores, from lands to lands,

Inhospitable rocks and barren sands,
Wand'ring in exile thro' the stormy sea,
We search in vain for flying Italy.

Now cast by fortune on this kindred
land,

What should our rest and rising walls
withstand,

Or hinder here to fix our banish'd band?

O country lost, and gods redeem'd in vain,
If still in endless exile we remain!

Shall we no more the Trojan walls renew,
Or streams of some dissembled Simois
view!

Haste, join with me, th' unhappy fleet consume!

Cassandra bids; and I declare her doom.
In sleep I saw her; she supplied my hands
(For this I more than dreamt) with flaming brands:

'With these,' said she, 'these wand'ring
ships destroy:

These are your fatal seats, and this your Troy.'

Time calls you now; the precious hour
employ:

Slack not the good presage, while Heav'n inspires

Our minds to dare, and gives the ready
fires.

See! Neptune's altars minister their brands:
The god is pleas'd; the god supplies our
hands."

Then from the pile a flaming fire she drew,
And, toss'd in air, amidst the galleys threw.

Wrapp'd in amaze, the matrons wildly stare:

Then Pyrgo, reverenc'd for her hoary hair,
Pyrgo, the nurse of Priam's num'rous race:
"No Beroe this, tho' she belies her face!

What terrors from her frowning front arise!
Behold a goddess in her ardent eyes!

What rays around her heav'nly face are
seen!

Mark her majestic voice, and more than mortal mien!

Beroe but now I left, whom, pin'd with
pain,

Her age and anguish from these rites detain."

She said. The matrons, seiz'd with new amaze,

Roll their malignant eyes, and on the navy
gaze.

They fear, and hope, and neither part
obey:

They hope the fated land, but fear the fatal way.

The goddess, having done her task below,
Mounts up on equal wings, and bends her painted bow.

Struck with the sight, and seiz'd with rage
divine,

The matrons prosecute their mad design:
They shriek aloud; they snatch, with im-
pious hands,

The food of altars; fires and flaming brands.
Green boughs and saplings, mingled in their
haste,

And smoking torches, on the ships they
cast.

The flame, unstopp'd at first, more fury
gains,

And Vulcan rides at large with loosen'd
reins:

Triumphant to the painted sterns he soars,
And seizes, in his way, the banks and crackling oars.

Eumelus was the first the news to bear,
While yet they crowd the rural theater.

Then, what they hear, is witness'd by their
eyes:

A storm of sparkles and of flames arise.
Ascanius took th' alarm, while yet he led

His early warriors on his prancing steed,
And, spurring on, his equals soon o'erpass'd;

Nor could his frightened friends reclaim his
haste.

Soon as the royal youth appear'd in view,
He sent his voice before him as he flew:

"What madness moves you, matrons, to destroy

The last remainders of unhappy Troy!
Not hostile fleets, but your own hopes, you

burn,
And on your friends your fatal fury turn.

Behold your own Ascanius!" While he
said,

He drew his glitt'ring helmet from his
head,

In which the youths to sportful arms he
led.

By this, Æneas and his train appear;

And now the women, seiz'd with shame and
fear, Dispers'd, to woods and caverns take their
flight,
Abhor their actions, and avoid the light;
Their friends acknowledge, and their error
find,
And shake the goddess from their alter'd
mind.

Not so the raging fires their fury cease,
But, lurking in the seams, with seeming
peace,

Work on their way amid the smold'ring tow,
Sure in destruction, but in motion slow.
The silent plague thro' the green timber eats,

And vomits out a tardy flame by fits.
Down to the keels, and upward to the sails,
The fire descends, or mounts, but still prevails;

Nor buckets pour'd, nor strength of human
hand,
Can the victorious element withstand.

The pious hero rends his robe, and throws
To heav'n his hands, and with his hands his vows.

"O Jove," he cried, "if pray'rs can yet have place;

If thou abhorr'st not all the Dardan race;
If any spark of pity still remain;
If gods are gods, and not invok'd in vain;
Yet spare the relics of the Trojan train! }
Yet from the flames our burning vessels
free,

Or let thy fury fall alone on me!
At this devoted head thy thunder throw,
And send the willing sacrifice below!"

Scarce had he said, when southern storms
arise:

From pole to pole the forky lightning flies;
Loud rattling shakes the mountains and the
plain;

Heav'n bellies downward, and descends in rain.

Whole sheets of water from the clouds are
sent,

Which, hissing thro' the planks, the flames
prevent,

And stop the fiery pest. Four ships alone
Burn to the waist, and for the fleet atone.

But doubtful thoughts the hero's heart
divide;

If he should still in Sicily reside,
Forgetful of his fates, or tempt the main,
In hope the promis'd Italy to gain.

Then Nautes, old and wise, to whom alone
The will of Heav'n by Pallas was foreshown;

Vers'd in portents, experienc'd, and inspir'd
To tell events, and what the fates requir'd;
Thus while he stood, to neither part inclin'd,
With cheerful words reliev'd his lab'ring
mind:

"O goddess-born, resign'd in ev'ry state,
With patience bear, with prudence push your fate.

By suff'ring well, our Fortune we subdue;
Fly when she frowns, and, when she calls,
pursue.

Your friend Acestes is of Trojan kind;
To him disclose the secrets of your mind:
Trust in his hands your old and useless
train;

Too num'rous for the ships which yet
remain:

The feeble, old, indulgent of their ease,
The dames who dread the dangers of the
seas,

With all the dastard crew, who dare not
stand

The shock of battle with your foes by land.
Here you may build a common town for all,
And, from Acestes' name, Acesta call."

The reasons, with his friend's experience
join'd,
Encourag'd much, but more disturb'd his
mind.

'T was dead of night; when to his slumb'ring eyes

His father's shade descended from the
skies,

And thus he spoke: "O more than vital
breath,

Lov'd while I liv'd, and dear ev'n after
death;

O son, in various toils and troubles toss'd,
The King of Heav'n employs my careful ghost

On his commands: the god, who sav'd from
fire

Your flaming fleet, and heard your just desire.

The wholesome counsel of your friend
receive,

And here the coward train and women
leave:

The chosen youth, and those who nobly
dare,

Transport, to tempt the dangers of the war.
The stern Italians will their courage try;

Rough are their manners, and their minds are high.

But first to Pluto's palace you shall go,
And seek my shade among the blest below:
For not with impious ghosts my soul

remains, 960

Nor suffers with the damn'd perpetual
pains,

But breathes the living air of soft Elysian
plains.

The chaste Sibylla shall your steps convey,
And blood of offer'd victims free the way.
There shall you know what realms the gods assign,

And learn the fates and fortunes of your
line.

But now, farewell! I vanish with the
night,

And feel the blast of heav'n's approaching light."

He said, and mix'd with shades, and took his airy flight.

"Whither so fast?" the filial duty cried;
"And why, ah why, the wish'd embrace denied?" 971

He said, and rose: as holy zeal inspires,
He rakes hot embers, and renews the fires;
His country gods and Vesta then adores
With cakes and incense, and their aid implores.

Next, for his friends and royal host he sent,
Reveal'd his vision, and the gods' intent,
With his own purpose. All, without delay,
The will of Jove, and his desires obey.

They list with women each degenerate
name, 980

Who dares not hazard life for future fame.
These they cashier: the brave remaining few,

Oars, banks, and cables, half consum'd,
renew.

The prince designs a city with the plow;
The lots their sev'ral tenements allow.

This part is nam'd from Ilium, that from Troy,

And the new king ascends the throne with
joy;

A chosen senate from the people draws;
Appoints the judges, and ordains the laws.

Then, on the top of Eryx, they begin 990
A rising temple to the Paphian queen.

Anchises, last, is honor'd as a god;
A priest is added, annual gifts bestow'd,

And groves are planted round his blest
abode.

Nine days they pass in feasts, their temples
crown'd;

And fumes of incense in the fanes abound.
Then from the south arose a gentle breeze
That curl'd the smoothness of the glassy
seas;

The rising winds a ruffling gale afford,
And call the merry mariners aboard. 1000

Now loud laments along the shores re-
sound,

Of parting friends in close embraces bound.
The trembling women, the degenerate train,
Who shunn'd the frightful dangers of the
main,

Ev'n those desire to sail, and take their
share

Of the rough passage and the promis'd
war:

Whom good Æneas cheers, and recommends

To their new master's care his fearful
friends.

On Eryx' altars three fat calves he lays;
A lamb new-fallen to the stormy seas; 1010
Then slips his haulsers, and his anchors weighs.

High on the deck the godlike hero stands,
With olive crown'd, a charger in his hands;
Then cast the reeking entrails in the brine,
And pour'd the sacrifice of purple wine.

Fresh gales arise; with equal strokes they
vie,

And brush the buxom seas, and o'er the billows fly.

Meantime the mother goddess, full of
fears,

To Neptune thus address'd, with tender
tears:

"The pride of Jove's imperious queen, the
rage, 1020

The malice which no suff'rings can assuage,

Compel me to these pray'rs; since neither
fate,

Nor time, nor pity, can remove her hate:
Ev'n Jove is thwarted by his haughty
wife;

Still vanquish'd, yet she still renews the strife.

As if 't were little to consume the town
Which aw'd the world, and wore th' imperial crown,

She prosecutes the ghost of Troy with pains,
And gnaws, ev'n to the bones, the last remains.

Let her the causes of her hatred tell; ¹⁰³⁰
But you can witness its effects too well.

You saw the storm she rais'd on Libyan
floods,
That mix'd the mounting billows with the clouds;

When, bribing Æolus, she shook the main,
And mov'd rebellion in your wat'ry reign.
With fury she possess'd the Dardan dames,
To burn their fleet with execrable flames,
And forc'd Æneas, when his ships were
lost,

To leave his foll'wers on a foreign coast.
For what remains, your godhead I implore, ¹⁰⁴⁰
And trust my son to your protecting pow'r.
If neither Jove's nor Fate's decree with-
stand,

Secure his passage to the Latian land."
Then thus the mighty Ruler of the Main:
"What may not Venus hope from Neptune's reign?

My kingdom claims your birth; my late
defense

Of your indanger'd fleet may claim your confidence.

Nor less by land than sea my deeds declare

How much your lov'd Æneas is my care.
Thee, Xanthus, and thee, Simois, I attest: ¹⁰⁵⁰

Your Trojan troops when proud Achilles
press'd,

And drove before him headlong on the
plain,

And dash'd against the walls the trembling train;

When floods were fill'd with bodies of
the slain;

When crimson Xanthus, doubtful of his
way,

Stood up on ridges to behold the sea;
(New heaps came tumbling in, and chok'd
his way;)

When your Æneas fought, but fought with odds

Of force unequal, and unequal gods;
I spread a cloud before the victor's sight, Sustain'd the vanquish'd, and secur'd his flight; ¹⁰⁶¹

Ev'n then secur'd him, when I sought with
joy

The wou'd destruction of ungrateful Troy.
My will's the same: fair goddess, fear no
more,

Your fleet shall safely gain the Latian shore;
Their lives are giv'n; one destin'd head
alone

Shall perish, and for multitudes atone."
Thus having arm'd with hopes her anxious
mind,

His funny team Saturnian Neptune join'd,
Then adds the foamy bridle to their jaws, ¹⁰⁷⁰
And to the loosen'd reins permits the laws.
High on the waves his azure car he guides;
Its axles thunder, and the sea subsides,
And the smooth ocean rolls her silent
tides.

The tempests fly before their father's face,
Trains of inferior gods his triumph grace,
And monster whales before their master
play,

And choirs of Tritons crowd the wat'ry way.
The marshal'd pow'rs in equal troops divide

To right and left; the gods his better side ¹⁰⁸⁰

Inclose, and on the worse the Nymphs and Nereids ride.

Now smiling hope, with sweet vicissitude,
Within the hero's mind his joys renew'd.
He calls to raise the masts, the sheets dis-
play;

The cheerful crew with diligence obey;
They scud before the wind, and sail in open sea.

Ahead of all the master pilot steers;
And, as he leads, the following navy veers.
The steeds of Night had travel'd half the
sky,

The drowsy rowers on their benches lie,
When the soft God of Sleep, with easy flight, ¹⁰⁹¹

Descends, and draws behind a trail of light.
Thou, Palinurus, art his destin'd prey;
To thee alone he takes his fatal way.

Dire dreams to thee, and iron sleep, he
bears;

And, lighting on thy prow, the form of Phorbas wears.

Then thus the traitor god began his tale:
"The winds, my friend, inspire a pleasing
gale;

The ships, without thy care, securely sail.
Now steal an hour of sweet repose; and I Will take the rudder and thy room supply." ¹¹⁰¹

To whom the yawning pilot, half asleep:
"Me dost thou bid to trust the treach'rous
deep,

The harlot smiles of her dissembling face,
And to her faith commit the Trojan race?
Shall I believe the Siren South again,
And, oft betray'd, not know the monster
main?"

He said: his fasten'd hands the rudder
keep,

And, fix'd on heav'n, his eyes repel invading sleep.

The god was wroth, and at his temples
threw

A branch in Lethe dipp'd, and drunk with Stygian dew:

The pilot, vanquish'd by the pow'r divine,
Soon clos'd his swimming eyes, and lay su-pine.

Scarce were his limbs extended at their length,

The god, insulting with superior strength,
Fell heavy on him, plung'd him in the sea,
And, with the stern, the rudder tore away.
Headlong he fell, and, struggling in the
main,

Cried out for helping hands, but cried in
vain.

The victor dæmon mounts obscure in air, ¹¹²⁰
While the ship sails without the pilot's
care.

On Neptune's faith the floating fleet re-
lies;

But what the man forsook, the god supplies,

And o'er the dang'rous deep secure the navy flies;

Glides by the Sirens' cliffs, a shelfy coast,
Long infamous for ships and sailors lost,
And white with bones. Th' impetuous ocean
roars,

And rocks rebellow from the sounding
shores.

The watchful hero felt the knocks, and
found

The tossing vessel sail'd on shoaly ground.
Sure of his pilot's loss, he takes himself

The helm, and steers aloof, and shuns the shelf.

Inly he griev'd, and, groaning from the
breast,

Deplor'd his death; and thus his pain ex-
press'd:

"For faith repos'd on seas, and on the flat-
t'ring sky,

Thy naked corpse is doom'd on shores unknown to lie."

THE SIXTH BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

The Sibyl foretells Æneas the adventures he should meet with in Italy. She attends him to hell; describing to him the various scenes of that place, and conducting him to his father Anchises, who instructs him in those sublime mysteries of the soul of the world, and the transmigration; and shews him that glorious race of heroes which was to descend from him, and his posterity.

HE said, and wept; then spread his sails
before

The winds, and reach'd at length the Cuman shore:

Their anchors dropp'd, his crew the vessels moor.

They turn their heads to sea, their sterns
to land,

And greet with greedy joy th' Italian
strand.

Some strike from clashing flints their fiery seed;

Some gather sticks, the kindled flames to
feed,

Or search for hollow trees, and fell the
woods,

Or trace thro' valleys the discover'd floods.
Thus, while their sev'ral charges they fulfil,

The pious prince ascends the sacred hill
Where Phœbus is ador'd; and seeks the
shade

Which hides from sight his venerable maid.
Deep in a cave the Sibyl makes abode;

Thence full of fate returns, and of the god.
Thro' Trivia's grove they walk; and now
behold,

And enter now, the temple roof'd with gold.
When Dædalus, to fly the Cretan shore,

His heavy limbs on jointed pinions bore,
(The first who sail'd in air,) 't is sung by

Fame,

To the Cumæan coast at length he came,
And, here alighting, built this costly

frame.

Inscrib'd to Phœbus, here he hung on high
The steerage of his wings, that cut the sky:

Then o'er the lofty gate his art emboss'd
Androgeos' death, and off'rings to his ghost;

Sev'n youths from Athens yearly sent, to
meet

The fate appointed by revengeful Crete.
 And next to those the dreadful urn was plac'd,
 In which the destin'd names by lots were cast:
 The mournful parents stand around in tears,
 And rising Crete against their shore appears.
 There too, in living sculpture, might be seen
 The mad affection of the Cretan queen;
 Then how she cheats her bellowing lover's eye;
 The rushing leap, the doubtful progeny,
 The lower part a beast, a man above,
 The monument of their polluted love.
 Nor far from thence he grav'd the wondrous maze,
 A thousand doors, a thousand winding ways:
 Here dwells the monster, hid from human view,
 Not to be found, but by the faithful clew;
 Till the kind artist, mov'd with pious grief,
 Lent to the loving maid this last relief,
 And all those erring paths describ'd so well
 That Theseus conquer'd and the monster fell.
 Here hapless Icarus had found his part,
 Had not the father's grief restrain'd his art.
 He twice assay'd to cast his son in gold;
 Twice from his hands he dropp'd the forming mold.
 All this with wond'ring eyes Æneas view'd;
 Each varying object his delight renew'd:
 Eager to read the rest — Achates came,
 And by his side the mad divining dame,
 The priestess of the god, Deiphobe her name.
 "Time suffers not," she said, "to feed your eyes
 With empty pleasures; haste the sacrifice.
 Sev'n bullocks, yet unyok'd, for Phœbus choose,
 And for Diana sev'n unspotted ewes."
 This said, the servants urge the sacred rites,
 While to the temple she the prince invites.
 A spacious cave, within its farthest part,
 Was hew'd and fashion'd by laborious art
 Thro' the hill's hollow sides: before the place,
 A hundred doors a hundred entries grace;
 As many voices issue, and the sound

Of Sibyl's words as many times rebound.
 Now to the mouth they come. Aloud she cries:
 "This is the time; enquire your destinies.
 He comes; behold the god!" Thus while she said,
 (And shiv'ring at the sacred entry stay'd,)
 Her color chang'd; her face was not the same,
 And hollow groans from her deep spirit came.
 Her hair stood up; convulsive rage possess'd
 Her trembling limbs, and heav'd her labouring breast.
 Greater than humankind she seem'd to look,
 And with an accent more than mortal spoke.
 Her staring eyes with sparkling fury roll;
 When all the god came rushing on her soul.
 Swiftly she turn'd, and, foaming as she spoke:
 "Why this delay?" she cried — "the pow'rs invoke!
 Thy pray'rs alone can open this abode;
 Else vain are my demands, and dumb the god."
 She said no more. The trembling Trojans hear,
 O'erspread with a damp sweat and holy fear.
 The prince himself, with awful dread possess'd,
 His vows to great Apollo thus address'd:
 "Indulgent god, propitious pow'r to Troy,
 Swift to relieve, unwilling to destroy,
 Directed by whose hand the Dardan dart pierc'd the proud Grecian's only mortal part:
 Thus far, by fate's decrees and thy commands,
 Thro' ambient seas and thro' devouring sands,
 Our exil'd crew has sought th' Ansonian ground;
 And now, at length, the flying coast is found.
 Thus far the fate of Troy, from place to place,
 With fury has pursued her wand'ring race.
 Here cease, ye pow'rs, and let your vengeance end:
 Troy is no more, and can no more offend.

And thou, O sacred maid, inspir'd to see 100
Th' event of things in dark futurity;
Give me what Heav'n has promis'd to my
fate,

To conquer and command the Latian state;
To fix my wand'ring gods, and find a place
For the long exiles of the Trojan race.
Then shall my grateful hands a temple
rear

To the twin gods, with vows and solemn
pray'r;

And annual rites, and festivals, and games,
Shall be perform'd to their auspicious
names.

Nor shalt thou want thy honors in my
land; 110

For there thy faithful oracles shall stand,
Preserv'd in shrines; and ev'ry sacred lay,
Which, by thy mouth, Apollo shall convey:
All shall be treasur'd by a chosen train
Of holy priests, and ever shall remain.
But O! commit not thy prophetic mind
To fitting leaves, the sport of ev'ry wind,
Lest they disperse in air our empty fate;
Write not, but, what the pow'rs ordain,
relate."

Struggling in vain, impatient of her
load, 120

And lab'ring underneath the pond'rous god,
The more she strove to shake him from her
breast,

With more and far superior force he press'd;
Commands his entrance, and, without control,

Usurps her organs and inspires her soul.
Now, with a furious blast, the hundred doors

Ope of themselves; a rushing whirlwind
roars

Within the cave, and Sibyl's voice restores:

"Escap'd the dangers of the wat'ry reign,
Yet more and greater ills by land re-
main. 130

The coast, so long desir'd (nor doubt th'
event),

Thy troops shall reach, but, having reach'd,
repent.

Wars, horrid wars, I view — a field of blood,
And Tiber rolling with a purple flood.

Simois nor Xanthus shall be wanting there:
A new Achilles shall in arms appear,

And he, too, goddess-born. Fierce Juno's
hate,

Added to hostile force, shall urge thy fate.

To what strange nations shalt not thou resort,

Driv'n to solicit aid at ev'ry court! 140

The cause the same which Ilium once op-
press'd;

A foreign mistress, and a foreign guest.
But thou, secure of soul, unbent with woes,
The more thy fortune frowns, the more oppose.

The dawns of thy safety shall be shown
From whence thou least shalt hope, a Grecian town."

Thus, from the dark recess, the Sibyl
spoke,

And the resisting air the thunder broke;
The cave rebellow'd, and the temple
shook.

Th' ambiguous god, who rul'd her lab'r-
ing breast, 150

In these mysterious words his mind ex-
press'd;

Some truths reveal'd, in terms involv'd the
rest.

At length her fury fell, her foaming ceas'd,
And, ebbing in her soul, the god decreas'd.
Then thus the chief: "No terror to my
view,

No frightful face of danger can be new.

Inur'd to suffer, and resolv'd to dare,

The Fates, without my pow'r, shall be without my care.

This let me crave, since near your grove
the road

To hell lies open, and the dark abode 160
Which Acheron surrounds, th' innavigable flood;

Conduct me thro' the regions void of light,
And lead me longing to my father's sight.

For him, a thousand dangers I have
sought,

And, rushing where the thickest Grecians
fought,

Safe on my back the sacred burthen
brought.

He, for my sake, the raging ocean tried,
And wrath of Heav'n, my still auspicious
guide,

And bore beyond the strength decrepid age supplied.

Oft, since he breath'd his last, in dead of
night 170

His reverend image stood before my sight;
Enjoin'd to seek, below, his holy shade;

Conducted there by your unerring aid.

But you, if pious minds by pray'rs are won,

Oblige the father, and protect the son.
Yours is the pow'r; nor Proserpine in vain
Has made you priestess of her nightly reign.
If Orpheus, arm'd with his enchanting lyre,
The ruthless king with pity could inspire,
And from the shades below redeem his
wife; 180

If Pollux, off'ring his alternate life,
Could free his brother, and can daily go
By turns aloft, by turns descend below —
Why name I Theseus, or his greater friend,
Who trod the downward path, and upward could ascend ?

Not less than theirs, from Jove my lineage
came;

My mother greater, my descent the same."
So pray'd the Trojan prince, and, while he
pray'd,

His hand upon the holy altar laid. 189

Then thus replied the prophetess divine:
"O goddess-born, of great Anchises' line,
The gates of hell are open night and day;
Smooth the descent, and easy is the way:
But to return, and view the cheerful skies,
In this the task and mighty labor lies.
To few great Jupiter imparts this grace,
And those of shining worth and heav'nly
race.

Betwixt those regions and our upper light,
Deep forests and impenetrable night Possess the middle space: th' infernal bounds 200

Cocytus, with his sable waves, surrounds.
But if so dire a love your soul invades,
As twice below to view the trembling
shades;

If you so hard a toil will undertake,
As twice to pass th' innavigable lake;
Receive my counsel. In the neighb'ring grove

There stands a tree; the queen of Stygian
Jove

Claims it her own; thick woods and gloomy
night

Conceal the happy plant from human sight.
One bough it bears; but (wondrous to behold !)

The ductile rind and leaves of radiant gold:
This from the vulgar branches must be torn,
And to fair Proserpine the present borne, Ere leave be giv'n to tempt the nether
skies. 210

The first thus rent, a second will arise,
And the same metal the same room
supplies. }

Look round the wood, with lifted eyes, to
see

The lurking gold upon the fatal tree:
Then rend it off, as holy rites command;
The willing metal will obey thy hand, 220
Following with ease, if, favor'd by thy fate,
Thou art foredoom'd to view the Stygian
state:

If not, no labor can the tree constrain;
And strength of stubborn arms and steel
are vain.

Besides, you know not, while you here
attend,

Th' unworthy fate of your unhappy friend:
Breathless he lies; and his unburied ghost,
Depriv'd of fun'ral rites, pollutes your host.
Pay first his pious dues; and, for the dead,
Two sable sheep around his hearse be
led; 230

Then, living turfs upon his body lay:
This done, securely take the destin'd
way,

To find the regions destitute of day."
She said, and held her peace. Æneas went }

Sad from the cave, and full of discontent,
Unknowing whom the sacred Sibyl meant. }
Achates, the companion of his breast,
Goes grieving by his side, with equal cares
oppress'd.

Walking, they talk'd, and fruitlessly divin'd
What friend the priestess by those words
design'd. 240

But soon they found an object to deplore:
Misenus lay extended on the shore;
Son of the God of Winds: none so renown'd
The warrior trumpet in the field to sound;
With breathing brass to kindle fierce
alarms,

And rouse to dare their fate in honorable
arms.

He serv'd great Hector, and was ever near,
Not with his trumpet only, but his spear.
But by Pelides' arms when Hector fell,
He chose Æneas; and he chose as well. 250
Swoln with applause, and aiming still at
more,

He now provokes the sea gods from the
shore;

With envy Triton heard the martial sound,
And the bold champion, for his challenge,
drown'd;

Then cast his mangled carcass on the strand:
The gazing crowd around the body stand.
All weep; but most Æneas mourns his fate,

And hastens to perform the funeral state.
 In altar-wise, a stately pile they rear;
 The basis broad below, and top advanc'd in air. ²⁶⁰
 An ancient wood, fit for the work design'd,
 (The shady covert of the salvage kind,)
 The Trojans found: the sounding ax is
 plied;
 Firs, pines, and pitch trees, and the tow'ring
 pride
 Of forest ashes, feel the fatal stroke,
 And piercing wedges cleave the stubborn oak.
 Huge trunks of trees, fell'd from the steepy
 crown
 Of the bare mountains, roll with ruin down.
 Arm'd like the rest the Trojan prince
 appears,
 And by his pious labor urges theirs. ²⁷⁰
 Thus while he wrought, revolving in his
 mind
 The ways to compass what his wish de-
 sign'd,
 He cast his eyes upon the gloomy grove,
 And then with vows implor'd the Queen of Love:
 "O may thy pow'r, propitious still to me,
 Conduct my steps to find the fatal tree,
 In this deep forest; since the Sibyl's breath
 Foretold, alas! too true, Misenus' death."
 Scarce had he said, when, full before his sight,
 Two doves, descending from their airy flight, ²⁸⁰
 Secure upon the grassy plain alight.
 He knew his mother's birds; and thus he
 pray'd:
 "Be you my guides, with your auspicious
 aid,
 And lead my footsteps, till the branch be
 found,
 Whose glitt'ring shadow gilds the sacred
 ground.
 And thou, great parent, with celestial care,
 In this distress be present to my pray'r!"
 Thus having said, he stopp'd, with watchful sight,
 Observing still the motions of their flight,
 What course they took, what happy signs
 they shew. ²⁹⁰
 They fed, and, flutt'ring, by degrees
 withdrew
 Still farther from the place, but still in view:
 Hopping and flying, thus they led him on

To the slow lake, whose baleful stench to shun
 They wing'd their flight aloft; then, stooping low,
 Perch'd on the double tree that bears the golden bough.
 Thro' the green leafs the glitt'ring shadows
 glow;
 As, on the sacred oak, the wintry mistletoe,
 Where the proud mother views her precious brood,
 And happier branches, which she never sow'd. ³⁰⁰
 Such was the glitt'ring; such the ruddy rind,
 And dancing leaves, that wanton'd in the
 wind.
 He seiz'd the shining bough with griping
 hold,
 And rent away, with ease, the ling'ring
 gold;
 Then to the Sibyl's palace bore the prize. } Meantime the Trojan troops, with } weeping eyes,
 To dead Misenus pay his obsequies. }
 First, from the ground a lofty pile they
 rear,
 Of pitch trees, oaks, and pines, and unc-
 tuous fir:
 The fabric's front with cypress twigs they strew, ³¹⁰
 And stick the sides with boughs of baleful
 yew.
 The topmost part his glitt'ring arms adorn;
 Warm waters, then, in brazen caldrons
 borne,
 Are pour'd to wash his body, joint by joint,
 And fragrant oils the stiffen'd limbs anoint.
 With groans and cries Misenus they de-
 plore:
 Then on a bier, with purple cover'd o'er,
 The breathless body, thus bewail'd, they
 lay, }
 And fire the pile, their faces turn'd away— } Such reverend rites their fathers us'd to }
 pay. ³²⁰
 Pure oil and incense on the fire they throw,
 And fat of victims, which his friends bestow.
 These gifts the greedy flames to dust devour;
 Then on the living coals red wine they
 pour;
 And, last, the relics by themselves dispose,
 Which in a brazen urn the priests inclose.
 Old Corynæus compass'd thrice the crew,
 And dipp'd an olive branch in holy dew;

Which thrice he sprinkled round, and thrice
aloud Invok'd the dead, and then dismiss'd the
crowd.
But good Æneas order'd on the shore ³³⁰
A stately tomb, whose top a trumpet
bore,
A soldier's fauchion, and a seaman's oar. }
Thus was his friend interr'd; and deathless
fame
Still to the lofty cape consigns his name.
These rites perform'd, the prince, without delay,
Hastes to the nether world his destin'd way.
Deep was the cave; and, downward as it
went
From the wide mouth, a rocky rough descent;
And here th' access a gloomy grove defends, ³⁴⁰
And there th' unnavigable lake extends,
O'er whose unhappy waters, void of light,
No bird presumes to steer his airy flight;
Such deadly stench from the depth arise,
And steaming sulphur, that infects the
skies.
From hence the Grecian bards their legends
make,
And give the name Avernus to the lake.
Four sable bullocks, in the yoke untaught,
For sacrifice the pious hero brought.
The priestess pours the wine betwixt their horns; ³⁵⁰
Then cuts the curling hair; that first oblation burns,
Invoking Hecate hither to repair:
A pow'rful name in hell and upper air.
The sacred priests with ready knives be-reave
The beasts of life, and in full bowls receive
The streaming blood: a lamb to Hell and
Night
(The sable wool without a streak of white)
Æneas offers; and, by fate's decree,
A barren heifer, Proserpine, to thee.
With holocausts he Pluto's altar fills; ³⁶⁰ Sev'n brawny bulls with his own hand he kills:
Then on the broiling entrails oil he pours;
Which, ointed thus, the raging flame devours.
Late the nocturnal sacrifice begun,
Nor ended till the next returning sun.
Then earth began to bellow, trees to dance,

And howling dogs in glimm'ring light advance,
Ere Hecate came. "Far hence be souls profane!"
The Sibyl cried, "and from the grove abstain!"
Now, Trojan, take the way thy fates afford;
Assume thy courage, and unsheathe thy ³⁷⁰
sword."
She said, and pass'd along the gloomy space;
The prince pursued her steps with equal
pace.
Ye realms, yet unreveal'd to human
sight,
Ye gods who rule the regions of the night,
Ye gliding ghosts, permit me to relate
The mystic wonders of your silent state!
Obscure they went thro' dreary shades,
that led
Along the waste dominions of the dead.
Thus wander travelers in woods by night,
By the moon's doubtful and malignant light, ³⁸¹
When Jove in dusky clouds involves the
skies,
And the faint crescent shoots by fits before their eyes.
Just in the gate and in the jaws of hell,
Revengeful Cares and sullen Sorrows dwell,
And pale Diseases, and repining Age,
Want, Fear, and Famine's unresisted rage;
Here Toils, and Death, and Death's half-brother, Sleep,
Forms terrible to view, their sentry keep;
With anxious Pleasures of a guilty mind, Deep Frauds before, and open Force behind; ³⁹¹
The Furies' iron beds; and Strife, that
shakes
Her hissing tresses and unfolds her snakes.
Full in the midst of this infernal road,
An elm displays her dusky arms abroad:
The God of Sleep there hides his heavy
head,
And empty dreams on ev'ry leaf are spread.
Of various forms unnumber'd specters more,
Centaur's, and double shapes, besiege the door. ³⁹⁹
Before the passage, horrid Hydra stands,
And Briareus with all his hundred hands;
Gorgons, Geryon with his triple frame;
And vain Chimæra vomits empty flame.
The chief unsheath'd his shining steel, pre-
par'd,

Tho' seiz'd with sudden fear, to force the
 guard,
 Off'ring his brandish'd weapon at their
 face;
 Had not the Sibyl stopp'd his eager pace,
 And told him what those empty phantoms
 were:
 Forms without bodies, and impassive air.
 Hence to deep Acheron they take their way, ⁴¹⁰
 Whose troubled eddies, thick with ooze and clay,
 Are whirl'd aloft, and in Cocytus lost.
 There Charon stands, who rules the dreary
 coast —
 A sordid god: down from his hoary chin
 A length of beard descends, uncomb'd, unclean;
 His eyes, like hollow furnaces on fire;
 A girdle, foul with grease, binds his obscene attire.
 He spreads his canvas; with his pole he steers;
 The freights of fitting ghosts in his thin bottom bears.
 He look'd in years; yet in his years were seen ⁴²⁰
 A youthful vigor and autumnal green.
 An airy crowd came rushing where he
 stood,
 Which fill'd the margin of the fatal flood:
 Husbands and wives, boys and unmarried maids,
 And mighty heroes' more majestic shades,
 And youths, intomb'd before their fathers'
 eyes,
 With hollow groans, and shrieks, and feeble
 cries.
 Thick as the leaves in autumn strow the
 woods,
 Or fowls, by winter forc'd, forsake the
 floods,
 And wing their hasty flight to happier lands; ⁴³⁰
 Such, and so thick, the shiv'ring army
 stands,
 And press for passage with extended
 hands.
 Now these, now those, the surly boatman bore:
 The rest he drove to distance from the
 shore.
 The hero, who beheld with wond'ring eyes
 The tumult mix'd with shrieks, laments, and
 cries,

Ask'd of his guide, what the rude concourse meant;
 Why to the shore the thronging people
 bent;
 What forms of law among the ghosts were
 us'd;
 Why some were ferried o'er, and some re-
 fus'd.
 "Son of Anchises, offspring of the gods," ⁴⁴⁰
 The Sibyl said, "you see the Stygian floods,
 The sacred stream which heav'n's imperial
 state
 Attests in oaths, and fears to violate.
 The ghosts rejected are th' unhappy crew
 Depriv'd of sepulchers and fun'ral due:
 The boatman, Charon; those, the buried
 host,
 He ferries over to the farther coast;
 Nor dares his transport vessel cross the waves
 With such whose bones are not compos'd in graves. ⁴⁵⁰
 A hundred years they wander on the shore;
 At length, their penance done, are wafted
 o'er."
 The Trojan chief his forward pace repress'd, Revolving anxious thoughts within his
 breast.
 He saw his friends, who, whelm'd beneath the waves,
 Their fun'ral honors claim'd, and ask'd their quiet graves.
 The lost Leucaspis in the crowd he knew,
 And the brave leader of the Lycian crew, Whom, on the Tyrrhene seas, the tempests met; ⁴⁵⁹
 The sailors master'd, and the ship o'erset.
 Amidst the spirits, Palinurus press'd,
 Yet fresh from life, a new-admitted guest,
 Who, while he steering view'd the stars,
 and bore
 His course from Afric to the Latian shore, Fell headlong down. The Trojan fix'd his
 view,
 And scarcely thro' the gloom the sullen shadow knew.
 Then thus the prince: "What envious
 pow'r, O friend, Brought your lov'd life to this disastrous
 end?
 For Phœbus, ever true in all he said, ⁴⁶⁹
 Has in your fate alone my faith betray'd.
 The god foretold you should not die, before
 You reach'd, secure from seas, th' Italian
 shore.

Is this th' unerring pow'r?" The ghost replied:
 "Nor Phœbus flatter'd, nor his answers lied;
 Nor envious gods have sent me to the deep:
 But, while the stars and course of heav'n I keep,
 My wearied eyes were seiz'd with fatal sleep.
 I fell; and, with my weight, the helm constrain'd
 Was drawn along, which yet my gripe retain'd.
 Now by the winds and raging waves I swear, ⁴⁸⁰
 Your safety, more than mine, was then my care;
 Lest, of the guide bereft, the rudder lost,
 Your ship should run against the rocky coast.
 Three blust'ring nights, borne by the southern blast,
 I floated, and discover'd land at last:
 High on a mounting wave my head I bore,
 Forcing my strength, and gath'ring to the shore.
 Panting, but past the danger, now I seiz'd
 The craggy cliffs, and my tir'd members eas'd.
 While, cumber'd with my dropping clothes, I lay, ⁴⁸⁵
 The cruel nation, covetous of prey,
 Stain'd with my blood th' inhospitable coast;
 And now, by winds and waves, my lifeless limbs are toss'd:
 Which O avert, by yon ethereal light,
 Which I have lost for this eternal night!
 Or, if by dearer ties you may be won,
 By your dead sire, and by your living son,
 Redeem from this reproach my wand'ring ghost;
 Or with your navy seek the Velin coast,
 And in a peaceful grave my corpse compose;
 Or, if a nearer way your mother shows, ⁵⁰¹
 Without whose aid you durst not undertake
 This frightful passage o'er the Stygian lake,
 Lend to this wretch your hand, and waft him o'er
 To the sweet banks of yon forbidden shore."
 Scarce had he said, the prophetess began:
 "What hopes delude thee, miserable man?

Think'st thou, thus untomb'd, to cross the floods,
 To view the Furies and infernal gods, ⁵⁰⁹
 And visit, without leave, the dark abodes?
 Attend the term of long revolving years;
 Fate, and the dooming gods, are deaf to tears.
 This comfort of thy dire misfortune take:
 The wrath of Heav'n, inflicted for thy sake,
 With vengeance shall pursue th' inhuman coast,
 Till they propitiate thy offended ghost,
 And raise a tomb, with vows and solemn pray'r;
 And Palinurus' name the place shall bear."
 This calm'd his cares; sooth'd with his future fame,
 And pleas'd to hear his propagated name.
 Now nearer to the Stygian lake they draw: ⁵²¹
 Whom, from the shore, the surly boatman saw;
 Observ'd their passage thro' the shady wood,
 And mark'd their near approaches to the flood.
 Then thus he call'd aloud, inflam'd with wrath:
 "Mortal, whate'er, who this forbidden path
 In arms presum'st to tread, I charge thee, stand,
 And tell thy name, and bus'ness in the land.
 Know this, the realm of night — the Stygian shore:
 My boat conveys no living bodies o'er; ⁵³⁰
 Nor was I pleas'd great Theseus once to bear,
 Who forc'd a passage with his pointed spear,
 Nor strong Alcides — men of mighty fame,
 And from th' immortal gods their lineage came.
 In fetters one the barking porter tied,
 And took him trembling from his sov'reign's side:
 Two sought by force to seize his beautiful bride."
 To whom the Sibyl thus: "Compose thy mind;
 Nor frauds are here contriv'd, nor force design'd.
 Still may the dog the wand'ring troops constrain ⁵⁴⁰
 Of airy ghosts, and vex the guilty train,
 And with her grisly lord his lovely queen remain."

The Trojan chief, whose lineage is from
Jove,
Much fam'd for arms, and more for filial
love,
Is sent to seek his sire in your Elysian
grove.

If neither piety, nor Heav'n's command,
Can gain his passage to the Stygian strand,
This fatal present shall prevail, at least."
Then shew'd the shining bough, conceal'd within her vest.

No more was needful: for the gloomy
god

Stood mute with awe, to see the golden rod;
Admir'd the destin'd off'ring to his queen —
A venerable gift, so rarely seen.

His fury thus appeas'd, he puts to land;
The ghosts forsake their seats at his command:

He clears the deck, receives the mighty
freight;

The leaky vessel groans beneath the weight.
Slowly she sails, and scarcely stems the
tides;

The pressing water pours within her sides.
His passengers at length are wafted o'er, 560
Expos'd, in muddy weeds, upon the miry
shore.

No sooner landed, in his den they found
The triple porter of the Stygian sound,
Grim Cerberus, who soon began to rear
His crested snakes, and arm'd his bristling
hair.

The prudent Sibyl had before prepar'd
A sop, in honey steep'd, to charm the guard;
Which, mix'd with pow'rful drugs, she cast
before

His greedy grinning jaws, just op'd to roar.
With three enormous mouths he gapes;
and straight, 570

With hunger press'd, devours the pleasing bait.

Long draughts of sleep his monstrous limbs
enslave;

He reels, and, falling, fills the spacious cave.

The keeper charm'd, the chief without
delay

Pass'd on, and took th' irremeable way.
Before the gates, the cries of babes new born,

Whom fate had from their tender mothers
torn,

Assault his ears: then those, whom form
of laws

Condemn'd to die, when traitors judg'd their cause. 579

Nor want they lots, nor judges to review
The wrongful sentence, and award a new.
Minos, the strict inquisitor, appears;
And lives and crimes, with his assessors,
hears.

Round in his urn the blended balls he rolls,
Absolves the just, and dooms the guilty
souls.

The next, in place and punishment, are they

Who prodigally throw their souls away;
Fools, who, repining at their wretched state,
And loathing anxious life, suborn'd their
fate.

With late repentance now they would retrieve

The bodies they forsook, and wish to live;
Their pains and poverty desire to bear,
To view the light of heav'n, and breathe
the vital air:

But fate forbids; the Stygian floods oppose,

And with nine circling streams the captive souls inclose.

Not far from thence, the Mournful Fields
appear,

So call'd from lovers that inhabit there.

The souls whom that unhappy flame
invades,

In secret solitude and myrtle shades Make endless moans, and, pining with desire, 600

Lament too late their unextinguish'd fire.

Here Procris, Eriphyle here he found, Baring her breast, yet bleeding with the
wound

Made by her son. He saw Pasiphae there,
With Phædra's ghost, a foul incestuous
pair.

There Laodamia, with Evadne, moves;

Unhappy both, but loyal in their loves:

Cæneus, a woman once, and once a man,

But ending in the sex she first began.

Not far from these Phœnician Dido stood, Fresh from her wound, her bosom bath'd
in blood; 611

Whom when the Trojan hero hardly knew, Obscure in shades, and with a doubtful
view,

(Doubtful as he who sees, thro' dusky
night,

Or thinks he sees, the moon's uncertain
light,)

With tears he first approach'd the sullen
shade;
And, as his love inspir'd him, thus he said:
"Unhappy queen! then is the common
breath
Of rumor true, in your reported death, And I, alas! the cause? By Heav'n, I vow, ⁶²⁰
And all the pow'rs that rule the realms
below,
Unwilling I forsook your friendly state, Commanded by the gods, and forc'd by
fate —
Those gods, that fate, whose unresisted
might
Have sent me to these regions void of light,
Thro' the vast empire of eternal night. } Nor dar'd I to presume, that, press'd with
grief,
My flight should urge you to this dire relief.
Stay, stay your steps, and listen to my vows:
'T is the last interview that fate allows!" ⁶³⁰
In vain he thus attempts her mind to move
With tears, and pray'rs, and late-repenting
love.
Disdainfully she look'd; then turning round,
But fix'd her eyes unmov'd upon the ground,
And what he says and swears, regards no
more
Than the deaf rocks, when the loud billows
roar;
But whirl'd away, to shun his hateful sight,
Hid in the forest and the shades of night;
Then sought Sichæus thro' the shady grove,
Who answer'd all her cares, and equal'd all her love. ⁶⁴⁰
Some pious tears the pitying hero paid,
And follow'd with his eyes the flitting
shade,
Then took the forward way, by fate or-
dain'd,
And, with his guide, the farther fields at-
tain'd,
Where, sever'd from the rest, the warrior souls remain'd. }
Tydeus he met, with Meleager's race,
The pride of armies, and the soldiers'
grace;
And pale Adrastus with his ghastly face. }
Of Trojan chiefs he view'd a num'rous train,
All much lamented, all in battle slain; ⁶⁵⁰
Glaucus and Medon, high above the rest,
Antenor's sons, and Ceres' sacred priest.
And proud Idæus, Priam's charioteer,

Who shakes his empty reins, and aims his airy spear.
The gladsome ghosts, in circling troops, attend,
And with unwearied eyes behold their
friend;
Delight to hover near, and long to know What bus'ness brought him to the realms
below.
But Argive chiefs, and Agamemnon's train,
When his refulgent arms flash'd thro' the shady plain, ⁶⁶⁰
Fled from his well-known face, with wonted fear,
As when his thund'ring sword and pointed
spear
Drove headlong to their ships, and glean'd
the routed rear.
They rais'd a feeble cry, with trembling notes;
But the weak voice deceiv'd their gasping throats.
Here Priam's son, Deiphobus, he found,
Whose face and limbs were one continued
wound:
Dishonest, with lopp'd arms, the youth appears,
Spoil'd of his nose, and shorten'd of his ears.
He scarcely knew him, striving to disown, ⁶⁷⁰
His blotted form, and blushing to be known;
And therefore first began: "O Teucer's
race,
Who durst thy faultless figure thus de-
face?
What heart could wish, what hand inflict,
this dire disgrace?
'T was fam'd, that in our last and fatal night
Your single prowess long sustain'd the fight, Till tir'd, not forc'd, a glorious fate you
chose,
And fell upon a heap of slaughter'd foes.
But, in remembrance of so brave a deed,
A tomb and fun'ral honors I decreed; ⁶⁸⁰
Thrice call'd your manes on the Trojan
plains:
The place your armor and your name retains.
Your body too I sought, and, had I found,
Design'd for burial in your native ground."
The ghost replied: "Your piety has paid
All needful rites, to rest my wand'ring
shade;
But cruel fate, and my more cruel wife,
To Grecian swords betray'd my sleeping life.
These are the monuments of Helen's love:

The shame I bear below, the marks I bore
above.

You know in what deluding joys we pass'd
The night that was by Heav'n decreed our last:

For, when the fatal horse, descending down,
Pregnant with arms, o'erwhelm'd th' unhappy town,

She feign'd nocturnal orgies; left my bed,
And, mix'd with Trojan dames, the dances
led;

Then, waving high her torch, the signal
made,

Which rous'd the Grecians from their ambuscade.

With watching overworn, with cares }
oppress'd,

Unhappy I had laid me down to rest, 700
And heavy sleep my weary limbs possess'd.

Meantime my worthy wife our arms mis-
laid,

And from beneath my head my sword con-
vey'd;

The door unlatch'd, and, with repeated calls,
Invites her former lord within my walls.
Thus in her crime her confidence she plac'd,
And with new treasons would redeem the
past.

What need I more? Into the room they ran,
And meanly murder'd a defenseless man.

Ulysses, basely born, first led the way. 710
Avenging pow'rs! with justice if I pray,
That fortune be their own another day! }

But answer you; and in your turn relate,
What brought you, living, to the Stygian
state:

Driv'n by the winds and errors of the
sea,

Or did you Heav'n's superior doom obey? } Or tell what other chance conducts your
way,

To view with mortal eyes our dark retreats,

Tumults and torments of th' infernal seats."

While thus in talk the flying hours they pass, 720

The sun had finish'd more than half his race:
And they, perhaps, in words and tears had spent

The little time of stay which Heav'n had lent;

But thus the Sibyl chides their long delay:
"Night rushes down, and headlong drives
the day:

'Tis here, in different paths, the way divides;

The right to Pluto's golden palace guides;
The left to that unhappy region tends,
Which to the depth of Tartarus descends;
The seat of night profound, and punish'd fiends."

Then thus Deiphobus: "O sacred maid,
Forbear to chide, and be your will obey'd!
Lo! to the secret shadows I retire,
To pay my penance till my years expire.
Proceed, auspicious prince, with glory
crown'd,

And born to better fates than I have found."
He said; and, while he said, his steps he
turn'd

To secret shadows, and in silence mourn'd.
The hero, looking on the left, espied

A lofty tow'r, and strong on ev'ry side 740
With treble walls, which Phlegethon surrounds,

Whose fiery flood the burning empire
bounds;

And, press'd betwix the rocks, the bel-lowing noise resounds.

Wide is the fronting gate, and, rais'd on
high

With adamantine columns, threatens the sky.
Vain is the force of man, and Heav'n's as
vain,

To crush the pillars which the pile sustain.
Sublime on these a tow'r of steel is rear'd;
And dire Tisiphone there keeps the ward, Girt in her sanguine gown, by night and
day, 750

Observant of the souls that pass the downward way.

From hence are heard the groans of ghosts,
the pains

Of sounding lashes and of dragging chains.
The Trojan stood astonish'd at their cries,
And ask'd his guide from whence those yells arise;

And what the crimes; and what the tortures
were,

And loud laments that rent the liquid air.

She thus replied: "The chaste and holy
race

Are all forbidden this polluted place.

But Hecate, when she gave to rule the
woods, 760

Then led me trembling thro' these dire
abodes,

And taught the tortures of th' avenging gods.

These are the realms of unrelenting fate;
And awful Rhadamanthus rules the state.
He hears and judges each committed crime;
Enquires into the manner, place, and time.
The conscious wretch must all his acts reveal,

(Loth to confess, unable to conceal,
From the first moment of his vital breath,
To his last hour of unrepenting death. ⁷⁷⁰
Straight, o'er the guilty ghost, the Fury
shakes

The sounding whip and brandishes her
snakes,
And the pale sinner, with her sisters, takes.

Then, of itself, unfolds th' eternal door;
With dreadful sounds the brazen hinges
roar.

You see, before the gate, what stalking ghost Commands the guard, what sentries keep the post.

More formidable Hydra stands within,
Whose jaws with iron teeth severely grin.
The gaping gulf low to the center lies, ⁷⁸⁰
And twice as deep as earth is distant from
the skies.

The rivals of the gods, the Titan race,
Here, sing'd with lightning, roll within th'
unfathom'd space.

Here lie th' Alæan twins, (I saw them both,) Enormous bodies, of gigantic growth,
Who dar'd in fight the Thund'rer to defy, Affect his heav'n, and force him from the
sky.

Salmoneus, suff'ring cruel pains, I found,
For emulating Jove; the rattling sound
Of mimic thunder, and the glitt'ring blaze ⁷⁹⁰
Of pointed lightnings, and their fork'y rays.
Thro' Elis and the Grecian towns he flew;
Th' audacious wretch four fiery coursers
drew:

He wav'd a torch aloft, and, madly vain,
Sought godlike worship from a servile
train.

Ambitious fool! with horny hoofs to pass
O'er hollow arches of resounding brass,
To rival thunder in its rapid course,
And imitate inimitable force!

But he, the King of Heav'n, obscure on high, ⁸⁰⁰

Bar'd his red arm, and, launching from the
sky

His writhen bolt, not shaking empty smoke,
Down to the deep abyss the flaming felon
strook.

There Tityus was to see, who took his birth
From heav'n, his nursing from the foodful
earth.

Here his gigantic limbs, with large embrace,

Infold nine acres of infernal space.

A rav'nous vulture, in his open'd side,
Her crooked beak and cruel talons tried;
Still for the growing liver digg'd his breast;
The growing liver still supplied the feast;
Still are his entrails fruitful to their pains:
Th' immortal hunger lasts, th' immortal
food remains. ⁸¹³

Ixion and Perithoüs I could name,
And more Thessalian chiefs of mighty fame.
High o'er their heads a mold'ring rock is
plac'd,

That promises a fall, and shakes at ev'ry
blast.

They lie below, on golden beds display'd;
And genial feasts with regal pomp are
made.

The Queen of Furies by their sides is set,
And snatches from their mouths th' un-tasted meat, ⁸²¹

Which if they touch, her hissing snakes she
rears,

Tossing her torch, and thund'ring in their ears.

Then they, who brothers' better claim dis-
own,

Expel their parents, and usurp the throne;
Defraud their clients, and, to lucre sold,
Sit brooding on unprofitable gold;
Who dare not give, and ev'n refuse to lend

To their poor kindred, or a wanting friend.
Vast is the throng of these; nor less the train ⁸³⁰

Of lustful youths, for foul adult'ry slain:
Hosts of deserters, who their honor sold,
And basely broke their faith for bribes of
gold.

All these within the dungeon's depth re-
main,

Despairing pardon, and expecting pain.
Ask not what pains; nor farther seek to
know

Their process, or the forms of law below.
Some roll a weighty stone; some, laid
along,

And bound with burning wires, on spokes of wheels are hung.

Unhappy Theseus, doom'd for ever there,
Is fix'd by fate on his eternal chair; ⁸⁴¹

And wretched Phlegyas warns the world with cries
 (Could warning make the world more just or wise):
 'Learn righteousness, and dread th'
 avenging deities.'

To tyrants others have their country sold,
 Imposing foreign lords, for foreign gold;
 Some have old laws repeal'd, new statutes
 made,
 Not as the people pleas'd, but as they paid;
 With incest some their daughters' bed pro-
 fan'd:

All dar'd the worst of ills, and, what they dar'd, attain'd. 850

Had I a hundred mouths, a hundred tongues,
 And throats of brass, inspir'd with iron lungs,
 I could not half those horrid crimes repeat,
 Nor half the punishments those crimes have met.

But let us haste our voyage to pursue:
 The walls of Pluto's palace are in view;
 The gate, and iron arch above it, stands
 On anvils labor'd by the Cyclops' hands.
 Before our farther way the Fates allow,
 Here must we fix on high the golden bough." 860

She said: and thro' the gloomy shades
 they pass'd,
 And chose the middle path. Arriv'd at last,
 The prince with living water sprinkled o'er His limbs and body; then approach'd the door,
 Possess'd the porch, and on the front above
 He fix'd the fatal bough requir'd by Pluto's
 love.

These holy rites perform'd, they took their
 way
 Where long extended plains of pleasure lay:
 The verdant fields with those of heav'n may
 vie,
 With ether vested, and a purple sky; 870
 The blissful seats of happy souls below.
 Stars of their own, and their own suns, they
 know;
 Their airy limbs in sports they exercise,
 And on the green contend the wrestler's
 prize.

Some in heroic verse divinely sing;
 Others in artful measures lead the ring.
 The Thracian bard, surrounded by the rest,
 There stands conspicuous in his flowing
 vest;

His flying fingers, and harmonious quill,
 Strike sev'n distinguish'd notes, and sev'n
 at once they fill. 880

Here found they Teucer's old heroic race, Born better times and happier years to
 grace.

Assaracus and Ilus here enjoy
 Perpetual fame, with him who founded Troy.

The chief beheld their chariots from afar,
 Their shining arms, and coursers train'd
 to war:

Their lances fix'd in earth, their steeds
 around,
 Free from their harness, graze the flow'ry
 ground.

The love of horses which they had, alive,
 And care of chariots, after death survive. 890
 Some cheerful souls were feasting on the
 plain;

Some did the song, and some the choir
 maintain,
 Beneath a laurel shade, where mighty Po Mounts up to woods above, and hides his head below.

Here patriots live, who, for their country's
 good,
 In fighting fields, were prodigal of blood:
 Priests of unblemish'd lives here make
 abode,

And poets worthy their inspiring god;
 And searching wits, of more mechanic parts,
 Who grac'd their age with new-invented
 arts: 900

Those who to worth their bounty did extend,
 And those who knew that bounty to commend.

The heads of these with holy fillets bound,
 And all their temples were with garlands
 crown'd.

To these the Sibyl thus her speech
 address'd,
 And first to him surrounded by the rest (Tow'ring his height, and ample was his
 breast):

"Say, happy souls, divine Musæus, say,
 Where lives Anchises, and where lies our
 way
 To find the hero, for whose only sake 910
 We sought the dark abodes, and cross'd the bitter lake?"

To this the sacred poet thus replied:
 "In no fix'd place the happy souls reside.
 In groves we live, and lie on mossy beds,

By crystal streams, that murmur thro' the meads:

But pass yon easy hill, and thence descend;
The path conducts you to your journey's end."

This said, he led them up the mountain's brow,
And shews them all the shining fields below.
They wind the hill, and thro' the blissful meadows go. 920

But old Anchises, in a flow'ry vale,
Review'd his muster'd race, and took the tale:

Those happy spirits, which, ordain'd by fate,

For future beings and new bodies wait —
With studious thought observ'd th' illustrious throng,

In nature's order as they pass'd along:
Their names, their fates, their conduct, and their care,

In peaceful senates and successful war.
He, when Æneas on the plain appears,
Meets him with open arms, and falling tears. 930

"Welcome," he said, "the gods' undoubted race!
O long expected to my dear embrace!
Once more 'tis giv'n me to behold your face!"

The love and pious duty which you pay
Have pass'd the perils of so hard a way.
'Tis true, computing times, I now believ'd
The happy day approach'd; nor are my hopes deceiv'd.

What length of lands, what oceans have you pass'd;

What storms sustain'd, and on what shores been cast?

How have I fear'd your fate! but fear'd it most, 940

When love assail'd you, on the Libyan coast."

To this, the filial duty thus replies:

"Your sacred ghost before my sleeping eyes

Appear'd, and often urg'd this painful enterprise."

After long tossing on the Tyrrhene sea,
My navy rides at anchor in the bay.

But reach your hand, O parent shade, nor shun

The dear embraces of your longing son!"

He said; and falling tears his face bedew:

Then thrice around his neck his arms he threw;

And thrice the fitting shadow slipp'd away, 950
Like winds, or empty dreams that fly the day.

Now, in a secret vale, the Trojan sees
A sep'rate grove, thro' which a gentle breeze

Plays with a passing breath, and whispers thro' the trees;

And, just before the confines of the wood,
The gliding Lethe leads her silent flood.

About the boughs an airy nation flew,
Thick as the humming bees, that hunt the golden dew;

In summer's heat on tops of lilies feed, 960
And creep within their bells, to suck the balmy seed:

The winged army roams the fields around;
The rivers and the rocks remurmur to the sound.

Æneas wond'ring stood, then ask'd the cause

Which to the stream the crowding people draws.

Then thus the sire: "The souls that throng the flood

Are those to whom, by fate, are other bodies ow'd:

In Lethe's lake they long oblivion taste,
Of future life secure, forgetful of the past.
Long has my soul desir'd this time and place, 970

To set before your sight your glorious race,
That this presaging joy may fire your mind
To seek the shores by destiny design'd."

"O father, can it be, that souls sublime
Return to visit our terrestrial clime,
And that the gen'rous mind, releas'd by death,

Can covet lazy limbs and mortal breath?"

Anchises then, in order, thus begun

To clear those wonders to his godlike son:

"Know, first, that heav'n, and earth's compact frame, 980

And flowing waters, and the starry flame,
And both the radiant lights, one common soul

Inspires and feeds, and animates the whole.
This active mind, infus'd thro' all the space,

Unites and mingles with the mighty mass.

Hence men and beasts the breath of life obtain,

And birds of air, and monsters of the main.

Th' ethereal vigor is in all the same,

And every soul is fill'd with equal flame;
 As much as earthy limbs, and gross alloy
 Of mortal members, subject to decay,⁹⁹¹
 Blunt not the beams of heav'n and edge
 of day.
 From this coarse mixture of terrestrial
 parts,
 Desire and fear by turns possess their
 hearts,
 And grief, and joy; nor can the groveling
 mind,
 In the dark dungeon of the limbs confin'd,
 Assert the native skies, or own its heav'nly
 kind:
 Nor death itself can wholly wash their stains;
 But long-contracted filth ev'n in the soul
 remains.
 The relics of inveterate vice they wear,¹⁰⁰⁰
 And spots of sin obscene in ev'ry face appear.
 For this are various penances enjoind;
 And some are hung to bleach upon the wind,
 Some plung'd in waters, others purg'd in
 fires,
 Till all the dregs are drain'd, and all the rust expires.
 All have their manes, and those manes
 bear:
 The few, so cleans'd, to these abodes repair,
 And breathe, in ample fields, the soft Elysian air.
 Then are they happy, when by length of time
 The scurf is worn away of each committed crime;¹⁰¹⁰
 No speck is left of their habitual stains,
 But the pure ether of the soul remains.
 But, when a thousand rolling years are past,
 (So long their punishments and penance
 last,)
 Whole droves of minds are, by the driving
 god,
 Compell'd to drink the deep Lethæan flood,
 In large forgetful draughts to steep the
 cares
 Of their past labors, and their irksome years,
 That, unrememb'ring of its former pain,
 The soul may suffer mortal flesh again."¹⁰²⁰
 Thus having said, the father spirit leads The priestess and his son thro' swarms of shades,
 And takes a rising ground, from thence to
 see

The long procession of his progeny.
 "Survey," pursued the sire, "this airy
 throng,
 As, offer'd to thy view, they pass along.
 These are th' Italian names, which fate will
 join
 With ours, and graff upon the Trojan line.
 Observe the youth who first appears in
 sight,
 And holds the nearest station to the light,
 Already seems to snuff the vital air,¹⁰³¹
 And leans just forward, on a shining spear:
 Silvius is he, thy last-begotten race,
 But first in order sent, to fill thy place;
 An Alban name, but mix'd with Dardan
 blood,
 Born in the covert of a shady wood:
 Him fair Lavinia, thy surviving wife,
 Shall breed in groves, to lead a solitary life.
 In Alba he shall fix his royal seat,
 And, born a king, a race of kings beget.¹⁰⁴⁰
 Then Procas, honor of the Trojan name,
 Capys, and Numitor, of endless fame.
 A second Silvius after these appears;
 Silvius Æneas, for thy name he bears;
 For arms and justice equally renown'd,
 Who, late restor'd, in Alba shall be crown'd.
 How great they look! how vig'rously they
 wield
 Their weighty lances, and sustain the shield!
 But they, who crown'd with oaken wreaths
 appear,
 Shall Gabian walls and strong Fidenæ rear;
 Nomentum, Bola, with Pometia, found;¹⁰⁵¹
 And raise Collatian tow'rs on rocky ground.
 All these shall then be towns of mighty
 fame,
 Tho' now they lie obscure, and lands without a name.
 See Romulus the great, born to restore
 The crown that once his injur'd grandsire
 wore.
 This prince a priestess of your blood shall
 bear,
 And like his sire in arms he shall appear.
 Two rising crests his royal head adorn;
 Born from a god, himself to godhead born:
 His sire already signs him for the skies,¹⁰⁶¹
 And marks the seat amidst the deities.
 Auspicious chief! thy race, in times to come,
 Shall spread the conquests of imperial Rome —
 Rome, whose ascending tow'rs shall heav'n
 invade,
 Involving earth and ocean in her shade;

High as the Mother of the Gods in place,
And proud, like her, of an immortal race.
Then, when in pomp she makes the Phrygian round,

With golden turrets on her temples crown'd; 1070

A hundred gods her sweeping train supply;
Her offspring all, and all command the sky.

"Now fix your sight, and stand intent, to see

Your Roman race, and Julian progeny.
The mighty Cæsar waits his vital hour,
Impatient for the world, and grasps his promis'd pow'r.

But next behold the youth of form divine,
Cæsar himself, exalted in his line;

Augustus, promis'd oft, and long foretold,
Sent to the realm that Saturn rul'd of old; 1080

Born to restore a better age of gold.

Afric and India shall his pow'r obey;

He shall extend his propagated sway

Beyond the solar year, without the starry way,

Where Atlas turns the rolling heav'n's around,

And his broad shoulders with their lights are crown'd.

At his foreseen approach, already quake

The Caspian kingdoms and Mæotian lake:

Their seers behold the tempest from afar,

And threat'ning oracles denounce the war.

Nile hears him knocking at his sev'nfold gates, 1091

And seeks his hidden spring, and fears his nephew's fates.

Nor Hercules more lands or labors knew,

Not tho' the brazen-footed hind he slew,

Freed Erymanthus from the foaming boar,

And dipp'd his arrows in Lernæan gore;

Nor Bacchus, turning from his Indian war,

By tigers drawn triumphant in his car,

From Nisus' top descending on the plains,

With curling vines around his purple reins.

And doubt we yet thro' dangers to pursue 1101

The paths of honor, and a crown in view?

But what's the man, who from afar appears?

His head with olive crown'd, his hand a censer bears.

His hoary beard and holy vestments bring

His lost idea back: I know the Roman king.

He shall to peaceful Rome new laws ordain,

Call'd from his mean abode a scepter to sustain.

Him Tullus next in dignity succeeds,
An active prince, and prone to martial deeds.
He shall his troops for fighting fields prepare, 1111

Disus'd to toils, and triumphs of the war.
By dint of sword his crown he shall increase,

And scour his armor from the rust of peace.

Whom Ancus follows, with a fawning air,

But vain within, and proudly popular.

Next view the Tarquin kings, th' avenging sword

Of Brutus, justly drawn, and Rome restor'd.

He first renews the rods and ax severe, 1119

And gives the consuls royal robes to wear.

His sons, who seek the tyrant to sustain,

And long for arbitrary lords again,

With ignominy scourg'd, in open sight,

He dooms to death deserv'd, asserting public right.

Unhappy man, to break the pious laws

Of nature, pleading in his children's cause!

Howe'er the doubtful fact is understood,

'Tis love of honor, and his country's good:

The consul, not the father, sheds the blood.

Behold Torquatus the same track pursue;

And, next, the two devoted Decii view: 1131

The Drusian line, Camillus loaded home

With standards well redeem'd, and foreign foes o'ercome.

The pair you see in equal armor shine,

Now, friends below, in close embraces join;

But, when they leave the shady realms of night,

And, cloth'd in bodies, breathe your upper light,

With mortal hate each other shall pursue:

What wars, what wounds, what slaughter shall ensue!

From Alpine heights the father first descends; 1140

His daughter's husband in the plain attends:

His daughter's husband arms his eastern friends.

Embrace again, my sons, be foes no more;

Nor stain your country with her children's gore!

And thou, the first, lay down thy lawless claim,

Thou, of my blood, who bear'st the Julian name!

Another comes, who shall in triumph ride,

And to the Capitol his chariot guide,

From conquer'd Corinth, rich with Grecian spoils.

And yet another, fam'd for warlike toils,
On Argos shall impose the Roman laws, ¹¹⁵¹
And on the Greeks revenge the Trojan cause;
Shall drag in chains their Achillean race;
Shall vindicate his ancestors' disgrace, }
And Pallas, for her violated place. }
Great Cato there, for gravity renown'd,
And conquer'ing Cossus goes with laurels crown'd.

Who can omit the Gracchi? who declare
The Scipios' worth, those thunderbolts of war,

The double bane of Carthage? Who can see
Without esteem for virtuous poverty, ¹¹⁶¹
Severe Fabricius, or can cease t'admire
The plowman consul in his coarse attire?
Tir'd as I am, my praise the Fabii claim;
And thou, great hero, greatest of thy name,
Ordain'd in war to save the sinking state,
And, by delays, to put a stop to fate!
Let others better mold the running mass
Of metals, and inform the breathing brass, }
And soften into flesh a marble face; ¹¹⁷⁰ }
Plead better at the bar; describe the skies,
And when the stars descend, and when they rise.

But, Rome, 't is thine alone, with awful sway,
To rule mankind, and make the world obey,
Disposing peace and war thy own majestic way;
To tame the proud, the fetter'd slave to free:

These are imperial arts, and worthy thee."

He paus'd; and, while with wond'ring eyes they view'd

The passing spirits, thus his speech renew'd:
"See great Marcellus! how, untir'd in toils.
He moves with manly grace, how rich with regal spoils!" ¹¹⁸¹

He, when his country, threaten'd with alarms,

Requires his courage and his conquer'ing arms,

Shall more than once the Punic bands affright;

Shall kill the Gaulish king in single fight;
Then to the Capitol in triumph move,
And the third spoils shall grace Feretrian Jove."

Æneas here beheld, of form divine,
A godlike youth in glitt'ring armor shine,

With great Marcellus keeping equal pace;
But gloomy were his eyes, dejected was his face. ¹¹⁹¹

He saw, and, wond'ring, ask'd his airy guide,
What and of whence was he, who press'd the hero's side:

"His son, or one of his illustrious name?
How like the former, and almost the same!
Observe the crowds that compass him around;

All gaze, and all admire, and raise a shouting sound:

But hov'ring mists around his brows are spread,

And night, with sable shades, involves his head."

"Seek not to know," the ghost replied with tears, ¹²⁰⁰

"The sorrows of thy sons in future years.
This youth (the blissful vision of a day)
Shall just be shown on earth, and snatch'd away.

The gods too high had rais'd the Roman state,

Were but their gifts as permanent as great.
What groans of men shall fill the Martian field!

How fierce a blaze his flaming pile shall yield!

What fun'ral pomp shall floating Tiber see,
When, rising from his bed, he views the sad solemnity!" ¹²⁰⁹

No youth shall equal hopes of glory give,
No youth afford so great a cause to grieve;
The Trojan honor, and the Roman boast,
Admir'd when living, and ador'd when lost!
Mirror of ancient faith in early youth!

Undaunted worth, inviolable truth!

No foe, unpunish'd, in the fighting field
Shall dare thee, foot to foot, with sword and shield;

Much less in arms oppose thy matchless force,

When thy sharp spurs shall urge thy foaming horse.

Ah! couldst thou break thro' fate's severe decree, ¹²²⁰

A new Marcellus shall arise in thee!

Full canisters of fragrant lilies bring,
Mix'd with the purple roses of the spring;

Let me with fun'ral flow'rs his body strow;
This gift which parents to their children owe,

This unavailing gift, at least, I may bestow!"

Thus having said, he led the hero round
 The confines of the blest Elysian ground;
 Which when Anchises to his son had shown,
 And fir'd his mind to mount the promis'd throne, ¹²³⁰
 He tells the future wars, ordain'd by fate;
 The strength and customs of the Latian
 state;
 The prince, and people; and forearms his
 care
 With rules, to push his fortune, or to bear.
 Two gates the silent house of Sleep
 adorn;
 Of polish'd iv'ry this, that of transparent
 horn:
 True visions thro' transparent horn arise;
 Thro' polish'd iv'ry pass deluding lies.
 Of various things discoursing as he pass'd,
 Anchises hither bends his steps at last. ¹²⁴⁰
 Then, thro' the gate of iv'ry, he dismiss'd
 His valiant offspring and divining guest.
 Straight to the ships Æneas took his way, Embark'd his men, and skimm'd along
 the sea,
 Still coasting, till he gain'd Cajeta's bay. }
 At length on oozy ground his galleys moor;
 Their heads are turn'd to sea, their sterns to shore.

THE SEVENTH BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

King Latinus entertains Æneas, and promises him his only daughter, Lavinia, the heiress of his crown. Turnus, being in love with her, favor'd by her mother, and stirr'd up by Juno and Alecto, breaks the treaty which was made, and engages in his quarrel Mezentius, Camilla, Messapus, and many others of the neighboring princes; whose forces, and the names of their commanders, are here particularly related.

AND thou, O matron of immortal fame,
 Here dying, to the shore hast left thy name;
 Cajeta still the place is call'd from thee,
 The nurse of great Æneas' infancy.
 Here rest thy bones in rich Hesperia's
 plains;
 Thy name ('t is all a ghost can have) remains.
 Now, when the prince her fun'ral rites had paid,

He plow'd the Tyrrhene seas with sails dis-
 play'd.
 From land a gentle breeze arose by night, Serenely shone the stars, the moon was bright, }
 And the sea trembled with her silver ¹⁰
 light.
 Now near the shelves of Circe's shores they
 run,
 (Circe the rich, the daughter of the Sun,)
 A dang'rous coast: the goddess wastes her days
 In joyous songs; the rocks resound her lays:
 In spinning, or the loom, she spends the
 night,
 And cedar brands supply her father's light.
 From hence were heard, rebellowing to the
 main,
 The roars of lions that refuse the chain,
 The grunts of bristled boars, and groans of bears, ²⁰
 And herds of howling wolves that stun the sailors' ears.
 These from their caverns, at the close of
 night,
 Fill the sad isle with horror and affright.
 Darkling they mourn their fate, whom Circe's pow'r,
 (That watch'd the moon and planetary hour,)
 With words and wicked herbs from human-
 kind
 Had alter'd, and in brutal shapes confin'd.
 Which monsters lest the Trojans' pious host Should bear, or touch upon th' enchanted
 coast,
 Propitious Neptune steer'd their course by night ³⁰
 With rising gales that sped their happy
 flight.
 Supplied with these, they skim the sounding shore,
 And hear the swelling surges vainly roar.
 Now, when the rosy morn began to rise,
 And wav'd her saffron streamer thro' the
 skies;
 When Thetis blush'd in purple not her own,
 And from her face the breathing winds were blown,
 A sudden silence sate upon the sea,
 And sweeping oars, with struggling, urge
 their way.
 The Trojan, from the main, beheld a wood, ⁴⁰
 Which thick with shades and a brown horror stood:

Betwixt the trees the Tiber took his course,
With whirlpools dimpled; and with downward force,

That drove the sand along, he took his way,
And roll'd his yellow billows to the sea.

About him, and above, and round the wood,
The birds that haunt the borders of his flood,

That bath'd within, or basked upon his side,
To tuneful songs their narrow throats applied.

The captain gives command; the joyful train⁵⁰

Glide thro' the gloomy shade, and leave the main.

Now, Erato, thy poet's mind inspire,
And fill his soul with thy celestial fire!
Relate what Latium was; her ancient kings;
Declare the past and present state of things,
When first the Trojan fleet Ausonia sought,
And how the rivals lov'd, and how they fought.

These are my theme, and how the war began,

And how concluded by the godlike man:
For I shall sing of battles, blood, and rage,
Which princes and their people did engage;
And haughty souls, that, mov'd with mutual hate,⁶²

In fighting fields pursued and found their fate;

That rous'd the Tyrrhene realm with loud alarms,

And peaceful Italy involv'd in arms.
A larger scene of action is display'd;
And, rising hence, a greater work is weigh'd.

Latinus, old and mild, had long possess'd
The Latian scepter, and his people blest:
His father Faunus; a Laurentian dame⁷⁰
His mother; fair Marica was her name.
But Faunus came from Picus: Picus drew
His birth from Saturn, if records be true.
Thus King Latinus, in the third degree,
Had Saturn author of his family.

But this old peaceful prince, as Heav'n decreed,

Was blest with no male issue to succeed:
His sons in blooming youth were snatch'd
by fate;

One only daughter heir'd the royal state.
Fir'd with her love, and with ambition led,⁸⁰

The neighb'ring princes court her nuptial bed.

Among the crowd, but far above the rest,

Young Turnus to the beauteous maid address'd.

Turnus, for high descent and graceful mien,
Was first, and favor'd by the Latian queen;
With him she strove to join Lavinia's hand,
But dire portents the purpos'd match withstand.

Deep in the palace, of long growth, there stood

A laurel's trunk, a venerable wood;
Where rites divine were paid; whose holy hair⁹⁰

Was kept and cut with superstitious care.
This plant Latinus, when his town he wall'd,

Then found, and from the tree Laurentum call'd;

And last, in honor of his new abode,
He vow'd the laurel to the laurel's god.
It happen'd once (a boding prodigy!)
A swarm of bees, that cut the liquid sky, (Unknown from whence they took their airy flight,)

Upon the topmost branch in clouds alight;
There with their clasping feet together clung,¹⁰⁰

And a long cluster from the laurel hung.
An ancient augur prophesied from hence:
"Behold on Latian shores a foreign prince!

From the same parts of heav'n his navy stands,

To the same parts on earth; his army lands;

The town he conquers, and the tow'r commands."

Yet more, when fair Lavinia fed the fire
Before the gods, and stood beside her sire,
(Strange to relate!) the flames, involv'd in smoke

Of incense, from the sacred altar broke,¹¹⁰
Caught her dishevel'd hair and rich attire;
Her crown and jewels crackled in the fire:
From thence the fuming trail began to spread,

And lambent glories danc'd about her head.
This new portent the seer with wonder views,

Then pausing, thus his prophecy renews:
"The nymph, who scatters flaming fires around,

Shall shine with honor, shall herself be crown'd;

But, caus'd by her irrevocable fate,
War shall the country waste, and change the state."¹²⁰

Latinus, frighted with this dire ostent,
For counsel to his father Faunus went,
And sought the shades renown'd for prophecy
Which near Albunea's sulph'rous fountain
lie.

To these the Latian and the Sabine land Fly, when distress'd, and thence relief demand.

The priest on skins of off'rings takes his
ease,

And nightly visions in his slumber sees;
A swarm of thin aërial shapes appears,
And, flutt'ring round his temples, deafs his ears: ¹³⁰

These he consults, the future fates to know,
From pow'rs above, and from the fiends
below.

Here, for the gods' advice, Latinus flies,
Off'ring a hundred sheep for sacrifice:
Their woolly fleeces, as the rites requir'd,
He laid beneath him, and to rest retir'd.
No sooner were his eyes in slumber bound,
When, from above, a more than mortal
sound

Invades his ears; and thus the vision
spoke:

"Seek not, my seed, in Latian bands to yoke ¹⁴⁰

Our fair Lavinia, nor the gods provoke.
A foreign son upon thy shore descends,
Whose martial fame from pole to pole extends.

His race, in arms and arts of peace re-
nown'd,
Not Latium shall contain, nor Europe
bound:

'Tis theirs whate'er the sun surveys
around."

These answers, in the silent night receiv'd,
The king himself divulg'd, the land be-liev'd:

The fame thro' all the neighb'ring nations
flew,

When now the Trojan navy was in view. ¹⁵⁰

Beneath a shady tree, the hero spread
His table on the turf, with cakes of bread;
And, with his chiefs, on forest fruits he
fed.

They sate; and, (not without the god's command,)

Their homely fare dispatch'd, the hungry
band

Invade their trenchers next, and soon devour,

To mend the scanty meal, their cakes of flour.

Ascanius this observ'd, and smiling said:
"See, we devour the plates on which we
fed."

The speech had omen, that the Trojan race Should find repose, and this the time and place. ¹⁶¹

Æneas took the word, and thus replies,
Confessing fate with wonder in his eyes:
"All hail, O earth! all hail, my household
gods!

Behold the destin'd place of your abodes!
For thus Anchises prophesied of old,
And this our fatal place of rest foretold:
'When, on a foreign shore, instead of meat,
By famine forc'd, your trenchers you shall eat,

Then ease your weary Trojans will attend,
And the long labors of your voyage end. ¹⁷¹
Remember on that happy coast to build,
And with a trench inclose the fruitful field.'
This was that famine, this the fatal place
Which ends the wand'ring of our exil'd
race.

Then, on to-morrow's dawn, your care employ,

To search the land, and where the cities
lie,

And what the men; but give this day to
joy.

Now pour to Jove; and, after Jove is blest,
Call great Anchises to the genial feast: ¹⁸⁰
Crown high the goblets with a cheerful draught;

Enjoy the present hour; adjourn the future
thought."

Thus having said, the hero bound his
brows

With leafy branches, then perform'd his
vows;

Adoring first the genius of the place,
Then Earth, the mother of the heav'nly
race,

The nymphs, and native godheads yet un-
known,

And Night, and all the stars that gild her
sable throne,

And ancient Cybel, and Idæan Jove,
And last his sire below, and mother queen above. ¹⁹⁰

Then heav'n's high monarch thunder'd
thrice aloud,

And thrice he shook aloft a golden cloud.
Soon thro' the joyful camp a rumor flew,

The time was come their city to renew.
Then ev'ry brow with cheerful green is
crown'd,
The feasts are doubled, and the bowls go
round.

When next the rosy morn disclos'd the
day,
The scouts to sev'ral parts divide their way,
To learn the natives' names, their towns
explore,
The coasts and trendings of the crooked
shore: ²⁰⁰

Here Tiber flows, and here Numicus stands;
Here warlike Latins hold the happy lands.
The pious chief, who sought by peaceful ways

To found his empire, and his town to raise,
A hundred youths from all his train selects,
And to the Latian court their course directs,
(The spacious palace where their prince resides,)

And all their heads with wreaths of olive hides.

They go commission'd to require a peace,
And carry presents to procure access. ²¹⁰
Thus while they speed their pace, the prince designs

His new-elected seat, and draws the lines.
The Trojans round the place a rampire cast,
And palisades about the trenches plac'd.

Meantime the train, proceeding on their
way,

From far the town and lofty tow'rs survey;
At length approach the walls. Without the
gate,

They see the boys and Latian youth debate
The martial prizes on the dusty plain:
Some drive the cars, and some the coursers
rein; ²²⁰

Some bend the stubborn bow for victory,
And some with darts their active sinews
try.

A posting messenger, dispatch'd from
hence,

Of this fair troop advis'd their aged prince,
That foreign men of mighty stature came;
Uncouth their habit, and unknown their
name.

The king ordains their entrance, and ascends
His regal seat, surrounded by his friends.

The palace built by Picus, vast and proud,
Supported by a hundred pillars stood, ²³⁰
And round incompass'd with a rising
wood.

The pile o'erlook'd the town, and drew the
sight;

Surpris'd at once with reverence and de-
light.

There kings receiv'd the marks of sov'reign pow'r;
In state the monarchs march'd; the lictors bore

Their awful axes and the rods before.

Here the tribunal stood, the house of pray'r,
And here the sacred senators repair;

All at large tables, in long order set,
A ram their off'ring, and a ram their meat.
Above the portal, carv'd in cedar wood, ²⁴¹
Plac'd in their ranks, their godlike grand-sires stood;

Old Saturn, with his crooked scythe, on
high;

And Italus, that led the colony;
And ancient Janus, with his double face,
And bunch of keys, the porter of the place.

There good Sabinus, planter of the vines,
On a short pruning hook his head reclines,
And studiously surveys his gen'rous
wines;

Then warlike kings, who for their country fought, ²⁵⁰

And honorable wounds from battle brought.
Around the posts hung helmets, darts,

and spears,
And captive chariots, axes, shields, and bars,

And broken beaks of ships, the trophies of their wars.

Above the rest, as chief of all the band,
Was Picus plac'd, a buckler in his hand;
His other wav'd a long divining wand.

Girt in his Gabin gown the hero sate,
Yet could not with his art avoid his fate:
For Circe long had lov'd the youth in vain, ²⁶⁰

Till love, refus'd, converted to disdain:
Then, mixing pow'rful herbs, with magic

art,
She chang'd his form, who could not change
his heart;

Constrain'd him in a bird, and made him fly,
With party-color'd plumes, a chatt'ring pie.

In this high temple, on a chair of state,
The seat of audience, old Latinus sate;
Then gave admission to the Trojan train;
And thus with pleasing accents he began:
"Tell me, ye Trojans, for that name you own, ²⁷⁰

Nor is your course upon our coasts unknown —

Say what you seek, and whither were you bound:

Were you by stress of weather cast aground?

(Such dangers as on seas are often seen,
And oft befall to miserable men,)

Or come, your shipping in our ports to lay,
Spent and disabled in so long a way?

Say what you want: the Latians you shall find

Not forc'd to goodness, but by will inclin'd;
For, since the time of Saturn's holy reign,
His hospitable customs we retain. ²⁸¹

I call to mind (but time the tale has worn)
Th' Arunci told, that Dardanus, tho' born
On Latian plains, yet sought the Phrygian shore,

And Samothracia, Samos call'd before.
From Tuscan Coritum he claim'd his birth;
But after, when exempt from mortal earth,
From thence ascended to his kindred skies,
A god, and, as a god, augments their sacrifice."

He said. Ilioneus made this reply: ²⁹⁰
"O king, of Faunus' royal family!

Nor wintry winds to Latium forc'd our way,

Nor did the stars our wand'ring course betray.

Willing we sought your shores; and, hither bound,

The port, so long desir'd, at length we found;

From our sweet homes and ancient realms expell'd;

Great as the greatest that the sun beheld.
The god began our line, who rules above;
And, as our race, our king descends from Jove:

And hither are we come, by his command,
To crave admission in your happy land. ³⁰¹

How dire a tempest, from Mycenæ pour'd,
Our plains, our temples, and our town devour'd;

What was the waste of war, what fierce alarms

Shook Asia's crown with European arms;
Ev'n such have heard, if any such there be,
Whose earth is bounded by the frozen sea;
And such as, born beneath the burning sky
And sultry sun, betwixt the tropics lie.

From that dire deluge, thro' the wat'ry waste, ³¹⁰

Such length of years, such various perils past,)

At last escap'd, to Latium we repair,
To beg what you without your want }
may spare:

The common water, and the common air;
Sheds which ourselves will build, and mean abodes,

Fit to receive and serve our banish'd gods.
Nor our admission shall your realm disgrace,

Nor length of time our gratitude efface.
Besides, what endless honor you shall gain,
To save and shelter Troy's unhappy train!
Now, by my sov'reign, and his fate, I swear, ³²¹

Renown'd for faith in peace, for force in war;

Oft our alliance other lands desir'd,
And, what we seek of you, of us requir'd.
Despise not then, that in our hands we bear
These holy boughs, and sue with words of pray'r.

Fate and the gods, by their supreme command,

Have doom'd our ships to seek the Latian land.

To these abodes our fleet Apollo sends; ³²⁹
Here Dardanus was born, and hither tends;
Where Tuscan Tiber rolls with rapid force,
And where Numicus opes his holy source.

Besides, our prince presents, with his request,

Some small remains of what his sire possess'd.

This golden charger, snatch'd from burning Troy,

Anchises did in sacrifice employ;
This royal robe and this tiara wore
Old Priam, and this golden scepter bore
In full assemblies, and in solemn games;
These purple vests were weav'd by Dardan dames." ³⁴⁰

Thus while he spoke, Latinus roll'd around

His eyes, and fix'd a while upon the ground.
Intent he seem'd, and anxious in his breast;
Not by the scepter mov'd, or kingly vest,
But pond'ring future things of wondrous weight;

Succession, empire, and his daughter's fate.
On these he mus'd within his thoughtful mind,

And then revolv'd what Faunus had divin'd.
This was the foreign prince, by fate decreed

To share his scepter, and Lavinia's bed; ³⁵⁰
This was the race that sure portents fore-
shew

To sway the world, and land and sea subdue.
At length he rais'd his cheerful head, and
spoke:

"The pow'rs," said he, "the pow'rs we both
invoke,

To you, and yours, and mine, propitious be,
And firm our purpose with their augury!
Have what you ask; your presents I receive;
Land, where and when you please, with ample leave;

Partake and use my kingdom as your own;
All shall be yours, while I command the crown: ³⁶⁰

And, if my wish'd alliance please your king, Tell him he should not send the peace, but
bring.

Then let him not a friend's embraces fear;
The peace is made when I behold him here.
Besides this answer, tell my royal guest,
I add to his commands my own request:
One only daughter heirs my crown and
state,

Whom not our oracles, nor Heav'n, nor fate,
Nor frequent prodigies, permit to join
With any native of th' Ausonian line. ³⁷⁰
A foreign son-in-law shall come from far (Such is our doom), a chief renown'd in war,
Whose race shall bear aloft the Latian name,
And thro' the conquer'd world diffuse our
fame.

Himself to be the man the fates require,
I firmly judge, and, what I judge, desire."

He said, and then on each bestow'd a steed.
Three hundred horses, in high stables fed.
Stood ready, shining all, and smoothly
dress'd:

Of these he chose the fairest and the best, ³⁸⁰
To mount the Trojan troop. At his command

The steeds caparison'd with purple stand,
With golden trappings, glorious to behold,
And champ betwixt their teeth the foaming
gold.

Then to his absent guest the king decreed
A pair of coursers born of heav'nly breed,
Who from their nostrils breath'd ethereal
fire;

Whom Circe stole from her celestial sire,
By substituting mares produc'd on earth,
Whose wombs conceiv'd a more than mortal birth. ³⁹⁰

These draw the chariot which Latinus sends,

And the rich present to the prince com-
mends.

Sublime on stately steeds the Trojans borne,
To their expecting lord with peace return.

But jealous Juno, from Pachynus' height,
As she from Argos took her airy flight,
Beheld with envious eyes this hateful sight.
She saw the Trojan and his joyful train
Descend upon the shore, desert the main,
Design a town, and, with unhop'd success, ⁴⁰⁰

Th' ambassadors return with promis'd peace.
Then, pierc'd with pain, she shook her haughty head,
Sigh'd from her inward soul, and thus she
said:

"O hated offspring of my Phrygian foes!
O fates of Troy, which Juno's fates oppose!
Could they not fall unpitied on the plain,
But slain revive, and, taken, scape again?
When execrable Troy in ashes lay,
Thro' fires and swords and seas they forc'd their way. ⁴⁰⁹

Then vanquish'd Juno must in vain contend,
Her rage disarm'd, her empire at an end.
Breathless and tir'd, is all my fury spent?
Or does my glutted spleen at length relent?
As if 't were little from their town to chase,
I thro' the seas pursued their exil'd race;
Ingag'd the heav'ns, oppos'd the stormy
main;

But billows roar'd, and tempests rag'd in
vain.

What have my Scyllas and my Syrtes done,
When these they overpass, and those they shun? ⁴¹⁹

On Tiber's shores they land, secure of fate,
Triumphant o'er the storms and Juno's hate.
Mars could in mutual blood the Centaurs
bathe,

And Jove himself gave way to Cynthia's wrath,

Who sent the tusky boar to Calydon;
(What great offense had either people
done?)

But I, the consort of the Thunderer,
Have wag'd a long and unsuccessful war,
With various arts and arms in vain have toil'd, ⁴²⁸

And by a mortal man at length am foil'd.
If native pow'r prevail not, shall I doubt
To seek for needful succor from without?
If Jove and Heav'n my just desires deny, Hell shall the pow'r of Heav'n and Jove
supply.

Grant that the Fates have firm'd, by their decree,

The Trojan race to reign in Italy;

At least I can defer the nuptial day,

And with protracted wars the peace delay:

With blood the dear alliance shall be bought,

And both the people near destruction brought;

So shall the son-in-law and father join, ⁴⁴⁰
With ruin, war, and waste of either line.

O fatal maid, thy marriage is endow'd

With Phrygian, Latian, and Rutulian blood !

Bellona leads thee to thy lover's hand; }

Another queen brings forth another brand, }

To burn with foreign fires another land ! }

A second Paris, diff'ring but in name,

Shall fire his country with a second flame."

Thus having said, she sinks beneath the ground,

With furious haste, and shoots the Stygian sound, ⁴⁵⁰

To rouse Alecto from th' infernal seat

Of her dire sisters, and their dark retreat.

This Fury, fit for her intent, she chose;

One who delights in wars and human woes.

Ev'n Pluto hates his own misshapen race;

Her sister Furies fly her hideous face;

So frightful are the forms the monster takes,

So fierce the hissings of her speckled snakes.

Her Juno finds, and thus inflames her spite:

"O virgin daughter of eternal Night, ⁴⁶⁰

Give me this once thy labor, to sustain

My right, and execute my just disdain.

Let not the Trojans, with a feign'd pretense

Of proffer'd peace, delude the Latian prince.

Expel from Italy that odious name,

And let not Juno suffer in her fame.

'Tis thine to ruin realms, o'erturn a state, }

Betwixt the dearest friends to raise de- } bate,

And kindle kindred blood to mutual hate. }

Thy hand o'er towns the fun'ral torch dis- } plays, ⁴⁷⁰

And forms a thousand ills ten thousand

ways.

Now shake, from out thy fruitful breast, the seeds

Of envy, discord, and of cruel deeds:

Confound the peace establish'd, and prepare

Their souls to hatred, and their hands to

war."

Smear'd as she was with black Gorgonian

blood,

The Fury sprang above the Stygian flood;
And on her wicker wings, sublime thro'
night,

She to the Latian palace took her flight:

There sought the queen's apartment, stood before ⁴⁸⁰

The peaceful threshold, and besieg'd the
door.

Restless Amata lay, her swelling breast }

Fir'd with disdain for Turnus dispossess'd, }

And the new nuptials of the Trojan guest. }

From her black bloody locks the Fury
shakes

Her darling plague, the fav'rite of her
snakes;

With her full force she threw the pois'nous
dart,

And fix'd it deep within Amata's heart,

That, thus envenom'd, she might kindle
rage,

And sacrifice to strife her house and husband's age. ⁴⁹⁰

Unseen, unfelt, the fiery serpent skims

Betwixt her linen and her naked limbs;

His baleful breath inspiring, as he glides,

Now like a chain around her neck he rides,

Now like a fillet to her head repairs,

And with his circling volumes folds her hairs.

At first the silent venom slid with ease,

And seiz'd her cooler senses by degrees;

Then, ere th' infected mass was fir'd too
far,

In plaintive accents she began the war, ⁵⁰⁰

And thus bespoke her husband: "Shall,"
she said,

"A wand'ring prince enjoy Lavinia's bed ?

If nature plead not in a parent's heart,

Pity my tears, and pity her desert.

I know, my dearest lord, the time will come,

You would, in vain, reverse your cruel
doom;

The faithless pirate soon will set to sea,

And bear the royal virgin far away !

A guest like him, a Trojan guest before, }

In shew of friendship sought the Spartan } shore, ⁵¹⁰

And ravish'd Helen from her husband }

bore.

Think on a king's inviolable word;

And think on Turnus, her once plighted
lord:

To this false foreigner you give your throne,

And wrong a friend, a kinsman, and a son.

Resume your ancient care; and, if the god

Your sire, and you, resolve on foreign blood,
Know all are foreign, in a larger sense,
Not born your subjects, or deriv'd from hence. ⁵¹⁹

Then, if the line of Turnus you retrace,
He springs from Inachus of Argive race."

But when she saw her reasons idly spent,
And could not move him from his fix'd in-
tent,

She flew to rage; for now the snake possess'd
Her vital parts, and poison'd all her breast;
She raves, she runs with a distracted pace,
And fills with horrid howls the public place.
And, as young striplings whip the top for
sport,

On the smooth pavement of an empty court;
The wooden engine flies and whirls about, ⁵³⁰
Admir'd, with clamors, of the beardless rout;
They lash aloud; each other they provoke,
And lend their little souls at ev'ry stroke:
Thus fares the queen; and thus her fury
blows

Amidst the crowd, and kindles as she goes.
Nor yet content, she strains her malice
more,

And adds new ills to those contriv'd before:
She flies the town, and, mixing with a throng
Of madding matrons, bears the bride along, Wand'ring thro' woods and wilds, and devious ways, ⁵⁴⁰

And with these arts the Trojan match delays.

She feign'd the rites of Bacchus; cried aloud,
And to the buxom god the virgin vow'd.
"Evoe! O Bacchus!" thus began the song;
And "Evoe!" answer'd all the female
throng.

"O virgin! worthy thee alone!" she cried;
"O worthy thee alone!" the crew replied.
"For thee she feeds her hair, she leads thy
dance,

And with thy winding ivy wreathes her lance."

Like fury seiz'd the rest; the progress known, ⁵⁵⁰

All seek the mountains, and forsake the
town:

All, clad in skins of beasts, the jav'lin
bear,

Give to the wanton winds their flowing
hair,

And shrieks and shoutings rend the suf-f'ring air.

The queen herself, inspir'd with rage divine,
Shook high above her head a flaming pine;

Then roll'd her haggard eyes around the
throng,
And sung, in Turnus' name, the nuptial
song:

"Io, ye Latian dames! if any here
Hold your unhappy queen, Amata, dear; ⁵⁶⁰
If there be here," she said, "who dare maintain

My right, nor think the name of mother
vain;

Unbind your fillets, loose your flowing hair,
And orgies and nocturnal rites prepare."

Amata's breast the Fury thus invades,
And fires with rage, amid the sylvan shades;
Then, when she found her venom spread so
far,

The royal house embroil'd in civil war, Rais'd on her dusky wings, she cleaves the
skies,

And seeks the palace where young Turnus lies. ⁵⁷⁰

His town, as fame reports, was built of old
By Danae, pregnant with almighty gold,
Who fled her father's rage, and, with a
train

Of following Argives, thro' the stormy
main,

Driv'n by the southern blasts, was fated here to reign.

'T was Ardua once; now Ardea's name it
bears;

Once a fair city, now consum'd with years.
Here, in his lofty palace, Turnus lay,
Betwixt the confines of the night and day,
Secure in sleep. The Fury laid aside ⁵⁸⁰
Her looks and limbs, and with new methods tried

The foulness of th' infernal form to hide.
Propp'd on a staff, she takes a trembling
mien:

Her face is furrow'd, and her front obscene;
Deep-dinted wrinkles on her cheek she
draws;

Sunk are her eyes, and toothless are her
jaws;

Her hoary hair with holy fillets bound,
Her temples with an olive wreath are crown'd.

Old Chalybe, who kept the sacred fane
Of Juno, now she seem'd, and thus began, ⁵⁹⁰

Appearing in a dream, to rouse the careless man:

"Shall Turnus then such endless toil sustain In fighting fields, and conquer towns in
vain?

Win, for a Trojan head to wear the prize,
Usurp thy crown, enjoy thy victories?
The bride and scepter which thy blood has
bought,
The king transfers; and foreign heirs are
sought.

Go now, deluded man, and seek again
New toils, new dangers, on the dusty plain.
Repel the Tuscan foes; their city seize; 600
Protect the Latians in luxurious ease.
This dream all-pow'rful Juno sends; I bear
Her mighty mandates, and her words you
hear.

Haste; arm your Ardeans; issue to the
plain;
With fate to friend, assault the Trojan
train:
Their thoughtless chiefs, their painted ships,
that lie

In Tiber's mouth, with fire and sword destroy.

The Latian king, unless he shall submit,
Own his old promise, and his new forget — Let him, in arms, the pow'r of Turnus
prove, 610

And learn to fear whom he disdains to love.
For such is Heav'n's command." The youthful prince

With scorn replied, and made this bold defense:

"You tell me, mother, what I knew before:
The Phrygian fleet is landed on the shore.
I neither fear nor will provoke the war;
My fate is Juno's most peculiar care.
But time has made you dote, and vainly tell
Of arms imagin'd in your lonely cell.
Go; be the temple and the gods your
care; 620

Permit to men the thought of peace and
war."

These haughty words Alecto's rage provoke,
And frighted Turnus trembled as she spoke.
Her eyes grow stiffen'd, and with sulphur
burn;

Her hideous looks and hellish form return;
Her curling snakes with hissings fill the
place,

And open all the furies of her face:
Then, darting fire from her malignant
eyes,

She cast him backward as he strove to
rise,
And, ling'ring, sought to frame some new
replies. 630

High on her head she rears two twisted
snakes;
Her chains she rattles, and her whip she
shakes;
And, churning bloody foam, thus loudly
speaks:

"Behold whom time has made to dote, and tell

Of arms imagin'd in her lonely cell!
Behold the Fates' infernal minister!
War, death, destruction, in my hand I bear."
Thus having said, her smold'ring torch,
impress'd

With her full force, she plung'd into his
breast.

Aghast he wak'd; and, starting from his
bed, 640

Cold sweat, in clammy drops, his limbs o'er-
spread.

"Arms! arms!" he cries: "my sword and shield prepare!"

He breathes defiance, blood, and mortal war.
So, when with crackling flames a caldron
fries,

The bubbling waters from the bottom rise:
Above the brims they force their fiery way;
Black vapors climb aloft, and cloud the day.

The peace polluted thus, a chosen band
He first commissions to the Latian land,
In threat'ning embassy; then rais'd the
rest, 650

To meet in arms th' intruding Trojan guest,
To force the foes from the Lavinian shore,
And Italy's indanger'd peace restore.

Himself alone an equal match he boasts,
To fight the Phrygian and Ausonian hosts.
The gods invok'd, the Rutuli prepare

Their arms, and warm each other to the
war.

His beauty these, and those his blooming
age,

The rest his house and his own fame ingage.

While Turnus urges thus his enterprise, 660

The Stygian Fury to the Trojans flies;
New frauds invents, and takes a steepy
stand,

Which overlooks the vale with wide command;

Where fair Ascanius and his youthful
train,

With horns and hounds, a hunting match
ordain,

And pitch their toils around the shady
plain.

The Fury fires the pack; they snuff, they vent,
 And feed their hungry nostrils with the scent.
 'T was of a well-grown stag, whose antlers rise
 High o'er his front; his beams invade the skies. 670
 From this light cause th' infernal maid prepares
 The country churls to mischief, hate, and wars.

The stately beast the two Tyrrhidæ bred,
 Snatch'd from his dam, and the tame youngling fed.

Their father Tyrrheus did his fodder bring,
 Tyrrheus, chief ranger to the Latian king:
 Their sister Silvia cherish'd with her care
 The little wanton, and did wreaths prepare
 To hang his budding horns, with ribbons tied

His tender neck, and comb'd his silken hide, 680

And bath'd his body. Patient of command
 In time he grew, and, growing us'd to hand,
 He waited at his master's board for food;
 Then sought his salvage kindred in the wood,

Where grazing all the day, at night he came

To his known lodgings, and his country dame.

This household beast, that us'd the woodland grounds,

Was view'd at first by the young hero's hounds,

As down the stream he swam, to seek retreat

In the cool waters, and to quench his heat. 690

Ascanius, young, and eager of his game,
 Soon bent his bow, uncertain in his aim;
 But the dire fiend the fatal arrow guides,
 Which pierc'd his bowels thro' his panting sides.

The bleeding creature issues from the floods,
 Possess'd with fear, and seeks his known abodes,
 His old familiar hearth and household gods. }

He falls; he fills the house with heavy groans,

Implores their pity, and his pain bemoans.
 Young Silvia beats her breast, and cries aloud 700

For succor from the clownish neighborhood:
 The churls assemble; for the fiend, who lay

In the close woody covert, urg'd their way.
 One with a brand yet burning from the flame,

Arm'd with a knotty club another came:
 Whate'er they catch or find, without their care,

Their fury makes an instrument of war.

Tyrrheus, the foster father of the beast,

Then clench'd a hatchet in his horny fist,

But held his hand from the descending stroke, 710

And left his wedge within the cloven oak,
 To whet their courage and their rage provoke. }

And now the goddess, exercis'd in ill,

Who watch'd an hour to work her impious will,

Ascends the roof, and to her crooked horn,
 Such as was then by Latian shepherds borne,

Adds all her breath: the rocks and woods around,

And mountains, tremble at th' infernal sound.

The sacred lake of Trivia from afar,

The Veline fountains, and sulphureous Nar, 720

Shake at the baleful blast, the signal of the war. }

Young mothers wildly stare, with fear possess'd,

And strain their helpless infants to their breast.

The clowns, a boist'rous, rude, ungovern'd crew,

With furious haste to the loud summons flew.

The pow'rs of Troy, then issuing on the plain,

With fresh recruits their youthful chief sustain:

Not theirs a raw and unexperienc'd train,

But a firm body of embattled men.

At first, while fortune favor'd neither side, 730

The fight with clubs and burning brands was tried;

But now, both parties reinforc'd, the fields
 Are bright with flaming swords and brazen shields.

A shining harvest either host displays,

And shoots against the sun with equal rays.

Thus, when a black-brow'd gust begins to rise,
 White foam at first on the curl'd ocean fries;
 Then roars the main, the billows mount the skies;
 Till, by the fury of the storm full blown,
 The muddy bottom o'er the clouds is thrown. ⁷⁴⁰
 First Almon falls, old Tyrrheus' eldest care,
 Pierc'd with an arrow from the distant war:
 Fix'd in his throat the flying weapon stood,
 And stopp'd his breath, and drank his vital blood.
 Huge heaps of slain around the body rise:
 Among the rest, the rich Galesus lies;
 A good old man, while peace he preach'd in vain,
 Amidst the madness of th' unruly train:
 Five herds, five bleating flocks, his pastures fill'd;
 His lands a hundred yoke of oxen till'd. ⁷⁵⁰
 Thus, while in equal scales their fortune stood,
 The Fury bath'd them in each other's blood;
 Then, having fix'd the fight, exulting flies,
 And bears fulfill'd her promise to the skies.
 To Juno thus she speaks: "Behold! 't is done,
 The blood already drawn, the war begun;
 The discord is complete; nor can they cease
 The dire debate, nor you command the peace.
 Now, since the Latian and the Trojan brood
 Have tasted vengeance and the sweets of blood; ⁷⁶⁰
 Speak, and my pow'r shall add this office more:
 The neighb'ring nations of th' Ausonian shore
 Shall hear the dreadful rumor, from afar,
 Of arm'd invasion, and embrace the war."
 Then Juno thus: "The grateful work is done,
 The seeds of discord sow'd, the war begun;
 Frauds, fears, and fury have possess'd the state,
 And fix'd the causes of a lasting hate.
 A bloody Hymen shall th' alliance join Betwixt the Trojan and Ausonian line: ⁷⁷⁰
 But thou with speed to night and hell repair;
 For not the gods, nor angry Jove, will bear
 Thy lawless wand'ring walks in upper air.

Leave what remains to me." Saturnia said:
 The sullen fiend her sounding wings display'd,
 Unwilling left the light, and sought the nether shade.
 In midst of Italy, well known to fame,
 There lies a lake (Amsanctus is the name)
 Below the lofty mounts: on either side
 Thick forests the forbidden entrance hide. ⁷⁸⁰
 Full in the center of the sacred wood
 An arm arises of the Stygian flood,
 Which, breaking from beneath with bellowing sound,
 Whirls the black waves and rattling stones around.
 Here Pluto pants for breath from out his cell,
 And opens wide the grinning jaws of hell.
 To this infernal lake the Fury flies;
 Here hides her hated head, and frees the lab'ring skies.
 Saturnian Juno now, with double care,
 Attends the fatal process of the war. ⁷⁹⁰
 The clowns, return'd, from battle bear the slain,
 Implore the gods, and to their king complain.
 The corps of Almon and the rest are shown;
 Shrieks, clamors, murmurs, fill the frightened town.
 Ambitious Turnus in the press appears,
 And, aggravating crimes, augments their fears;
 Proclaims his private injuries aloud,
 A solemn promise made, and disavow'd;
 A foreign son is sought, and a mix'd murder brood.
 Then they, whose mothers, frantic with their fear, ⁸⁰⁰
 In woods and wilds the flags of Bacchus bear,
 And lead his dances with dishevel'd hair,
 Increase the clamor, and the war demand,
 (Such was Amata's interest in the land,)
 Against the public sanctions of the peace,
 Against all omens of their ill success.
 With fates averse, the rout in arms resort,
 To force their monarch, and insult the court.
 But, like a rock unmov'd, a rock that braves
 The raging tempest and the rising waves — ⁸¹⁰

Propp'd on himself he stands; his solid
sides
Wash off the seaweeds, and the sounding
tides —

So stood the pious prince, unmov'd, and long Sustain'd the madness of the noisy throng.
But, when he found that Juno's pow'r prevail'd,

And all the methods of cool counsel fail'd,
He calls the gods to witness their offense,
Disclaims the war, asserts his innocence.

"Hurried by fate," he cries, "and borne
before

A furious wind, we leave the faithful
shore. 820

O more than madmen ! you yourselves shall
bear

The guilt of blood and sacrilegious war:
Thou, Turnus, shalt atone it by thy fate,
And pray to Heav'n for peace, but pray too
late.

For me, my stormy voyage at an end,
I to the port of death securely tend.
The fun'ral pomp which to your kings you pay,

Is all I want, and all you take away."
He said no more, but, in his walls confin'd, Shut out the woes which he too well
divin'd; 830

Nor with the rising storm would vainly
strive,

But left the helm, and let the vessel drive.

A solemn custom was observ'd of old,
Which Latium held, and now the Romans
hold,

Their standard when in fighting fields they
rear

Against the fierce Hyrcanians, or declare
The Scythian, Indian, or Arabian war; }
Or from the boasting Parthians would regain

Their eagles, lost in Carrhæ's bloody plain.
Two gates of steel (the name of Mars they
bear, 840

And still are worship'd with religious fear)
Before his temple stand: the dire abode,
And the fear'd issues of the furious god,
Are fenc'd with brazen bolts; without the gates;

The wary guardian Janus doubly waits.
Then, when the sacred senate votes the wars,

The Roman consul their decree declares, }
And in his robes the sounding gates un-bars.

The youth in military shouts arise,
And the loud trumpets break the yielding
skies. 850

These rites, of old by sov'reign princes
us'd,

Were the king's office; but the king re-
fus'd,

Deaf to their cries, nor would the gates unbar

Of sacred peace, or loose th' imprison'd
war;

But hid his head, and, safe from loud
alarms,

Abhorr'd the wicked ministry of arms.

Then heav'n's imperious queen shot down
from high:

At her approach the brazen hinges fly;

The gates are forc'd, and ev'ry falling bar;
And, like a tempest, issues out the war. 860

The peaceful cities of th' Ausonian shore,
Lull'd in their ease, and undisturb'd before,
Are all on fire; and some, with studious
care,

Their restiff steeds in sandy plains pre-
pare;

Some their soft limbs in painful marches
try,

And war is all their wish, and arms the gen'ral cry.

Part scour the rusty shields with seam;
and part

New grind the blunted ax, and point the
dart:

With joy they view the waving ensigns fly,
And hear the trumpet's clangor pierce the
sky. 870

Five cities forge their arms: th' Atinian
pow'rs,

Antemnæ, Tibur with her lofty tow'rs,

Ardea the proud, the Crustumian town:

All these of old were places of renown.

Some hammer helmets for the fighting field;
Some twine young shallows to support the
shield;

The croslet some, and some the cuishes
mold,

With silver plated, and with ductile gold.

The rustic honors of the scythe and share
Give place to swords and plumes, the pride of war. 880

Old fauchions are new temper'd in the
fires;

The sounding trumpet ev'ry soul inspires.
The word is giv'n; with eager speed they lace

The shining headpiece, and the shield embrace.

The neighing steeds are to the chariot tied;

The trusty weapon sits on ev'ry side.

And now the mighty labor is begun —

Ye Muses, open all your Helicon.

Sing you the chiefs that sway'd th' Ausonian land,

Their arms, and armies under their command; 890

What warriors in our ancient clime were bred;

What soldiers follow'd, and what heroes led.

For well you know, and can record alone,
What fame to future times conveys but darkly down.

Mezentius first appear'd upon the plain:

Scorn sate upon his brows, and sour disdain,

Defying earth and heav'n. Etruria lost,
He brings to Turnus' aid his baffled host.

The charming Lausus, full of youthful fire,
Rode in the rank, and next his sullen sire; 900

To Turnus only second in the grace

Of manly mien, and features of the face.

A skilful horseman, and a huntsman bred,

With fates averse a thousand men he led:

His sire unworthy of so brave a son;

Himself well worthy of a happier throne.

Next Aventinus drives his chariot round

The Latian plains, with palms and laurels crown'd.

Proud of his steeds, he smokes along the field;

His father's hydra fills his ample shield: 910

A hundred serpents hiss about the brims;

The son of Hercules he justly seems

By his broad shoulders and gigantic limbs;

Of heav'nly part, and part of earthly blood,

A mortal woman mixing with a god.

For strong Alcides, after he had slain

The triple Geryon, drove from conquer'd Spain

His captive herds; and, thence in triumph led,

On Tuscan Tiber's flow'ry banks they fed.

Then on Mount Aventine the son of Jove 920

The priestess Rhea found, and forc'd to love.

For arms, his men long piles and jav'lines bore;

And poles with pointed steel their foes in battle gore.

Like Hercules himself his son appears,

In salvage pomp; a lion's hide he wears;

About his shoulders hangs the shaggy skin;

The teeth and gaping jaws severely grin.

Thus, like the god his father, homely dress'd,
He strides into the hall, a horrid guest.

Then two twin brothers from fair Tibur came, 930

(Which from their brother Tiburs took the name,)

Fierce Coras and Catillus, void of fear:

Arm'd Argive horse they led, and in the front appear.

Like cloud-born Centaurs, from the mountain's height

With rapid course descending to the fight;

They rush along; the rattling woods give way;

The branches bend before their sweepy sway.

Nor was Præneste's founder wanting there,

Whom fame reports the son of Mulciber:
Found in the fire, and foster'd in the plains, 940

A shepherd and a king at once he reigns,
And leads to Turnus' aid his country swains.

His own Præneste sends a chosen band,

With those who plow Saturnia's Gabine land;

Besides the succor which cold Anien yields,

The rocks of Hernicus, and dewy fields,

Anagnia fat, and Father Amasene —

A num'rous rout, but all of naked men:

Nor arms they wear, nor swords and bucklers wield,

Nor drive the chariot thro' the dusty field, 950

But whirl from leathern slings huge balls of lead,

And spoils of yellow wolves adorn their head;

The left foot naked, when they march to fight,

But in a bull's raw hide they sheathe the right.

Messapus next, (great Neptune was his sire,)

Secure of steel, and fated from the fire,

In pomp appears, and with his ardor warms

A heartless train, unexercis'd in arms:
The just Faliscans he to battle brings,
And those who live where Lake Ciminia
springs;

And where Feronia's grove and temple
stands,

Who till Fescennian or Flavianian lands.

All these in order march, and marching sing

The warlike actions of their sea-born king;
Like a long team of snowy swans on high,
Which clap their wings, and cleave the liquid sky,

When, homeward from their wat'ry pastures
borne,

They sing, and Asia's lakes their notes return.

Not one who heard their music from afar,
Would think these troops an army train'd
to war,

But flocks of fowl, that, when the tempests
roar,

With their hoarse gabbling seek the silent
shore.

Then Clausus came, who led a num'rous
band

Of troops embodied from the Sabine land,
And, in himself alone, an army brought.

'T was he the noble Claudian race begot,
The Claudian race, ordain'd, in times to
come,

To share the greatness of imperial Rome.
He led the Cures forth, of old renown,

Mutuscans from their olive-bearing town,
And all th' Eretian pow'rs; besides a band

That follow'd from Velinum's dewy land,
And Amiternian troops, of mighty fame,

And mountaineers, that from Severus came,
And from the craggy cliffs of Tetrica,

And those where yellow Tiber takes his
way,

And where Himella's wanton waters play. } Casperia sends her arms, with those that
lie

By Fabaris, and fruitful Foruli:
The warlike aids of Horta next appear,

And the cold Nursians come to close the
rear,

Mix'd with the natives born of Latine blood,
Whom Allia washes with her fatal flood.

Not thicker billows beat the Libyan main,
When pale Orion sets in wintry rain;

Nor thicker harvests on rich Hermus rise,
Or Lycian fields, when Phœbus burns the
skies,

Than stand these troops: their bucklers ring around;

Their trampling turns the turf, and shakes
the solid ground.

High in his chariot then Halesus came,

A foe by birth to Troy's unhappy name:
From Agamemnon born — to Turnus' aid

A thousand men the youthful hero led,
Who till the Massic soil, for wine re-
nown'd,

And fierce Auruncans from their hilly
ground,

And those who live by Sidicinian shores,
And where with shoaly fords Vulturhus

roars,
Cales' and Osca's old inhabitants,

And rough Saticulans, inur'd to wants:
Light demi-lances from afar they throw,

Fasten'd with leathern thongs, to gall the
foe.

Short crooked swords in closer fight they
wear,

And on their warding arm light bucklers
bear.

Nor, (Ebalus, shalt thou be left unsung,
From nymph Semethis and old Telon
sprung,

Who then in Teleboan Capri reign'd;
But that short isle th' ambitious youth dis-
dain'd,

And o'er Campania stretch'd his ample
sway,

Where swelling Sarnus seeks the Tyrrhene
sea;

O'er Batulum, and where Abella sees,

From her high tow'rs, the harvest of her trees.

And these (as was the Teuton use of old) Wield brazen swords, and brazen bucklers

hold;
Sling weighty stones, when from afar they
fight;

Their casques are cork, a covering thick and light.

Next these in rank, the warlike Ufens
went,

And led the mountain troops that Nursia
sent.

The rude Equicolæ his rule obey'd; Hunting their sport, and plund'ring was their trade.

In arms they plow'd, to battle still pre-
par'd:

Their soil was barren, and their hearts were hard.

Umbro the priest the proud Marrubians
 led,
 By King Archippus sent to Turnus' aid,
 And peaceful olives crown'd his hoary
 head.
 His wand and holy words, the viper's rage,
 And venom'd wounds of serpents could assuage.
 He, when he pleas'd with powerful juice to steep
 Their temples, shut their eyes in pleasing
 sleep.
 But vain were Marsian herbs, and magic art,
 To cure the wound giv'n by the Dardan
 dart:
 Yet his untimely fate th' Angitian woods¹⁰⁴⁰
 In sighs remurmur'd to the Fucine floods.
 The son of fam'd Hippolytus was there,
 Fam'd as his sire, and, as his mother, fair;
 Whom in Egerian groves Aricia bore,
 And nurs'd his youth along the marshy
 shore,
 Where great Diana's peaceful altars flame,
 In fruitful fields; and Virbius was his name.
 Hippolytus, as old records have said,
 Was by his stepdam sought to share her
 bed;
 But, when no female arts his mind could¹⁰⁵⁰
 move,
 She turn'd to furious hate her impious love.
 Torn by wild horses on the sandy shore,
 Another's crimes th' unhappy hunter bore,
 Glutting his father's eyes with guiltless
 gore.
 But chaste Diana, who his death deplor'd,
 With Æsculapian herbs his life restor'd.
 Then Jove, who saw from high, with just disdain,
 The dead inspir'd with vital breath again,
 Struck to the center, with his flaming
 dart,
 Th' unhappy founder of the godlike art.¹⁰⁶⁰
 But Trivia kept in secret shades alone
 Her care, Hippolytus, to fate unknown;
 And call'd him Virbius in th' Egerian grove,
 Where then he liv'd obscure, but safe from Jove.
 For this, from Trivia's temple and her
 wood
 Are coursers driv'n, who shed their master's blood,
 Affrighted by the monsters of the flood.
 His son, the second Virbius, yet retain'd His father's art, and warrior steeds he rein'd.¹⁰⁷⁰

Amid the troops, and like the leading
 god,
 High o'er the rest in arms the graceful
 Turnus rode:
 A triple pile of plumes his crest adorn'd,
 On which with belching flames Chimæra
 burn'd:
 The more the kindled combat rises high'r,
 The more with fury burns the blazing fire.
 Fair Io grac'd his shield; but Io now With horns exalted stands, and seems to
 low —
 A noble charge ! Her keeper by her side,
 To watch her walks, his hundred eyes ap-
 plied;
 And on the brims her sire, the wat'ry god,¹⁰⁸⁰
 Roll'd from a silver urn his crystal flood.
 A cloud of foot succeeds, and fills the fields
 With swords, and pointed spears, and clatt'ring shields;
 Of Argives, and of old Sicanian bands,
 And those who plow the rich Rutulian lands;
 Auruncan youth, and those Sacrana yields,
 And the proud Labicans, with painted
 shields,
 And those who near Numician streams reside,
 And those whom Tiber's holy forests
 hide,
 Or Circe's hills from the main land di-¹⁰⁹⁰
 vide;
 Where Ufens glides along the lowly lands,
 Or the black water of Pomptina stands.
 Last, from the Volscians fair Camilla
 came,
 And led her warlike troops, a warrior dame;
 Unbred to spinning, in the loom unskill'd,
 She chose the nobler Pallas of the field.
 Mix'd with the first, the fierce virago
 fought,
 Sustain'd the toils of arms, the danger
 sought,
 Outstripp'd the winds in speed upon the
 plain,
 Flew o'er the fields, nor hurt the bearded¹¹⁰⁰
 grain:
 She swept the seas, and, as she skimm'd
 along,
 Her flying feet unbath'd on billows hung.
 Men, boys, and women, stupid with surprise,
 Where'er she passes, fix their wond'ring
 eyes:
 Longing they look, and, gaping at the sight,
 Devour her o'er and o'er with vast delight;
 Her purple habit sits with such a grace

On her smooth shoulders, and so suits her
face;
Her head with ringlets of her hair is
crown'd,
And in a golden caul the curls are bound.
She shakes her myrtle jav'lin; and, behind,
Her Lycian quiver dances in the wind.

THE EIGHTH BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

The war being now begun, both the generals make all possible preparations. Turnus sends to Diomedes. Æneas goes in person to beg succors from Evander and the Tuscans.
Evander receives him kindly, furnishes him with men, and sends his son Pallas with him.
Vulcan, at the request of Venus, makes arms for her son Æneas, and draws on his shield
the most memorable actions of his posterity.

WHEN Turnus had assembled all his pow'rs,
His standard planted on Laurentum's tow'rs;
When now the sprightly trumpet, from afar,
Had giv'n the signal of approaching war,
Had rous'd the neighing steeds to scour the fields,

While the fierce riders clatter'd on their
shields;

Trembling with rage, the Latian youth prepare

To join th' allies, and headlong rush to war.
Fierce Æfens, and Messapus, led the crowd,
With bold Mezentius, who blasphem'd
aloud.

These thro' the country took their wasteful course,

The fields to forage, and to gather force.

Then Venulus to Diomede they send,

To beg his aid Ausonia to defend,
Declare the common danger, and inform
The Grecian leader of the growing storm:
Æneas, landed on the Latian coast,

With banish'd gods, and with a baffled host,
Yet now aspir'd to conquest of the state,
And claim'd a title from the gods and fate;
What num'rous nations in his quarrel came,
And how they spread his formidable name.
What he design'd, what mischief might
arise,

If fortune favor'd his first enterprise,
Was left for him to weigh, whose equal fears,
And common interest, was involv'd in theirs.

While Turnus and th' allies thus urge
the war,

The Trojan, floating in a flood of care,
Beholds the tempest which his foes prepare.
This way and that he turns his anxious
mind;

Thinks, and rejects the counsels he design'd;
Explores himself in vain, in ev'ry part,
And gives no rest to his distracted heart.
So, when the sun by day, or moon by night,
Strike on the polish'd brass their trembling
light,

The glitt'ring species here and there divide,
And cast their dubious beams from side to
side;

Now on the walls, now on the pavement
play,

And to the ceiling flash the glaring day.

'T was night; and weary nature lull'd asleep

The birds of air, and fishes of the deep,
And beasts, and mortal men. The Trojan
chief

Was laid on Tiber's banks, oppress'd with
grief,

And found in silent slumber late relief.

Then, thro' the shadows of the poplar wood,
Arose the father of the Roman flood;

An azure robe was o'er his body spread,

A wreath of shady reeds adorn'd his head:

Thus, manifest to sight, the god appear'd,
And with these pleasing words his sorrow
cheer'd:

"Undoubted offspring of ethereal race,
O long expected in this promis'd place!

Who thro' the foes hast borne thy banish'd
gods,

Restor'd them to their hearths, and old
abodes;

This is thy happy home, the clime where
fate

Ordains thee to restore the Trojan state.

Fear not! The war shall end in lasting peace,

And all the rage of haughty Juno cease.

And that this nightly vision may not seem

Th' effect of fancy, or an idle dream,

A sow beneath an oak shall lie along,

All white herself, and white her thirty young.

When thirty rolling years have run their
race,

Thy son Ascanius, on this empty space,

Shall build a royal town, of lasting fame,

Which from this omen shall receive the
name.

Time shall approve the truth. For what remains,

And how with sure success to crown thy pains,

With patience next attend. A banish'd band,
Driv'n with Evander from th' Arcadian land,

Have planted here, and plac'd on high their walls;

Their town the founder Pallanteum calls,
Deriv'd from Pallas, his great-grandsire's name:

But the fierce Latians old possession claim,
With war infesting the new colony.

These make thy friends, and on their aid rely.

To thy free passage I submit my streams.
Wake, son of Venus, from thy pleasing dreams;

And, when the setting stars are lost in day,
To Juno's pow'r thy just devotion pay; ⁸⁰
With sacrifice the wrathful queen appease:
Her pride at length shall fall, her fury cease.
When thou return'st victorious from the war,

Perform thy vows to me with grateful care.
The god am I, whose yellow water flows
Around these fields, and fattens as it goes:
Tiber my name; among the rolling floods
Renown'd on earth, esteem'd among the gods.
This is my certain seat. In times to come,
My waves shall wash the walls of mighty Rome."

He said, and plung'd below. While yet he spoke,

His dream Æneas and his sleep forsook.
He rose, and looking up, beheld the skies
With purple blushing, and the day arise.
Then water in his hollow palm he took
From Tiber's flood, and thus the pow'rs bespoke:

"Laurentian nymphs, by whom the streams are fed,

And Father Tiber, in thy sacred bed Receive Æneas, and from danger keep.
Whatever fount, whatever holy deep, ¹⁰⁰
Conceals thy wat'ry stores; where'er they rise,

And, bubbling from below, salute the skies;
Thou, king of horned floods, whose plentiful urn

Suffices fatness to the fruitful corn,
For this thy kind compassion of our woes, Shalt share my morning song and ev'ning vows.

But, O be present to thy people's aid,
And firm the gracious promise thou hast made!"

Thus having said, two galleys, from his stores,

With care he chooses, mans, and fits with oars.

Now on the shore the fatal swine is found. ¹¹⁰
Wondrous to tell!—She lay along the ground:

Her well-fed offspring at her udders hung;
She white herself, and white her thirty young.

Æneas takes the mother and her brood,
And all on Juno's altar are bestow'd.

The foll'wing night, and the succeeding day,

Propitious Tiber smooth'd his wat'ry way:
He roll'd his river back, and pois'd he stood,
A gentle swelling, and a peaceful flood. ¹²⁰

The Trojans mount their ships; they put from shore,

Borne on the waves, and scarcely dip an oar.
Shouts from the land give omen to their course,

And the pitch'd vessels glide with easy force.

The woods and waters wonder at the gleam
Of shields, and painted ships that stem the stream.

One summer's night and one whole day they pass

Betwixt the greenwood shades, and cut the liquid glass.

The fiery sun had finish'd half his race,
Look'd back, and doubted in the middle space, ¹³⁰

When they from far beheld the rising tow'rs,

The tops of sheds, and shepherds' lowly bow'rs,

Thin as they stood, which, then of homely clay,

Now rise in marble, from the Roman sway.
These cots (Evander's kingdom, mean and poor)

The Trojan saw, and turn'd his ships to shore.

'T was on a solemn day: th' Arcadian states,
The king and prince, without the city gates,
Then paid their offerings in a sacred grove
To Hercules, the warrior son of Jove. ¹⁴⁰
Thick clouds of rolling smoke involve the skies,

And fat of entrails on his altar fries.

But, when they saw the ships that stemm'd the flood,
And glitter'd thro' the covert of the wood,
They rose with fear, and left th' unfinish'd
feast,

Till dauntless Pallas reassur'd the rest
To pay the rites. Himself without delay
A jav'lin seiz'd, and singly took his way;
Then gain'd a rising ground, and call'd
from far:

"Resolve me, strangers, whence, and what you are; ¹⁵⁰
Your bus'ness here; and bring you peace or war?"

High on the stern Æneas took his stand,
And held a branch of olive in his hand, While thus he spoke: "The Phrygians'
arms you see,

Expell'd from Troy, provok'd in Italy
By Latian foes, with war unjustly made;
At first affianc'd, and at last betray'd.
This message bear: 'The Trojans and their
chief

Bring holy peace, and beg the king's relief.'" Struck with so great a name, and all on fire, ¹⁶⁰

The youth replies: "Whatever you require,
Your fame exacts. Upon our shores descend,

A welcome guest, and, what you wish, a
friend."

He said, and, downward hasting to the
strand,

Embrac'd the stranger prince, and join'd
his hand.

Conducted to the grove, Æneas broke
The silence first, and thus the king bespoke:
"Best of the Greeks, to whom, by fate's
command,

I bear these peaceful branches in my hand,
Undaunted I approach you, tho' I know ¹⁷⁰
Your birth is Grecian, and your land my
foe;

From Atreus tho' your ancient lineage came,
And both the brother kings your kindred
claim;

Yet, my self-conscious worth, your high renown,

Your virtue, thro' the neighb'ring nations blown,

Our fathers' mingled blood, Apollo's voice,
Have led me hither, less by need than choice.
Our founder Dardanus, as fame has sung,
And Greeks acknowledge, from Electra
sprung:

Electra from the loins of Atlas came; ¹⁸⁰
Atlas, whose head sustains the starry frame.
Your sire is Mercury, whom long before
On cold Cyllene's top fair Maia bore.

Maia the fair, on fame if we rely,
Was Atlas' daughter, who sustains the sky.
Thus from one common source our streams
divide;

Ours is the Trojan, yours th' Arcadian
side.

Rais'd by these hopes, I sent no news be-
fore,

Nor ask'd your leave, nor did your faith
implore;

But come, without a pledge, my own ambassador. ¹⁹⁰

The same Rutulians, who with arms pursue
The Trojan race, are equal foes to you.

Our host expell'd, what farther force can
stay

The victor troops from universal sway?
Then will they stretch their pow'r athwart
the land,

And either sea from side to side command.
Receive our offer'd faith, and give us thine;

Ours is a gen'rous and experienc'd line:
We want not hearts nor bodies for the war;
In council cautious, and in fields we dare."

He said; and while he spoke, with pierce-
ing eyes ²⁰⁰

Evander view'd the man with vast surprise, Pleas'd with his action, ravish'd with his
face:

Then answer'd briefly, with a royal grace:
"O valiant leader of the Trojan line,
In whom the features of thy father shine,
How I recall Anchises! how I see His motions, mien, and all my friend, in thee!

Long tho' it be, 't is fresh within my mind,
When Priam to his sister's court design'd
A welcome visit, with a friendly stay, ²¹⁰
And thro' th' Arcadian kingdom took his
way.

Then, past a boy, the callow down began
To shade my chin, and call me first a man.
I saw the shining train with vast delight,
And Priam's goodly person pleas'd my
sight:

But great Anchises, far above the rest,
With awful wonder fir'd my youthful breast.
I long'd to join in friendship's holy bands
Our mutual hearts, and plight our mutual hands. ²²⁰

I first accosted him: I sued, I sought,

And, with a loving force, to Pheneus brought.

He gave me, when at length constrain'd to go,

A Lycian quiver and a Gnosian bow,
A vest embroider'd, glorious to behold,
And two rich bridles, with their bits of gold,

Which my son's coursers in obedience hold.

The league you ask, I offer, as your right;
And, when to-morrow's sun reveals the light,

With swift supplies you shall be sent away.

Now celebrate with us this solemn day,
Whose holy rites admit no long delay.

Honor our annual feast; and take your seat,

With friendly welcome, at a homely treat."
Thus having said, the bowls (remov'd for fear)

The youths replac'd, and soon restor'd the cheer.

On sods of turf he set the soldiers round:
A maple throne, rais'd higher from the ground,

Receiv'd the Trojan chief; and, o'er the bed,

A lion's shaggy hide for ornament they spread.

The loaves were serv'd in canisters; the wine

In bowls; the priest renew'd the rites divine:

Broil'd entrails are their food, and beef's continued chine.

But when the rage of hunger was repress'd,

Thus spoke Evander to his royal guest:
"These rites, these altars, and this feast,

O king,

From no vain fears or superstition spring,
Or blind devotion, or from blinder chance,
Or heady zeal, or brutal ignorance;

But, sav'd from danger, with a grateful sense,

The labors of a god we recompense.

See, from afar, yon rock that mates the sky,
About whose feet such heaps of rubbish lie;
Such indigested ruin; bleak and bare,

How desert now it stands, expos'd in air!

'T was once a robber's den, inclos'd around
With living stone, and deep beneath the ground.

The monster Cacus, more than half a beast,
This hold, impervious to the sun, possess'd.
The pavement ever foul with human gore;
Heads, and their mangled members, hung the door.

Vulcan this plague begot; and, like his sire,
Black clouds he belch'd, and flakes of livid fire.

Time, long expected, eas'd us of our load,
And brought the needful presence of a god.
Th' avenging force of Hercules, from Spain,

Arriv'd in triumph, from Geryon slain:
Thrice liv'd the giant, and thrice liv'd in vain.

His prize, the lowing herds, Alcides drove Near Tiber's bank, to graze the shady grove.

Allur'd with hope of plunder, and intent
By force to rob, by fraud to circumvent,
The brutal Cacus, as by chance they stray'd,
Four oxen thence, and four fair kine convey'd;

And, lest the printed footsteps might be seen,

He dragg'd 'em backwards to his rocky den.

The tracks averse a lying notice gave,
And led the searcher backward from the cave.

"Meantime the herdsman hero shifts his place,

To find fresh pasture and untrodden grass.
The beasts, who miss'd their mates, fill'd
all around

With bellowings, and the rocks restor'd the sound.

One heifer, who had heard her love complain,

Roar'd from the cave, and made the project vain.

Alcides found the fraud; with rage he shook,
And toss'd about his head his knotted oak.
Swift as the winds, or Scythian arrows' flight,

He clomb, with eager haste, th' aerial height.
Then first we saw the monster mend his pace;

Fear in his eyes, and paleness in his face, Confess'd the god's approach. Trembling
he springs,

As terror had increas'd his feet with wings;
Nor stay'd for stairs; but down the depth
he threw

His body, on his back the door he drew

(The door, a rib of living rock; with pains
His father hew'd it out, and bound with iron chains):

He broke the heavy links, the mountain
clos'd,

And bars and levers to his foe oppos'd.

The wretch had hardly made his dungeon
fast;

The fierce avenger came with bounding
haste;

Survey'd the mouth of the forbidden hold,³⁰⁰
And here and there his raging eyes he roll'd.

He gnash'd his teeth; and thrice he compass'd round

With winged speed the circuit of the ground.

Thrice at the cavern's mouth he pull'd in
vain,

And, panting, thrice desisted from his pain.

A pointed flinty rock, all bare and black,
Grew gibbous from behind the mountain's
back;

Owls, ravens, all ill omens of the night,
Here built their nests, and hither wing'd their flight.

The leaning head hung threat'ning o'er the flood,³¹⁰

And nodded to the left. The hero stood Adverse, with planted feet, and, from the
right,

Tugg'd at the solid stone with all his might.
Thus heav'd, the fix'd foundations of the rock

Gave way; heav'n echo'd at the rattling
shock.

Tumbling, it chok'd the flood: on either side
The banks leap backward, and the streams
divide;

The sky shrunk upward with unusual dread,
And trembling Tiber div'd beneath his
bed.

The court of Cacus stands reveal'd to sight;³²⁰
The cavern glares with new-admitted light.
So the pent vapors, with a rumbling sound, Heave from below, and rend the hollow
ground;

A sounding flaw succeeds; and from on
high,

The gods with hate beheld the nether sky:
The ghosts repine at violated night,
And curse th' invading sun, and sicken at
the sight.

The graceless monster, caught in open day,
Inclos'd, and in despair to fly away,³³⁰
Howls horrible from underneath, and fills
His hollow palace with unmanly yells.

The hero stands above, and from afar
Plies him with darts, and stones, and distant war.

He, from his nostrils and huge mouth, expires

Black clouds of smoke, amidst his father's
fires,

Gath'ring, with each repeated blast, the
night,

To make uncertain aim, and erring sight.

The wrathful god then plunges from above,
And, where in thickest waves the sparkles
drove,

There lights; and wades thro' fumes, and gropes his way,³⁴⁰

Half sing'd, half stifled, till he grasps his
prey.

The monster, spewing fruitless flames,
he found;

He squeez'd his throat; he writh'd his neck around,

And in a knot his crippled members
bound;

Then from their sockets tore his burning
eyes:

Roll'd on a heap, the breathless robber lies.

The doors, unbarr'd, receive the rushing
day,

And thoro' lights disclose the ravish'd prey.

The bulls, redeem'd, breathe open air again.
Next, by the feet, they drag him from his den.

The wond'ring neighborhood, with glad surprise,³⁵¹

Behold his shagged breast, his giant size,
His mouth that flames no more, and his extinguish'd eyes.

From that auspicious day, with rites divine,
We worship at the hero's holy shrine.

Potitius first ordain'd these annual vows:
As priests, were added the Pinarian house,
Who rais'd this altar in the sacred shade,
Where honors, ever due, for ever shall be
paid.

For these deserts, and this high virtue shown,³⁶⁰

Ye warlike youths, your heads with gar-lands crown:

Fill high the goblets with a sparkling flood,
And with deep draughts invoke our common god."

This said, a double wreath Evander
twin'd,

And poplars black and white his temples
bind.

Then brims his ample bowl. With like design

The rest invoke the gods, with sprinkled wine.

Meantime the sun descended from the skies,
And the bright evening star began to rise.
And now the priests, Potitius at their head,
In skins of beasts involv'd, the long procession led;

Held high the flaming tapers in their hands,
As custom had prescrib'd their holy bands;
Then with a second course the tables load,
And with full chargers offer to the god.

The Sallii sing, and cense his altars round
With Saban smoke, their heads with poplar bound —

One choir of old, another of the young, ³⁷²
To dance, and bear the burthen of the song.
The lay records the labors, and the praise,
And all th' immortal acts of Hercules:

First, how the mighty babe, when swath'd in bands,

The serpents strangled with his infant hands;

Then, as in years and matchless force he grew,

Th' Æchalian walls, and Trojan, overthrew.
Besides, a thousand hazards they relate,
Procur'd by Juno's and Eurystheus' hate:
"Thy hands, unconquer'd hero, could subdue

The cloud-born Centaurs, and the monster crew:

Nor thy resistless arm the bull withstood, ³⁹⁰
Nor he, the roaring terror of the wood.

The triple porter of the Stygian seat,
With lolling tongue, lay fawning at thy feet,

And, seiz'd with fear, forgot his mangled meat.

Th' infernal waters trembled at thy sight;
Thee, god, no face of danger could affright;
Not huge Typhæus, nor th' unnumber'd snake,

Increas'd with hissing heads, in Lerna's lake.

Hail, Jove's undoubted son! an added grace

To heav'n and the great author of thy race! ⁴⁰⁰
Receive the grateful off'rings which we pay,
And smile propitious on thy solemn day!"

In numbers thus they sung; above the rest,
The den and death of Cacus crown the feast.
The woods to hollow vales convey the sound,

The vales to hills, and hills the notes rebound.

The rites perform'd, the cheerful train retire.

Betwixt young Pallas and his aged sire,
The Trojan pass'd, the city to survey, ⁴¹⁰
And pleasing talk beguil'd the tedious way.

The stranger cast around his curious eyes,
New objects viewing still, with new surprise;

With greedy joy enquires of various things,
And acts and monuments of ancient kings.
Then thus the founder of the Roman towers:

"These woods were first the seat of sylvan powers,

Of Nymphs and Fauns, and salvage men, who took

Their birth from trunks of trees and stubborn oak.

Nor laws they knew, nor manners, nor the care

Of lab'ring oxen, or the shining share, ⁴²⁰
Nor arts of gain, nor what they gain'd to spare.

Their exercise the chase; the running flood Supplied their thirst, the trees supplied their food.

Then Saturn came, who fled the pow'r of Jove,

Robb'd of his realms, and banish'd from above.

The men, dispers'd on hills, to towns he brought,

And laws ordain'd, and civil customs taught,
And Latium call'd the land where safe he lay

From his unduteous son, and his usurping sway.

With his mild empire, peace and plenty came;

And hence the golden times deriv'd their name.

A more degenerate and discolored age
Succeeded this, with avarice and rage.

Th' Ausonians then, and bold Sicilians came;

And Saturn's empire often chang'd the name.

Then kings, gigantic Tybris, and the rest,
With arbitrary sway the land oppress'd:

For Tiber's flood was Albula before,
Till, from the tyrant's fate, his name it bore.

I last arriv'd, driv'n from my native home ⁴⁴⁰

By fortune's pow'r, and fate's resistless doom.

Long toss'd on seas, I sought this happy land,

Warn'd by my mother nymph, and call'd by Heav'n's command."

Thus, walking on, he spoke, and shew'd the gate,

Since call'd Carmental by the Roman state;
Where stood an altar, sacred to the name
Of old Carmenta, the prophetic dame,
Who to her son foretold th' Ænean race,
Sublime in fame, and Rome's imperial place:

Then shews the forest, which, in after⁴⁵⁰ times,

Fierce Romulus for perpetrated crimes
A sacred refuge made; with this, the shrine
Where Pan below the rock had rites divine:
Then tells of Argus' death, his murder'd guest,

Whose grave and tomb his innocence attest.
Thence, to the steep Tarpeian rock he leads;

Now roof'd with gold, then thatch'd with homely reeds.

A reverent fear (such superstition reigns Among the rude) ev'n then possess'd the swains.

Some god, they knew — what god, they could not tell —

Did there amidst the sacred horror dwell.
Th' Arcadians thought him Jove; and said they saw

The mighty Thund'rer with majestic awe,
Who took his shield, and dealt his bolts around,

And scatter'd tempests on the teeming ground.

Then saw two heaps of ruins, (once they stood

Two stately towns, on either side the flood,) Saturnia's and Janicula's remains;
And either place the founder's name retains.

Discouraging thus together, they resort
Where poor Evander kept his country court.
They view'd the ground of Rome's litigious hall;

(Once oxen low'd, where now the lawyers bawl;)

Then, stooping, thro' the narrow gate they press'd,

When thus the king bespoke his Trojan guest:

"Mean as it is, this palace, and this door,
Receiv'd Alcides, then a conqueror.

Dare to be poor; accept our homely food,
Which feasted him, and emulate a god."

Then underneath a lowly roof he led⁴⁸¹
The weary prince, and laid him on a bed;
The stuffing leaves, with hides of bears
o'erspread.

Now Night had shed her silver dew around,

And with her sable wings embrac'd the ground,

When love's fair goddess, anxious for her son,

(New tumults rising, and new wars begun,) Couch'd with her husband in his golden bed,
With these alluring words invokes his aid;
And, that her pleasing speech his mind may move,

Inspires each accent with the charms of love:⁴⁹⁰

"While cruel fate conspir'd with Grecian pow'rs,

To level with the ground the Trojan tow'rs,
I ask'd not aid th' unhappy to restore,
Nor did the succor of thy skill implore;
Nor urg'd the labors of my lord in vain,
A sinking empire longer to sustain,
Tho' much I ow'd to Priam's house, and more

The dangers of Æneas did deplore.

But now, by Jove's command, and fate's decree,

His race is doom'd to reign in Italy:
With humble suit I beg thy needful art,
O still propitious pow'r, that rules my heart!

A mother kneels a suppliant for her son.

By Thetis and Aurora thou wert won
To forge impenetrable shields, and grace
With fated arms a less illustrious race.

Behold, what haughty nations are combin'd
Against the relics of the Phrygian kind,
With fire and sword my people to destroy,

And conquer Venus twice, in conqu'ring Troy."

She said; and straight her arms, of snowy hue,

About her unresolving husband threw.

Her soft embraces soon infuse desire;

His bones and marrow sudden warmth inspire;

And all the godhead feels the wonted fire.

Not half so swift the rattling thunder flies,
Or forky lightnings flash along the skies.
The goddess, proud of her successful wiles,
And conscious of her form, in secret
smiles.

Then thus the pow'r, obnoxious to her
charms,

Panting, and half dissolving in her arms:
"Why seek you reasons for a cause so just,
Or your own beauties or my love distrust?
Long since, had you requir'd my helpful
hand,

Th' artificer and art you might command,
To labor arms for Troy: nor Jove, nor fate,
Confin'd their empire to so short a date.

And, if you now desire new wars to wage,
My skill I promise, and my pains engage.
Whatever melting metals can conspire, 531
Or breathing bellows, or the forming fire,
Is freely yours: your anxious fears remove,
And think no task is difficult to love."

Trembling he spoke; and, eager of her
charms,

He snatch'd the willing goddess to his
arms;

Till, in her lap infus'd, he lay possess'd
Of full desire, and sunk to pleasing rest.
Now when the Night her middle race had rode,

And his first slumber had refresh'd the
god —

The time when early housewives leave the
bed;

When living embers on the hearth they
spread,

Supply the lamp, and call the maids to
rise —

With yawning mouths, and with half-open'd
eyes,

They ply the distaff by the winking light,
And to their daily labor add the night:

Thus frugally they earn their children's bread,

And uncorrupted keep the nuptial bed —
Not less concern'd, nor at a later hour,

Rose from his downy couch the forging
pow'r.

Sacred to Vulcan's name, an isle there
lay,

Betwixt Sicilia's coasts and Lipare, Rais'd high on smoking rocks; and, deep
below,

In hollow caves the fires of Ætna glow.
The Cyclops here their heavy hammers
deal;

Loud strokes, and hissings of tormented
steel,

Are heard around; the boiling waters roar,
And smoky flames thro' fuming tunnels
soar.

Hether the Father of the Fire, by night,
Thro' the brown air precipitates his flight.
On their eternal anvils here he found 561
The brethren beating, and the blows go
round.

A load of pointless thunder now there lies
Before their hands, to ripen for the skies:
These darts, for angry Jove, they daily
cast;

Consum'd on mortals with prodigious waste.
Three rays of writhen rain, of fire three
more,

Of winged southern winds and cloudy store
As many parts, the dreadful mixture frame;
And fears are added, and avenging flame.

Inferior ministers, for Mars, repair 571
His broken axletrees and blunted war,
And send him forth again with furbish'd
arms,

To wake the lazy war with trumpets' loud
alarms.

The rest refresh the scaly snakes that fold
The shield of Pallas, and renew their gold.
Full on the crest the Gorgon's head they
place,

With eyes that roll in death, and with distorted face.

"My sons," said Vulcan, "set your tasks
aside;

Your strength and master-skill must now be tried.

Arms for a hero forge; arms that require 580
Your force, your speed, and all your forming fire."

He said. They set their former work aside,
And their new toils with eager haste divide.
A flood of molten silver, brass, and gold,
And deadly steel, in the large furnace
roll'd;

Of this, their artful hands a shield prepare,
Alone sufficient to sustain the war.

Sev'n orbs within a spacious round they
close:

One stirs the fire, and one the bellows
blows.

The hissing steel is in the smithy drown'd; 590
The grot with beaten anvils groans around.
By turns their arms advance, in equal time;
By turns their hands descend, and hammers chime.

They turn the glowing mass with crooked
tongs;

The fiery work proceeds, with rustic songs.
While, at the Lemnian god's command,
they urge

Their labors thus, and ply th' Æolian forge,
The cheerful morn salutes Evander's eyes,
And songs of chirping birds invite to rise. 600
He leaves his lowly bed: his buskins meet
Above his ankles; sandals sheathe his feet:
He sets his trusty sword upon his side,
And o'er his shoulder throws a panther's
hide.

Two menial dogs before their master
press'd.

Thus clad, and guarded thus, he seeks his kingly guest.

Mindful of promis'd aid, he mends his pace,
But meets Æneas in the middle space.

Young Pallas did his father's steps attend,
And true Achates waited on his friend. 610
They join their hands; a secret seat they
choose;

Th' Arcadian first their former talk renews:
"Undaunted prince, I never can believe
The Trojan empire lost, while you survive.
Command th' assistance of a faithful friend;
But feeble are the succors I can send.

Our narrow kingdom here the Tiber
bounds;

That other side the Latian state surrounds,

Insults our walls, and wastes our fruitful grounds.

But mighty nations I prepare, to join 620
Their arms with yours, and aid your just design.

You come, as by your better genius sent,
And fortune seems to favor your intent.
Not far from hence there stands a hilly
town,

Of ancient building, and of high renown,
Torn from the Tuscans by the Lydian race,
Who gave the name of Cære to the place,
Once Agyllina call'd. It flourish'd long,
In pride of wealth and warlike people
strong,

Till curs'd Mezentius, in a fatal hour, 630
Assum'd the crown, with arbitrary pow'r.
What words can paint those execrable
times,

The subjects' sufferings, and the tyrant's crimes!

That blood, those murders, O ye gods, replace

On his own head, and on his impious race!
The living and the dead at his command Were coupl'd, face to face, and hand to
hand,

Till, chok'd with stench, in loath'd embraces tied,

The ling'ring wretches pin'd away and died.
Thus plung'd in ills, and meditating
more — 640

The people's patience, tir'd, no longer bore
The raging monster; but with arms beset
His house, and vengeance and destruction
threat.

They fire his palace: while the flame ascends,

They force his guards, and execute his
friends.

He cleaves the crowd, and, favor'd by the
night,

To Turnus' friendly court directs his flight.
By just revenge the Tuscans set on fire,
With arms, their king to punishment require:

Their num'rous troops, now muster'd on the
strand, 650

My counsel shall submit to your command.
Their navy swarms upon the coasts; they
cry

To hoist their anchors, but the gods deny.
An ancient augur, skill'd in future fate,
With these foreboding words restrains their
hate:

'Ye brave in arms, ye Lydian blood, the
flow'r

Of Tuscan youth, and choice of all their
pow'r,

Whom just revenge against Mezentius
arms,

To seek your tyrant's death by lawful
arms; 659

Know this: no native of our land may lead
This pow'rful people; seek a foreign head.'
Aw'd with these words, in camps they still abide,

And wait with longing looks their promis'd
guide.

Tarchon, the Tuscan chief, to me has sent
Their crown, and ev'ry regal ornament:
The people join their own with his desire;
And all my conduct, as their king, require.
But the chill blood that creeps within my
veins,

And age, and listless limbs unfit for pains,
And a soul conscious of its own decay, 670
Have forc'd me to refuse imperial sway.

My Pallas were more fit to mount the throne,
 And should, but he's a Sabine mother's son,
 And half a native; but, in you, combine
 A manly vigor, and a foreign line.
 Where Fate and smiling Fortune shew the way,
 Pursue the ready path to sov'reign sway.
 The staff of my declining days, my son,
 Shall make your good or ill success his own;
 In fighting fields from you shall learn to dare, ⁶⁸⁰
 And serve the hard apprenticeship of war;
 Your matchless courage and your conduct view,
 And early shall begin t' admire and copy you.
 Besides, two hundred horse he shall command;
 Tho' few, a warlike and well-chosen band.
 These in my name are listed; and my son
 As many more has added in his own."
 Scarce had he said; Achates and his guest,
 With downcast eyes, their silent grief express'd;
 Who, short of succors, and in deep despair, ⁶⁹⁰
 Shook at the dismal prospect of the war.
 But his bright mother, from a breaking cloud,
 To cheer her issue, thunder'd thrice aloud;
 Thrice forky lightning flash'd along the sky,
 And Tyrrhene trumpets thrice were heard on high.
 Then, gazing up, repeated peals they hear;
 And, in a heav'n serene, refulgent arms appear:
 Redd'ning the skies, and glitt'ring all around,
 The temper'd metals clash, and yield a silver sound.
 The rest stood trembling, struck with awe divine; ⁷⁰⁰
 Æneas only, conscious to the sign,
 Presag'd th' event, and joyful view'd, above,
 Th' accomplish'd promise of the Queen of Love.
 Then, to th' Arcadian king: "This prodigy (Dismiss your fear) belongs alone to me.
 Heav'n calls me to the war: th' expected sign

Is giv'n of promis'd aid, and arms divine.
 My goddess mother, whose indulgent care
 Foresaw the dangers of the growing war,
 This omen gave, when bright Vulcanian arms, ⁷¹⁰
 Fated from force of steel by Stygian charms,
 Suspended, shone on high: she then fore-show'd
 Approaching fights, and fields to float in blood.
 Turnus shall dearly pay for faith forsworn;
 And corps, and swords, and shields, on Tiber borne,
 Shall choke his flood: now sound the loud alarms;
 And, Latian troops, prepare your perjurd arms."
 He said, and, rising from his homely throne,
 The solemn rites of Hercules begun,
 And on his altars wak'd the sleeping fires; ⁷²⁰
 Then cheerful to his household gods retires;
 There offers chosen sheep. Th' Arcadian king
 And Trojan youth the same oblations bring.
 Next, of his men and ships he makes review;
 Draws out the best and ablest of the crew.
 Down with the falling stream the refuse run,
 To raise with joyful news his drooping son.
 Steeds are prepar'd to mount the Trojan band,
 Who wait their leader to the Tyrrhene land.
 A sprightly courser, fairer than the rest, ⁷³⁰
 The king himself presents his royal guest:
 A lion's hide his back and limbs infold,
 Precious with studded work, and paws of gold.
 Fame thro' the little city spreads aloud
 Th' intended march, amid the fearful crowd:
 The matrons beat their breasts, dissolve in tears,
 And double their devotion in their fears.
 The war at hand appears with more affright,
 And rises ev'ry moment to the sight.
 Then old Evander, with a close embrace, ⁷⁴⁰

Strain'd his departing friend; and tears
o'erflow his face.

"Would Heav'n," said he, "my strength and youth recall,

Such as I was beneath Præneste's wall;
Then when I made the foremost foes retire,
And set whole heaps of conquer'd shields
on fire;

When Herilus in single fight I slew,
Whom with three lives Feronia did endue;
And thrice I sent him to the Stygian shore,
Till the last ebbing soul return'd no more —
Such if I stood renew'd, not these alarms, Nor death, should rend me from my Pallas'

arms; ⁷⁵¹

Nor proud Mezentius, thus unpunish'd,
boast

His rapes and murders on the Tuscan
coast.

Ye gods, and mighty Jove, in pity bring Relief, and hear a father and a king!
If fate and you reserve these eyes, to see
My son return with peace and victory;
If the lov'd boy shall bless his father's
sight;

If we shall meet again with more delight;
Then draw my life in length; let me sus-tain, ⁷⁶⁰

In hopes of his embrace, the worst of pain.
But if your hard decrees — which, O! I dread —

Have doom'd to death his undeserving
head;

This, O this very moment, let me die!
While hopes and fears in equal balance lie;
While, yet possess'd of all his youthful
charms,

I strain him close within these aged arms;
Before that fatal news my soul shall
wound!"

He said, and, swooning, sunk upon the
ground.

His servants bore him off, and softly laid ⁷⁷⁰

His languish'd limbs upon his homely bed.

The horsemen march; the gates are open'd wide;

Æneas at their head, Achates by his side.
Next these, the Trojan leaders rode along;
Last follows in the rear th' Arcadian
throng.

Young Pallas shone conspicuous o'er the
rest; .

Gilded his arms, embroider'd was his vest.
So, from the seas, exerts his radiant head

The star by whom the lights of heav'n are
led;

Shakes from his rosy locks the pearly dew,
Dispels the darkness, and the day renews. ⁷⁸¹

The trembling wives the walls and turrets
crowd,

And follow, with their eyes, the dusty
cloud,

Which winds disperse by fits, and shew
from far

The blaze of arms, and shields, and shining
war.

The troops, drawn up in beautiful array,
O'er heathy plains pursue the ready way.
Repeated peals of shouts are heard
around;

The neighing coursers answer to the
sound,

And shake with horny hoofs the solid ground. ⁷⁹⁰

A greenwood shade, for long religion
known,

Stands by the streams that wash the Tuscan town,

Incompass'd round with gloomy hills above,
Which add a holy horror to the grove.

The first inhabitants, of Grecian blood,
That sacred forest to Silvanus vow'd,
The guardian of their flocks and fields; and
pay

Their due devotions on his annual day.

Not far from hence, along the river's side,
In tents secure, the Tuscan troops abide, ⁸⁰⁰

By Tarchon led. Now, from a rising ground,
Æneas cast his wond'ring eyes around.

And all the Tyrrhene army had in sight, Stretch'd on the spacious plain from left to
right.

Thether his warlike train the Trojan led,
Refresh'd his men, and wearied horses fed.

Meantime the mother goddess, crown'd
with charms,

Breaks thro' the clouds, and brings the fated arms.

Within a winding vale she finds her son,
On the cool river's banks, retir'd alone. ⁸¹⁰
She shews her heav'nly form without disguise,

And gives herself to his desiring eyes.

"Behold," she said, "perform'd in ev'ry
part,

My promise made, and Vulcan's labor'd art.
Now seek, secure, the Latian enemy,

And haughty Turnus to the field defy."
 She said; and, having first her son embrac'd,
 The radiant arms beneath an oak she plac'd.
 Proud of the gift, he roll'd his greedy sight Around the work, and gaz'd with vast delight. ⁸²⁰

He lifts, he turns, he poises, and admires
 The crested helm, that vomits radiant fires:
 His hands the fatal sword and corslet hold,
 One keen with temper'd steel, one stiff with
 gold:

Both ample, flaming both, and beamy
 bright;

So shines a cloud, when edg'd with adverse
 light.

He shakes the pointed spear, and longs to
 try

The plated cuishes on his manly thigh;
 But most admires the shield's mysterious
 mold,

And Roman triumphs rising on the gold:
 For these, emboss'd, the heav'nly smith had wrought ⁸³¹

(Not in the rolls of future fate untaught)
 The wars in order, and the race divine
 Of warriors issuing from the Julian line.
 The cave of Mars was dress'd with mossy greens:

There, by the wolf, were laid the martial twins.

Intrepid on her swelling dugs they hung;
 The foster dam loll'd out her fawning
 tongue:

They suck'd secure, while, bending back
 her head,

She lick'd their tender limbs, and form'd them as they fed. ⁸⁴⁰

Not far from thence new Rome appears, with games

Projected for the rape of Sabine dames.

The pit resounds with shrieks; a war suc-
 ceeds,

For breach of public faith, and unexampled
 deeds.

Here for revenge the Sabine troops contend;
 The Romans there with arms the prey defend.

Wearied with tedious war, at length they
 cease;

And both the kings and kingdoms plight the
 peace.

The friendly chiefs before Jove's altar
 stand,

Both arm'd, with each a charger in his hand: ⁸⁵⁰

A fatted sow for sacrifice is led,
 With imprecations on the perjurd head.
 Near this, the traitor Metius, stretch'd between

Four fiery steeds, is dragg'd along the
 green,

By Tullus' doom: the brambles drink his
 blood,

And his torn limbs are left the vulture's
 food.

There, Porsena to Rome proud Tarquin
 brings,

And would by force restore the banish'd kings.

One tyrant for his fellow-tyrant fights;
 The Roman youth assert their native rights. ⁸⁶⁰

Before the town the Tuscan army lies,
 To win by famine, or by fraud surprise.

Their king, half-threat'ning, half-disdaining
 stood,

While Cocles broke the bridge, and stemm'd
 the flood.

The captive maids there tempt the raging
 tide,

Scap'd from their chains, with Clœlia for their guide.

High on a rock heroic Manlius stood,
 To guard the temple, and the temple's god.
 Then Rome was poor; and there you might behold

The palace thatch'd with straw, now roof'd with gold. ⁸⁷⁰

The silver goose before the shining gate
 There flew, and, by her cackle, sav'd the
 state.

She told the Gauls' approach; th' approaching Gauls,

Obscure in night, ascend, and seize the
 walls.

The gold dissembled well their yellow hair,
 And golden chains on their white necks
 they wear.

Gold are their vests; long Alpine spears
 they wield,

And their left arm sustains a length of shield.

Hard by, the leaping Salian priests advance;

And naked thro' the streets the mad Luperci
 dance, ⁸⁸⁰

In caps of wool; the targets dropp'd from
 heav'n.

Here modest matrons, in soft litters driv'n,
 To pay their vows in solemn pomp appear,

And odorous gums in their chaste hands
they bear.

Far hence remov'd, the Stygian seats are
seen;

Pains of the damn'd, and punish'd Catiline
Hung on a rock — the traitor; and, around,
The Furies hissing from the nether ground.
Apart from these, the happy souls he draws,
And Cato's holy ghost dispensing laws. ⁸⁹⁰

Betwixt the quarters flows a golden sea;
But foaming surges there in silver play.
The dancing dolphins with their tails divide

The glitt'ring waves, and cut the precious
tide.

Amid the main, two mighty fleets engage
Their brazen beaks, oppos'd with equal rage.
Actium surveys the well-disputed prize;
Leucate's wat'ry plain with foamy billows
fries.

Young Cæsar, on the stern, in armor
bright,

Here leads the Romans and their gods to fight: ⁹⁰⁰

His beamy temples shoot their flames afar,
And o'er his head is hung the Julian star.
Agrippa seconds him, with prosp'rous gales,
And, with propitious gods, his foes assails:
A naval crown, that binds his manly
brows,

The happy fortune of the fight foreshows.
Rang'd on the line oppos'd, Antonius brings Barbarian aids, and troops of Eastern kings;
Th' Arabians near, and Bactrians from
afar,

Of tongues discordant, and a mingled war: ⁹¹⁰

And, rich in gaudy robes, amidst the strife,
His ill fate follows him — th' Egyptian wife.
Moving they fight; with oars and forky
prows

The froth is gather'd, and the water glows.
It seems, as if the Cyclades again
Were rooted up, and justled in the main;
Or floating mountains floating mountains
meet:

Such is the fierce encounter of the fleet.
Fireballs are thrown, and pointed jav'lines
fly;

The fields of Neptune take a purple dye. ⁹²⁰
The queen herself, amidst the loud alarms,
With cymbals toss'd her fainting soldiers warms —

Fool as she was! who had not yet divin'd
Her cruel fate, nor saw the snakes behind.

Her country gods, the monsters of the sky,
Great Neptune, Pallas, and Love's Queen defy:

The dog Anubis barks, but barks in vain,
Nor longer dares oppose th' ethereal train.
Mars in the middle of the shining shield
Is grav'd, and strides along the liquid field. ⁹³⁰

The Diræ souse from heav'n with swift descent;

And Discord, dyed in blood, with garments
rent,

Divides the prease: her steps Bellona
treads,

And shakes her iron rod above their heads.
This seen, Apollo, from his Actian height, Pours down his arrows; at whose winged
flight

The trembling Indians and Egyptians yield,
And soft Sabæans quit the wat'ry field.
The fatal mistress hoists her silken sails,
And, shrinking from the fight, invokes the gales. ⁹⁴⁰

Aghast she looks, and heaves her breast
for breath,

Panting, and pale with fear of future death.
The god had figur'd her as driv'n along By winds and waves, and scudding thro' the
throng.

Just opposite, sad Nilus opens wide
His arms and ample bosom to the tide,
And spreads his mantle o'er the winding
coast,

In which he wraps his queen, and hides the flying host.

The victor to the gods his thanks express'd,
And Rome, triumphant, with his presence
bless'd. ⁹⁵⁰

Three hundred temples in the town he
plac'd;

With spoils and altars ev'ry temple grac'd.
Three shining nights, and three succeeding days,

The fields resound with shouts, the streets
with praise,

The domes with songs, the theaters with plays.

All altars flame: before each altar lies,
Drench'd in his gore, the destin'd sacrifice.
Great Cæsar sits sublime upon his throne,
Before Apollo's porch of Parian stone;
Accepts the presents vow'd for victory, ⁹⁶⁰
And hangs the monumental crowns on high.
Vast crowds of vanquish'd nations march
along,

Various in arms, in habit, and in tongue.
 Here, Mulciber assigns the proper place
 For Carians, and th' ungirt Numidian race;
 Then ranks the Thracians in the second row,
 With Scythians, expert in the dart and bow.
 And here the tam'd Euphrates humbly glides,
 And there the Rhine submits her swelling
 tides,
 And proud Araxes, whom no bridge
 could bind; ⁹⁷⁰
 The Danes' unconquer'd offspring march
 behind,
 And Morini, the last of humankind.
 These figures, on the shield divinely
 wrought,
 By Vulcan labor'd, and by Venus brought,
 With joy and wonder fill the hero's
 thought.
 Unknown the names, he yet admires the
 grace,
 And bears aloft the fame and fortune of his
 race.

THE NINTH BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

Turnus takes advantage of Æneas' absence, fires some of his ships, (which are transform'd into sea nymphs,) and assaults his camp.
 The Trojans, reduc'd to the last extremities, send Nisus and Euryalus to recall Æneas; which furnishes the poet with that admirable episode of their friendship, generosity, and the conclusion of their adventures.

WHILE these affairs in distant places pass'd,
 The various Iris Juno sends with haste,
 To find bold Turnus, who, with anxious
 thought,
 The secret shade of his great grandsire
 sought.
 Retir'd alone she found the daring man,
 And op'd her rosy lips, and thus began:
 "What none of all the gods could grant thy
 vows,
 That, Turnus, this auspicious day bestows.
 Æneas, gone to seek th' Arcadian prince,
 Has left the Trojan camp without defense;
 And, short of succors there, employs his pains ¹¹
 In parts remote to raise the Tuscan swains.

Now snatch an hour that favors thy designs;
 Unite thy forces, and attack their lines."

This said, on equal wings she pois'd her weight,

And form'd a radiant rainbow in her flight.

The Daunian hero lifts his hands and eyes,
 And thus invokes the goddess as she flies:

"Iris, the grace of heav'n, what pow'r divine

Has sent thee down, thro' dusky clouds to shine? ²⁰

See, they divide; immortal day appears,
 And glitt'ring planets dancing in their spheres!

With joy, these happy omens I obey,
 And follow to the war the god that leads
 the way."

Thus having said, as by the brook he stood,
 He scoop'd the water from the crystal flood;
 Then with his hands the drops to heav'n he
 throws,

And loads the pow'rs above with offer'd
 vows.

Now march the bold confed'rates thro'
 the plain,

Well hors'd, well clad; a rich and shining train. ³⁰

Messapus leads the van; and, in the rear,
 The sons of Tyrrheus in bright arms appear.

In the main battle, with his flaming crest,
 The mighty Turnus tow'rs above the rest.

Silent they move, majestically slow,
 Like ebbing Nile, or Ganges in his flow.

The Trojans view the dusty cloud from far,
 And the dark menace of the distant war.

Caÿcus from the rampire saw it rise, Black'ning the fields, and thick'ning thro'
 the skies. ⁴⁰

Then to his fellows thus aloud he calls:
 "What rolling clouds, my friends, approach
 the walls?

Arm! arm! and man the works! prepare your spears

And pointed darts! the Latian host appears."

Thus warn'd, they shut their gates; with shouts ascend

The bulwarks, and, secure, their foes attend:

For their wise gen'ral, with foreseeing care,
 Had charg'd them not to tempt the doubtful war,

Nor, tho' provok'd, in open fields advance,
 But close within their lines attend their chance. ⁵⁰

Unwilling, yet they keep the strict command,

And sourly wait in arms the hostile band.

The fiery Turnus flew before the rest:

A piebald steed of Thracian strain he
press'd;

His helm of massy gold, and crimson was his crest.

With twenty horse to second his designs,
An unexpected foe, he fac'd the lines.

"Is there," he said, "in arms, who bravely
dare

His leader's honor and his danger share?"

Then spurring on, his brandish'd dart he
threw, 60

In sign of war: applauding shouts ensue.

Amaz'd to find a dastard race, that run
Behind the rampions and the battle shun,
He rides around the camp, with rolling
eyes,

And stops at ev'ry post, and ev'ry passage tries.

So roams the nightly wolf about the fold:
Wet with descending show'rs, and stiff with cold,

He howls for hunger, and he grins for
pain,

(His gnashing teeth are exercis'd in vain,)

And, impotent of anger, finds no way 70

In his distended paws to grasp the prey.

The mothers listen; but the bleating lambs

Securely swig the dug, beneath the dams.

Thus ranges eager Turnus o'er the plain,
Sharp with desire, and furious with dis-
dain;

Surveys each passage with a piercing sight,
To force his foes in equal field to fight.

Thus while he gazes round, at length he
spies,

Where, fenc'd with strong redoubts, their navy lies,

Close underneath the walls; the washing
tide 80

Secures from all approach this weaker side.

He takes the wish'd occasion, fills his hand

With ready fires, and shakes a flaming brand.

Urg'd by his presence, ev'ry soul is warm'd,
And ev'ry hand with kindled firs is arm'd.

From the fir'd pines the scatt'ring sparkles
fly;

Fat vapors, mix'd with flames, involve the
sky.

What pow'r, O Muses, could avert the
flame

Which threaten'd, in the fleet, the Trojan
name?

Tell: for the fact, thro' length of time
obscure, 90

Is hard to faith; yet shall the fame endure.

'T is said that, when the chief prepar'd
his flight,

And fell'd his timber from Mount Ida's
height,

The grandam goddess then approach'd her
son,

And with a mother's majesty begun:

"Grant me," she said, "the sole request I
bring,

Since conquer'd heav'n has own'd you for its king.

On Ida's brows, for ages past, there stood,

With firs and maples fill'd, a shady wood;

And on the summit rose a sacred grove, 100

Where I was worship'd with religious love.

Those woods, that holy grove, my long de-
light,

I gave the Trojan prince, to speed his flight.

Now, fill'd with fear, on their behalf I come;

Let neither winds o'erset, nor waves intomb

The floating forests of the sacred pine;

But let it be their safety to be mine."

Then thus replied her awful son, who rolls

The radiant stars, and heav'n and earth controls:

"How dare you, mother, endless date demand 110

For vessels molded by a mortal hand?

What then is fate? Shall bold Æneas ride,

Of safety certain, on th' uncertain tide?

Yet, what I can, I grant: when, wafted o'er,

The chief is landed on the Latian shore,

Whatever ships escape the raging storms,

At my command shall change their fading forms

To nymphs divine, and plow the wat'ry
way,

Like Dotis and the daughters of the sea."

To seal his sacred vow, by Styx he swore,

The lake of liquid pitch, the dreary shore,

And Phlegethon's innavigable flood, 120

And the black regions of his brother god.

He said; and shook the skies with his imperial nod.

And now at length the number'd hours were come,

Prefix'd by fate's irrevocable doom,

When the great Mother of the Gods was
free

To save her ships, and finish Jove's decree.

First, from the quarter of the morn, there sprung
 A light that sign'd the heav'ns, and shot along; ¹³⁰
 Then from a cloud, fring'd round with golden fires,
 Were timbrels heard, and Berecynthian
 choirs;
 And, last, a voice, with more than mortal
 sounds,
 Both hosts, in arms oppos'd, with equal horror wounds:
 "O Trojan race, your needless aid forbear,
 And know, my ships are my peculiar care.
 With greater ease the bold Rutulian may,
 With hissing brands, attempt to burn the
 sea,
 Than singe my sacred pines. But you, my charge,
 Loos'd from your crooked anchors, launch
 at large, ¹⁴⁰
 Exalted each a nymph: forsake the sand,
 And swim the seas, at Cybele's command."
 No sooner had the goddess ceas'd to speak,
 When, lo! th' obedient ships their haulsers
 break;
 And, strange to tell, like dolphins, in the
 main
 They plunge their prows, and dive, and spring again:
 As many beauteous maids the billows sweep,
 As rode before tall vessels on the deep.
 The foes, surpris'd with wonder, stood aghast; ¹⁴⁹
 Messapus curb'd his fiery courser's haste;
 Old Tiber roar'd, and, raising up his head,
 Call'd back his waters to their oozy bed.
 Turnus alone, undaunted, bore the shock,
 And with these words his trembling troops bespoke:
 "These monsters for the Trojans' fate are meant,
 And are by Jove for black presages sent.
 He takes the cowards' last relief away;
 For fly they cannot, and, constrain'd to
 stay,
 Must yield unfought, a base inglorious
 prey.
 The liquid half of all the globe is lost; ¹⁶⁰ Heav'n shuts the seas, and we secure the
 coast.
 Theirs is no more than that small spot of
 ground
 Which myriads of our martial men surround.
 Their fates I fear not, or vain oracles.

'T was giv'n to Venus they should cross the
 seas,
 And land secure upon the Latian plains:
 Their promis'd hour is pass'd, and mine remains.
 'T is in the fate of Turnus to destroy,
 With sword and fire, the faithless race of Troy. ¹⁶⁹
 Shall such affronts as these alone inflame
 The Grecian brothers, and the Grecian
 name?
 My cause and theirs is one; a fatal strife,
 And final ruin, for a ravish'd wife.
 Was't not enough, that, punish'd for the crime,
 They fell; but will they fall a second time?
 One would have thought they paid enough
 before,
 To curse the costly sex, and durst offend no
 more.
 Can they securely trust their feeble wall,
 A slight partition, a thin interval,
 Betwixt their fate and them; when Troy,
 tho' built ¹⁸⁰
 By hands divine, yet perish'd by their guilt?
 Lend me, for once, my friends, your valiant
 hands,
 To force from out their lines these dastard
 bands.
 Less than a thousand ships will end this war,
 Nor Vulcan needs his fated arms prepare.
 Let all the Tuscans, all th' Arcadians, join!
 Nor these, nor those, shall frustrate my design.
 Let them not fear the treasons of the
 night,
 The robb'd Palladium, the pretended flight: ¹⁸⁹
 Our onset shall be made in open light.
 No wooden engine shall their town betray;
 Fires they shall have around, but fires by
 day.
 No Grecian babes before their camp appear,
 Whom Hector's arms detain'd to the tenth tardy year.
 Now, since the sun is rolling to the west,
 Give we the silent night to needful rest:
 Refresh your bodies, and your arms prepare;
 The morn shall end the small remains of
 war."
 The post of honor to Messapus falls,
 To keep the nightly guard, to watch the walls, ²⁰⁰
 To pitch the fires at distances around,
 And close the Trojans in their scanty ground.

Twice seven Rutulian captains ready stand,
And twice seven hundred horse these chiefs
command;

All clad in shining arms the works invest,
Each with a radiant helm and waving crest.
Stretch'd at their length, they press the grassy ground;

They laugh, they sing, (the jolly bowls go
round,)

With lights and cheerful fires renew the
day,

And pass the wakeful night in feasts and play. ²¹⁰

The Trojans, from above, their foes be-
held,

And with arm'd legions all the rampires
fill'd.

Seiz'd with affright, their gates they first explore;

Join works to works with bridges, tow'r to
tow'r:

Thus all things needful for defense abound.
Mnestheus and brave Seresthus walk the
round,

Commission'd by their absent prince to
share

The common danger, and divide the care.
The soldiers draw their lots, and, as they
fall,

By turns relieve each other on the wall. ²²⁰

Nigh where the foes their utmost guards
advance,

To watch the gate was warlike Nisus'
chance.

His father Hyrtacus of noble blood;
His mother was a huntress of the wood,
And sent him to the wars. Well could he
bear

His lance in fight, and dart the flying spear,
But better skill'd unerring shafts to send.
Beside him stood Euryalus, his friend:

Euryalus, than whom the Trojan host
No fairer face, or sweeter air, could boast — Scarce had the down to shade his cheeks begun. ²³¹

One was their care, and their delight was
one:

One common hazard in the war they shar'd,
And now were both by choice upon the
guard.

Then Nisus thus: "Or do the gods inspire

This warmth, or make we gods of our desire ?

A gen'rous ardor boils within my breast,

Eager of action, enemy to rest:

This urges me to fight, and fires my mind
To leave a memorable name behind. ²⁴⁰

Thou see'st the foe secure; how faintly
shine

Their scatter'd fires ! the most, in sleep su-pine

Along the ground, an easy conquest lie:
The wakeful few the fuming flagon ply;

All hush'd around. Now hear what I revolve —

A thought unripe — and scarcely yet resolve.

Our ardent prince both camp and council
mourn;

By message both would hasten his return:
If they confer what I demand on thee,

(For fame is recompense enough for me,) ²⁵⁰
Methinks, beneath yon hill, I have espied

A way that safely will my passage guide."

Euryalus stood list'ning while he spoke,
With love of praise and noble envy struck;

Then to his ardent friend expos'd his
mind:

"All this, alone, and leaving me behind !
Am I unworthy, Nisus, to be join'd ?

Think'st thou I can my share of glory
yield,

Or send thee unassisted to the field ?
Not so my father taught my childhood arms; ²⁶⁰

Born in a siege, and bred among alarms !
Nor is my youth unworthy of my friend,

Nor of the heav'n-born hero I attend.
The thing call'd life, with ease I can dis-
claim,

And think it over-sold to purchase fame."

Then Nisus thus: "Alas ! thy tender years

Would minister new matter to my fears.
So may the gods, who view this friendly
strife,

Restore me to thy lov'd embrace with life, Condemn'd to pay my vows, (as sure I trust,) ²⁷⁰

This thy request is cruel and unjust.
But if some chance — as many chances are,

And doubtful hazards, in the deeds of war —
If one should reach my head, there let it
fall,

And spare thy life; I would not perish all.
Thy bloomy youth deserves a longer date:

Live thou to mourn thy love's unhappy fate;
To bear my mangled body from the foe,

Or buy it back, and fun'ral rites bestow.

Or, if hard fortune shall those dues deny, ²⁸⁰
 Thou canst at least an empty tomb supply.
 O let not me the widow's tears renew!
 Nor let a mother's curse my name pursue:
 Thy pious parent, who, for love of thee,
 Forsook the coasts of friendly Sicily,
 Her age committing to the seas and wind,
 When ev'ry weary matron stay'd behind."
 To this, Euryalus: "You plead in vain,
 And but protract the cause you cannot gain.
 No more delays, but haste!" With that, he wakes ²⁹⁰

The nodding watch: each to his office takes.
 The guard reliev'd, the gen'rous couple
 went

To find the council at the royal tent.

All creatures else forgot their daily care,
 And sleep, the common gift of nature,
 share;

Except the Trojan peers, who wakeful sate
 In nightly council for th' indanger'd state.
 They vote a message to their absent chief,
 Shew their distress, and beg a swift relief.
 Amid the camp a silent seat they chose,
 Remote from clamor, and secure from foes. ³⁰¹

On their left arms their ample shields they
 bear,

The right reclin'd upon the bending spear.
 Now Nisus and his friend approach the
 guard,

And beg admission, eager to be heard:
 Th' affair important, not to be deferr'd. }
 Ascanius bids 'em be conducted in,
 Ord'ring the more experienc'd to begin.
 Then Nisus thus: "Ye fathers, lend your
 ears;

Nor judge our bold attempt beyond our years. ³¹⁰

The foe, securely drench'd in sleep and
 wine,
 Neglect their watch; the fires but thinly
 shine;

And, where the smoke in cloudy vapors
 flies,

Cov'ring the plain, and curling to the skies,
 Betwixt two paths, which at the gate
 divide,

Close by the sea, a passage we have spied,
 Which will our way to great Æneas
 guide. }

Expect each hour to see him safe again,
 Loaded with spoils of foes in battle slain.
 Snatch we the lucky minute while we may;
 Nor can we be mistaken in the way; ³²¹

For, hunting in the vale, we both have seen
 The rising turrets, and the stream between,
 And know the winding course, with ev'ry
 ford."

Heceas'd; and old Alethes took the word:
 "Our country gods, in whom our trust we
 place,

Will yet from ruin save the Trojan race,
 While we behold such dauntless worth appear

In dawning youth, and souls so void of
 fear."

Then into tears of joy the father broke;

Each in his longing arms by turns he took; ³³¹

Panted and paus'd; and thus again he
 spoke:

"Ye brave young men, what equal gifts can we,

In recompense of such desert, decree?

The greatest, sure, and best you can receive,

The gods and your own conscious worth will give.

The rest our grateful gen'ral will bestow,
 And young Ascanius till his manhood owe."

"And I, whose welfare in my father
 lies,"

Ascanius adds, "by the great deities, ³⁴⁰
 By my dear country, by my household
 gods,

By hoary Vesta's rites and dark abodes, Adjure you both, (on you my fortune
 stands;

That and my faith I plight into your
 hands,)

Make me but happy in his safe return,
 Whose wanted presence I can only mourn;
 Your common gift shall two large goblets
 be

Of silver, wrought with curious imagery,
 And high emboss'd, which, when old Priam
 reign'd, ³⁴⁹

My conqu'ring sire at sack'd Arisba gain'd;
 And more, two tripods cast in antic mold,
 With two great talents of the finest gold;
 Beside a costly bowl, ingrav'd with art,
 Which Dido gave, when first she gave her
 heart.

But, if in conquer'd Italy we reign,
 When spoils by lot the victor shall obtain — Thou saw'st the courser by proud Turnus
 press'd:

That, Nisus, and his arms, and nodding
 crest,

And shield, from chance exempt, shall be thy share:
 Twelve lab'ring slaves, twelve handmaids
 young and fair, ³⁶⁰
 All clad in rich attire, and train'd with
 care;
 And, last, a Latian field with fruitful
 plains,
 And a large portion of the king's domains.
 But thou, whose years are more to mine
 allied —

No fate my vow'd affection shall divide
 From thee, heroic youth! Be wholly mine;
 Take full possession; all my soul is thine.
 One faith, one fame, one fate, shall both
 attend;

My life's companion, and my bosom friend:
 My peace shall be committed to thy care, ³⁷⁰
 And to thy conduct my concerns in war."

Then thus the young Euryalus replied:
 "Whatever fortune, good or bad, betide,
 The same shall be my age, as now my
 youth;

No time shall find me wanting to my truth.
 This only from your goodness let me gain
 (And, this ungranted, all rewards are vain):
 Of Priam's royal race my mother came —
 And sure the best that ever bore the name —
 Whom neither Troy nor Sicily could hold ³⁸⁰
 From me departing, but, o'erspent and old,
 My fate she follow'd. Ignorant of this (Whatever) danger, neither parting kiss,
 Nor pious blessing taken, her I leave,
 And in this only act of all my life deceive.
 By this right hand and conscious Night I swear,

My soul so sad a farewell could not bear.
 Be you her comfort; fill my vacant place
 (Permit me to presume so great a grace);
 Support her age, forsaken and distress'd. ³⁹⁰
 That hope alone will fortify my breast
 Against the worst of fortunes, and of fears."
 He said. The mov'd assistants melt in tears.

Then thus Ascanius, wonderstruck to see
 That image of his filial piety:
 "So great beginnings, in so green an age,
 Exact the faith which I again ingage.
 Thy mother all the dues shall justly claim,
 Creüsa had, and only want the name.
 Whate'er event thy bold attempt shall have, ⁴⁰⁰

'T is merit to have borne a son so brave.
 Now by my head, a sacred oath, I swear,
 (My father us'd it,) what, returning here

Crown'd with success, I for thyself prepare,
 That, if thou fail, shall thy lov'd mother
 share."

He said, and weeping, while he spoke the
 word,
 From his broad belt he drew a shining
 sword,
 Magnificent with gold. Lycaon made,
 And in an iv'ry scabbard sheath'd the blade.

This was his gift. Great Mnestheus gave his friend ⁴¹⁰

A lion's hide, his body to defend;
 And good Alethes furnish'd him, beside,
 With his own trusty helm, of temper tried.

Thus arm'd they went. The noble Trojans wait

Their issuing forth, and follow to the gate
 With prayers and vows. Above the rest
 appears

Ascanius, manly far beyond his years,
 And messages committed to their care,
 Which all in winds were lost, and flitting
 air.

The trenches first they pass'd; then took their way ⁴²⁰
 Where their proud foes in pitch'd pavilions
 lay;

To many fatal, ere themselves were slain.
 They found the careless host dispers'd upon
 the plain,

Who, gorg'd, and drunk with wine, supinely
 snore.

Unharness'd chariots stand along the shore:
 Amidst the wheels and reins, the goblet by,
 A medley of debauch and war, they lie.

Observing Nisus shew'd his friend the sight:
 "Behold a conquest gain'd without a fight.

Occasion offers, and I stand prepar'd; ⁴³⁰
 There lies our way: be thou upon the
 guard,

And look around, while I securely go,
 And hew a passage thro' the sleeping foe."
 Softly he spoke; then striding took his way,
 With his drawn sword, where haughty
 Rhamnes lay:

His head rais'd high on tapestry beneath,
 And heaving from his breast, he drew his
 breath;

A king and prophet, by King Turnus lov'd:
 But fate by prescience cannot be remov'd.
 Him and his sleeping slaves he slew; then spies ⁴⁴⁰

Where Remus, with his rich retinue, lies.
 His armor-bearer first, and next he kills

His charioteer, intrench'd betwixt the wheels
 And his lov'd horses; last invades their
 lord;
 Full on his neck he drives the fatal sword:
 The gasping head flies off; a purple flood Flows from the trunk, that welters in the
 blood,
 Which, by the spurning heels dispers'd
 around,
 The bed besprinkles and bedews the ground.
 Lamus the bold, and Lamyus the strong, ⁴⁵⁰
 He slew, and then Serranus fair and young.
 From dice and wine the youth retir'd to
 rest,
 And puff'd the fummy god from out his
 breast:
 Ev'n then he dreamt of drink and lucky
 play —
 More lucky, had it lasted till the day.
 The famish'd lion thus, with hunger bold,
 O'erleaps the fences of the nightly fold,
 And tears the peaceful flocks: with silent awe Trembling they lie, and pant beneath his paw.
 Nor with less rage Euryalus employs ⁴⁶⁰
 The wrathful sword, or fewer foes destroys;
 But on th' ignoble crowd his fury flew:
 He Fadus, Hebesus, and Rhœtus slew.
 Oppress'd with heavy sleep the former
 fall,
 But Rhœtus wakeful, and observing all:
 Behind a spacious jar he slink'd for fear;
 The fatal iron found and reach'd him
 there;
 For, as he rose, it pierc'd his naked side,
 And, reeking, thence return'd in crimson dyed.
 The wound pours out a stream of wine and blood; ⁴⁷⁰
 The purple soul comes floating in the flood.
 Now, where Messapus quarter'd, they arrive.
 The fires were fainting there, and just alive;
 The warrior-horses, tied in order, fed.
 Nisus observ'd the discipline, and said:
 "Our eager thirst of blood may both betray;
 And see the scatter'd streaks of dawning
 day,
 Foe to nocturnal thefts. No more, my
 friend;

Here let our gluttred execution end.
 A lane thro' slaughter'd bodies we have made." ⁴⁸⁰
 The bold Euryalus, tho' loth, obey'd.
 Of arms, and arras, and of plate, they find
 A precious load; but these they leave behind.
 Yet, fond of gaudy spoils, the boy would
 stay
 To make the rich caparison his prey,
 Which on the steed of conquer'd Rham-nes lay. }
 Nor did his eyes less longingly behold
 The girdle-belt, with nails of burnish'd
 gold.
 This present Cædicus the rich bestow'd On Remulus, when friendship first they vow'd, ⁴⁹⁰
 And, absent, join'd in hospitable ties:
 He, dying, to his heir bequeath'd the
 prize;
 Till, by the conqu'ring Ardean troops op-
 press'd,
 He fell; and they the glorious gift possess'd.
 These glitt'ring spoils (now made the victor's gain)
 He to his body suits, but suits in vain:
 Messapus' helm he finds among the rest,
 And laces on, and wears the waving crest.
 Proud of their conquest, prouder of their
 prey,
 They leave the camp, and take the ready
 way. ⁵⁰⁰
 But far they had not pass'd, before they spied
 Three hundred horse, with Volscens for their guide.
 The queen a legion to King Turnus sent;
 But the swift horse the slower foot prevent,
 And now, advancing, sought the leader's
 tent. }
 They saw the pair; for, thro' the doubtful shade,
 His shining helm Euryalus betray'd,
 On which the moon with full reflection
 play'd. }
 "T is not for naught," cried Volscens from
 the crowd,
 "These men go there;" then rais'd his voice aloud: ⁵¹⁰
 "Stand! stand! why thus in arms? And whither bent?
 From whence, to whom, and on what errand
 sent?"

Silent they scud away, and haste their flight
To neighb'ring woods, and trust themselves to night.

The speedy horse all passages belay,
And spur their smoking steeds to cross their
way,

And watch each entrance of the winding
wood.

Black was the forest: thick with beech it
stood,

Horrid with fern, and intricate with thorn;
Few paths of human feet, or tracks of beasts,
were worn. ⁵²⁰

The darkness of the shades, his heavy prey,
And fear, misled the younger from his way.
But Nisus hit the turns with happier haste,
And, thoughtless of his friend, the forest
pass'd,

And Alban plains, from Alba's name so
call'd,

Where King Latinus then his oxen stall'd;
Till, turning at the length, he stood his
ground,

And miss'd his friend, and cast his eyes
around:

"Ah wretch!" he cried, "where have I left
behind

Th' unhappy youth? where shall I hope to find? ⁵³⁰

Or what way take?" Again he ventures
back,

And treads the mazes of his former track.
He winds the wood, and, list'ning, hears the noise

Of trampling coursers, and the riders' voice.
The sound approach'd; and suddenly he
view'd

The foes inclosing, and his friend pursued,
Forelaid and taken, while he strove in vain
The shelter of the friendly shades to gain.
What should he next attempt? what arms

employ,
What fruitless force, to free the captive boy? ⁵⁴⁰

Or desperate should he rush and lose his
life,

With odds oppress'd, in such unequal strife?
Resolv'd at length, his pointed spear he
shook;

And, casting on the moon a mournful look:
"Guardian of groves, and goddess of the
night,

Fair queen," he said, "direct my dart
aright.

If e'er my pious father, for my sake,

Did grateful off'rings on thy altars make,
Or I increas'd them with my sylvan toils,
And hung thy holy roofs with savage spoils, Give me to scatter these." Then from his ear ⁵⁵¹

He pois'd, and aim'd, and launch'd the trembling spear.

The deadly weapon, hissing from the grove,
Impetuous on the back of Sulmo drove;
Pierc'd his thin armor, drank his vital blood,
And in his body left the broken wood.

He staggers round; his eyeballs roll in
death,

And with short sobs he gasps away his
breath.

All stand amaz'd — a second jav'lin flies
With equal strength, and quivers thro' the skies. ⁵⁶⁰

This thro' thy temples, Tagus, forc'd the
way,

And in the brainpan warmly buried lay.
Fierce Volscens foams with rage, and, gazing round,

Descried not him who gave the fatal wound,
Nor knew to fix revenge: "But thou," he
cries,

"Shalt pay for both," and at the pris'ner
flies

With his drawn sword. Then, struck with deep despair,

That cruel sight the lover could not bear;
But from his covert rush'd in open view,
And sent his voice before him as he flew:

"Me! me!" he cried — "turn all your swords alone ⁵⁷¹

On me — the fact confess'd, the fault my
own.

He neither could nor durst, the guiltless
youth:

Ye moon and stars, bear witness to the truth!

His only crime (if friendship can offend)
Is too much love to his unhappy friend."

Too late he speaks: the sword, which fury
guides,

Driv'n with full force, had pierc'd his tender sides.

Down fell the beauteous youth: the yawning
wound

Gush'd out a purple stream, and stain'd the ground. ⁵⁸⁰

His snowy neck reclines upon his breast,
Like a fair flow'r by the keen share op-
press'd;

Like a white poppy sinking on the plain,

Whose heavy head is overcharg'd with rain.
 Despair, and rage, and vengeance justly vow'd,
 Drove Nisus headlong on the hostile crowd.
 Volscens he seeks; on him alone he bends:
 Borne back and bor'd by his surrounding friends,
 Onward he press'd, and kept him still in sight;
 Then whirl'd aloft his sword with all his might;
 Th' unerring steel descended while he spoke,
 Pierc'd his wide mouth, and thro' his weazon broke.
 Dying, he slew; and, stagg'ring on the plain,
 With swimming eyes he sought his lover slain;
 Then quiet on his bleeding bosom fell,
 Content, in death, to be reveng'd so well.
 O happy friends! for, if my verse can give Immortal life, your fame shall ever live,
 Fix'd as the Capitol's foundation lies,
 And spread, where'er the Roman eagle flies!
 The conqu'ring party first divide the prey,
 Then their slain leader to the camp convey.
 With wonder, as they went, the troops were fill'd,
 To see such numbers whom so few had kill'd.
 Serranus, Rhamnes, and the rest, they found:
 Vast crowds the dying and the dead surround;
 And the yet reeking blood o'erflows the ground.
 All knew the helmet which Messapus lost,
 But mourn'd a purchase that so dear had cost.
 Now rose the ruddy morn from Tithon's bed,
 And with the dawns of day the skies o'er-spread;
 Nor long the sun his daily course withheld,
 But added colors to the world reveal'd:
 When early Turnus, wak'ning with the light,
 All clad in armor, calls his troops to fight.
 His martial men with fierce harangue she fir'd,
 And his own ardor in their souls inspir'd.

This done — to give new terror to his foes,
 The heads of Nisus and his friend he shows,
 Rais'd high on pointed spears — a ghastly sight:

Loud peals of shouts ensue, and barbarous delight.

Meantime the Trojans run, where danger calls;
 They line their trenches, and they man their walls.

In front extended to the left they stood;
 Safe was the right, surrounded by the flood.
 But, casting from their tow'rs a frightful view,

They saw the faces, which too well they knew,
 Tho' then disguis'd in death, and smear'd all o'er

With filth obscene, and dropping putrid gore.
 Soon hasty fame thro' the sad city bears
 The mournful message to the mother's ears.
 An icy cold benumbs her limbs; she shakes;
 Her cheeks the blood, her hand the web forsakes.

She runs the rampires round amidst the war,
 Nor fears the flying darts; she rends her hair,

And fills with loud laments the liquid air.
 "Thus, then, my lov'd Euryalus appears!
 Thus looks the prop of my declining years!
 Was't on this face my famish'd eyes I fed?

Ah! how unlike the living is the dead!
 And could'st thou leave me, cruel, thus alone?

Not one kind kiss from a departing son!
 No look, no last adieu before he went,
 In an ill-boding hour to slaughter sent!
 Cold on the ground, and pressing foreign clay,

To Latian dogs and fowls he lies a prey!
 Nor was I near to close his dying eyes,
 To wash his wounds, to weep his obsequies,
 To call about his corpse his crying friends,
 Or spread the mantle (made for other ends)

On his dear body, which I wove with care,
 Nor did my daily pains or nightly labor spare.

Where shall I find his corpse? what earth sustains

His trunk dismember'd, and his cold remains?

For this, alas! I left my needful ease,

Expos'd my life to winds and winter seas !
 If any pity touch Rutulian hearts, Here empty all your quivers, all your darts;
 Or, if they fail, thou, Jove, conclude my
 woe,
 And send me thunderstruck to shades be-
 low ! " 660
 Her shrieks and clamors pierce the Trojans' ears,
 Unman their courage, and augment their
 fears;
 Nor young Ascanius could the sight sus-tain,
 Nor old Ilioneus his tears restrain,
 But Actor and Idæus jointly sent,
 To bear the madding mother to her tent.
 And now the trumpets terribly, from far,
 With rattling clangor, rouse the sleepy
 war.
 The soldiers' shouts succeed the brazen
 sounds;
 And heav'n, from pole to pole, the noise
 rebounds. 670
 The Volscians bear their shields upon their
 head,
 And, rushing forward, form a moving shed.
 These fill the ditch; those pull the bulwarks down:
 Some raise the ladders; others scale the
 town.
 But, where void spaces on the walls ap-
 pear,
 Or thin defense, they pour their forces
 there.
 With poles and missive weapons, from
 afar,
 The Trojans keep aloof the rising war.
 Taught, by their ten years' siege, defensive
 fight,
 They roll down ribs of rocks, an unresisted
 weight, 680
 To break the penthouse with the pond'rous
 blow,
 Which yet the patient Volscians undergo:
 But could not bear th' unequal combat
 long;
 For, where the Trojans find the thickest
 throng,
 The ruin falls: their shatter'd shields give
 way,
 And their crush'd heads become an easy
 prey.
 They shrink for fear, abated of their rage,
 Nor longer dare in a blind fight engage;

Contented now to gall them from below
 With darts and slings, and with the distant
 bow. 690

Elsewhere Mezentius, terrible to view,
 A blazing pine within the trenches threw.
 But brave Messapus, Neptune's warlike
 son,
 Broke down the palisades, the trenches
 won,
 And loud for ladders calls, to scale the
 town.

Calliope, begin ! Ye sacred Nine,
 Inspire your poet in his high design,
 To sing what slaughter manly Turnus
 made,
 What souls he sent below the Stygian
 shade,
 What fame the soldiers with their captain
 share, 700

And the vast circuit of the fatal war;
 For you in singing martial facts excel;
 You best remember, and alone can tell.

There stood a tow'r, amazing to the
 sight,
 Built up of beams, and of stupendous
 height:
 Art, and the nature of the place, conspir'd
 To furnish all the strength that war requir'd.

To level this, the bold Italians join;
 The wary Trojans obviate their design;
 With weighty stones o'erwhelm their troops
 below, 710
 Shoot thro' the loopholes, and sharp jav'lines
 throw.

Turnus, the chief, toss'd from his thund'ring hand,
 Against the wooden walls, a flaming brand:
 It stuck, the fiery plague; the winds were
 high;
 The planks were season'd, and the timber
 dry.

Contagion caught the posts; it spread
 along,
 Scorch'd, and to distance drove the scatter'd
 throng.

The Trojans fled; the fire pursued amain, Still gath'ring fast upon the trembling
 train; 719

Till, crowding to the corners of the wall,
 Down the defense and the defenders fall.
 The mighty flaw makes heav'n itself re-
 sound:

The dead and dying Trojans strew the
 ground.

The tow'r, that follow'd on the fallen crew, Whelm'd o'er their heads, and buried whom it slew:

Some stuck upon the darts themselves had
sent;

All the same equal ruin underwent.

Young Lycus and Helenor only scape; Sav'd — how, they know not — from the steepy leap.

Helenor, elder of the two: by birth, 730
On one side royal, one a son of earth,
Whom to the Lydian king Licymnia bare,
And sent her boasted bastard to the war
(A privilege which none but freemen
share).

Slight were his arms, a sword and silver
shield:

No marks of honor charg'd its empty field.
Light as he fell, so light the youth arose,
And rising, found himself amidst his foes;
Nor flight was left, nor hopes to force his
way.

Embolden'd by despair, he stood at bay; 740
And — like a stag, whom all the troop surrounds

Of eager huntsmen and invading hounds —
Resolv'd on death, he dissipates his fears,
And bounds aloft against the pointed spears:

So dares the youth, secure of death; and
throws

His dying body on his thickest toes.

But Lycus, swifter of his feet by far,
Runs, doubles, winds, and turns, amidst the
war;

Springs to the walls, and leaves his foes
behind, 749

And snatches at the beam he first can find;
Looks up, and leaps aloft at all the stretch,
In hopes the helping hand of some kind friend to reach.

But Turnus follow'd hard his hunted prey (His spear had almost reach'd him in the
way,

Short of his reins, and scarce a span behind):

"Fool!" said the chief, "tho' fleetier than
the wind,

Couldst thou presume to scape, when I
pursue?"

He said, and downward by the feet he
drew

The trembling dastard; at the tug he falls;
Vast ruins come along, rent from the smoking walls. 760

Thus on some silver swan, or tim'rous
hare,

Jove's bird comes sousing down from upper air;

Her crooked talons truss the fearful prey:
Then out of sight she soars, and wings her
way.

So seizes the grim wolf the tender lamb,
In vain lamented by the bleating dam.

Then rushing onward, with a barb'rous
cry,

The troops of Turnus to the combat fly.

The ditch with fagots fill'd, the daring
foe

Toss'd firebrands to the steepy turrets
throw. 770

Ilioneus, as bold Lucetius came

To force the gate, and feed the kindling
flame,

Roll'd down the fragment of a rock so
right,

It crush'd him double underneath the weight.

Two more young Liger and Asylas slew: }
To bend the bow young Liger better
knew;

Asylas best the pointed jav'lin threw. }

Brave Cæneus laid Ortygius on the plain;

The victor Cæneus was by Turnus slain.

By the same hand, Clonius and Itys fall, 780
Sagar, and Ida, standing on the wall.

From Capys' arms his fate Privernus found:
Hurt by Themilla first — but slight the
wound —

His shield thrown by, to mitigate the
smart,

He clapp'd his hand upon the wounded
part:

The second shaft came swift and unespied,
And pierc'd his hand, and nail'd it to his
side,

Transfix'd his breathing lungs and beating
heart:

The soul came issuing out, and hiss'd against the dart.

The son of Arcens shone amid the rest,
In glitt'ring armor and a purple vest, 791

(Fair was his face, his eyes inspiring love,)

Bred by his father in the Martian grove,

Where the fat altars of Palicus flame,

And sent in arms to purchase early fame.

Him when he spied from far, the Tuscan
king

Laid by the lance, and took him to the sling,

Thrice whirl'd the thong around his head,
and threw:

The heated lead half melted as it flew;
It pierc'd his hollow temples and his brain;
The youth came tumbling down, and spurn'd the plain. 801

Then young Ascanius, who, before this
day,
Was wont in woods to shoot the savage
prey,

First bent in martial strife the twanging
bow,

And exercis'd against a human foe —
With this bereft Numanus of his life,
Who Turnus' younger sister took to wife.
Proud of his realm, and of his royal
bride,

Vaunting before his troops, and lengthen'd with a stride, }
In these insulting terms the Trojans he defied: 810

"Twice-conquer'd cowards, now your shame is shown —

Coop'd up a second time within your town !
Who dare not issue forth in open field,
But hold your walls before you for a shield.
Thus threat you war ? thus our alliance
force ?

What gods, what madness, hether steer'd your course ?

You shall not find the sons of Atreus here,
Nor need the frauds of sly Ulysses fear.
Strong from the cradle, of a sturdy brood,
We bear our newborn infants to the flood;
There bath'd amid the stream, our boys we
hold, 821

With winter harden'd, and inur'd to cold.
They wake before the day to range the
wood,

Kill ere they eat, nor taste unconquer'd
food.

No sports, but what belong to war, they
know:

To break the stubborn colt, to bend the
bow.

Our youth, of labor patient, earn their
bread;

Hardly they work, with frugal diet fed.
From plows and harrows sent to seek re-
nown,

They fight in fields, and storm the shaken
town. 830

No part of life from toils of war is free,
No change in age, or diff'rence in degree.
We plow and till in arms; our oxen feel,

Instead of goads, the spur and pointed
steel;

Th' inverted lance makes furrows in the
plain.

Ev'n time, that changes all, yet changes us
in vain:

The body, not the mind; nor can control
Th' immortal vigor, or abate the soul.
Our helms defend the young, disguise the gray:

We live by plunder, and delight in prey.
Your vests embroider'd with rich purple
shine; 841

In sloth you glory, and in dances join.
Your vests have sweeping sleeves; with female pride

Your turbants underneath your chins are tied.

Go, Phrygians, to your Dindymus again !
Go, less than women, in the shapes of men !
Go, mix'd with eunuchs, in the Mother's rites,

Where with unequal sound the flute invites;

Sing, dance, and howl, by turns, in Ida's
shade:

Resign the war to men, who know the martial trade !" 850

This foul reproach Ascanius could not
hear

With patience, or a vow'd revenge forbear.
At the full stretch of both his hands he
drew,

And almost join'd the horns of the tough
yew.

But, first, before the throne of Jove he
stood,

And thus with lifted hands invok'd the
god:

"My first attempt, great Jupiter, succeed !

An annual off'ring in thy grove shall bleed;
A snow-white steer, before thy altar led,
Who, like his mother, bears aloft his head,
Butts with his threat'ning brows, and bel-lowing stands, 861

And dares the fight, and spurns the yellow
sands."

Jove bow'd the heav'ns, and lent a gracious ear,

And thunder'd on the left, amidst the clear.

Sounded at once the bow; and swiftly flies
The feather'd death, and hisses thro' the
skies.

The steel thro' both his temples fore'd the way:

Extended on the ground, Numanus lay.

"Go now, vain boaster, and true valor scorn!

The Phrygians, twice subdued, yet make this third return." ⁸⁷⁰

Ascanius said no more. The Trojans shake
The heav'n's with shouting, and new vigor take.

Apollo then bestrode a golden cloud,
To view the feats of arms, and fighting crowd;
And thus the beardless victor he bespoke aloud:

"Advance, illustrious youth, increase in fame,

And wide from east to west extend thy name;

Offspring of gods thyself; and Rome shall owe

To thee a race of demigods below.

This is the way to heav'n: the pow'rs divine ⁸⁸⁰

From this beginning date the Julian line.

To thee, to them, and their victorious heirs,
The conquer'd war is due, and the vast world is theirs.

Troy is too narrow for thy name." He said,

And plunging downward shot his radiant head;

Dispell'd the breathing air, that broke his flight:

Shorn of his beams, a man to mortal sight.

Old Butes' form he took, Anchises' squire,

Now left, to rule Ascanius, by his sire:

His wrinkled visage, and his hoary hairs,
His mien, his habit, and his arms, he wears, ⁸⁹¹

And thus salutes the boy, too forward for his years:

"Suffice it thee, thy father's worthy son,

The warlike prize thou hast already won.

The god of archers gives thy youth a part
Of his own praise, nor envies equal art.

Now tempt the war no more." He said, and flew

Obscure in air, and vanish'd from their view.

The Trojans, by his arms, their patron know,

And hear the twanging of his heav'nly bow.

Then duteous force they use, and Phœbus' name, ⁹⁰¹

To keep from fight the youth too fond of fame.

Undaunted, they themselves no danger shun;

From wall to wall the shouts and clamors run.

They bend their bows; they whirl their slings around;

Heaps of spent arrows fall, and strew the ground;

And helms, and shields, and rattling arms resound.

The combat thickens, like the storm that flies

From westward, when the show'ry Kids arise;

Or pat'ring hail comes pouring on the main, ⁹¹⁰

When Jupiter descends in harden'd rain,
Or bellowing clouds burst with a stormy sound,

And with an armed winter strew the ground.

Pand'rus and Bitias, thunderbolts of war,
Whom Hiera to bold Alcanor bare

On Ida's top, two youths of height and size

Like firs that on their mother mountain rise,

Presuming on their force, the gates unbar,
And of their own accord invite the war.

With fates averse, against their king's command, ⁹²¹

Arm'd, on the right and on the left they stand,

And flank the passage: shining steel they wear,

And waving crests above their heads appear.

Thus two tall oaks, that Padus' banks adorn,

Lift up to heav'n their leafy heads unshorn,
And, overpress'd with nature's heavy load,

Dance to the whistling winds, and at each other nod.

In flows a tide of Latians, when they see
The gate set open, and the passage free;

Bold Quercens, with rash Tmarus, rushing on, ⁹³⁰

Equiculus, that in bright armor shone,
And Hæmon first; but soon repuls'd they fly,

Or in the well-defended pass they die.

These with success are fir'd, and those with rage,

And each on equal terms at length ingage.
 Drawn from their lines, and issuing on the
 plain,
 The Trojans hand to hand the fight maintain.

Fierce Turnus in another quarter fought,
 When suddenly th' unhop'd-for news was
 brought,

The foes had left the fastness of their
 place,
 Prevail'd in fight, and had his men in chase.

He quits th' attack, and, to prevent their
 fate,
 Runs where the giant brothers guard the
 gate.

The first he met, Antiphates the brave,
 But base-begotten on a Theban slave,
 Sarpedon's son, he slew: the deadly dart Found passage thro' his breast, and pierc'd
 his heart.

Fix'd in the wound th' Italian cornel stood,
 Warm'd in his lungs, and in his vital blood.
 Aphidnus next, and Erymanthus dies, ⁹⁵⁰
 And Meropes, and the gigantic size
 Of Bitias, threat'ning with his ardent
 eyes.

Not by the feeble dart he fell oppress'd
 (A dart were lost within that roomy
 breast),

But from a knotted lance, large, heavy,
 strong,
 Which roar'd like thunder as it whirl'd
 along:

Not two bull hides th' impetuous force withhold,
 Nor coat of double mail, with scales of
 gold.

Down sunk the monster bulk and press'd
 the ground;

His arms and clatt'ring shield on the vast body sound, ⁹⁶⁰

Not with less ruin than the Bajan mole,
 Rais'd on the seas, the surges to control —
 At once comes tumbling down the rocky wall;

Prone to the deep, the stones disjointed fall
 Of the vast pile; the scatter'd ocean flies;
 Black sands, discolord froth, and mingled mud arise:

The frighted billows roll, and seek the
 shores;

Then trembles Prochyta, then Ischia roars:
 Typhœus, thrown beneath, by Jove's command,

Astonish'd at the flaw that shakes the land, ⁹⁷⁰

Soon shifts his weary side, and, scarce
 awake,

With wonder feels the weight press lighter on his back.

The warrior god the Latian troops in-
 spir'd,

New strung their sinews, and their courage
 fir'd,

But chills the Trojan hearts with cold
 affright:

Then black despair precipitates their flight.

When Pandarus beheld his brother kill'd,
 The town with fear and wild confusion
 fill'd,

He turns the hinges of the heavy gate
 With both his hands, and adds his shoulders to the weight; ⁹⁸⁰

Some happier friends within the walls in-
 clos'd;

The rest shut out, to certain death expos'd:
 Fool as he was, and frantic in his care,
 T' admit young Turnus, and include the
 war!

He thrust amid the crowd, securely bold,
 Like a fierce tiger pent amid the fold.

Too late his blazing buckler they descry,
 And sparkling fires that shot from either
 eye,

His mighty members, and his ample breast,
 His rattling armor, and his crimson crest.

Far from that hated face the Trojans fly, ⁹⁹¹

All but the fool who sought his destiny.
 Mad Pandarus steps forth, with vengeance
 vow'd

For Bitias' death, and threatens thus aloud:
 "These are not Ardea's walls, nor this the
 town

Amata proffers with Lavinia's crown:
 'Tis hostile earth you tread. Of hope bereft,

No means of safe return by flight are left."
 To whom, with count'nance calm, and soul
 sedate,

Thus Turnus: "Then begin, and try thy fate: ¹⁰⁰⁰

My message to the ghost of Priam bear;
 Tell him a new Achilles sent thee there."

A lance of tough ground ash the Trojan
 threw,

Rough in the rind, and knotted as it grew:
 With his full force he whirl'd it first
 around;

But the soft yielding air receiv'd the wound:

Imperial Juno turn'd the course before,
And fix'd the wand'ring weapon in the door.

"But hope not thou," said Turnus, "when I strike,

To shun thy fate: our force is not alike,
Nor thy steel temper'd by the Lemnian god."

Then rising, on his utmost stretch he stood,
And aim'd from high: the full descending blow

Cleaves the broad front and beardless cheeks in two.

Down sinks the giant with a thund'ring sound:

His pond'rous limbs oppress the trembling ground;

Blood, brains, and foam gush from the gaping wound:

Scalp, face, and shoulders the keen steel divides,

And the shar'd visage hangs on equal sides.
The Trojans fly from their approaching fate;

And, had the victor then secur'd the gate,
And to his troops without unclos'd the bars,
One lucky day had ended all his wars.

But boiling youth, and blind desire of blood,

Push'd on his fury, to pursue the crowd.
Hamstring'd behind, unhappy Gyges died;
Then Phalaris is added to his side.

The pointed jav'lins from the dead he drew,
And their friends' arms against their fellows threw.

Strong Halys stands in vain; weak Phlegys flies;

Saturnia, still at hand, new force and fire supplies.

Then Halius, Prytanis, Alcander fall —
Ingag'd against the foes who scal'd the wall:

But, whom they fear'd without, they found within.

At last, tho' late, by Lynceus he was seen.
He calls new succors, and assaults the prince:

But weak his force, and vain is their defense.

Turn'd to the right, his sword the hero drew,

And at one blow the bold aggressor slew.
He joints the neck; and, with a stroke so strong,

The helm flies off, and bears the head along.

Next him, the huntsman Amycus he kill'd,
In darts invenom'd and in poison skill'd.

Then Clytius fell beneath his fatal spear,
And Creteus, whom the Muses held so dear:

He fought with courage, and he sung the fight;

Arms were his bus'ness, verses his delight.
The Trojan chiefs behold, with rage and grief,

Their slaughter'd friends, and hasten their relief.

Bold Mnestheus rallies first the broken train,

Whom brave Seresthus and his troop sustain.

To save the living, and revenge the dead,
Against one warrior's arms all Troy they led.

"O, void of sense and courage!" Mnestheus cried,

"Where can you hope your coward heads to hide?

Ah! where beyond these rampires can you run?

One man, and in your camp inclos'd, you shun!

Shall then a single sword such slaughter boast,

And pass unpunish'd from a num'rous host?
Forsaking honor, and renouncing fame,

Your gods, your country, and your king you shame!"

This just reproach their virtue does excite:
They stand, they join, they thicken to the fight.

Now Turnus doubts, and yet disdains to yield,

But with slow paces measures back the field.

And inches to the walls, where Tiber's tide,

Washing the camp, defends the weaker side.

The more he loses, they advance the more,
And tread in ev'ry step he trod before.

They shout: they bear him back; and, whom by might

They cannot conquer, they oppress with weight.

As, compass'd with a wood of spears around,

The lordly lion still maintains his ground;

Grins horrible, retires, and turns again;
Threats his distended paws, and shakes his mane;

He loses while in vain he presses on,
Nor will his courage let him dare to run:
So Turnus fares, and, unresolv'd of flight, Moves tardy back, and just recedes from
fight.

Yet twice, inrag'd, the combat he renews,
Twice breaks, and twice his broken foes
pursues. 1081

But now they swarm, and, with fresh troops
supplied,

Come rolling on, and rush from ev'ry side:
Nor Juno, who sustain'd his arms before,
Dares with new strength suffice th' exhausted store;

For Jove, with sour commands, sent Iris
down,
To force th' invader from the frightened
town.

With labor spent, no longer can he wield
The heavy fauchion, or sustain the shield, O'erwhelm'd with darts, which from afar
they fling: 1090

The weapons round his hollow temples ring;

His golden helm gives way, with stony
blows

Batter'd, and flat, and beaten to his brows.
His crest is rash'd away; his ample shield
Is falsified, and round with jav'lines fill'd.

The foe, now faint, the Trojans overwhelm;

And Mnestheus lays hard load upon his helm.

Sick sweat succeeds; he drops at ev'ry
pore;

With driving dust his cheeks are pasted
o'er;

Shorter and shorter ev'ry gasp he takes;
And vain efforts and hurtless blows he makes. 1101

Arm'd as he was, at length he leap'd from
high,

Plung'd in the flood, and made the waters
fly.

The yellow god the welcome burthen
bore,

And wip'd the sweat, and wash'd away the
gore;

Then gently wafts him to the farther
coast,

And sends him safe to cheer his anxious
host.

THE TENTH BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

Jupiter, calling a council of the gods, forbids them to engage in either party. At Æneas's return there is a bloody battle: Turnus killing Pallas; Æneas, Lausus and Mezentius. Mezentius is describ'd as an atheist; Lausus, as a pious and virtuous youth. The different actions and death of these two are the subject of a noble episode.

THE gates of heav'n unfold: Jove summons
all

The gods to council in the common hall.
Sublimely seated, he surveys from far
The fields, the camp, the fortune of the war,
And all th' inferior world. From first to
last,

The sov'reign senate in degrees are plac'd.
Then thus th' almighty sire began: "Ye
gods,

Natives or denizens of blest abodes,
From whence these murmurs, and this change of mind,

This backward fate from what was first
design'd? 10

Why this protracted war, when my commands

Pronounc'd a peace, and gave the Latian
lands?

What fear or hope on either part divides
Our heav'ns, and arms our pow'rs on diff'rent sides?

A lawful time of war at length will come, (Nor need your haste anticipate the doom,)

When Carthage shall contend the world with Rome,

Shall force the rigid rocks and Alpine chains,
And, like a flood, come pouring on the plains.

Then is your time for faction and debate,
For partial favor, and permitted hate. 21

Let now your immature dissension cease;
Sit quiet, and compose your souls to peace."

Thus Jupiter in few unfolds the charge;
But lovely Venus thus replies at large:

"O pow'r immense, eternal energy,
(For to what else protection can we fly?)
Seest thou the proud Rutulians, how they
dare

In fields, unpunish'd, and insult my care?
How lofty Turnus vaunts amidst his train,

In shining arms, triumphant on the plain ? 31
Ev'n in their lines and trenches they contend,

And scarce their walls the Trojan troops defend:

The town is fill'd with slaughter, and o'er-floats,

With a red deluge, their increasing moats.
Æneas, ignorant, and far from thence,
Has left a camp expos'd, without defense.
This endless outrage shall they still sustain ?
Shall Troy renew'd be forc'd and fir'd again ?

A second siege my banish'd issue fears, 40
And a new Diomede in arms appears.

One more audacious mortal will be found;
And I, thy daughter, wait another wound.

Yet, if with fates averse, without thy leave,
The Latian lands my progeny receive,

Bear they the pains of violated law,
And thy protection from their aid withdraw.

But, if the gods their sure success foretell;
If those of heav'n consent with those of hell,

To promise Italy; who dare debate 50
The pow'r of Jove, or fix another fate ?

What should I tell of tempests on the main,
Of Æolus usurping Neptune's reign ?

Of Iris sent, with Bacchanalian heat
T' inspire the matrons, and destroy the fleet ?

Now Juno to the Stygian sky descends,
Solicits hell for aid, and arms the fiends.

That new example wanted yet above:
An act that well became the wife of Jove !

Alecto, rais'd by her, with rage inflames 60
The peaceful bosoms of the Latian dames.

Imperial sway no more exalts my mind;
(Such hopes I had indeed, while Heav'n was kind;)

Now let my happier foes possess my place,
Whom Jove prefers before the Trojan race;

And conquer they, whom you with conquest grace.

Since you can spare, from all your wide command,

No spot of earth, no hospitable land,
Which may my wand'ring fugitives receive;

(Since haughty Juno will not give you leave;)

Then, father, (if I still may use that name,) 70
By ruin'd Troy, yet smoking from the flame,

I beg you, let Ascanius, by my care,

Be freed from danger, and dismiss'd the war:

Inglorious let him live, without a crown:
The father may be cast on coasts unknown,
Struggling with fate; but let me save the son.

Mine is Cythera, mine the Cyprian tow'rs:
In those recesses, and those sacred bow'rs,

Obscurely let him rest; his right resign 80
To promis'd empire, and his Julian line.

Then Carthage may th' Ausonian towns destroy,

Nor fear the race of a rejected boy.
What profits it my son to scape the fire,

Arm'd with his gods, and loaded with his sire;

To pass the perils of the seas and wind;
Evade the Greeks, and leave the war behind;

To reach th' Italian shores; if, after all,
Our second Pergamus is doom'd to fall ?

Much better had he curb'd his high desires,

And hover'd o'er his ill-extinguish'd fires. 90
To Simois' banks the fugitives restore,

And give them back to war, and all the woes before."

Deep indignation swell'd Saturnia's heart:
"And must I own," she said, "my secret smart —

What with more decency were in silence kept,

And, but for this unjust reproach, had slept ?
Did god or man your fav'rite son advise,

With war unhop'd the Latians to surprise ?
By fate, you boast, and by the gods' decree,

He left his native land for Italy ! 101
Confess the truth; by mad Cassandra, more

Than Heav'n inspir'd, he sought a foreign shore !

Did I persuade to trust his second Troy
To the raw conduct of a heedless boy,

With walls unfinish'd, which himself forsakes,

And thro' the waves a wand'ring voyage takes ?

When have I urg'd him meanly to demand
The Tuscan aid, and arm a quiet land ?

Did I or Iris give this mad advice, 110
Or made the fool himself the fatal choice ?

You think it hard, the Latians should destroy

With swords your Trojans, and with fires your Troy !

Hard and unjust indeed, for men to draw

Their native air, nor take a foreign law !
That Turnus is permitted still to live,
To whom his birth a god and goddess give !
But yet 'tis just and lawful for your line
To drive their fields, and force with fraud to join;

Realms, not your own, among your clans
divide,
And from the bridegroom tear the promis'd
bride;

Petition, while you public arms prepare;
Pretend a peace, and yet provoke a war !
'T was giv'n to you, your darling son to shroud,

To draw the dastard from the fighting
crowd,

And, for a man, obtend an empty cloud.
From flaming fleets you turn'd the fire
away,

And chang'd the ships to daughters of the
sea.

But 't is my crime — the Queen of Heav'n offends,

If she presume to save her suff'ring
friends !

Your son, not knowing what his foes decree,
You say, is absent: absent let him be.

Yours is Cythera, yours the Cyprian tow'rs,
The soft recesses, and the sacred bow'rs.

Why do you then these needless arms pre-
pare,

And thus provoke a people prone to war ?

Did I with fire the Trojan town deface,

Or hinder from return your exil'd race ?

Was I the cause of mischief, or the man

Whose lawless lust the fatal war began ?

Think on whose faith th' adult'rous youth relied;

Who promis'd, who procur'd, the Spartan
bride ?

When all th' united states of Greece com-
bin'd,

To purge the world of the perfidious kind,
Then was your time to fear the Trojan
fate:

Your quarrels and complaints are now too
late."

Thus Juno. Murmurs rise, with mix'd
applause,

Just as they favor or dislike the cause.

So winds, when yet unfledg'd in woods they
lie,

In whispers first their tender voices try, ¹⁵⁰
Then issue on the main with bellowing rage,
And storms to trembling mariners presage.

Then thus to both replied th' imperial
god,
Who shakes heav'n's axles with his awful nod.

(When he begins, the silent senate stand
With rev'rence, list'ning to the dread command:

The clouds dispel; the winds their breath
restrain;

And the hush'd waves lie flatted on the
main.)

"Celestials, your attentive ears incline !

Since," said the god, "the Trojans must not join

In wish'd alliance with the Latian line;

Since endless jarrings and immortal hate

Tend but to discompose our happy state;

The war henceforward be resign'd to fate:

Each to his proper fortune stand or fall;

Equal and unconcern'd I look on all.

Rutulians, Trojans, are the same to me;

And both shall draw the lots their fates
decree.

Let these assault, if Fortune be their
friend;

And, if she favors those, let those defend:

'The Fates will find their way.' The Thun-
d'rer said,

And shook the sacred honors of his head,

Attesting Styx, th' inviolable flood,

And the black regions of his brother god.

Trembled the poles of heav'n, and earth

confess'd the nod.

This end the sessions had: the senate rise,
And to his palace wait their sov'reign thro'
the skies.

Meantime, intent upon their siege, the
foes

Within their walls the Trojan host inclose:

They wound, they kill, they watch at ev'ry
gate;

Renew the fires, and urge their happy fate.

Th' Æneans wish in vain their wanted
chief,

Hopeless of flight, more hopeless of relief.

Thin on the tow'rs they stand; and ev'n those few

A feeble, fainting, and dejected crew.

Yet in the face of danger some there stood:

The two bold brothers of Sarpedon's blood,

Asius and Æmon; both th' Assaraci;

Young Hæmon, and tho' young, resolv'd to
die.

With these were Clarus and Thymætus
join'd;

Tibris and Castor, both of Lycian kind.
From Acmon's hands a rolling stone there
came,

So large, it half deserv'd a mountain's
name:

Strong-sinew'd was the youth, and big of
bone;

His brother Mnestheus could not more have done,

Or the great father of th' intrepid son.

Some firebrands throw, some flights of arrows send;

And some with darts, and some with stones defend.

Amid the press appears the beauteous
boy,

The care of Venus, and the hope of Troy. 200

His lovely face unarm'd, his head was bare;

In ringlets o'er his shoulders hung his hair.

His forehead circled with a diadem;

Distinguish'd from the crowd, he shines a gem,

Enchas'd in gold, or polish'd iv'ry set,

Amidst the meaner foil of sable jet.

Nor Ismarus was wanting to the war,

Directing ointed arrows from afar,

And death with poison arm'd—in Lydia
born,

Where plenteous harvests the fat fields
adorn; 210

Where proud Pactolus floats the fruitful
lands,

And leaves a rich manure of golden sands.

There Capys, author of the Capuan name,

And there was Mnestheus too, increas'd
in fame,

Since Turnus from the camp he cast with
shame.

Thus mortal war was wag'd on either side.

Meantime the hero cuts the nightly tide:

For, anxious, from Evander when he went,

He sought the Tyrrhene camp, and Tar-chon's tent;

Expos'd the cause of coming to the chief; 220

His name and country told, and ask'd relief;

Propos'd the terms; his own small strength
declar'd;

What vengeance proud Mezentius had pre-
par'd;

What Turnus, bold and violent, design'd;

Then shew'd the slipp'ry state of human-
kind,

And fickle fortune; warn'd him to beware,

And to his wholesome counsel added pray'r.

Tarchon, without delay, the treaty signs,

And to the Trojan troops the Tuscan joins.

They soon set sail; nor now the fates
withstand; 230

Their forces trusted with a foreign hand.

Æneas leads; upon his stern appear

Two lions carv'd, which rising Ida
bear—

Ida, to wand'ring Trojans ever dear.

Under their grateful shade Æneas sate,

Revolving war's events, and various fate.

His left young Pallas kept, fix'd to his side,

And oft of winds enquir'd, and of the tide;

Oft of the stars, and of their wat'ry way;

And what he suffer'd both by land and
sea. 240

Now, sacred sisters, open all your spring!

The Tuscan leaders, and their army sing,

Which follow'd great Æneas to the war:

Their arms, their numbers, and their names,
declare.

A thousand youths brave Massicus obey,

Borne in the Tiger thro' the foaming sea;

From Asium brought, and Cosa, by his care:

For arms, light quivers, bows and shafts,
they bear.

Fierce Abas next: his men bright armor
wore;

His stern Apollo's golden statue bore. 250

Six hundred Populonia sent along,

All skill'd in martial exercise, and strong.

Three hundred more for battle Ilva joins,

An isle renown'd for steel, and unexhausted mines.

Asylas on his prow the third appears,

Who heav'n interprets, and the wand'ring stars;

From offer'd entrails prodigies expounds,

And peals of thunder, with presaging sounds.

A thousand spears in warlike order stand,

Sent by the Pisans under his command. 260

Fair Astur follows in the wat'ry field,

Proud of his manag'd horse and painted
shield.

Graviscæ, noisome from the neighb'ring fen,

And his own Cære, sent three hundred men;

With those which Minio's fields and Pyrgi
gave,

All bred in arms, unanimous, and brave.

Thou, Muse, the name of Cinyras renew,

And brave Cupavo follow'd but by few;

Whose helm confess'd the lineage of the
man,

And bore, with wings display'd, a silver swan. 270

Love was the fault of his fam'd ancestry,

Whose forms and fortunes in his ensigns fly.
For Cyenus lov'd unhappy Phaeton,
And sung his loss in poplar groves, alone,
Beneath the sister shades, to soothe his grief.
Heav'n heard his song, and hasten'd his relief,

And chang'd to snowy plumes his hoary hair,
And wing'd his flight, to chant aloft in air.
His son Cupavo brush'd the briny flood:
Upon his stern a brawny Centaur stood, ²⁸⁰
Who heav'd a rock, and, threat'ning still to throw,

With lifted hands alarm'd the seas below:
They seem'd to fear the formidable sight,
And roll'd their billows on, to speed his flight.

Ocnus was next, who led his native train
Of hardy warriors thro' the wat'ry plain:
The son of Manto by the Tuscan stream,
From whence the Mantuan town derives the name —

An ancient city, but of mix'd descent:
Three sev'ral tribes compose the government; ²⁹⁰

Four towns are under each; but all obey
The Mantuan laws, and own the Tuscan sway.

Hate to Mezentius arm'd five hundred more,	}
Whom Mincius from his sire Benacus bore:
Mincius, with wreaths of reeds his fore- head cover'd o'er.

These grave Auletes leads: a hundred sweep

With stretching oars at once the glassy deep.

Him and his martial train the Triton bears;
High on his poop the sea-green god appears:
Frowning he seems his crooked shell to sound, ³⁰⁰

And at the blast the billows dance around.

A hairy man above the waist he shows;
A porpoise tail beneath his belly grows;
And ends a fish: his breast the waves divides,

And froth and foam augment the murm'ring
tides.

Full thirty ships transport the chosen
train

For Troy's relief, and scour the briny main.

Now was the world forsaken by the sun,
And Phœbe half her nightly race had run.
The careful chief, who never clos'd his eyes, ³¹⁰

Himself the rudder holds, the sails supplies.

A choir of Nereids meet him on the flood,
Once his own galleys, hewn from Ida's
wood;

But now, as many nymphs, the sea they sweep,

As rode, before, tall vessels on the deep.
They know him from afar; and in a ring
Inclose the ship that bore the Trojan king.
Cymodoce, whose voice excell'd the rest,
Above the waves advanc'd her snowy
breast;

Her right hand stops the stern; her left divides ³²⁰

The curling ocean, and corrects the tides.
She spoke for all the choir, and thus began With pleasing words to warn th' unknow-ing man:

"Sleeps our lov'd lord? O goddess-born,
awake!

Spread ev'ry sail, pursue your wat'ry track,
And haste your course. Your navy once were we,

From Ida's height descending to the sea;
Till Turnus, as at anchor fix'd we stood,
Presum'd to violate our holy wood.

Then, loos'd from shore, we fled his fires
profane ³³⁰

(Unwillingly we broke our master's chain),

And since have sought you thro' the Tuscan main.

The mighty Mother chang'd our forms to these,

And gave us life immortal in the seas.

But young Ascanius, in his camp distress'd,
By your insulting foes is hardly press'd.

Th' Arcadian horsemen, and Etrurian host,
Advance in order on the Latian coast:

To cut their way the Daunian chief designs,
Before their troops can reach the Trojan lines. ³⁴⁰

Thou, when the rosy morn restores the
light,

First arm thy soldiers for th' ensuing fight:
Thyself the fated sword of Vulcan wield,
And bear aloft th' impenetrable shield.

To-morrow's sun, unless my skill be vain,
Shall see huge heaps of foes in battle slain."

Parting, she spoke; and with immortal
force

Push'd on the vessel in her wat'ry course;
For well she knew the way. Impell'd behind,

The ship flew forward, and outstripp'd the wind. ³⁵⁰

The rest make up. Unknowing of the
cause,

The chief admires their speed, and happy
omens draws.

Then thus he pray'd, and fix'd on heav'n
his eyes:

"Hear thou, great Mother of the deities,
With turrets crown'd! (on Ida's holy hill Fierce tigers, rein'd and curb'd, obey thy will.)

Firm thy own omens; lead us on to fight;
And let thy Phrygians conquer in thy right."

He said no more. And now renewing day ³⁵⁹

Had chas'd the shadows of the night away.

He charg'd the soldiers, with preventing
care,

Their flags to follow, and their arms pre-
pare;

Warn'd of th' ensuing fight, and bade 'em
hope the war.

Now, from his lofty poop, he view'd below
His camp incompass'd, and th' inclosing
foe.

His blazing shield, imbrac'd, he held on
high;

The camp receive the sign, and with loud
shouts reply.

Hope arms their courage: from their tow'rs
they throw

Their darts with double force, and drive
the foe.

Thus, at the signal giv'n, the cranes arise ³⁷⁰
Before the stormy south, and blacken all
the skies.

King Turnus wonder'd at the fight re-
new'd,

Till, looking back, the Trojan fleet he
view'd,

The seas with swelling canvas cover'd o'er,
And the swift ships descending on the shore.

The Latians saw from far, with dazzled
eyes,

The radiant crest that seem'd in flames to risé,

And dart diffusive fires around the field,
And the keen glitt'ring of the golden
shield.

Thus threat'ning comets, when by night they rise, ³⁸⁰

Shoot sanguine streams, and sadden all the
skies:

So Sirius, flashing forth sinister lights,

Pale humankind with plagues and with dry famine frights.

Yet Turnus with undaunted mind is bent
To man the shores, and hinder their descent,

And thus awakes the courage of his friends:
"What you so long have wish'd, kind Fortune sends;

In ardent arms to meet th' invading foe:
You find, and find him at advantage now.

Yours is the day: you need but only dare;
Your swords will make you masters of the war. ³⁹¹

Your sires, your sons, your houses, and your
lands,

And dearest wives, are all within your
hands.

Be mindful of the race from whence you
came,

And emulate in arms your fathers' fame.

Now take the time, while stagg'ring yet they stand

With feet unfirm, and prepossess the strand: Fortune befriends the bold." Nor more
he said,

But balanc'd whom to leave, and whom to
lead;

Then these elects, the landing to prevent;
And those he leaves, to keep the city
pent. ⁴⁰¹

Meantime the Trojan sends his troops
ashore:

Some are by boats expos'd, by bridges more.
With lab'ring oars they bear along the
strand,

Where the tide languishes, and leap aland.

Tarchon observes the coast with careful
eyes,

And, where no ford he finds, no water
fries,

Nor billows with unequal murmurs roar,
But smoothly slide along, and swell the
shore,

That course he steer'd, and thus he gave command: ⁴¹⁰

"Here ply your oars, and at all hazard
land:

Force on the vessel, that her keel may
wound

This hated soil, and furrow hostile ground.
Let me securely land — I ask no more;

Then sink my ships, or shatter on the
shore."

This fiery speech inflames his fearful
friends:

They tug at ev'ry oar, and ev'ry stretcher
bends;

They run their ships aground; the vessels knock,

(Thus forc'd ashore,) and tremble with the shock.

Tarchon's alone was lost, that stranded
stood,

Stuck on a bank, and beaten by the flood:⁴²⁰
She breaks her back; the loosen'd sides
give way,

And plunge the Tuscan soldiers in the sea.

Their broken oars and floating planks
withstand

Their passage, while they labor to the
land,

And ebbing tides bear back upon th' uncertain sand.

Now Turnus leads his troops without
delay,

Advancing to the margin of the sea.

The trumpets sound: Æneas first assail'd
The clowns new-raisd and raw, and soon

prevail'd.⁴³⁰

Great Theron fell, an omen of the fight;
Great Theron, large of limbs, of giant

height.
He first in open field defied the prince:

But armor scal'd with gold was no defense
Against the fated sword, which open'd wide

His plated shield, and pierc'd his naked side.
Next, Lichas fell, who, not like others born,

Was from his wretched mother ripp'd and
torn;

Sacred, O Phœbus, from his birth to thee;
For his beginning life from biting steel was free.⁴⁴⁰

Not far from him was Gyas laid along,
Of monstrous bulk; with Cisseus fierce and

strong:
Vain bulk and strength! for, when the chief assail'd,

Nor valor nor Herculean arms avail'd,

Nor their fam'd father, wont in war to go
With great Alcides, while he toil'd below.

The noisy Pharos next receiv'd his death:
Æneas writh'd his dart, and stopp'd his bawling breath.

Then wretched Cydon had receiv'd his

doom,
Who courted Clytius in his beardless

bloom,⁴⁵⁰
And sought with lust obscene polluted joys:
The Trojan sword had cur'd his love of boys,

Had not his sev'n bold brethren stopp'd the
course

Of the fierce champion, with united force.
Sev'n darts were thrown at once; and some

rebound
From his bright shield, some on his helmet

sound:
The rest had reach'd him; but his mother's

care
Prevented those, and turn'd aside in air.

The prince then call'd Achates, to supply
The spears that knew the way to victory —

"Those fatal weapons, which, inur'd to⁴⁶⁰
blood,

In Grecian bodies under Ilium stood:
Not one of those my hand shall toss in vain

Against our foes, on this contended plain."
He said; then seiz'd a mighty spear, and

threw;

Which, wing'd with fate, thro' Mæon's buckler flew,

Pierc'd all the brazen plates, and reach'd
his heart:

He stagger'd with intolerable smart.
Aleanor saw; and reach'd, but reach'd in

vain,
His helping hand, his brother to sustain.⁴⁷⁰

A second spear, which kept the former
course,

From the same hand, and sent with equal
force,

His right arm pierc'd, and holding on, bereft

His use of both, and pinion'd down his left.
Then Numitor from his dead brother

drew
Th' ill-omen'd spear, and at the Trojan

threw:
Preventing fate directs the lance awry,

Which, glancing, only mark'd Achates' thigh.

In pride of youth the Sabine Clausus
came,

And, from afar, at Dryops took his aim.⁴⁸⁰
The spear flew hissing thro' the middle

space,
And pierc'd his throat, directed at his

face;
It stopp'd at once the passage of his wind,

And the free soul to flitting air resign'd:
His forehead was the first that struck the

ground;
Lifeblood and life rush'd mingled thro' the

wound.

He slew three brothers of the Borean
 race,
 And three, whom Ismarus, their native
 place,
 Had sent to war, but all the sons of Thrace.
 Halesus, next, the bold Aurunci leads: ⁴⁹⁰
 The son of Neptune to his aid succeeds, Conspicuous on his horse. On either hand,
 These fight to keep, and those to win, the
 land.
 With mutual blood th' Ausonian soil is
 died,
 While on its borders each their claim decide.
 As wintry winds, contending in the sky,
 With equal force of lungs their titles try:
 They rage, they roar; the doubtful rack of
 heav'n
 Stands without motion, and the tide undriv'n: ⁴⁹⁹
 Each bent to conquer, neither side to yield,
 They long suspend the fortune of the field.
 Both armies thus perform what courage can;
 Foot set to foot, and mingled man to man.
 But, in another part, th' Arcadian horse
 With ill success ingage the Latin force:
 For, where th' impetuous torrent, rushing
 down,
 Huge craggy stones and rooted trees had
 thrown,
 They left their coursers, and, unus'd to
 fight
 On foot, were scatter'd in a shameful flight.
 Pallas, who with disdain and grief had view'd ⁵¹⁰
 His foes pursuing, and his friends pursued, Us'd threat'nings mix'd with pray'rs, his last resource,
 With these to move their minds, with those to fire their force.
 "Which way, companions? whether would you run?
 By you yourselves, and mighty battles
 won,
 By my great sire, by his establish'd name,
 And early promise of my future fame;
 By my youth, emulous of equal right
 To share his honors — shun ignoble flight!
 Trust not your feet: your hands must hew your way ⁵²⁰
 Thro' yon black body, and that thick array:
 'Tis thro' that forward path that we must
 come;

There lies our way, and that our passage home.
 Nor pow'rs above, nor destinies below
 Oppress our arms: with equal strength
 we go,
 With mortal hands to meet a mortal foe.
 See on what foot we stand: a scanty shore,
 The sea behind, our enemies before;
 No passage left, unless we swim the main;
 Or, forcing these, the Trojan trenches gain." ⁵³⁰
 This said, he strode with eager haste along,
 And bore amidst the thickest of the throng.
 Lagos, the first he met, with fate to foe,
 Had heav'd a stone of mighty weight, to
 throw:
 Stooping, the spear descended on his chine,
 Just where the bone distinguish'd either loin:
 It stuck so fast, so deeply buried lay,
 That scarce the victor forc'd the steel
 away.
 Hisbon came on: but, while he mov'd too
 slow
 To wish'd revenge, the prince prevents his blow; ⁵⁴⁰
 For, warding his at once, at once he press'd,
 And plung'd the fatal weapon in his breast.
 Then lewd Anchemolus he laid in dust,
 Who stain'd his stepdam's bed with impious lust.
 And, after him, the Daucian twins were
 slain,
 Laris and Thymbrus, on the Latian plain;
 So wondrous like in feature, shape, and size,
 As caus'd an error in their parents' eyes — Grateful mistake! but soon the sword decides ⁵⁴⁹
 The nice distinction, and their fate divides:
 For Thymbrus' head was lopp'd; and Laris'
 hand,
 Dismember'd, sought its owner on the
 strand:
 The trembling fingers yet the fauchion
 strain,
 And threaten still th' intended stroke in
 vain.
 Now, to renew the charge, th' Arcadians came:
 Sight of such acts, and sense of honest
 shame,
 And grief, with anger mix'd, their minds
 inflamm'd.
 Then, with a casual blow was Rhœteus
 slain,

Who chanc'd, as Pallas threw, to cross the plain:

The flying spear was after Ilus sent; 560
But Rhœteus happen'd on a death unmeant:
From Teuthras and from Tyres while he fled,

The lance, athwart his body, laid him dead:
Roll'd from his chariot with a mortal wound,
And intercepted fate, he spurn'd the ground.

As when, in summer, welcome winds arise,
The watchful shepherd to the forest flies,
And fires the midmost plants; contagion spreads,

And catching flames infect the neighb'ring heads;

Around the forest flies the furious }
blast, 570

And all the leafy nation sinks at last,
And Vulcan rides in triumph o'er the waste;

The pastor, pleas'd with his dire victory,
Beholds the satiate flames in sheets ascend the sky:

So Pallas' troops their scatter'd strength unite,

And, pouring on their foes, their prince delight.

Halesus came, fierce with desire of blood;
But first collected in his arms he stood:

Advancing then, he plied the spear so well,
Ladon, Demodocus, and Pheres fell. 580

Around his head he toss'd his glitt'ring brand,

And from Strymonius hew'd his better hand,

Held up to guard his throat; then hurl'd a stone

At Thoas' ample front, and pierc'd the bone:

It struck beneath the space of either eye;
And blood, and mingled brains, together fly.

Deep skill'd in future fates, Halesus' sire
Did with the youth to lonely groves retire:
But, when the father's mortal race was run,

Dire destiny laid hold upon the son, 590
And haul'd him to the war, to find, beneath
Th' Evandrian spear, a memorable death.
Pallas th' encounter seeks, but, ere he throws,

To Tuscan Tiber thus address'd his vows:
"O sacred stream, direct my flying dart,
And give to pass the proud Halesus' heart !

His arms and spoils thy holy oak shall bear."

Pleas'd with the bribe, the god receiv'd his pray'r:

For, while his shield protects a friend distress'd,

The dart came driving on, and pierc'd his breast. 600

But Lausus, no small portion of the war,
Permits not panic fear to reign too far,
Caus'd by the death of so renown'd a knight;

But by his own example cheers the fight.
Fierce Abas first he slew; Abas, the stay
Of Trojan hopes, and hind'rance of the day.
The Phrygian troops escap'd the Greeks in vain:

They, and their mix'd allies, now load the plain.

To the rude shock of war both armies came;
Their leaders equal, and their strength the same. 610

The rear so press'd the front, they could not wield

Their angry weapons, to dispute the field.
Here Pallas urges on, and Lausus there: }
Of equal youth and beauty both appear, } But both by fate forbid to breathe their } native air.

Their congress in the field great Jove withstands:

Both doom'd to fall, but fall by greater hands.

Meantime Juturna warns the Daunian chief

Of Lausus' danger, urging swift relief. 619
With his driv'n chariot he divides the crowd,
And, making to his friends, thus calls aloud:
"Let none presume his needless aid to join;
Retire, and clear the field; the fight is mine:

To this right hand is Pallas only due;
O were his father here, my just revenge to view !"

From the forbidden space his men retir'd.
Pallas their awe, and his stern words, admir'd;

Survey'd him o'er and o'er with wond'ring sight,

Struck with his haughty mien, and tow'ring height.

Then to the king: "Your empty vaunts forbear; 630

Success I hope, and fate I cannot fear;
Alive or dead, I shall deserve a name;

Jove is impartial, and to both the same."
 He said, and to the void advanc'd his pace:
 Pale horror sate on each Arcadian face.
 Then Turnus, from his chariot leaping light,
 Address'd himself on foot to single fight.
 And, as a lion — when he spies from far
 A bull that seems to meditate the war, Bending his neck, and spurning back the
 sand —
 Runs roaring downward from his hilly stand: ⁶⁴⁰

Imagine eager Turnus not more slow,
 To rush from high on his unequal foe.

Young Pallas, when he saw the chief advance

Within due distance of his flying lance,
 Prepares to charge him first, resolv'd to try
 If fortune would his want of force supply;
 And thus to Heav'n and Hercules address'd:
 "Alcides, once on earth Evander's guest,
 His son adjures you by those holy rites, ⁶⁵⁰
 That hospitable board, those genial nights;
 Assist my great attempt to gain this prize,
 And let proud Turnus view, with dying
 eyes,

His ravish'd spoils." 'T was heard, the vain request;

Alcides mourn'd, and stifled sighs within his breast.

Then Jove, to soothe his sorrow, thus
 began:

"Short bounds of life are set to mortal
 man.

'T is virtue's work alone to stretch the narrow span.

So many sons of gods, in bloody fight, Around the walls of Troy, have lost the light: ⁶⁶⁰

My own Sarpedon fell beneath his foe;
 Nor I, his mighty sire, could ward the
 blow.

Ev'n Turnus shortly shall resign his
 breath,

And stands already on the verge of death."
 This said, the god permits the fatal fight,
 But from the Latian fields averts his sight.

Now with full force his spear young Pallas threw,

And, having thrown, his shining fauchion
 drew.

The steel just graz'd along the shoulder joint,

And mark'd it slightly with the glancing point. ⁶⁷⁰

Fierce Turnus first to nearer distance drew,

And pois'd his pointed spear, before he
 threw:

Then, as the winged weapon whizz'd along,
 "See now," said he, "whose arm is better strung."

The spear kept on the fatal course, unstay'd
 By plates of ir'n, which o'er the shield were
 laid:

Thro' folded brass and tough bull hides it
 pass'd,

His corslet pierc'd, and reach'd his heart
 at last.

In vain the youth tugs at the broken
 wood;

The soul comes issuing with the vital blood:
 He falls; his arms upon his body sound; ⁶⁸¹
 And with his bloody teeth he bites the
 ground.

Turnus bestrode the corpse: "Arcadians,
 hear,"

Said he; "my message to your master bear:
 Such as the sire deserv'd, the son I send;
 It costs him dear to be the Phrygians'
 friend.

The lifeless body, tell him, I bestow,
 Unask'd, to rest his wand'ring ghost below."
 He said, and trampled down with all the
 force

Of his left foot, and spurn'd the wretched corpse; ⁶⁹⁰

Then snatch'd the shining belt, with gold inlaid;

The belt Eurytion's artful hands had made,
 Where fifty fatal brides, express'd to
 sight,

All in the compass of one mournful night,
 Depriv'd their bridegrooms of returning
 light.

In an ill hour insulting Turnus tore Those golden spoils, and in a worse he wore.

O mortals, blind in fate, who never know
 To bear high fortune, or endure the low!

The time shall come, when Turnus, but in vain, ⁷⁰⁰

Shall wish untouch'd the trophies of the
 slain;

Shall wish the fatal belt were far away,
 And curse the dire remembrance of the
 day.

The sad Arcadians, from th' unhappy
 field,

Bear back the breathless body on a shield.
 O grace and grief of war! at once restor'd,
 With praises, to thy sire, at once deplor'd!

One day first sent thee to the fighting
 field,
 Beheld whole heaps of foes in battle
 kill'd;
 One day beheld thee dead, and borne upon thy shield. ⁷¹⁰

This dismal news, not from uncertain fame,
 But sad spectators, to the hero came:
 His friends upon the brink of ruin stand,
 Unless reliev'd by his victorious hand.
 He whirls his sword around, without delay,
 And hews thro' adverse foes an ample way,
 To find fierce Turnus, of his conquest proud:
 Evander, Pallas, all that friendship ow'd
 To large deserts, are present to his eyes;
 His plighted hand, and hospitable ties. ⁷²⁰

Four sons of Sulmo, four whom Ufens
 bred,

He took in fight, and living victims led,
 To please the ghost of Pallas, and expire,
 In sacrifice, before his fun'ral fire.
 At Magus next he threw: he stoop'd below
 The flying spear, and shunn'd the promis'd
 blow;

Then, creeping, clasp'd the hero's knees,
 and pray'd:

"By young Iulus, by thy father's shade,
 O spare my life, and send me back to see
 My longing sire, and tender progeny! ⁷³⁰
 A lofty house I have, and wealth untold,
 In silver ingots, and in bars of gold:
 All these, and sums besides, which see no
 day,

The ransom of this one poor life shall pay.
 If I survive, will Troy the less prevail?
 A single soul's too light to turn the scale."
 He said. The hero sternly thus replied:
 "Thy bars and ingots, and the sums beside,
 Leave for thy children's lot. Thy Turnus
 broke

All rules of war by one relentless stroke, ⁷⁴⁰
 When Pallas fell: so deems, nor deems alone
 My father's shadow, but my living son."
 Thus having said, of kind remorse bereft,
 He seiz'd his helm, and dragg'd him with his left;

Then with his right hand, while his neck he wreath'd,

Up to the hilts his shining fauchion sheath'd.
 Apollo's priest, Emonides, was near;
 His holy fillets on his front appear;
 Glitt'ring in arms, he shone amidst the
 crowd;

Much of his god, more of his purple,
 proud. ⁷⁵⁰

Him the fierce Trojan follow'd thro' the
 field:

The holy coward fell; and, forc'd to yield,
 The prince stood o'er the priest, and, at one
 blow,

Sent him an off'ring to the shades below.
 His arms Seresthus on his shoulders bears,
 Design'd a trophy to the God of Wars.

Vulcanian Cæculus renews the fight,
 And Umbro, born upon the mountains'
 height.

The champion cheers his troops t' encounter those,

And seeks revenge himself on other foes. ⁷⁶⁰
 At Anxur's shield he drove; and, at the
 blow,

Both shield and arm to ground together go.
 Anxur had boasted much of magic charms,
 And thought he wore impenetrable arms,
 So made by mutter'd spells; and, from the spheres,

Had life secur'd, in vain, for length of years.
 Then Tarquitus the field in triumph trod;
 A nymph his mother, and his sire a god.
 Exulting in bright arms, he braves the
 prince:

With his pretended lance he makes defense; ⁷⁷⁰

Bears back his feeble foe; then, pressing on, Arrests his better hand, and drags him
 down;

Stands o'er the prostrate wretch, and, as he
 lay,

Vain tales inventing, and prepar'd to pray,
 Mows off his head: the trunk a moment
 stood,

Then sunk, and roll'd along the sand in
 blood.

The vengeful victor thus upbraids the slain:
 "Lie there, proud man, unpitied, on the
 plain;

Lie there, inglorious, and without a tomb,
 Far from thy mother and thy native home, ⁷⁸⁰

Expos'd to savage beasts, and birds of
 prey,

Or thrown for food to monsters of the sea."

On Lycas and Anteus next he ran,
 Two chiefs of Turnus, and who led his van.
 They fled for fear; with these, he chas'd
 along

Camers the yellow-lock'd, and Numa
 strong;

Both great in arms, and both were fair
 and young.

Camers was son to Volskens lately slain,
 In wealth surpassing all the Latian train,
 And in Amycla fix'd his silent easy reign. ⁷⁹⁰
 And, as Ægeon, when with heav'n he strove,
 Stood opposite in arms to mighty Jove; Mov'd all his hundred hands, provok'd the
 war,
 Defied the forky lightning from afar;
 At fifty mouths his flaming breath expires,
 And flash for flash returns, and fires for
 fires;
 In his right hand as many swords he wields,
 And takes the thunder on as many shields:
 With strength like his, the Trojan hero
 stood;
 And soon the fields with falling corps
 were strow'd, ⁸⁰⁰
 When once his fauchion found the taste
 of blood.
 With fury scarce to be conceiv'd, he flew Against Niphæus, whom four coursers
 drew.
 They, when they see the fiery chief advance,
 And pushing at their chests his pointed
 lance,
 Wheel'd with so swift a motion, mad with
 fear,
 They threw their master headlong from the chair.
 They stare, they start, nor stop their course,
 before
 They bear the bounding chariot to the
 shore.
 Now Lucagus and Liger scour the plains, ⁸¹⁰
 With two white steeds; but Liger holds the reins,
 And Lucagus the lofty seat maintains:
 Bold brethren both. The former wav'd
 in air
 His flaming sword: Æneas couch'd his
 spear,
 Unus'd to threats, and more unus'd to
 fear.
 Then Liger thus: "Thy confidence is
 vain
 To scape from hence, as from the Trojan
 plain:
 Nor these the steeds which Diomede bestrode,
 Nor this the chariot where Achilles rode;

Nor Venus' veil is here, nor Neptune's
 shield;
 Thy fatal hour is come, and this the field." ⁸²⁰
 Thus Liger vainly vaunts: the Trojan peer
 Return'd his answer with his flying spear.
 As Lucagus, to lash his horses, bends, Prone to the wheels, and his left foot pro-
 tends,
 Prepar'd for fight; the fatal dart arrives,
 And thro' the borders of his buckler drives;
 Pass'd thro', and pierc'd his groin: the deadly wound,
 Cast from his chariot, roll'd him on the
 ground.
 Whom thus the chief upbraids with scornful spite: ⁸³⁰
 "Blame not the slowness of your steeds in
 flight;
 Vain shadows did not force their swift retreat;
 But you yourself forsake your empty seat."
 He said, and seiz'd at once the loosen'd rein;
 For Liger lay already on the plain,
 By the same shock: then, stretching out his hands,
 The recreant thus his wretched life demands:
 "Now, by thyself, O more than mortal
 man!
 By her and him from whom thy breath
 began,
 Who form'd thee thus divine, I beg thee,
 spare ⁸⁴⁰
 This forfeit life, and hear thy suppliant's
 pray'r."
 Thus much he spoke, and more he would have said;
 But the stern hero turn'd aside his head,
 And cut him short: "I hear another man;
 You talk'd not thus before the fight began.
 Now take your turn; and, as a brother should,
 Attend your brother to the Stygian flood."
 Then thro' his breast his fatal sword he
 sent,
 And the soul issued at the gaping vent.
 As storms the skies, and torrents tear
 the ground, ⁸⁵⁰
 Thus rag'd the prince, and scatter'd deaths
 around.
 At length Ascanius and the Trojan train Broke from the camp, so long besieg'd in
 vain.

Meantime the King of Gods and Mortal Man
 Held conference with his queen, and thus began:
 "My sister goddess, and well-pleasing wife,
 Still think you Venus' aid supports the strife —
 Sustains her Trojans — or themselves, alone,
 With inborn valor force their fortune on? How fierce in fight, with courage undecay'd! Judge if such warriors want immortal aid." To whom the goddess with the charming eyes, ⁸⁶²
 Soft in her tone, submissively replies:
 "Why, O my sov'reign lord, whose frown I fear,
 And cannot, unconcern'd, your anger bear; Why urge you thus my grief? when, if I still (As once I was) were mistress of your will, From your almighty pow'r your pleasing wife Might gain the grace of length'ning Turnus' life,
 Securely snatch him from the fatal fight, And give him to his aged father's sight. ⁸⁷¹
 Now let him perish, since you hold it good, And glut the Trojans with his pious blood. Yet from our lineage he derives his name, And, in the fourth degree, from god Piliunus came;
 Yet he devoutly pays you rites divine, And offers daily incense at your shrine."
 Then shortly thus the sov'reign god replied:
 "Since in my pow'r and goodness you confide,
 If for a little space, a lengthen'd span, ⁸⁸⁰
 You beg reprieve for this expiring man, I grant you leave to take your Turnus hence From instant fate, and can so far dispense. But, if some secret meaning lies beneath, To save the short-liv'd youth from destin'd death,
 Or if a farther thought you entertain, To change the fates; you feed your hopes in vain."
 To whom the goddess thus, with weeping eyes:
 "And what if that request, your tongue denies,
 Your heart should grant; and not a short reprieve, ⁸⁹⁰
 But length of certain life, to Turnus give?

Now speedy death attends the guiltless youth,
 If my presaging soul divines with truth; Which, O! I wish, might err thro' causeless fears,
 And you (for you have pow'r) prolong his years!"
 Thus having said, involv'd in clouds, she flies,
 And drives a storm before her thro' the skies.
 Swift she descends, alighting on the plain, Where the fierce foes a dubious fight maintain. ⁸⁹⁹
 Of air condens'd a specter soon she made; And, what Æneas was, such seem'd the shade.
 Adorn'd with Dardan arms, the phantom bore
 His head aloft; a plummy crest he wore: This hand appear'd a shining sword to wield, And that sustain'd an imitated shield.
 With manly mien he stalk'd along the ground,
 Nor wanted voice belied, nor vaunting sound.
 (Thus haunting ghosts appear to waking sight,
 Or dreadful visions in our dreams by night.) The specter seems the Daunian chief to dare, ⁹¹⁰
 And flourishes his empty sword in air. At this, advancing, Turnus hurl'd his spear: The phantom wheel'd, and seem'd to fly for fear.
 Deluded Turnus thought the Trojan fled, And with vain hopes his haughty fancy fed.
 "Whether, O coward?" (thus he calls aloud, Nor found he spoke to wind, and chas'd a cloud,)
 "Why thus forsake your bride! Receive from me ⁹¹⁸
 The fated land you sought so long by sea." He said, and, brandishing at once his blade, With eager pace pursued the flying shade. By chance a ship was fasten'd to the shore, Which from old Clusium King Osinius bore: The plank was ready laid for safe ascent; For shelter there the trembling shadow bent,
 And skippt and skulk'd, and under hatches went. } Exulting Turnus, with regardless haste, Ascends the plank, and to the galley pass'd.

Scarce had he reach'd the prow: Saturnia's
 hand
 The haulsers cuts, and shoots the ship from land. ⁹³⁰
 With wind in poop, the vessel plows the sea,
 And measures back with speed her former
 way.
 Meantime Æneas seeks his absent foe,
 And sends his slaughter'd troops to shades
 below.
 The guileful phantom now forsook the
 shroud,
 And flew sublime, and vanish'd in a cloud.
 Too late young Turnus the delusion found, Far on the sea, still making from the
 ground.
 Then, thankless for a life redeem'd by
 shame,
 With sense of honor stung, and forfeit fame, ⁹⁴⁰
 Fearful besides of what in fight had pass'd,
 His hands and haggard eyes to heav'n he
 cast:
 "O Jove!" he cried, "for what offense have I
 Deserv'd to bear this endless infamy?
 Whence am I forc'd, and whether am I
 borne?
 How, and with what reproach, shall I return?
 Shall ever I behold the Latian plain,
 Or see Laurentum's lofty tow'rs again?
 What will they say of their deserting
 chief?
 The war was mine: I fly from their relief; ⁹⁵⁰
 I led to slaughter, and in slaughter leave;
 And ev'n from hence their dying groans
 receive.
 Here, overmatch'd in fight, in heaps they lie;
 There, scatter'd o'er the fields, ignobly fly.
 Gape wide, O earth, and draw me down
 alive!
 Or, O ye pitying winds, a wretch relieve!
 On sands or shelves the splitting vessel
 drive;
 Or set me shipwreck'd on some desert
 shore,
 Where no Rutulian eyes may see me more,
 Unknown to friends, or foes, or conscious Fame, ⁹⁶⁰
 Lest she should follow, and my flight proclaim."
 Thus Turnus rav'd, and various fates revolv'd:

The choice was doubtful, but the death resolv'd.
 And now the sword, and now the sea took
 place,
 That to revenge, and this to purge disgrace.
 Sometimes he thought to swim the stormy
 main,
 By stretch of arms the distant shore to
 gain.
 Thrice he the sword assay'd, and thrice the
 flood;
 But Juno, mov'd with pity, both withstood,
 And thrice repress'd his rage; strong gales supplied, ⁹⁷⁰
 And push'd the vessel o'er the swelling tide.
 At length she lands him on his native
 shores,
 And to his father's longing arms restores.
 Meantime, by Jove's impulse, Mezentius
 arm'd,
 Succeeding Turnus, with his ardor warm'd His fainting friends, reproach'd their shameful flight,
 Repell'd the victors, and renew'd the fight.
 Against their king the Tuscan troops con-
 spire;
 Such is their hate, and such their fierce desire
 Of wish'd revenge: on him, and him alone, ⁹⁸⁰
 All hands employ'd, and all their darts are
 thrown.
 He, like a solid rock by seas inclos'd,
 To raging winds and roaring waves oppos'd,
 From his proud summit looking down, dis-dains
 Their empty menace, and unmov'd remains.
 Beneath his feet fell haughty Hebrus
 dead,
 Then Latagus, and Palmus as he fled.
 At Latagus a weighty stone he flung:
 His face was flatted, and his helmet rung.
 But Palmus from behind receives his wound; ⁹⁹⁰
 Hamstring'd he falls, and grovels on the
 ground:
 His crest and armor, from his body torn,
 Thy shoulders, Lausus, and thy head adorn.
 Evas and Mimas, both of Troy, he slew.
 Mimas his birth from fair Theano drew,
 Born on that fatal night, when, big with
 fire,
 The queen produc'd young Paris to his
 sire:
 But Paris in the Phrygian fields was slain,

Unthinking Mimas on the Latian plain.

And, as a savage boar, on mountains
bred,

With forest mast and fatt'ning marshes fed,¹⁰⁰⁰
When once he sees himself in toils inclos'd,
By huntsmen and their eager hounds oppos'd —

He whets his tusks, and turns, and dares
the war;

Th' invaders dart their jav'lins from afar:
All keep aloof, and safely shout around;
But none presumes to give a nearer wound:
He frets and froths, erects his bristled hide,
And shakes a grove of lances from his
side:

Not otherwise the troops, with hate in-
spir'd,

And just revenge against the tyrant fir'd,¹⁰¹⁰
Their darts with clamor at a distance
drive,

And only keep the languish'd war alive.

From Coritus came Acon to the fight,
Who left his spouse betroth'd, and unconsummate night.

Mezentius sees him thro' the squadrons
ride,

Proud of the purple favors of his bride.

Then, as a hungry lion, who beholds
A gamesome goat, who frisks about the folds,

Or beamy stag, that grazes on the plain —
He runs, he roars, he shakes his rising
mane,

He grins, and opens wide his greedy jaws;
The prey lies panting underneath his paws:
He fills his famish'd maw; his mouth runs
o'er

With unchew'd morsels, while he churns
the gore:

So proud Mezentius rushes on his foes,

And first unhappy Acon overthrows:

Stretch'd at his length, he spurns the swarthy ground;

The lance, besmear'd with blood, lies broken in the wound.

Then with disdain the haughty victor
view'd

Orodes flying, nor the wretch pursued,¹⁰³⁰
Nor thought the dastard's back deserv'd a
wound,

But, running, gain'd th' advantage of
the ground:

Then turning short, he met him face to
face,

To give his victory the better grace.

Orodes falls, in equal fight oppress'd:

Mezentius fix'd his foot upon his breast,
And rested lance; and thus aloud he cries:
"Lo! here the champion of my rebels
lies!"

The fields around with Io Pæan! ring;
And peals of shouts applaud the conqu'ring
king.

At this the vanquish'd, with his dying¹⁰⁴¹
breath,

Thus faintly spoke, and prophesied in
death:

"Nor thou, proud man, unpunish'd shalt
remain:

Like death attends thee on this fatal
plain."

Then, sourly smiling, thus the king replied:
"For what belongs to me, let Jove provide;

But die thou first, whatever chance ensue."
He said, and from the wound the weapon
drew.

A hov'ring mist came swimming o'er his
sight,

And seal'd his eyes in everlasting night.¹⁰⁵⁰

By Cædicius, Alcathous was slain;

Sacrator laid Hydaspes on the plain;

Orses the strong to greater strength must
yield;

He, with Parthenius, were by Rapo kill'd.

Then brave Messapus Ericetes slew,

Who from Lycaon's blood his lineage drew.

But from his headstrong horse his fate
he found,

Who threw his master, as he made a
bound:

The chief, alighting, stuck him to the
ground;

Then Clonius, hand to hand, on foot assails:
The Trojan sinks, and Neptune's son prevails.

Agis the Lycian, stepping forth with pride,

To single fight the boldest foe defied;

Whom Tuscan Valerus by force o'ercame,

And not belied his mighty father's fame.

Salius to death the great Antronius sent:

But the same fate the victor underwent,

Slain by Nealces' hand, well-skill'd to throw

The flying dart, and draw the far-deceiving
bow.

Thus equal deaths are dealt with equal¹⁰⁷⁰
chance;

By turns they quit their ground, by turns
advance:

Victors and vanquish'd, in the various field,

Nor wholly overcome, nor wholly yield.
The gods from heav'n survey the fatal
strife,

And mourn the miseries of human life.
Above the rest, two goddesses appear Concern'd for each: here Venus, Juno there.
Amidst the crowd, infernal Ate shakes
Her scourge aloft, and crest of hissing
snakes.

Once more the proud Mezentius, with
disdain,
Brandish'd his spear, and rush'd into the
plain,
Where tow'ring in the midmost rank she
stood,

Like tall Orion stalking o'er the flood (When with his brawny breast he cuts the waves,

His shoulders scarce the topmost billow
laves),

Or like a mountain ash, whose roots are
spread,

Deep fix'd in earth; in clouds he hides his
head.

The Trojan prince beheld him from afar,
And dauntless undertook the doubtful war.
Collected in his strength, and like a rock, Pois'd on his base, Mezentius stood the
shock.

He stood, and, measuring first with careful
eyes

The space his spear could reach, aloud he
cries:

"My strong right hand, and sword, assist my stroke !

(Those only gods Mezentius will invoke.)

His armor, from the Trojan pirate torn,
By my triumphant Lausus shall be worn."

He said; and with his utmost force he
threw

The massy spear, which, hissing as it flew,
Reach'd the celestial shield, that stopp'd
the course;

But, glancing thence, the yet unbroken
force

Took a new bent obliquely, and betwixt
The side and bowels fam'd Anthores fix'd.

Anthores had from Argos travel'd far,
Alcides' friend, and brother of the war;

Till, tir'd with toils, fair Italy he chose,
And in Evander's palace sought repose.

Now, falling by another's wound, his eyes
He cast to heav'n, on Argos thinks, and dies.

The pious Trojan then his jav'lin sent;

The shield gave way; thro' treble plates it
went

Of solid brass, of linen trebly roll'd,
And three bull hides which round the buck-ler fold.

All these it pass'd, resistless in the course,
Transpiere'd his thigh, and spent its dying
force.

The gaping wound gush'd out a crimson
flood.

The Trojan, glad with sight of hostile blood,
His fauchion drew, to closer fight address'd,
And with new force his fainting foe op-
press'd.

His father's peril Lausus view'd with
grief;

He sigh'd, he wept, he ran to his relief.

And here, heroic youth, 't is here I must

To thy immortal memory be just,

And sing an act so noble and so new,

Posterity will scarce believe 't is true.

Pain'd with his wound, and useless for the
fight,

The father sought to save himself by flight:
Incumber'd, slow he dragg'd the spear
along,

Which pierc'd his thigh, and in his buckler
hung.

The pious youth, resolv'd on death, below
The lifted sword springs forth to face
the foe;

Protects his parent, and prevents the
blow.

Shouts of applause ran ringing thro' the
field,

To see the son the vanquish'd father shield.
All, fir'd with gen'rous indignation, strive,
And with a storm of darts to distance drive
The Trojan chief, who, held at bay from
far,

On his Vulcanian orb sustain'd the war.
As, when thick hail comes rattling in the
wind,

The plowman, passenger, and lab'ring hind
For shelter to the neigh'ring covert fly,
Or hous'd, or safe in hollow caverns lie;

But, that o'erblown, when heav'n above 'em
smiles,

Return to travel, and renew their toils:
Æneas thus, o'erwhelm'd on ev'ry side,
The storm of darts, undaunted, did abide;

And thus to Lausus loud with friendly
threat'ning cried:

"Why wilt thou rush to certain death, and
rage

In rash attempts, beyond thy tender age, ¹¹⁵⁰ Betray'd by pious love ?" Nor, thus for-
borne,

The youth desists, but with insulting scorn
Provokes the ling'ring prince, whose patience, tir'd,

Gave place; and all his breast with fury
fir'd.

For now the Fates prepar'd their sharpen'd
shears;

And lifted high the flaming sword appears,
Which, full descending with a frightful
sway,

Thro' shield and corslet forc'd th' impet-uous way,

And buried deep in his fair bosom lay. }

The purple streams thro' the thin armor strove, ¹¹⁶⁰

And drench'd th' imbroider'd coat his mother wove;

And life at length forsook his heaving
heart,

Loth from so sweet a mansion to depart.

But when, with blood and paleness all
o'erspread,

The pious prince beheld young Lausus
dead,

He griev'd; he wept; the sight an image
brought

Of his own filial love, a sadly pleasing
thought:

Then stretch'd his hand to hold him up,
and said:

"Poor hapless youth! what praises can be
paid

To love so great, to such transcendent store ¹¹⁷⁰

Of early worth, and sure presage of more?
Accept whate'er Æneas can afford;

Untouch'd thy arms, untaken be thy sword;
And all that pleas'd thee living, still remain

Inviolatè, and sacred to the slain.
Thy body on thy parents I bestow,

To rest thy soul, at least, if shadows
know,

Or have a sense of human things below. }

There to thy fellow ghosts with glory tell:
'T was by the great Æneas' hand I fell."

With this, his distant friends he beckons near, ¹¹⁸¹

Provokes their duty, and prevents their
fear:

Himself assists to lift him from the ground,
With clotted locks, and blood that well'd from out the wound.

Meantime, his father, now no father,
stood,

And wash'd his wounds by Tiber's yellow
flood:

Oppress'd with anguish, panting, and o'er-
spent,

His fainting limbs against an oak he leant.

A bough his brazen helmet did sustain;

His heavier arms lay scatter'd on the plain: ¹¹⁹⁰

A chosen train of youth around him stand;

His drooping head was rested on his hand:

His grisly beard his pensive bosom sought;

And all on Lausus ran his restless thought.

Careful, concern'd his danger to prevent,

He much enquir'd, and many a message
sent

To warn him from the field — alas! in vain!

Behold, his mournful followers bear him
slain!

O'er his broad shield still gush'd the yawning wound,

And drew a bloody trail along the ground. ¹²⁰⁰

Far off he heard their cries, far off divin'd

The dire event, with a foreboding mind.

With dust he sprinkled first his hoary
head;

Then both his lifted hands to heav'n he
spread;

Last, the dear corpse embracing, thus he
said:

"What joys, alas! could this frail being
give,

That I have been so covetous to live?

To see my son, and such a son, resign

His life, a ransom for preserving mine!

And am I then preserv'd, and art thou lost? ¹²¹⁰

How much too dear has that redemption
cost!

'T is now my bitter banishment I feel:

This is a wound too deep for time to heal.

My guilt thy growing virtues did defame;

My blackness blotted thy unblemish'd
name.

Chas'd from a throne, abandon'd, and exil'd

For foul misdeeds, were punishments too mild:

I ow'd my people these, and, from their
hate,

With less resentment could have borne my
fate.

And yet I live, and yet sustain the sight ¹²²⁰
Of hated men, and of more hated light:

But will not long." With that he rais'd from ground

His fainting limbs, that stagger'd with his
wound;

Yet, with a mind resolv'd, and unappall'd
With pains or perils, for his courser call'd;
Well-mouth'd, well-manag'd, whom himself did dress

With daily care, and mounted with success;

His aid in arms, his ornament in peace.

Soothing his courage with a gentle stroke,
The steed seem'd sensible, while thus he spoke: 1230

"O Rhœbus, we have liv'd too long for
me —

If life and long were terms that could agree!

This day thou either shalt bring back the
head

And bloody trophies of the Trojan dead;
This day thou either shalt revenge my woe,

For murder'd Lausus, on his cruel foe;

Or, if inexorable fate deny

Our conquest, with thy conquer'd master
die:

For, after such a lord, I rest secure,
Thou wilt no foreign reins, or Trojan load endure." 1240

He said; and straight th' officious courser
kneels,

To take his wonted weight. His hands he fills

With pointed jav'lins; on his head he lac'd His glitt'ring helm, which terribly was
grac'd

With waving horsehair, nodding from afar;
Then spur'd his thund'ring steed amidst
the war.

Love, anguish, wrath, and grief, to madness
wrought,

Despair, and secret shame, and conscious
thought

Of inborn worth, his lab'ring soul oppress'd, Roll'd in his eyes, and rag'd within his
breast. 1250

Then loud he call'd Æneas thrice by name:
The loud repeated voice to glad Æneas
came.

"Great Jove," he said, "and the far-
shooting god,

Inspire thy mind to make thy challenge
good!"

He spoke no more; but hasten'd, void of
fear,

And threaten'd with his long protended
spear.

To whom Mezentius thus: "Thy vaunts
are vain.

My Lausus lies extended on the plain:
He's lost! thy conquest is already won;
The wretched sire is murder'd in the
son. 1260

Nor fate I fear, but all the gods defy.
Forbear thy threats: my bus'ness is to
die;

But first receive this parting legacy."
He said; and straight a whirling dart he
sent;

Another after, and another went.
Round in a spacious ring he rides the
field,

And vainly plies th' impenetrable shield.
Thrice rode he round; and thrice Æneas
wheel'd.

Turn'd as he turn'd: the golden orb with-
stood

The strokes, and bore about an iron wood.

Impatient of delay, and weary grown, 1271

Still to defend, and to defend alone,

To wrench the darts which in his buckler
light,

Urg'd and o'er-labor'd in unequal fight;
At length resolv'd, he throws with all his
force

Full at the temples of the warrior horse.
Just where the stroke was aim'd, th' unerring spear

Made way, and stood transfix'd thro' either
ear.

Seiz'd with unwonted pain, surpris'd with
fright,

The wounded steed curvets, and, rais'd up-
right, 1280

Lights on his feet before; his hoofs behind
Spring up in air aloft, and lash the wind.

Down comes the rider headlong from his
height:

His horse came after with unwieldy weight,
And, flound'ring forward, pitching on his
head.

His lord's incumber'd shoulder overlaid.

From either host, the mingled shouts and
cries

Of Trojans and Rutulians rend the skies.
Æneas, hast'ning, wav'd his fatal sword

High o'er his head, with this reproachful
word: 1290

"Now; where are now thy vaunts, the fierce disdain

Of proud Mezentius, and the lofty strain ? ” Struggling, and wildly staring on the
skies,

With scarce recover'd sight he thus replies:
“ Why these insulting words, this waste of
breath,

To souls undaunted, and secure of death ?
’T is no dishonor for the brave to die,
Nor came I here with hope of victory;
Nor ask I life, nor fought with that design:
As I had us’d my fortune, use thou thine.
My dying son contracted no such band; ¹³⁰¹
The gift is hateful from his murd’rer’s
hand.

For this, this only favor let me sue,
If pity can to conquer’d foes be due:
Refuse it not; but let my body have
The last retreat of humankind, a grave.
Too well I know th’ insulting people’s hate;
Protect me from their vengeance after fate:
This refuge for my poor remains provide,
And lay my much-lov’d Lausus by my side.” ¹³¹⁰

He said, and to the sword his throat ap-
plied.

The crimson stream distain’d his arms
around,
And the disdainful soul came rushing thro’
the wound.

THE ELEVENTH BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

Æneas erects a trophy of the spoils of Mezentius, grants a truce for burying the dead, and sends home the body of Pallas with great solemnity. Latinus calls a council, to propose offers of peace to Æneas; which occasions great animosity betwixt Turnus and Drances. In the mean time there is a sharp engagement of the horse; wherein Camilla signalizes herself; is kill’d; and the Latine troops are entirely defeated.

SCARCE had the rosy Morning rais’d her
head

Above the waves, and left her wat’ry bed;
The pious chief, whom double cares attend
For his unburied soldiers and his friend, Yet first to Heav’n perform’d a victor’s
vows:

He bar’d an ancient oak of all her boughs;
Then on a rising ground the trunk he plac’d,

Which with the spoils of his dead foe he
grac’d.

The coat of arms by proud Mezentius worn,
Now on a naked snag in triumph borne, ¹⁰
Was hung on high, and glitter’d from afar,
A trophy sacred to the God of War.
Above his arms, fix’d on the leafless wood, Appear’d his plummy crest, besmear’d with
blood:

His brazen buckler on the left was seen;
Truncheons of shiver’d lances hung between;
And on the right was plac’d his corslet,
bor’d;

And to the neck was tied his unavailing
sword.

A crowd of chiefs inclose the godlike
man,

Who thus, conspicuous in the midst, began:
“ Our toils, my friends, are crown’d with sure success; ²¹

The greater part perform’d, achieve the less.

Now follow cheerful to the trembling town;
Press but an entrance, and presume it won.
Fear is no more, for fierce Mezentius lies,
As the first fruits of war, a sacrifice.

Turnus shall fall extended on the plain,
And, in this omen, is already slain.

Prepar’d in arms, pursue your happy chance;
That none unwarn’d may plead his ignorance, ³⁰

And I, at Heav’n’s appointed hour, may find
Your warlike ensigns waving in the wind.
Meantime the rites and fun’ral pomps pre-
pare,

Due to your dead companions of the war:
The last respect the living can bestow,
To shield their shadows from contempt below.

That conquer’d earth be theirs, for which they fought,

And which for us with their own blood they
bought;

But first the corpse of our unhappy friend
To the sad city of Evander send, ⁴⁰
Who, not inglorious, in his age’s bloom,
Was hurried hence by too severe a doom.”

Thus, weeping while he spoke, he took
his way,

Where, new in death, lamented Pallas lay.
Acetes watch’d the corpse; whose youth deserv’d

The father’s trust; and now the son he serv’d

With equal faith, but less auspicious care.
Th' attendants of the slain his sorrow share.
A troop of Trojans mix'd with these appear,
And mourning matrons with dishevel'd
hair. 50

Soon as the prince appears, they raise a
cry;

All beat their breasts, and echoes rend the
sky.

They rear his drooping forehead from the
ground;

But, when Æneas view'd the grisly wound
Which Pallas in his manly bosom bore,
And the fair flesh distain'd with purple
gore;

First, melting into tears, the pious man
Deplor'd so sad a sight, then thus began:
"Unhappy youth! when Fortune gave the
rest

Of my full wishes, she refus'd the best! 60
She came; but brought not thee along, to bless

My longing eyes, and share in my success:
She grudg'd thy safe return, the triumphs
due

To prosp'rous valor, in the public view.
Not thus I promis'd, when thy father lent
Thy needless succor with a sad consent;
Embrac'd me, parting for th' Etrurian land,
And sent me to possess a large command.
He warn'd, and from his own experience
told,

Our foes were warlike, disciplin'd, and bold. 70

And now perhaps, in hopes of thy return,
Rich odors on his loaded altars burn,
While we, with vain officious pomp, pre-
pare

To send him back his portion of the war,
A bloody breathless body, which can owe
No farther debt, but to the pow'rs below.
The wretched father, ere his race is run,
Shall view the fun'ral honors of his son.
These are my triumphs of the Latian war,
Fruits of my plighted faith and boasted
care! 80

And yet, unhappy sire, thou shalt not see
A son whose death disgrac'd his ancestry;
Thou shalt not blush, old man, however
griev'd:

Thy Pallas no dishonest wound receiv'd.
He died no death to make thee wish, too
late,

Thou hadst not liv'd to see his shameful
fate:

But what a champion has th' Ausonian
coast,
And what a friend hast thou, Ascanius,
lost!"

Thus having mourn'd, he gave the word
around,

To raise the breathless body from the
ground; 90

And chose a thousand horse, the flow'r of
all

His warlike troops, to wait the funeral,
To bear him back and share Evander's
grief:

A well-becoming, but a weak relief.
Of oaken twigs they twist an easy bier,
Then on their shoulders the sad burden rear.
The body on this rural hearse is borne:
Strew'd leaves and funeral greens the bier
adorn.

All pale he lies, and looks a lovely flow'r,
New cropp'd by virgin hands, to dress the
bow'r: 100

Unfaded yet, but yet unfed below,
No more to mother earth or the green stem shall owe.

Then two fair vests, of wondrous work
and cost,

Of purple woven, and with gold emboss'd,
For ornament the Trojan hero brought,
Which with her hands Sidonian Dido
wrought.

One vest array'd the corpse; and one they
spread

O'er his clos'd eyes, and wrapp'd around
his head,

That, when the yellow hair in flame should
fall,

The catching fire might burn the golden caul. 110

Besides, the spoils of foes in battle slain,
When he descended on the Latian plain;
Arms, trappings, horses, by the hearse are
led

In long array — th' achievements of the dead.

Then, pinion'd with their hands behind, appear

Th' unhappy captives, marching in the
rear,

Appointed off'rings in the victor's name,
To sprinkle with their blood the fun'ral
flame.

Inferior trophies by the chiefs are borne;
Gauntlets and helms their loaded hands
adorn; 120

And fair inscriptions fix'd, and titles read
Of Latian leaders conquer'd by the dead.

Accostes on his pupil's corpse attends,
With feeble steps, supported by his friends.
Pausing at ev'ry pace, in sorrow drown'd, Betwixt their arms he sinks upon the
ground;

Where grov'ling while he lies in deep despair,

He beats his breast, and rends his hoary
hair.

The champion's chariot next is seen to
roll,

Besmeared with hostile blood, and honorably foul. ¹³⁰

To close the pomp, Æthon, the steed of
state,

Is led, the fun'rals of his lord to wait.

Stripp'd of his trappings, with a sullen
pace

He walks; and the big tears run rolling down his face.

The lance of Pallas, and the crimson crest,
Are borne behind: the victor seiz'd the
rest.

The march begins: the trumpets hoarsely
sound;

The pikes and lances trail along the ground.
Thus while the Trojan and Arcadian horse

To Pallantean tow'rs direct their course, ¹⁴⁰
In long procession rank'd, the pious chief

Stopp'd in the rear, and gave a vent to
grief:

"The public care," he said, "which war
attends,

Diverts our present woes, at least suspends.
Peace with the manes of great Pallas

dwell!
Hail, holy relics! and a last farewell!"

He said no more, but, inly tho' he mourn'd, Restrain'd his tears, and to the camp re-
turn'd.

Now suppliants, from Laurentum sent,
demand

A truce, with olive branches in their hand; ¹⁵⁰

Obtest his clemency, and from the plain Beg leave to draw the bodies of their
slain.

They plead, that none those common rites deny

To conquer'd foes that in fair battle die.

All cause of hate was ended in their death;
Nor could he war with bodies void of
breath.

A king, they hop'd, would hear a king's request,

Whose son he once was call'd, and once his guest.

Their suit, which was too just to be denied,

The hero grants, and farther thus replied:
"O Latian princes, how severe a fate ¹⁶⁰

In causeless quarrels has involv'd your
state,

And arm'd against an unoffending man,
Who sought your friendship ere the war
began!

You beg a truce, which I would gladly
give,

Not only for the slain, but those who live.
I came not hether but by Heav'n's command,

And sent by fate to share the Latian land.
Nor wage I wars unjust: your king denied

My proffer'd friendship, and my promis'd bride; ¹⁷⁰

Left me for Turnus. Turnus then should try

His cause in arms, to conquer or to die.
My right and his are in dispute: the slain

Fell without fault, our quarrel to maintain.
In equal arms let us alone contend;

And let him vanquish, whom his fates be-
friend.

This is the way (so tell him) to possess
The royal virgin, and restore the peace.

Bear this my message back, with ample
leave,

That your slain friends may fun'ral rites receive." ¹⁸⁰

Thus having said — th' ambassadors,
amaz'd,

Stood mute a while, and on each other
gaz'd.

Drances, their chief, who harbor'd in his
breast

Long hate to Turnus, as his foe profess'd, Broke silence first, and to the godlike

man,

With graceful action bowing, thus began:
"Auspicious prince, in arms a mighty

name,
But yet whose actions far transcend your
fame;

Would I your justice or your force express, Thought can but equal; and all words are less. ¹⁹⁰

Your answer we shall thankfully relate,
And favors granted to the Latian state.

If wish'd success our labor shall attend, Think peace concluded, and the king your
friend:

Let Turnus leave the realm to your command,
And seek alliance in some other land:
Build you the city which your fates assign;
We shall be proud in the great work to
join."

Thus Drances; and his words so well persuade
The rest impower'd, that soon a truce is made. ²⁰⁰

Twelve days the term allow'd: and, during those,

Latians and Trojans, now no longer foes, Mix'd in the woods, for fun'ral piles pre-
pare

To fell the timber, and forget the war.
Loud axes thro' the groaning groves re-
sound;

Oak, mountain ash, and poplar spread the
ground;

Firs fall from high; and some the trunks
receive

In loaden wains; with wedges some they cleave.

And now the fatal news by Fame is blown Thro' the short circuit of th' Arcadian town, ²¹⁰

Of Pallas slain — by Fame, which just before

His triumphs on distended pinions bore.
Rushing from out the gate, the people
stand,

Each with a fun'ral flambeau in his hand.
Wildly they stare, distracted with amaze:
The fields are lighten'd with a fiery blaze,
That cast a sullen splendor on their friends,
The marching troop which their dead prince attends.

Both parties meet: they raise a doleful
cry;

The matrons from the walls with shrieks
reply, ²²⁰

And their mix'd mourning rends the vaulted sky.

The town is fill'd with tumult and with
tears,

Till the loud clamors reach Evander's ears:
Forgetful of his state, he runs along,
With a disorder'd pace, and cleaves the
throng;

Falls on the corpse; and groaning there he
lies,

With silent grief, that speaks but at his
eyes.

Short sighs and sobs succeed; till sorrow breaks

A passage, and at once he weeps and speaks:
"O Pallas! thou hast fail'd thy plighted word, ²³⁰

To fight with caution, not to tempt the
sword!

I warn'd thee, but in vain; for well I knew
What perils youthful ardor would pursue,
That boiling blood would carry thee too
far,

Young as thou wert in dangers, raw to war!
O curst essay of arms, disastrous doom,
Prelude of bloody fields, and fights to come!
Hard elements of unauspicious war,

Vain vows to Heav'n, and unavailing care!
Thrice happy thou, dear partner of my bed, ²⁴⁰

Whose holy soul the stroke of Fortune fled,
Præcious of ills, and leaving me behind,
To drink the dregs of life by fate assign'd!
Beyond the goal of nature I have gone:

My Pallas late set out, but reach'd too soon.
If, for my league against th' Ausonian state,
Amidst their weapons I had found my fate, (Deserv'd from them,) then I had been re-
turn'd

A breathless victor, and my son had mourn'd. ²⁴⁹

Yet will I not my Trojan friend upbraid,
Nor grudge th' alliance I so gladly made.
'T was not his fault, my Pallas fell so young,
But my own crime, for having liv'd too
long.

Yet, since the gods had destin'd him to die,
At least he led the way to victory:

First for his friends he won the fatal
shore,

And sent whole herds of slaughter'd foes
before;

A death too great, too glorious to deplore.

Nor will I add new honors to thy grave,
Content with those the Trojan hero gave: ²⁶⁰
That funeral pomp thy Phrygian friends
design'd,

In which the Tuscan chiefs and army join'd.
Great spoils and trophies, gain'd by thee,
they bear:

Then let thy own achievements be thy
share.

Even thou, O Turnus, hadst a trophy stood, Whose mighty trunk had better grac'd the
wood,

If Pallas had arriv'd, with equal length
Of years, to match thy bulk with equal strength.

But why, unhappy man, dost thou detain
These troops, to view the tears thou shedd'st in vain? ²⁷⁰

Go, friends, this message to your lord re-
late:

Tell him, that, if I bear my bitter fate,
And, after Pallas' death, live ling'ring on,
'Tis to behold his vengeance for my son.
I stay for Turnus, whose devoted head
Is owing to the living and the dead.
My son and I expect it from his hand;
'Tis all that he can give, or we demand.
Joy is no more; but I would gladly go,
To greet my Pallas with such news below."

The morn had now dispell'd the shades of night, ²⁸¹

Restoring toils, when she restor'd the light.
The Trojan king and Tuscan chief command

To raise the piles along the winding strand.
Their friends convey the dead to fun'ral
fires;

Black smold'ring smoke from the green wood expires;

The light of heav'n is chok'd, and the new day retires.

Then thrice around the kindled piles they go

(For ancient custom had ordain'd it so); Thrice horse and foot about the fires are
led;

And thrice, with loud laments, they hail the dead. ²⁹⁰

Tears, trickling down their breasts, bedew
the ground,

And drums and trumpets mix their mournful sound.

Amid the blaze, their pious brethren throw
The spoils, in battle taken from the foe:
Helms, bits emboss'd, and swords of shining steel;

One casts a target, one a chariot wheel;
Some to their fellows their own arms re-
store:

The fauchions which in luckless fight they
bore,

Their bucklers pierc'd, their darts bestow'd
in vain, ³⁰⁰

And shiver'd lances gather'd from the plain.
Whole herds of offer'd bulls, about the fire,
And bristled boars, and woolly sheep expire.

Around the piles a careful troop attends,
To watch the wasting flames, and weep
their burning friends;

Ling'ring along the shore, till dewy night
New decks the face of heav'n with starry
light.

The conquer'd Latians, with like pious
care,

Piles without number for their dead prepare.

Part in the places where they fell are laid;
And part are to the neighb'ring fields con-
vey'd. ³¹¹

The corps of kings, and captains of renown,
Borne off in state, are buried in the town;
The rest, unhonor'd, and without a name,
Are cast a common heap to feed the
flame.

Trojans and Latians vie with like desires To make the field of battle shine with
fires,

And the promiscuous blaze to heav'n aspires. }

Now had the morning thrice renew'd the
light,

And thrice dispell'd the shadows of the night, ³²⁰

When those who round the wasted fires re-
main,

Perform the last sad office to the slain.
They rake the yet warm ashes from below;

These, and the bones unburn'd, in earth bestow;

These relics with their country rites they
grace,

And raise a mount of turf to mark the
place.

But, in the palace of the king, appears

A scene more solemn, and a pomp of tears.
Maids, matrons, widows, mix their common moans;

Orphans their sires, and sires lament their sons. ³³⁰

All in that universal sorrow share,
And curse the cause of this unhappy war:
A broken league, a bride unjustly sought,
A crown usurp'd, which with their blood is
bought!

These are the crimes with which they load
the name

Of Turnus, and on him alone exclaim:
"Let him who lords it o'er th' Ausonian
land

Engage the Trojan hero hand to hand:
His is the gain; our lot is but to serve;

"T is just, the sway he seeks, he should deserve." ³⁴⁰

This Drances aggravates; and adds, with spite:

"His foe expects, and dares him to the fight."

Nor Turnus wants a party, to support
His cause and credit in the Latian court.
His former acts secure his present fame,
And the queen shades him with her mighty name.

While thus their factious minds with fury burn,
The legates from th' Ætolian prince return:

Sad news they bring, that, after all the cost

And care employ'd, their embassy is lost;
That Diomede refus'd his aid in war, ³⁵¹ Unmov'd with presents, and as deaf to
pray'r.

Some new alliance must elsewhere be
sought,

Or peace with Troy on hard conditions
bought.

Latinus, sunk in sorrow, finds too late,
A foreign son is pointed out by fate;
And, till Æneas shall Lavinia wed,
The wrath of Heav'n is hov'ring o'er his
head.

The gods, he saw, espous'd the juster
side,

When late their titles in the field were tried: ³⁶⁰

Witness the fresh laments, and fun'ral tears undried.

Thus, full of anxious thought, he summons
all

The Latian senate to the council hall.

The princes come, commanded by their
head,

And crowd the paths that to the palace
lead.

Supreme in pow'r, and reverenc'd for his
years,

He takes the throne, and in the midst appears.

Majestically sad, he sits in state,
And bids his envoys their success relate.

When Venulus began, the murmuring sound ³⁷⁰

Was hush'd, and sacred silence reign'd
around.

"We have," said he, "perform'd your high
command,

And pass'd with peril a long tract of land:
We reach'd the place desir'd; with wonder
fill'd,

The Grecian tents and rising tow'rs beheld.
Great Diomede has compass'd round with
walls

The city, which Argyripa he calls,
From his own Argos nam'd. We touch'd, with joy,

The royal hand that raz'd unhappy Troy.
When introduc'd, our presents first we bring, ³⁸⁰

Then crave an instant audience from the
king.

His leave obtain'd, our native soil we name,
And tell th' important cause for which we
came.

Attentively he heard us, while we spoke;
Then, with soft accents, and a pleasing
look,

Made this return: 'Ausonian race, of old
Renown'd for peace, and for an age of gold,
What madness has your alter'd minds pos-
sess'd,

To change for war hereditary rest, Solicit arms unknown, and tempt the sword, ³⁹⁰

A needless ill your ancestors abhorr'd?
We — for myself I speak, and all the name
Of Grecians, who to Troy's destruction
came,

Omitting those who were in battle slain,
Or borne by rolling Simois to the main —
Not one but suffer'd, and too dearly bought The prize of honor which in arms he
sought;

Some doom'd to death, and some in exile
driv'n,

Outcasts, abandon'd by the care of Heav'n;
So worn, so wretched, so despis'd a crew, ⁴⁰⁰
As ev'n old Priam might with pity view.

Witness the vessels by Minerva toss'd
In storms; the vengeful Capharean coast;
Th' Eubæan rocks! the prince, whose brother
led

Our armies to revenge his injur'd bed,
In Egypt lost! Ulysses with his men
Have seen Charybdis and the Cyclops' den.
Why should I name Idomenus, in vain

Restor'd to scepters, and expell'd again?
Or young Achilles, by his rival slain? ⁴¹⁰ Ev'n he, the King of Men, the foremost
name

Of all the Greeks, and most renown'd by
fame,

The proud revenger of another's wife,
Yet by his own adult'ress lost his life;
Fell at his threshold; and the spoils of Troy
The foul polluters of his bed enjoy.
The gods have envied me the sweets of life,
My much lov'd country, and my more lov'd
wife:

Banish'd from both, I mourn; while in the
sky,
Transform'd to birds, my lost companions fly: ⁴²⁰

Hov'ring about the coasts, they make their
moan,
And cuff the cliffs with pinions not their
own.

What squalid specters, in the dead of night, Break my short sleep, and skim before my
sight!

I might have promis'd to myself those harms,

Mad as I was, when I, with mortal arms,
Presum'd against immortal pow'rs to move,
And violate with wounds the Queen of
Love.

Such arms this hand shall never more employ;

No hate remains with me to ruin'd 'Troy. ⁴³⁰

I war not with its dust; nor am I glad
To think of past events, or good or bad.

Your presents I return: whate'er you bring
To buy my friendship, send the Trojan king.
We met in fight; I know him, to my cost:
With what a whirling force his lance he toss'd!

Heav'n's! what a spring was in his arm, to
throw!

How high he held his shield, and rose at ev'ry blow!

Had Troy produc'd two more his match in
might,

They would have chang'd the fortune of the fight: ⁴⁴⁰

Th' invasion of the Greeks had been re-
turn'd,

Our empire wasted, and our cities burn'd.
The long defense the Trojan people made,
The war protracted, and the siege delay'd,
Were due to Hector's and this hero's hand:
Both brave alike, and equal in command;
Æneas, not inferior in the field,
In pious reverence to the gods excell'd.

Make peace, ye Latians, and avoid with care
Th' impending dangers of a fatal war.' ⁴⁵⁰

He said no more; but, with this cold excuse,
Refus'd th' alliance, and advis'd a truce."

Thus Venulus concluded his report.

A jarring murmur fill'd the factious court:
As, when a torrent rolls with rapid force,
And dashes o'er the stones that stop the
course,

The flood, constrain'd within a scanty space,
Roars horrible along th' uneasy race;
White foam in gath'ring eddies floats
around;

The rocky shores rebellow to the sound. ⁴⁶⁰

The murmur ceas'd: then from his lofty
throne

The king invok'd the gods, and thus begun:
"I wish, ye Latins, what we now debate
Had been resolv'd before it was too late.
Much better had it been for you and me,
Unforc'd by this our last necessity,
'To have been earlier wise, than now to
call

A council, when the foe surrounds the wall.
O citizens, we wage unequal war,
With men not only Heav'n's peculiar care,
But Heav'n's own race; unconquer'd in the field, ⁴⁷¹

Or, conquer'd, yet unknowing how to yield.
What hopes you had in Diomede, lay down:
Our hopes must center on ourselves alone.
Yet those how feeble, and, indeed, how vain,
You see too well; nor need my words explain.

Vanquish'd without resource; laid flat by
fate;

Factions within, a foe without the gate!
Not but I grant that all perform'd their
parts

With manly force, and with undaunted hearts. ⁴⁸⁰

With our united strength the war we wag'd;
With equal numbers, equal arms, engag'd.
You see th' event. — Now hear what I propose,

To save our friends, and satisfy our foes.
A tract of land the Latins have possess'd
Along the Tiber, stretching to the west,
Which now Rutulians and Auruncans till,
And their mix'd cattle graze the fruitful
hill.

Those mountains fill'd with firs, that lower land, ⁴⁸⁹

If you consent, the Trojan shall command,
Call'd into part of what is ours; and there,
On terms agreed, the common country
share.

There let 'em build and settle, if they
please;

Unless they choose once more to cross the
 seas,
 In search of seats remote from Italy,
 And from unwelcome inmates set us free.
 Then twice ten galleys let us build with speed,
 Or twice as many more, if more they need.
 Materials are at hand; a well-grown wood
 Runs equal with the margin of the flood:
 Let them the number and the form assign;
 The care and cost of all the stores be mine.
 To treat the peace, a hundred senators ⁵⁰³
 Shall be commission'd hence with ample
 pow'rs,
 With olive crown'd: the presents they shall bear,
 A purple robe, a royal iv'ry chair,
 And all the marks of sway that Latian
 monarchs wear,
 And sums of gold. Among yourselves debate
 This great affair, and save the sinking
 state."
 Then Drances took the word, who grudg'd, long since, ⁵¹⁰
 The rising glories of the Daunian prince.
 Factionous and rich, bold at the council
 board,
 But cautious in the field, he shunn'd the
 sword;
 A close caballer, and tongue-valiant lord.
 Noble his mother was, and near the throne;
 But, what his father's parentage, unknown.
 He rose, and took th' advantage of the times,
 To load young Turnus with invidious crimes.
 "Such truths, O king," said he, "your words contain, ⁵¹⁹
 As strike the sense, and all replies are vain;
 Nor are your loyal subjects now to seek What common needs require, but fear to speak.
 Let him give leave of speech, that haughty
 man,
 Whose pride this un auspicious war began;
 For whose ambition (let me dare to say,
 Fear set apart, tho' death is in my way)
 The plains of Latium run with blood around;
 So many valiant heroes bite the ground;
 Dejected grief in ev'ry face appears;
 A town in mourning, and a land in tears;
 While he, th' undoubted author of our harms, ⁵³¹
 The man who menaces the gods with arms,
 Yet, after all his boasts, forsook the fight,

And sought his safety in ignoble flight.
 Now, best of kings, since you propose to send Such bounteous presents to your Trojan
 friend;
 Add yet a greater at our joint request,
 One which he values more than all the
 rest:
 Give him the fair Lavinia for his bride;
 With that alliance let the league be tied,
 And for the bleeding land a lasting peace provide. ⁵⁴¹
 Let insolence no longer awe the throne;
 But, with a father's right, bestow your own.
 For this maligner of the general good,
 If still we fear his force, he must be woo'd;
 His haughty godhead we with pray'rs im-
 plore,
 Your scepter to release, and our just rights
 restore.
 O cursed cause of all our ills, must we Wage wars unjust, and fall in fight, for thee!
 What right hast thou to rule the Latian
 state, ⁵⁵⁰
 And send us out to meet our certain fate?
 'Tis a destructive war: from Turnus' hand
 Our peace and public safety we demand.
 Let the fair bride to the brave chief re-
 main;
 If not, the peace, without the pledge, is
 vain.
 Turnus, I know you think me not your
 friend,
 Nor will I much with your belief contend:
 I beg your greatness not to give the law
 In others' realms, but, beaten, to withdraw.
 Pity your own, or pity our estate; ⁵⁶⁰
 Nor twist our fortunes with your sinking
 fate.
 Your interest is, the war should never
 cease;
 But we have felt enough to wish the peace:
 A land exhausted to the last remains,
 Depopulated towns, and driven plains.
 Yet, if desire of fame, and thirst of pow'r,
 A beauteous princess, with a crown in dlow'r,
 So fire your mind, in arms assert your
 right,
 And meet your foe, who dares you to the
 fight.
 Mankind, it seems, is made for you alone;
 We, but the slaves who mount you to the throne: ⁵⁷¹

A base ignoble crowd, without a name,
 Unwept, unworthy of the fun'ral flame,
 By duty bound to forfeit each his life,
 That Turnus may possess a royal wife.
 Permit not, mighty man, so mean a crew Should share such triumphs, and detain from you
 The post of honor, your undoubted due.
 Rather alone your matchless force employ,
 To merit what alone you must enjoy." 580
 These words, so full of malice mix'd with
 art, Inflam'd with rage the youthful hero's
 heart.
 Then, groaning from the bottom of his
 breast,
 He heav'd for wind, and thus his wrath ex-
 press'd:
 "You, Drances, never want a stream of
 words,
 Then, when the public need requires our swords.
 First in the council hall to steer the state,
 And ever foremost in a tongue-debate, While our strong walls secure us from the
 foe,
 Ere yet with blood our ditches overflow: 590
 But let the potent orator declaim,
 And with the brand of coward blot my
 name;
 Free leave is giv'n him, when his fatal
 hand
 Has cover'd with more corps the sanguine
 strand,
 And high as mine his tow'ring trophies
 stand.
 If any doubt remains, who dares the most,
 Let us decide it at the Trojans' cost,
 And issue both abreast, where honor calls — Foes are not far to seek without the
 walls —
 Unless his noisy tongue can only fight, 600
 And feet were giv'n him but to speed his
 flight.
 I beaten from the field? I forc'd away?
 Who, but so known a dastard, dares to
 say?
 Had he but ev'n beheld the fight, his eyes
 Had witness'd for me what his tongue denies:
 What heaps of Trojans by this hand were
 slain,
 And how the bloody Tiber swell'd the
 main.
 All saw, but he, th' Arcadian troops retire

In scatter'd squadrons, and their prince expire.
 The giant brothers, in their camp, have
 found, 610
 I was not forc'd with ease to quit my
 ground.
 Not such the Trojans tried me, when, in-
 clos'd,
 I singly their united arms oppos'd:
 First forc'd an entrance thro' their thick
 array;
 Then, glutted with their slaughter, freed
 my way.
 'Tis a destructive war? So let it be,
 But to the Phrygian pirate, and to thee!
 Meantime proceed to fill the people's ears
 With false reports, their minds with panic
 fears:
 Extol the strength of a twice-conquer'd
 race; 620
 Our foes encourage, and our friends debase.
 Believe thy fables, and the Trojan town Triumphant stands; the Grecians are o'er-
 thrown;
 Suppliant at Hector's feet Achilles lies,
 And Diomed from fierce Æneas flies.
 Say rapid Aufidus with awful dread Runs backward from the sea, and hides his
 head,
 When the great Trojan on his bank appears;
 For that's as true as thy dissembled fears
 Of my revenge. Dismiss that vanity: 630
 Thou, Drances, art below a death from me.
 Let that vile soul in that vile body rest;
 The lodging is well worthy of the guest.
 "Now, royal father, to the present state
 Of our affairs, and of this high debate:
 If in your arms thus early you diffide,
 And think your fortune is already tried;
 If one defeat has brought us down so low,
 As never more in fields to meet the foe;
 Then I conclude for peace: 't is time to treat, 640
 And lie like vassals at the victor's feet.
 But, O! if any ancient blood remains,
 One drop of all our fathers', in our veins,
 That man would I prefer before the rest,
 Who dar'd his death with an undaunted
 breast;
 Who comely fell, by no dishonest wound,
 To shun that sight, and, dying, gnaw'd the
 ground.
 But, if we still have fresh recruits in store,
 If our confederates can afford us more;
 If the contended field we bravely fought, 650

And not a bloodless victory was bought;
 Their losses equal'd ours; and, for their
 slain,
 With equal fires they fill'd the shining
 plain;
 Why thus, unforc'd, should we so tamely
 yield,
 And, ere the trumpet sounds, resign the
 field?

Good unexpected, evils unforeseen,
 Appear by turns, as fortune shifts the scene:
 Some, rais'd aloft, come tumbling down
 again;
 Then fall so hard, they bound and rise
 again.

If Diomed refuse his aid to lend, 660
 The great Messapus yet remains our friend:
 Tolumnius, who foretells events, is ours;
 Th' Italian chiefs and princes join their
 pow'rs:

Nor least in number, nor in name the last,
 Your own brave subjects have your cause
 embrac'd.

Above the rest, the Volscian Amazon
 Contains an army in herself alone,
 And heads a squadron, terrible to sight,
 With glitt'ring shields, in brazen armor
 bright.

Yet, if the foe a single fight demand, 670
 And I alone the public peace withstand;
 If you consent, he shall not be refus'd,
 Nor find a hand to victory unus'd.

This new Achilles, let him take the field,
 With fated armor, and Vulcanian shield!
 For you, my royal father, and my fame,
 I, Turnus, not the least of all my name,
 Devote my soul. He calls me hand to hand,
 And I alone will answer his demand. 679
 Drances shall rest secure, and neither share
 The danger, nor divide the prize of war."

While they debate, nor these nor those will yield,

Æneas draws his forces to the field,
 And moves his camp. The scouts with flying speed

Return, and thro' the frighted city spread Th' unpleasing news, the Trojans are described,

In battle marching by the river side,
 And bending to the town. They take th'
 alarm:

Some tremble, some are bold; all in confusion arm.

Th' impetuous youth press forward to the
 field; 690

They clash the sword, and clatter on the
 shield:

The fearful matrons raise a screaming
 cry;

Old feeble men with fainter groans reply;
 A jarring sound results, and mingles in
 the sky,

Like that of swans remurm'ring to the floods,

Or birds of diff'ring kinds in hollow woods.

Turnus th' occasion takes, and cries aloud:
 "Talk on, ye quaint haranguers of the
 crowd:

Declaim in praise of peace, when danger
 calls,

And the fierce foes in arms approach the
 walls." 700

He said, and, turning short, with speedy
 pace,

Casts back a scornful glance, and quits the
 place:

"Thou, Volusus, the Volscian troops command

To mount; and lead thyself our Ardean
 band.

Messapus and Catillus, post your force
 Along the fields, to charge the Trojan
 horse.

Some guard the passes, others man the wall;
 Drawn up in arms, the rest attend my call."

They swarm from ev'ry quarter of the
 town.

And with disorder'd haste the rampires
 crown. 710

Good old Latinus, when he saw, too late,
 The gath'ring storm just breaking on the
 state,

Dismiss'd the council till a fitter time,
 And own'd his easy temper as his crime,
 Who, forc'd against his reason, had com-
 plied

To break the treaty for the promis'd bride.

Some help to sink new trenches; others
 aid

To ram the stones, or raise the palisade.

Hoarse trumpets sound th' alarm; around
 the walls

Runs a distracted crew, whom their last labor calls. 720

A sad procession in the streets is seen,

Of matrons, that attend the mother queen:

High in her chair she sits, and, at her side,

With downcast eyes appears the fatal bride.

They mount the cliff, where Pallas' temple
 stands;

Pray'rs in their mouths, and presents in their hands.

With censers first they fume the sacred
shrine,

Then in this common supplication join:
"O patroness of arms, unspotted maid,
Propitious hear, and lend thy Latins aid ! 730 Break short the pirate's lance; pronounce his fate,

And lay the Phrygian low before the gate."
Now Turnus arms for fight. His back and breast

Well-temper'd steel and scaly brass invest:
The cuishes which his brawny thighs in-
fold

Are mingled metal damask'd o'er with gold.
His faithful fauchion sits upon his side;
Nor casque, nor crest, his manly features
hide:

But, bare to view, amid surrounding friends,
With godlike grace, he from the tow'r
descends. 740

Exulting in his strength, he seems to dare
His absent rival, and to promise war.

Freed from his keepers, thus, with broken
reins,

The wanton courser prances o'er the plains,
Or in the pride of youth o'erleaps the mounds,

And snuffs the females in forbidden grounds,
Or seeks his wat'ring in the well-known
flood,

To quench his thirst, and cool his fiery blood:
He swims luxuriant in the liquid plain,
And o'er his shoulder flows his waving
mane: 750

He neighs, he snorts, he bears his head on
high;

Before his ample chest the frothy waters
fly.

Soon as the prince appears without the
gate,

The Volscians, with their virgin leader, wait
His last commands. Then, with a graceful mien,

Lights from her lofty steed the warrior
queen:

Her squadron imitates, and each descends;
Whose common suit Camilla thus com-
mends:

"If sense of honor, if a soul secure
Of inborn worth, that can all tests endure,
Can promise aught, or on itself rely 761
Greatly to dare, to conquer or to die;
Then, I alone, sustain'd by these, will meet

The Tyrrhene troops, and promise their defeat.

Ours be the danger, ours the sole renown:
You, gen'ral, stay behind, and guard the
town."

Turnus a while stood mute, with glad surprise,

And on the fierce virago fix'd his eyes;
Then thus return'd: "O grace of Italy, 769
With what becoming thanks can I reply ?
Not only words lie lab'ring in my breast,
But thought itself is by thy praise op-
press'd.

Yet rob me not of all; but let me join My toils, my hazard, and my fame, with thine.

The Trojan, not in stratagem unskill'd, Sends his light horse before to scour the
field:

Himself, thro' steep ascents and thorny brakes,

A larger compass to the city takes.

This news my scouts confirm, and I prepare
To foil his cunning, and his force to dare;

With chosen foot his passage to forelay, 781
And place an ambush in the winding way.

Thou, with thy Volscians, face the Tuscan
horse:

The brave Messapus shall thy troops in-
force

With those of Tibur, and the Latian band, Subjected all to thy supreme command."

This said, he warns Messapus to the war,
Then ev'ry chief exhorts with equal care.
All thus encourag'd, his own troops he joins,
And hastes to prosecute his deep designs.

Inclos'd with hills, a winding valley lies,
By nature form'd for fraud, and fitted for surprise. 792

A narrow track, by human steps untrode, Leads, thro' perplexing thorns, to this obscure abode.

High o'er the vale a steepy mountain stands,
Whence the surveying sight the nether ground commands.

The top is level, an offensive seat

Of war; and from the war a safe retreat:
For, on the right and left, is room to press
The foes at hand, or from afar distress; 800
To drive 'em headlong downward, and to pour

On their descending backs a stony show'r.
Thither young Turnus took the well-known
way,

Possess'd the pass, and in blind ambush lay.

Meantime, Latonian Phœbe, from the
 skies,
 Beheld th' approaching war with hateful
 eyes,
 And call'd the light-foot Opis to her aid,
 Her most belov'd and ever-trusty maid;
 Then with a sigh began: "Camilla goes
 To meet her death amidst her fatal foes:
 The nymph I lov'd of all my mortal train,
 Invested with Diana's arms, in vain. ⁸¹²
 Nor is my kindness for the virgin new:
 'Twas born with her; and with her years
 it grew.
 Her father Metabus, when forc'd away
 From old Privernum, for tyrannic sway, Snatch'd up, and sav'd from his prevailing
 foes,
 This tender babe, companion of his woes.
 Camilla was her mother; but he drown'd
 One hissing letter in a softer sound, ⁸²⁰ And call'd Camilla. Thro' the woods he
 flies;
 Wrapp'd in his robe the royal infant lies.
 His foes in sight, he mends his weary
 pace;
 With shouts and clamors they pursue the
 chase.
 The banks of Amasene at length he gains: }
 The raging flood his farther flight re- }
 strains,
 Rais'd o'er the borders with unusual rains. } Prepar'd to plunge into the stream, he
 fears,
 Not for himself, but for the charge he
 bears.
 Anxious, he stops a while, and thinks in haste; ⁸³⁰
 Then, despairing in distress, resolves at last.
 A knotty lance of well-boil'd oak he bore;
 The middle part with cork he cover'd o'er:
 He clos'd the child within the hollow space;
 With twigs of bending osier bound the case;
 Then pois'd the spear, heavy with human
 weight,
 And thus invok'd my favor for the freight:
 'Accept, great goddess of the woods,' he
 said,
 'Sent by her sire, this dedicated maid!
 Thro' air she flies a suppliant to thy shrine; ⁸⁴⁰
 And the first weapons that she knows, are thine.'
 He said; and with full force the spear he
 threw:
 Above the sounding waves Camilla flew.

Then, press'd by foes, he stemm'd the stormy tide,
 And gain'd, by stress of arms, the farther
 side.
 His fasten'd spear he pull'd from out the
 ground,
 And, victor of his vows, his infant nymph
 unbound;
 Nor, after that, in towns which walls in-
 close,
 Would trust his hunted life amidst his foes;
 But, rough, in open air he chose to lie; ⁸⁵⁰ Earth was his couch, his cov'ring was the
 sky.
 On hills unshorn, or in a desert den,
 He shunn'd the dire society of men.
 A shepherd's solitary life he led;
 His daughter with the milk of mares he
 fed.
 The dugs of bears, and ev'ry salvage beast,
 He drew, and thro' her lips the liquor
 press'd.
 The little Amazon could scarcely go:
 He loads her with a quiver and a bow;
 And, that she might her staggring steps command, ⁸⁶⁰
 He with a slender jav'lin fills her hand.
 Her flowing hair no golden fillet bound;
 Nor swept her trailing robe the dusty
 ground.
 Instead of these, a tiger's hide o'erspread
 Her back and shoulders, fasten'd to her
 head.
 The flying dart she first attempts to fling,
 And round her tender temples toss'd the
 sling;
 Then, as her strength with years increas'd, began }
 To pierce aloft in air the soaring swan, }
 And from the clouds to fetch the heron } and the crane. ⁸⁷⁰
 The Tuscan matrons with each other vied,
 To bless their rival sons with such a bride;
 But she disdains their love, to share with
 me
 The sylvan shades and vow'd virginity.
 And, O! I wish, contented with my cares Of salvage spoils, she had not sought the
 wars:
 Then had she been of my celestial train,
 And shunn'd the fate that dooms her to be
 slain.
 But since, opposing Heav'n's decree, she goes ⁸⁷⁹
 To find her death among forbidden foes,

Haste with these arms, and take thy steepy
flight,
Where, with the gods averse, the Latins
fight.

This bow to thee, this quiver I bequeath,
This chosen arrow, to revenge her death:
By whate'er hand Camilla shall be slain,
Or of the Trojan or Italian train, Let him not pass unpunish'd from the
plain.

Then, in a hollow cloud, myself will aid
To bear the breathless body of my maid:
Unspoil'd shall be her arms, and unpro-
fan'd

Her holy limbs with any human hand,
And in a marble tomb laid in her native
land."

She said. The faithful nymph descends
from high
With rapid flight, and cuts the sounding
sky:

Black clouds and stormy winds around her body fly.

By this, the Trojan and the Tuscan horse,
Drawn up in squadrons, with united force,
Approach the walls: the sprightly coursers
bound.

Press forward on their bits, and shift their
ground.

Shields, arms, and spears flash horribly
from far;

And the fields glitter with a waving war.
Oppos'd to these, come on with furious
force

Messapus, Coras, and the Latian horse;
These in the body plac'd, on either hand
Sustain'd and clos'd by fair Camilla's band.
Advancing in a line, they couch their spears;
And less and less the middle space appears.
Thick smoke obscures the field; and scarce
are seen

The neighing coursers, and the shouting
men.

In distance of their darts they stop their
course;

Then man to man they rush, and horse to
horse.

The face of heav'n their flying jav'lines hide,
And deaths unseen are dealt on either side.
Tyrrhenus, and Aconteus, void of fear,
By mettled coursers borne in full career,
Meet first oppos'd; and, with a mighty
shock,

Their horses' heads against each other
knock.

Far from his steed is fierce Aconteus cast,
As with an engine's force, or lightning's
blast:

He rolls along in blood, and breathes his
last.

The Latin squadrons take a sudden fright,
And sling their shields behind, to save their backs in flight.

Spurring at speed, to their own walls they
drew;

Close in the rear the Tuscan troops pursue,
And urge their flight: Asylas leads the
chase;

Till, seiz'd with shame, they wheel about and face.

Receive their foes, and raise a threat'ning
cry.

The Tuscans take their turn to fear and fly.
So swelling surges, with a thund'ring roar, Driv'n on each other's backs, insult the
shore,

Bound o'er the rocks, inroach upon the
land,

And far upon the beach eject the sand;
Then backward, with a swing, they take
their way,

Repuls'd from upper ground, and seek their mother sea:

With equal hurry quit th' invaded shore,
And swallow back the sand and stones they spew'd before.

Twice were the Tuscans masters of the
field,

Twice by the Latins, in their turn, repell'd.
Asham'd at length, to the third charge they
ran;

Both hosts resolv'd, and mingled man to
man.

Now dying groans are heard; the fields are strow'd

With falling bodies, and are drunk with
blood.

Arms, horses, men, on heaps together lie:
Confus'd the fight, and more confus'd the
cry.

Orsilochus, who durst not press too near Strong Remulus, at distance drove his
spear,

And stuck the steel beneath his horse's
ear.

The fiery steed, impatient of the wound, Curvets, and, springing upward with a
bound,

His helpless lord cast backward on the
ground.

Catillus pierc'd Iolas first; then drew
 His reeking lance, and at Herminius
 threw,
 The mighty champion of the Tuscan
 crew.
 His neck and throat unarm'd, his head was
 bare,
 But shaded with a length of yellow hair:
 Secure, he fought, expos'd on ev'ry part,
 A spacious mark for swords, and for the flying dart.
 Across the shoulders came the feather'd
 wound;
 Transfix'd, he fell, and doubled to the
 ground.
 The sands with streaming blood are sanguine dyed, ⁹⁶⁰
 And death with honor sought on either
 side.
 Resistless thro' the war Camilla rode,
 In danger unappall'd, and pleas'd with
 blood.
 One side was bare for her exerted breast;
 One shoulder with her painted quiver
 press'd.
 Now from afar her fatal jav'lins play;
 Now with her ax's edge she hews her way:
 Diana's arms upon her shoulder sound;
 And when, too closely press'd, she quits
 the ground,
 From her bent bow she sends a backward wound. ⁹⁷⁰
 Her maids, in martial pomp, on either side,
 Larina, Tulla, fierce Tarpeia, ride:
 Italians all; in peace, their queen's delight;
 In war, the bold companions of the fight.
 So march'd the Thracian Amazons of old,
 When Thermodon with bloody billows
 roll'd:
 Such troops as these in shining arms were
 seen,
 When Theseus met in fight their maiden
 queen:
 Such to the field Penthisilea led,
 From the fierce virgin when the Grecians fled; ⁹⁸⁰
 With such, return'd triumphant from the
 war,
 Her maids with cries attend the lofty car;
 They clash with manly force their moony
 shields;
 With female shouts resound the Phrygian
 fields.
 Who foremost, and who last, heroic
 maid,

On the cold earth were by thy courage
 laid?
 Thy spear, of mountain ash, Eumenius first,
 With fury driv'n, from side to side trans-pierc'd:
 A purple stream came spouting from the
 wound;
 Bath'd in his blood he lies, and bites the ground. ⁹⁹⁰
 Liris and Pagasus at once she slew:
 The former, as the slacken'd reins he drew
 Of his faint steed; the latter, as he stretch'd
 His arm to prop his friend, the jav'lin reach'd.
 By the same weapon, sent from the same
 hand,
 Both fall together, and both spurn the sand.
 Amastrus next is added to the slain:
 The rest in rout she follows o'er the plain:
 Tereus, Harpalyceus, Demophoon, ⁹⁹⁹
 And Chromis, at full speed her fury shun.
 Of all her deadly darts, not one she lost;
 Each was attended with a Trojan ghost.
 Young Ornithus bestrode a hunter steed,
 Swift for the chase, and of Apulian breed.
 Him from afar she spied, in arms unknown:
 O'er his broad back an ox's hide was
 thrown;
 His helm a wolf, whose gaping jaws were
 spread
 A cov'ring for his cheeks, and grinn'd around his head.
 He clench'd within his hand an iron prong,
 And tower'd above the rest, conspicuous in the throng. ¹⁰¹⁰
 Him soon she singled from the flying train,
 And slew with ease; then thus insults the
 slain:
 "Vain hunter, didst thou think thro' woods to chase
 The savage herd, a vile and trembling
 race?
 Here cease thy vaunts, and own my victory:
 A woman warrior was too strong for thee.
 Yet, if the ghosts demand the conqueror's
 name,
 Confessing great Camilla, save thy shame."
 Then Butes and Orsilochus she slew,
 The bulkiest bodies of the Trojan crew; ¹⁰²⁰
 But Butes breast to breast: the spear
 descends
 Above the gorget, where his helmet ends,
 And o'er the shield which his left side defends.

Orsilochus and she their coursers ply:
He seems to follow, and she seems to fly;
But in a narrower ring she makes the race;
And then he flies, and she pursues the chase.

Gath'ring at length on her deluded foe,
She swings her ax, and rises to the blow;
Full on the helm behind, with such a sway
The weapon falls, the riven steel gives way:

He groans, he roars, he sues in vain for grace;
Brains, mingled with his blood, besmear his face.

Astonish'd Aunus just arrives by chance,
To see his fall, nor farther dares advance;
But, fixing on the horrid maid his eye,
He stares, and shakes, and finds it vain to fly;

Yet, like a true Ligurian, born to cheat,
(At least while fortune favor'd his deceit,) Cries out aloud: "What courage have you shown,

Who trust your courser's strength, and not your own?

Forego the vantage of your horse, alight,
And then on equal terms begin the fight:
It shall be seen, weak woman, what you can,

When, foot to foot, you combat with a man." He said. She glows with anger and disdain,

Dismounts with speed to dare him on the plain,
And leaves her horse at large among her train;

With her drawn sword defies him to the field,

And, marching, lifts aloft her maiden shield.
The youth, who thought his cunning did succeed,

Reins round his horse, and urges all his speed;

Adds the remembrance of the spur, and hides

The goring rowels in his bleeding sides.

"Vain fool, and coward!" cries the lofty maid,

"Caught in the train which thou thyself hast laid!

On others practice thy Ligurian arts;
Thin stratagems and tricks of little hearts
Are lost on me: nor shalt thou safe retire,
With vaunting lies, to thy fallacious sire."
At this, so fast her flying feet she sped,

That soon she strain'd beyond his horse's head:

Then turning short, at once she seiz'd the rein,

And laid the boaster grov'ling on the plain.
Not with more ease the falcon, from above,
Trusses in middle air the trembling dove,
Then plumes the prey, in her strong pounces bound:

The feathers, foul with blood, come tumbling to the ground.

Now mighty Jove, from his superior height,
With his broad eye surveys th' unequal fight.

He fires the breast of Tarchon with disdain,
And sends him to redeem th' abandon'd plain.

Betwixt the broken ranks the Tuscan rides,
And these encourages, and those he chides;
Recalls each leader, by his name, from flight;

Renews their ardor, and restores the fight.
"What panic fear has seiz'd your souls?
O shame,

O brand perpetual of th' Etrurian name!
Cowards incurable, a woman's hand
Drives, breaks, and scatters your ignoble band!

Now cast away the sword, and quit the shield!

What use of weapons which you dare not wield?

Not thus you fly your female foes by night,
Nor shun the feast, when the full bowls invite;

When to fat off'rings the glad augur calls,
And the shrill hornpipe sounds to bacchanals.

These are your studied cares, your lewd delight:

Swift to debauch, but slow to manly fight."
Thus having said, he spurs amid the foes,
Not managing the life he meant to lose.

The first he found he seiz'd, with headlong haste,

In his strong gripe, and clasp'd around the waist:

'T was Venulus, whom from his horse he tore,

And, laid athwart his own, in triumph bore.
Loud shouts ensue; the Latins turn their eyes,

And view th' unusual sight with vast surprise.

The fiery Tarchon, flying o'er the plains,
Press'd in his arms the pond'rous prey sus-
tains;

Then, with his shorten'd spear, explores around ¹⁰⁹⁹

His jointed arms, to fix a deadly wound.
Nor less the captive struggles for his life:
He writhes his body to prolong the strife,
And, fencing for his naked throat, exerts
His utmost vigor, and the point averts.

So stoops the yellow eagle from on high,
And bears a speckled serpent thro' the sky,
Fast'ning his crooked talons on the prey:
The pris'n'r hisses thro' the liquid way;
Resists the royal hawk; and, tho' oppress'd,
She fights in volumes, and erects her crest: ¹¹¹⁰

Turn'd to her foe, she stiffens ev'ry scale,
And shoots her forky tongue, and whisks her threat'ning tail.

Against the victor, all defense is weak:
Th' imperial bird still plies her with his beak;

He tears her bowels, and her breast he gores;

Then claps his pinions, and securely soars.
Thus, thro' the midst of circling enemies, Strong Tarchon snatch'd and bore away his
prize.

The Tyrrhene troops, that shrunk before,
now press

The Latins, and presume the like success. ¹¹²⁰
Then Aruns, doom'd to death, his arts
assay'd,

To murder, unespied, the Volscian maid:
This way and that his winding course he
bends,

And, wheresoe'er she turns, her steps attends.

When she retires victorious from the chase,
He wheels about with care, and shifts his
place;

When, rushing on, she seeks her foes in
fight,

He keeps aloof, but keeps her still in sight:
He threatens, and trembles, trying ev'ry way,
Unseen to kill, and safely to betray. ¹¹³⁰

Chloereus, the priest of Cybele, from far,
Glitt'ring in Phrygian arms amidst the war,
Was by the virgin view'd. The steed he
press'd

Was proud with trappings, and his brawny chest

With scales of gilded brass was cover'd o'er;
A robe of Tyrian dye the rider wore.

With deadly wounds he gall'd the distant
foe;

Gnossian his shafts, and Lycian was his bow:
A golden helm his front and head surrounds;
A gilded quiver from his shoulder
sounds. ¹¹⁴⁰

Gold, weav'd with linen, on his thighs he
wore,

With flowers of needlework distinguish'd
o'er,

With golden buckles bound, and gather'd up before.

Him the fierce maid beheld with ardent
eyes,

Fond and ambitious of so rich a prize,
Or that the temple might his trophies hold,
Or else to shine herself in Trojan gold.

Blind in her haste, she chases him alone,
And seeks his life, regardless of her own.

This lucky moment the sly traitor chose; ¹¹⁵⁰

Then, starting from his ambush, up he rose,

And threw, but first to Heav'n address'd his vows:

"O patron of Soraete's high abodes,
Phæbus, the ruling pow'r among the gods,
Whom first we serve, whole woods of unctuous pine

Are fell'd for thee, and to thy glory shine;
By thee protected, with our naked soles,
Thro' flames unsing'd we march, and tread
the kindled coals:

Give me, propitious pow'r, to wash away
The stains of this dishonorable day: ¹¹⁶⁰

Nor spoils, nor triumph, from the fact I
claim,

But with my future actions trust my fame.
Let me, by stealth, this female plague o'er-
come,

And from the field return inglorious home."
Apollo heard, and, granting half his pray'r, Shuffled in winds the rest, and toss'd in empty air.

He gives the death desir'd: his safe return
By southern tempests to the seas is borne.

Now, when the jav'lin whizz'd along the
skies,

Both armies on Camilla turn'd their eyes, ¹¹⁷⁰

Directed by the sound. Of either host,
Th' unhappy virgin, tho' concern'd the most,
Was only deaf; so greedy was she bent
On golden spoils, and on her prey intent;
Till in her pap the winged weapon stood

Infix'd, and deeply drunk the purple blood.
Her sad attendants hasten to sustain
Their dying lady, drooping on the plain.
Far from their sight the trembling Aruns
flies,

With beating heart, and fear confus'd with joys; 1180

Nor dares he farther to pursue his blow,
Or ev'n to bear the sight of his expiring foe.
As, when the wolf has torn a bullock's hide
At unawares, or ranch'd a shepherd's side,
Conscious of his audacious deed, he flies,
And claps his quiv'ring tail between his thighs:

So, speeding once, the wretch no more
attends,

But, spurring forward, herds among his
friends.

She wrench'd the jav'lin with her dying
hands,

But wedg'd within her breast the weapon
stands; 1190

The wood she draws, the steely point remains;

She staggers in her seat with agonizing
pains:

(A gath'ring mist o'erclouds her cheerful
eyes,

And from her cheeks the rosy color flies:)
Then turns to her, whom of her female train
She trusted most, and thus she speaks with
pain:

"Acca, 'tis past! he swims before my sight,
Inexorable Death; and claims his right.

Bear my last words to Turnus; fly with
speed, 1199

And bid him timely to my charge succeed,
Repel the Trojans, and the town relieve:

Farewell! and in this kiss my parting breath
receive."

She said, and, sliding, sunk upon the plain:
Dying, her open'd hand forsakes the rein;
Short, and more short, she pants: by slow degrees

Her mind the passage from her body frees.
She drops her sword; she nods her plummy
crest,

Her drooping head declining on her breast:
In the last sigh her struggling soul expires,
And, murm'ring with disdain, to Stygian
sounds retires. 1210

A shout, that struck the golden stars, ensued;

Despair and rage the languish'd fight re-
new'd.

The Trojan troops and Tuscans, in a line, Advance to charge; the mix'd Arcadians
join.

But Cynthia's maid, high seated, from
afar

Surveys the field, and fortune of the war, Unmov'd a while, till, prostrate on the
plain,

Welt'ring in blood, she sees Camilla slain,
And, round her corpse, of friends and foes a fighting train.

Then, from the bottom of her breast, she
drew 1220

A mournful sigh, and these sad words ensue:
"Too dear a fine, ah much lamented maid,
For warring with the Trojans, thou hast
paid!

Nor aught avail'd, in this unhappy strife,
Diana's sacred arms, to save thy life.

Yet unreveng'd thy goddess will not leave
Her vot'ry's death, nor with vain sorrow grieve.

Branded the wretch, and be his name abhorr'd;

But after ages shall thy praise record.

Th' inglorious coward soon shall press the
plain: 1230

Thus vows thy queen, and thus the Fates
ordain."

High o'er the field there stood a hilly mound,

Sacred the place, and spread with oaks
around,

Where, in a marble tomb, Dercennus lay,
A king that once in Latium bore the sway.

The beauteous Opis thither bent her flight,
To mark the traitor Aruns from the height.

Him in refulgent arms she soon espied, Sworn with success; and loudly thus she
cried:

"Thy backward steps, vain boaster, are too late; 1240

Turn like a man, at length, and meet thy
fate.

Charg'd with my message, to Camilla go,
And say I sent thee to the shades below,
An honor undeserv'd from Cynthia's
bow."

She said, and from her quiver chose with speed

The winged shaft, destin'd for the deed;
Then to the stubborn yew her strength ap-
plied,

Till the far distant horns approach'd on either side.

The bowstring touch'd her breast, so strong
she drew;

Whizzing in air the fatal arrow flew. 1250
At once the twanging bow and sounding
dart

The traitor heard, and felt the point within
his heart.

Him, beating with his heels in pangs of
death,

His flying friends to foreign fields bequeath.
The conqu'ring damsel, with expanded
wings,

The welcome message to her mistress
brings.

Their leader lost, the Volscians quit the
field;

And, unsustain'd, the chiefs of Turnus yield.
The frightened soldiers, when their captains
fly,

More on their speed than on their strength rely. 1260

Confus'd in flight, they bear each other
down,

And spur their horses headlong to the town.
Driv'n by their foes, and to their fears re-
sign'd,

Not once they turn, but take their wounds
behind.

These drop the shield, and those the lance forego,

Or on their shoulders bear the slacken'd
bow.

The hoofs of horses, with a rattling sound,
Beat short and thick, and shake the rotten
ground.

Black clouds of dust come rolling in the sky,
And o'er the darken'd walls and rampires
fly. 1270

The trembling matrons, from their lofty
stands,

Rend heav'n with female shrieks, and wring
their hands.

All pressing on, pursuers and pursued,
Are crush'd in crowds, a mingled multitude.
Some happy few escape: the throng too late Rush on for entrance, till they choke the gate.

Ev'n in the sight of home, the wretched sire
Looks on, and sees his helpless son expire.
Then, in a fright, the folding gates they
close,

But leave their friends excluded with their
foes. 1280

The vanquish'd cry; the victors loudly
shout;

'Tis terror all within, and slaughter all without.

Blind in their fear, they bounce against the wall,

Or, to the moats pursued, precipitate their
fall.

The Latian virgins, valiant with despair,
Arm'd on the tow'rs, the common danger
share:

So much of zeal their country's cause in-
spir'd;

So much Camilla's great example fir'd.
Poles, sharpen'd in the flames, from high
they throw,

With imitated darts to gall the foe. 1290
Their lives for godlike freedom they bequeath,

And crowd each other to be first in death.
Meantime to Turnus, ambush'd in the
shade,

With heavy tidings came th' unhappy
maid:

"The Volscians overthrown, Camilla kill'd;
The foes, entirely masters of the field,
Like a resistless flood, come rolling on:
The cry goes off the plain, and thickens to the town."

Inflam'd with rage, (for so the Furies fire
The Daunian's breast, and so the Fates require,) 1300

He leaves the hilly pass, the woods in vain Possess'd, and downward issues on the
plain.

Scarce was he gone, when to the straits,
now freed

From secret foes, the Trojan troops succeed.

Thro' the black forest and the ferny brake,
Unknowingly secure, their way they take;
From the rough mountains to the plain
descend,

And there, in order drawn, their line extend.

Both armies now in open fields are seen;
Nor far the distance of the space between.

Both to the city bend. Æneas sees, 1311
Thro' smoking fields, his hast'ning enemies;

And Turnus views the Trojans in array,
And hears th' approaching horses proudly neigh.

Soon had their hosts in bloody battle join'd:
But westward to the sea the sun declin'd.

Intrench'd before the town both armies lie, While Night with sable wings involves the
sky.

THE TWELFTH BOOK OF THE ÆNEIS

THE ARGUMENT

Turnus challenges Æneas to a single combat: articles are agreed on, but broken by the Rutili, who wound Æneas. He is miraculously cur'd by Venus, forces Turnus to a duel, and concludes the poem with his death.

WHEN Turnus saw the Latins leave the field,
Their armies broken, and their courage
quell'd,

Himself become the mark of public spite,
His honor question'd for the promis'd fight;
The more he was with vulgar hate oppress'd,
The more his fury boil'd within his breast:
He rous'd his vigor for the last debate,
And rais'd his haughty soul to meet his fate.

As, when the swains the Libyan lion chase,
He makes a sour retreat, nor mends his
pace;

But, if the pointed jav'lin pierce his side,
The lordly beast returns with double pride:
He wrenches out the steel, he roars for pain;
His sides he lashes, and erects his mane:
So Turnus fares; his eyeballs flash with fire,
'Thro' his wide nostrils clouds of smoke expire.

Trembling with rage, around the court he
ran,
At length approach'd the king, and thus began:

"No more excuses or delays: I stand In arms prepar'd to combat, hand to
hand,

This base deserter of his native land.
The Trojan, by his word, is bound to take
The same conditions which himself did make.

Renew the truce; the solemn rites prepare,
And to my single virtue trust the war.
The Latians unconcern'd shall see the fight;
This arm unaided shall assert your right:
Then, if my prostrate body press the plain,
To him the crown and beauteous bride remain."

To whom the king sedately thus replied:
"Brave youth, the more your valor has been tried,

The more becomes it us, with due respect,
To weigh the chance of war, which you neglect.

You want not wealth, or a successive throne,

Or cities which your arms have made your
own:

My towns and treasures are at your command,

And stor'd with blooming beauties is my
land;

Laurentum more than one Lavinia sees,
Unmarried, fair, of noble families.

Now let me speak, and you with patience
hear,

Things which perhaps may grate a lover's
ear,

But sound advice, proceeding from a heart
Sincerely yours, and free from fraudulent art.
The gods, by signs, have manifestly shown,
No prince Italian born should heir my
throne:

Oft have our augurs, in prediction skill'd,
And oft our priests, a foreign son reveal'd.
Yet, won by worth that cannot be with-
stood,

Brib'd by my kindness to my kindred blood,
Urg'd by my wife, who would not be denied,

I promis'd my Lavinia for your bride:
Her from her plighted lord by force I took;
All ties of treaties, and of honor, broke:
On your account I wag'd an impious
war —

With what success, 'tis needless to declare;

I and my subjects feel, and you have had your share.

Twice vanquish'd, while in bloody fields we strive,

Scarce in our walls we keep our hopes alive:
The rolling flood runs warm with human
gore;

The bones of Latians blanch the neighb'ring
shore.

Why put I not an end to this debate,
Still unresolv'd, and still a slave to fate?
If Turnus' death a lasting peace can give,
Why should I not procure it whilst you live?

Should I to doubtful arms your youth betray,

What would my kinsmen the Rutulians
say?

And, should you fall in fight, (which Heav'n defend!)

How curse the cause which hasten'd to his end

The daughter's lover and the father's
friend?

Weigh in your mind the various chance of war;

Pity your parent's age, and ease his care."

Such balmy words he pour'd, but all in vain:

The proffer'd med'cine but provok'd the pain.

The wrathful youth, disdaining the relief,
With intermitting sobs thus vents his grief:
"The care, O best of fathers, which you take

For my concerns, at my desire forsake.
Permit me not to languish out my days,
But make the best exchange of life for praise.

This arm, this lance, can well dispute the prize;

And the blood follows, where the weapon flies.

His goddess mother is not near, to shroud
The flying coward with an empty cloud."

But now the queen, who fear'd for Turnus' life,

And loath'd the hard conditions of the strife,

Held him by force; and, dying in his death,
In these sad accents gave her sorrow breath:

"O Turnus, I adjure thee by these tears,
And whate'er price Amata's honor bears
Within thy breast, since thou art all my hope,

My sickly mind's repose, my sinking age's prop;

Since on the safety of thy life alone

Depends Latinus, and the Latian throne:

Refuse me not this one, this only pray'r,

To waive the combat, and pursue the war.

Whatever chance attends this fatal strife,

Think it includes, in thine, Amata's life.

I cannot live a slave, or see my throne

Usurp'd by strangers, or a Trojan son."

At this, a flood of tears Lavinia shed;

A crimson blush her beauteous face o'er-spread,

Varying her cheeks by turns with white and red.

The driving colors, never at a stay,

Run here and there, and flush, and fade away.

Delightful change! Thus Indian iv'ry shows,

Which with the bord'ring paint of purple glows;

Or lilies damask'd by the neighb'ring rose.

The lover gaz'd, and, burning with desire,
The more he look'd, the more he fed the fire:

Revenge, and jealous rage, and secret spite,

Roll in his breast, and rouse him to the fight.

Then fixing on the queen his ardent eyes,
Firm to his first intent, he thus replies:

"O mother, do not by your tears prepare
Such boding omens, and prejudice the war.

Resolv'd on fight, I am no longer free
To shun my death, if Heav'n my death decrees."

Then turning to the herald, thus pursues:

"Go, greet the Trojan with ungrateful news;

Denounce from me, that, when to-morrow's light

Shall gild the heav'n's, he need not urge the fight;

The Trojan and Rutulian troops no more Shall dye, with mutual blood, the Latian shore:

Our single swords the quarrel shall decide,
And to the victor be the beauteous bride."

He said, and striding on, with speedy pace,

He sought his coursers of the Thracian race.

At his approach they toss their heads on high,

And, proudly neighing, promise victory.

The sires of these Orythia sent from far, To grace Pilumnus, when he went to war.

The drifts of Thracian snows were scarce so white,

Nor northern winds in fleetness match'd their flight.

Officious grooms stand ready by his side;

And some with combs their flowing manes divide,

And others stroke their chests and gently soothe their pride.

He sheath'd his limbs in arms; a temper'd mass

Of golden metal those, and mountain brass.

Then to his head his glitt'ring helm he tied,

And girt his faithful fauchion to his side.

In his Ætnæan forge, the God of Fire

That fauchion labor'd for the hero's sire;

Immortal keenness on the blade bestow'd,

And plung'd it hissing in the Stygian flood.

Propp'd on a pillar, which the ceiling bore,

Was plac'd the lance Auruncan Actor wore;

Which with such force he brandish'd in his hand,
The tough ash trembled like an osier wand:
Then cried: "O pond'rous spoil of Actor slain,

And never yet by Turnus toss'd in vain, ¹⁵⁰
Fail not this day thy wonted force; but go,
Sent by this hand, to pierce the Trojan foe!
Give me to tear his corslet from his breast,
And from that eunuch head to rend the crest;
Dragg'd in the dust, his frizzled hair to soil,
Hot from the vexing ir'n, and smear'd with fragrant oil!"

Thus while he raves, from his wide nostrils flies

A fiery steam, and sparkles from his eyes.
So fares the bull in his lov'd female's sight:
Proudly he bellows, and preludes the fight; ¹⁶⁰

He tries his goring horns against a tree,
And meditates his absent enemy;
He pushes at the winds; he digs the strand
With his black hoofs, and spurs the yellow sand.

Nor less the Trojan, in his Lemnian arms,
To future fight his manly courage warms:
He whets his fury, and with joy prepares
To terminate at once the ling'ring wars;
To cheer his chiefs and tender son, relates
What Heav'n had promis'd, and expounds the fates. ¹⁷⁰

Then to the Latian king he sends, to cease
The rage of arms, and ratify the peace.

The morn ensuing, from the mountain's height,
Had scarcely spread the skies with rosy light;

Th' ethereal coursers, bounding from the sea,
From out their flaming nostrils breath'd the day;

When now the Trojan and Rutulian guard.
In friendly labor join'd, the list prepar'd.
Beneath the walls they measure out the space;

Then sacred altars rear, on sods of grass, ¹⁸⁰

Where, with religious rites, their common gods they place.

In purest white the priests their heads attire,

And living waters bear, and holy fire;
And, o'er their linen hoods and shaded hair,
Long twisted wreaths of sacred vervain wear.

In order issuing from the town appears
The Latin legion, arm'd with pointed spears;
And from the fields, advancing on a line,
The Trojan and the Tuscan forces join:
Their various arms afford a pleasing sight;
A peaceful train they seem, in peace prepar'd for fight. ¹⁹¹

Betwixt the ranks the proud commanders ride,

Glitt'ring with gold, and vests in purple dyed;

Here Mnestheus, author of the Memmian line,

And there Messapus, born of seed divine.
The sign is giv'n; and, round the listed space,

Each man in order fills his proper place.
Reclining on their ample shields, they stand,
And fix their pointed lances in the sand.
Now, studious of the sight, a num'rous throng ²⁰⁰

Of either sex promiscuous, old and young,
Swarm from the town: by those who rest behind,

The gates and walls and houses' tops are lin'd.

Meantime the Queen of Heav'n beheld the sight,

With eyes unpleas'd, from Mount Albano's height

(Since call'd Albano by succeeding fame,
But then an empty hill, without a name).

She thence survey'd the field, the Trojan pow'rs,

The Latian squadrons, and Laurentine tow'rs.

Then thus the goddess of the skies bespake, ²¹⁰

With sighs and tears, the goddess of the lake,

King Turnus' sister, once a lovely maid,
Ere to the lust of lawless Jove betray'd:

Compress'd by force, but, by the grateful god,

Now made the Naï's of the neighb'ring flood.
"O nymph, the pride of living lakes," said she,

"O most renown'd, and most belov'd by me,
Long hast thou known, nor need I to record,

The wanton sallies of my wand'ring lord.
Of ev'ry Latian fair whom Jove misled ²²⁰

To mount by stealth my violated bed,
To thee alone I grudg'd not his embrace,

But gave a part of heav'n, and an unenvied place.

Now learn from me thy near approaching
grief,
Nor think my wishes want to thy relief.
While fortune favor'd, nor Heav'n's King denied

To lend my succor to the Latian side,
I sav'd thy brother, and the sinking state:
But now he struggles with unequal fate,
And goes, with gods averse, o'ermatch'd in might, 230

To meet inevitable death in fight;
Nor must I break the truce, nor can sustain the sight.
Thou, if thou dar'st, thy present aid supply;
It well becomes a sister's care to try."

At this the lovely nymph, with grief oppress'd, Thrice tore her hair, and beat her comely
breast.

To whom Saturnia thus: "Thy tears are
late:
Haste, snatch him, if he can be snatch'd
from fate:

New tumults kindle; violate the truce:
Who knows what changeful fortune may produce? 240

'T is not a crime t' attempt what I decree;
Or, if it were, discharge the crime on me."
She said, and, sailing on the winged wind,
Left the sad nymph suspended in her mind.

And now in pomp the peaceful kings
appear:

Four steeds the chariot of Latinus bear;
Twelve golden beams around his temples
play,

To mark his lineage from the God of Day.
Two snowy coursers Turnus' chariot yoke,
And in his hand two massy spears he shook:
Then issued from the camp, in arms divine,
Æneas, author of the Roman line; 252

And by his side Ascanius took his place,
The second hope of Rome's immortal race.
Adorn'd in white, a rev'rend priest appears,

And off'rings to the flaming altars bears;
A porket, and a lamb that never suffer'd
shears.

Then to the rising sun he turns his eyes,
And strews the beasts, design'd for sacrifice,
With salt and meal: with like officious
care 260

He marks their foreheads, and he clips their
hair.

Betwixt their horns the purple wine he sheds;

With the same gen'rous juice the flame he feeds.

Æneas then unsheath'd his shining sword,
And thus with pious pray'rs the gods
ador'd:

"All-seeing sun, and thou, Ausonian soil,
For which I have sustain'd so long a toil, Thou, King of Heav'n, and thou, the Queen of Air,

Propitious now, and reconcil'd by pray'r;
Thou, God of War, whose unresisted sway
The labors and events of arms obey; 271

Ye living fountains, and ye running floods,
All pow'rs of ocean, all ethereal gods,
Hear, and bear record: if I fall in field,
Or, recreant in the fight, to Turnus yield,
My Trojans shall encrease Evander's town;
Ascanius shall renounce th' Ausonian crown:

All claims, all questions of debate, shall
cease;

Nor he, nor they, with force infringe the
peace.

But, if my juster arms prevail in fight, 280
(As sure they shall, if I divine aright,)

My Trojans shall not o'er th' Italians reign:
Both equal, both unconquer'd shall remain, Join'd in their laws, their lands, and their
abodes;

I ask but altars for my weary gods.

The care of those religious rites be mine;

The crown to King Latinus I resign:

His be the sov'reign sway. Nor will I
share

His pow'r in peace, or his command in war.
For me, my friends another town shall
frame, 290

And bless the rising tow'rs with fair La-vinia's name."

Thus he. Then, with erected eyes and
hands,

The Latian king before his altar stands.

"By the same heav'n," said he, "and earth,
and main,

And all the pow'rs that all the three contain;

By hell below, and by that upper god

Whose thunder signs the peace, who seals
it with his nod;

So let Latona's double offspring hear,

And double-fronted Janus, what I swear:

I touch the sacred altars, touch the flames,
And all those pow'rs attest, and all their
names: 301

Whatever chance befall on either side,

No term of time this union shall divide:

No force, no fortune, shall my vows unbind,
Or shake the steadfast tenor of my mind;
Not tho' the circling seas should break their
bound,

O'erflow the shores, or sap the solid ground;
Not tho' the lamps of heav'n their spheres
forsake,

Hurl'd down, and hissing in the nether lake:
Ev'n as this royal scepter" (for he bore ³¹⁰
A scepter in his hand) "shall never more
Shoot out in branches, or renew the birth:
An orphan now, cut from the mother earth
By the keen ax, dishonor'd of its hair,
And cas'd in brass, for Latian kings to
bear."

When thus in public view the peace was tied

With solemn vows, and sworn on either
side,

All dues perform'd which holy rites require;

The victim beasts are slain before the fire,
The trembling entrails from their bodies torn, ³²⁰

And to the fatten'd flames in chargers
borne.

Already the Rutulians deem their man O'ermatch'd in arms, before the fight began.

First rising fears are whisper'd thro' the
crowd;

Then, gath'ring sound, they murmur more
aloud.

Now, side to side, they measure with their
eyes

The champions' bulk. their sinews, and their size:

The nearer they approach, the more is
known

Th' apparent disadvantage of their own.

Turnus himself appears in public sight ³³⁰

Conscious of fate, desponding of the fight.

Slowly he moves, and at his altar stands

With eyes dejected, and with trembling
hands;

And, while he mutters undistinguish'd
pray'rs,

A livid deadness in his cheeks appears.

With anxious pleasure when Juturna
view'd

Th' increasing fright of the mad multitude,
When their short sighs and thick'ning sobs
she heard,

And found their ready minds for change
prepar'd; ³³⁹

Dissembling her immortal form, she took Camertus' mien, his habit, and his look;
A chief of ancient blood: in arms well
known

Was his great sire, and he his greater son.
His shape assum'd, amid the ranks she ran,
And humoring their first motions, thus
began:

"For shame, Rutulians, can you bear the
sight

Of one expos'd for all, in single fight?

Can we, before the face of heav'n, confess

Our courage colder, or our numbers less?

View all the Trojan host, th' Arcadian band, ³⁵⁰

And Tuscan army; count 'em as they stand:

Undaunted to the battle if we go,

Scarce ev'ry second man will share a foe.

Turnus, 't is true, in this unequal strife,

Shall lose, with honor, his devoted life,

Or change it rather for immortal fame,

Succeeding to the gods, from whence he
came:

But you, a servile and inglorious band,

For foreign lords shall sow your native
land,

Those fruitful fields your fighting fathers
gain'd, ³⁶⁰

Which have so long their lazy sons sus-
tain'd."

With words like these, she carried her
design:

A rising murmur runs along the line.

Then ev'n the city troops, and Latians,
tir'd

With tedious war, seem with new souls in-
spir'd:

Their champion's fate with pity they lament,

And of the league, so lately sworn, repent.

Nor fails the goddess to foment the rage

With lying wonders, and a false presage;

But adds a sign, which, present to their eyes, ³⁷⁰

Inspires new courage, and a glad surprise.

For, sudden, in the fiery tracts above,

Appears in pomp th' imperial bird of Jove:

A plump of fowl he spies, that swim the lakes,

And o'er their heads his sounding pinions
shakes;

Then, stooping on the fairest of the train,

In his strong talons truss'd a silver swan.

Th' Italians wonder at th' unusual sight;

But, while he lags, and labors in his flight,

Behold, the dastard fowl return anew, ³⁸⁰

And with united force the foe pursue:
Clam'rous around the royal hawk they fly,
And, thick'ning in a cloud, o'ershade the sky.

They cuff, they scratch, they cross his airy course;

Nor can th' incumber'd bird sustain their force;

But vex'd, not vanquish'd, drops the pond'rous prey,

And, lighten'd of his burthen, wings his way.

Th' Ausonian bands with shouts salute the sight,

Eager of action, and demand the fight.

Then King Tolumnius, vers'd in augurs' arts, ³⁹⁰

Cries out, and thus his boasted skill imparts:
"At length 'tis granted, what I long desir'd !

This, this is what my frequent vows requir'd.
Ye gods, I take your omen, and obey.

Advance, my friends, and charge ! I lead the way.

These are the foreign foes, whose impious band,

Like that rapacious bird, infest our land:
But soon, like him, they shall be forc'd to sea

By strength united, and forego the prey. ³⁹⁹
Your timely succor to your country bring;

Haste to the rescue, and redeem your king."

He said; and, pressing onward thro' the crew,

Pois'd in his lifted arm, his lance he threw.
The winged weapon, whistling in the wind,
Came driving on, nor miss'd the mark design'd.

At once the cornel rattled in the skies;
At once tumultuous shouts and clamors rise.

Nine brothers in a goodly band there stood,
Born of Arcadian mix'd with Tuscan blood,
Gylippus' sons: the fatal jav'lin flew, ⁴¹⁰
Aim'd at the midmost of the friendly crew.

A passage thro' the jointed arms it found,
Just where the belt was to the body bound,

And struck the gentle youth extended on the ground.

Then, fir'd with pious rage, the gen'rous train

Run madly forward to revenge the slain.

And some with eager haste their jav'lins throw;

And some with sword in hand assault the foe.

The wish'd insult the Latine troops embrace, ⁴¹⁹

And meet their ardor in the middle space.

The Trojans, Tuscans, and Arcadian line,

With equal courage obviate their design.

Peace leaves the violated fields, and hate

Both armies urges to their mutual fate.

With impious haste their altars are o'erturn'd,

The sacrifice half-broil'd, and half-unburn'd.

Thick storms of steel from either army fly,

And clouds of clashing darts obscure the sky;

Brands from the fire are missive weapons made,

With chargers, bowls, and all the priestly trade. ⁴³⁰

Latinus, frighted, hastens from the fray,

And bears his unregarded gods away.

These on their horses vault; those yoke the car;

The rest, with swords on high, run headlong to the war.

Messapus, eager to confound the peace,
Spurr'd his hot courser thro' the fighting prease,

At King Aulestes, by his purple known
A Tuscan prince, and by his regal crown;

And, with a shock encount'ring, bore him down.

Backward he fell; and, as his fate design'd,

The ruins of an altar were behind: ⁴⁴¹

There, pitching on his shoulders and his head,

Amid the scatt'ring fires he lay supinely spread.

The beamy spear, descending from above,
His cuirass pierc'd, and thro' his body drove.

Then, with a scornful smile, the victor cries:
"The gods have found a fitter sacrifice."

Greedy of spoils, th' Italians strip the dead
Of his rich armor, and uncrown his head.

Priest Coryneus arm'd his better hand,
From his own altar, with a blazing brand;

And, as Ebusus with a thund'ring pace ⁴⁵¹
Advanc'd to battle, dash'd it on his face:

His bristly beard shines out with sudden fires;

The crackling crop a noisome scent ex-pires.

Following the blow, he seiz'd his curling crown

With his left hand; his other cast him
down.

The prostrate body with his knees he
press'd,

And plung'd his holy poniard in his breast.

While Podalirius, with his sword, pursued

The shepherd Alsus thro' the flying crowd,⁴⁶⁰
Swiftly he turns, and aims a deadly blow
Full on the front of his unwary foe.

The broad ax enters with a crashing
sound,

And cleaves the chin with one continued
wound;

Warm blood, and mingled brains, besmear his arms around.

An iron sleep his stupid eyes oppress'd,
And seal'd their heavy lids in endless rest.

But good Æneas rush'd amid the bands; Bare was his head, and naked were his
hands,

In sign of truce: then thus he cries aloud:⁴⁷⁰
"What sudden rage, what new desire of
blood,

Inflames your alter'd minds? O Trojans,
cease

From impious arms, nor violate the peace!
By human sanctions, and by laws divine,
The terms are all agreed; the war is mine.
Dismiss your fears, and let the fight ensue;
This hand alone shall right the gods and
you:

Our injur'd altars, and their broken vow,
To this avenging sword the faithless Turnus owe."

Thus while he spoke, unmindful of defense,

A winged arrow struck the pious prince.
But, whether from some human hand it
came,

Or hostile god, is left unknown by fame:
No human hand or hostile god was found,
To boast the triumph of so base a wound.

When Turnus saw the Trojan quit the
plain,
His chiefs dismay'd, his troops a fainting
train,

Th' unhop'd event his heighten'd soul inspires:

At once his arms and coursers he requires;
Then, with a leap, his lofty chariot gains,
And with a ready hand assumes the reins.
He drives impetuous, and, where'er he goes,

He leaves behind a lane of slaughter'd foes.

These his lance reaches; over those he rolls

His rapid car, and crushes out their souls:
In vain the vanquish'd fly; the victor sends
The dead men's weapons at their living
friends.

Thus, on the banks of Hebrus' freezing
flood,

The God of Battles, in his angry mood,⁵⁰⁰
Clashing his sword against his brazen shield, Lets loose the reins, and scours along the
field:

Before the wind his fiery coursers fly;
Groans the sad earth, resounds the rattling
sky.

Wrath, Terror, Treason, Tumult, and Despair

(Dire faces, and deform'd) surround the car;

Friends of the god, and followers of the
war.

With fury not unlike, nor less disdain,
Exulting Turnus flies along the plain:
His smoking horses, at their utmost speed,
He lashes on, and urges o'er the dead.⁵¹¹
Their fetlocks run with blood; and, when they bound,

The gore and gath'ring dust are dash'd
around.

Thamyras and Pholus, masters of the war,
He kill'd at hand, but Sthenelus afar:
From far the sons of Imbracrus he slew,
Glaucus and Lades, of the Lycian crew;
Both taught to fight on foot, in battle
join'd,

Or mount the courser that outstrips the
wind.

Meantime Eumedes, vaunting in the
field,

New fir'd the Trojans, and their foes⁵²⁰
repell'd.

This son of Dolon bore his grandsire's
name,

But emulated more his father's fame;
His guileful father, sent a nightly spy,
The Grecian camp and order to descry:
Hard enterprise! and well he might require Achilles' car and horses, for his hire:
But, met upon the scout, th' Ætolian prince
In death bestow'd a juster recompense.

Fierce Turnus view'd the Trojan from
afar,

And launch'd his jav'lin from his lofty car;⁵³⁰
Then lightly leaping down, pursued the
blow,

And, pressing with his foot his prostrate
foe,

Wrench'd from his feeble hold the shining
sword,

And plung'd it in the bosom of its lord.

"Possess," said he, "the fruit of all thy
pains,

And measure, at thy length, our Latian
plains.

Thus are my foes rewarded by my hand;
Thus may they build their town, and thus enjoy the land!"

Then Dares, Butes, Sybaris he slew, ⁵⁴⁰
Whom o'er his neck his flound'ring courser
threw.

As when loud Boreas, with his blust'ring
train,

Stoops from above, incumbent on the main;
Where'er he flies, he drives the rack before,
And rolls the billows on th' Ægean shore:
So, where resistless Turnus takes his course,
The scatter'd squadrons bend before his
force;

His crest of horses' hair is blown behind
By adverse air, and rustles in the wind.

This haughty Phegeus saw with high disdain, ⁵⁵⁰
And, as the chariot roll'd along the plain, } Light from the ground he leapt, and seiz'd the rein.

Thus hung in air, he still retain'd his hold,
The coursers frighted, and their course controll'd.

The lance of Turnus reach'd him as he hung,
And pierc'd his plated arms, but pass'd
along,

And only raz'd the skin. He turn'd, and
held

Against his threat'ning foe his ample shield;
Then call'd for aid: but, while he cried in
vain,

The chariot bore him backward on the plain. ⁵⁶⁰

He lies revers'd; the victor king descends,
And strikes so justly where his helmet ends,
He lops the head. The Latian fields are drunk

With streams that issue from the bleeding trunk.

While he triumphs, and while the Trojans
yield,

The wounded prince is forc'd to leave the
field:

Strong Mnestheus, and Achates often tried,
And young Ascanius, weeping by his side,

Conduct him to his tent. Scarce can he
rear

His limbs from earth, supported on his spear. ⁵⁷⁰

Resolv'd in mind, regardless of the smart,
He tugs with both his hands, and breaks
the dart.

The steel remains. No readier way he
found

To draw the weapon, than t' enlarge the
wound.

Eager of fight, impatient of delay,
He begs; and his unwilling friends obey.

Lapis was at hand to prove his art,
Whose blooming youth so fir'd Apollo's
heart,

That, for his love, he proffer'd to bestow
His tuneful harp and his unerring bow. ⁵⁸⁰

The pious youth, more studious how to save
His aged sire, now sinking to the grave, Preferr'd the pow'r of plants, and silent
praise

Of healing arts, before Phœbean bays.

Propp'd on his lance the pensive hero
stood,

And heard and saw, unmov'd, the mourning
crowd.

The fam'd physician tucks his robes around With ready hands, and hastens to the
wound.

With gentle touches he performs his part, }
This way and that, soliciting the dart, ⁵⁹⁰ }
And exercises all his heav'nly art.

All soft'ning simples, known of sov'reign
use,

He presses out, and pours their noble juice.

These first infus'd, to lenify the pain,

He tugs with pincers, but he tugs in vain.

Then to the patron of his art he pray'd:

The patron of his art refus'd his aid.

Meantime the war approaches to the tents;

Th' alarm grows hotter, and the noise
augments:

The driving dust proclaims the danger near; ⁶⁰⁰

And first their friends, and then their foes appear:

Their friends retreat; their foes pursue the rear.

The camp is fill'd with terror and affright:

The hissing shafts within the trench alight;

An undistinguish'd noise ascends the sky,

The shouts of those who kill, and groans of those who die.

But now the goddess mother, mov'd with grief,
 And pierc'd with pity, hastens her relief.
 A branch of healing dittany she brought,
 Which in the Cretan fields with care she sought: ⁶¹⁰
 Rough is the stem, which woolly leaves surround;
 The leaves with flow'rs, the flow'rs with purple crown'd,
 Well known to wounded goats; a sure relief
 To draw the pointed steel, and ease the grief.
 This Venus brings, in clouds involv'd, and brews
 Th' extracted liquor with ambrosian dews,
 And od'rous panacee. Unseen she stands,
 Temp'ring the mixture with her heav'nly hands,
 And pours it in a bowl, already crown'd
 With juice of med'cinal herbs prepar'd to bathe the wound. ⁶²⁰
 The leech, unknowing of superior art
 Which aids the cure, with this foment the part;
 And in a moment ceas'd the raging smart.
 Stanch'd is the blood, and in the bottom stands:
 The steel, but scarcely touch'd with tender hands,
 Moves up, and follows of its own accord,
 And health and vigor are at once restor'd.
 Iapis first perceiv'd the closing wound,
 And first the footsteps of a god he found.
 "Arms! arms!" he cries: "the sword and shield prepare, ⁶³⁰
 And send the willing chief, renew'd, to war.
 This is no mortal work, no cure of mine,
 Nor art's effect, but done by hands divine.
 Some god our general to the battle sends;
 Some god preserves his life for greater ends."
 The hero arms in haste; his hands in-fold
 His thighs with enishes of refulgent gold:
 Inflam'd to fight, and rushing to the field,
 That hand sustaining the celestial shield,
 This gripes the lance, and with such vigor shakes, ⁶⁴⁰
 That to the rest the beamy weapon quakes.
 Then with a close embrace he strain'd his son,
 And, kissing thro' his helmet, thus begun:

"My son, from my example learn the war,
 In camps to suffer, and in fields to dare;
 But happier chance than mine attend thy care!
 This day my hand thy tender age shall shield,
 And crown with honors of the conquer'd field:
 Thou, when thy riper years shall send thee forth ⁶⁴⁹
 To toils of war, be mindful of my worth;
 Assert thy birthright, and in arms be known,
 For Hector's nephew, and Æneas' son."
 He said; and, striding, issued on the plain.
 Anteus and Mnestheus, and a num'rous train, Attend his steps; the rest their weapons take,
 And, crowding to the field, the camp forsake.
 A cloud of blinding dust is rais'd around,
 Labors beneath their feet the trembling ground.
 Now Turnus, posted on a hill, from far Beheld the progress of the moving war: ⁶⁶⁰
 With him the Latins view'd the cover'd plains.
 And the chill blood ran backward in their veins.
 Juturna saw th' advancing troops appear,
 And heard the hostile sound, and fled for fear.
 Æneas leads; and draws a sweeping train,
 Clos'd in their ranks, and pouring on the plain.
 As when a whirlwind, rushing to the shore
 From the mid ocean, drives the waves before;
 The painful hind with heavy heart foresees
 The flatted fields, and slaughter of the trees; ⁶⁷⁰
 With like impetuous rage the prince appears
 Before his doubled front, nor less destruction bears.
 And now both armies shock in open field;
 Osiris is by strong Thymbraeus kill'd.
 Archetius, Ufens, Epulon, are slain
 (All fam'd in arms, and of the Latian train)
 By Gyas', Mnestheus', and Achates' hand.
 The fatal augur falls, by whose command
 The truce was broken, and whose lance, embued

With Trojan blood, th' unhappy fight renew'd. ⁶⁸⁰

Loud shouts and clamors rend the liquid
sky,

And o'er the field the frightened Latins fly.
The prince disdains the dastards to pursue,
Nor moves to meet in arms the fighting
few;

Turnus alone, amid the dusky plain,
He seeks, and to the combat calls in vain.
Juturna heard, and, seiz'd with mortal fear, Forc'd from the beam her brother's charioteer;

Assumes his shape, his armor, and his
mien,

And, like Metiscus, in his seat is seen. ⁶⁹⁰
As the black swallow near the palace
plies;

O'er empty courts, and under arches, flies;
Now hawks aloft, now skims along the
flood,

To furnish her loquacious nest with food:
So drives the rapid goddess o'er the plains;
The smoking horses run with loosen'd reins.
She steers a various course among the foes;
Now here, now there, her conqu'ring brother
shows;

Now with a straight, now with a wheeling
flight,
She turns, and bends, but shuns the single fight. ⁷⁰⁰

Æneas, fir'd with fury, breaks the crowd,
And seeks his foe, and calls by name aloud:
He runs within a narrower ring, and tries
To stop the chariot; but the chariot flies.
If he but gain a glimpse, Juturna fears,
And far away the Daunian hero bears.

What should he do! Nor arts nor arms avail;

And various cares in vain his mind assail.
The great Messapus, thund'ring thro' the
field,

In his left hand two pointed jav'lines held: ⁷¹⁰ Encount'ring on the prince, one dart he
drew,

And with unerring aim and utmost vigor
threw.

Æneas saw it come, and, stooping low Beneath his buckler, shunn'd the threat'n-ing blow.

The weapon hiss'd above his head, and tore
The waving plume which on his helm he wore.

Forc'd by this hostile act, and fir'd with spite,

That flying Turnus still declin'd the fight,
The prince, whose piety had long re-
pell'd

His inborn ardor, now invades the field; ⁷²⁰
Invokes the pow'rs of violated peace,
Their rites and injur'd altars to redress;
Then, to his rage abandoning the rein,
With blood and slaughter'd bodies fills the
plain.

What god can tell, what numbers can display,

The various labors of that fatal day;
What chiefs and champions fell on either
side,

In combat slain, or by what deaths they
died;

Whom Turnus, whom the Trojan hero
kill'd;

Who shar'd the fame and fortune of the field! ⁷³⁰

Jove, could'st thou view, and not avert thy sight,

Two jarring nations join'd in cruel fight,
Whom leagues of lasting love so shortly shall unite!

Æneas first Rutulian Sucre found, Whose valor made the Trojans quit their
ground;

Betwixt his ribs the jav'lin drove so just,
It reach'd his heart, nor needs a second thrust.

Now Turnus, at two blows, two brethren
slew;

First from his horse fierce Amycus he
threw:

Then, leaping on the ground, on foot assail'd ⁷⁴⁰

Diores, and in equal fight prevail'd.
Their lifeless trunks he leaves upon the
place;

Their heads, distilling gore, his chariot
grace.

Three cold on earth the Trojan hero
threw,

Whom without respite at one charge he
slew:

Cethegus, Tanais, Tagus, fell oppress'd,
And sad Onythes, added to the rest,
Of Theban blood, whom Peridia bore.

Turnus two brothers from the Lycian
shore,

And from Apollo's fane to battle sent, ⁷⁵⁰
O'erthrew; nor Phœbus could their fate
prevent.

Peaceful Menœtes after these he kill'd,

Who long had shunn'd the dangers of the field:

On Lerna's lake a silent life he led,
And with his nets and angle earn'd his bread;

Nor pompous cares, nor palaces, he knew,
But wisely from th' infectious world withdrew:

Poor was his house; his father's painful hand

Discharg'd his rent, and plow'd another's land.

As flames among the lofty woods are thrown

On diff'rent sides, and both by winds are blown;

The laurels crackle in the sputt'ring fire;
The frighted sylvans from their shades retire:

Or as two neighb'ring torrents fall from high;

Rapid they run; the foamy waters fry;
They roll to sea with unresisted force,

And down the rocks precipitate their course:
Not with less rage the rival heroes take

Their diff'rent ways, nor less destruction make.

With spears afar, with swords at hand, they strike;

And zeal of slaughter fires their souls alike.
Like them, their dauntless men maintain the field;

And hearts are pierc'd, unknowing how to yield:

They blow for blow return, and wound for wound;

And heaps of bodies raise the level ground.
Muranus, boasting of his blood, that springs

From a long royal race of Latian kings,
Is by the Trojan from his chariot thrown,
Crush'd with the weight of an unwieldy stone:

Betwixt the wheels he fell; the wheels, that bore

His living load, his dying body tore.

His starting steeds, to shun the glitt'ring sword,

Paw down his trampled limbs, forgetful of their lord.

Fierce Hyllus threaten'd high, and, face to face,

Affronted Turnus in the middle space:

The prince encounter'd him in full career,
And at his temples aim'd the deadly spear;

So fatally the flying weapon sped,
That thro' his brazen helm it pierc'd his head.

Nor, Cisseus, couldst thou scape from Turnus' hand,

In vain the strongest of th' Arcadian band:
Nor to Cupentus could his gods afford
Availing aid against th' Ænean sword,
Which to his naked heart pursued the course;

Nor could his plated shield sustain the force.

Iolas fell, whom not the Grecian pow'rs,
Nor great subverter of the Trojan tow'rs,
Were doom'd to kill, while Heav'n prolong'd his date;

But who can pass the bounds prefix'd by fate?

In high Lyrnessus, and in Troy, he held so
Two palaces, and was from each expell'd:
Of all the mighty man, the last remains
A little spot of foreign earth contains.

And now both hosts their broken troops unite

In equal ranks, and mix in mortal fight.

Seresthus and undaunted Mnestheus join
The Trojan, Tuscan, and Arcadian line:

Sea-born Messapus, with Atinas, heads
The Latin squadrons, and to battle leads.

They strike, they push, they throng the scanty space,

Resolv'd on death, impatient of disgrace;
And, where one falls, another fills his place.

The Cyprian goddess now inspires her son

To leave th' unfinished fight, and storm the town:

For, while he rolls his eyes around the plain
In quest of Turnus, whom he seeks in vain,
He views th' unguarded city from afar,
In careless quiet, and secure of war.

Occasion offers, and excites his mind
To dare beyond the task he first design'd.

Resolv'd, he calls his chiefs; they leave the fight:

Attended thus, he takes a neighb'ring height;

The crowding troops about their gen'ral stand,

All under arms, and wait his high command.
Then thus the lofty prince: "Hear and obey,

Ye Trojan bands, without the least delay.

Jove is with us; and what I have decreed

Requires our utmost vigor, and our speed.
Your instant arms against the town prepare,
The source of mischief, and the seat of
war. 830

This day the Latian tow'rs, that mate the
sky,

Shall level with the plain in ashes lie:
The people shall be slaves, unless in time
They kneel for pardon, and repent their crime.

Twice have our foes been vanquish'd on the
plain:

Then shall I wait till Turnus will be slain?
Your force against the perjurd city bend:
There it began, and there the war shall
end.

The peace profan'd our rightful arms requires;

Cleanse the polluted place with purging
fires." 840

He finish'd; and, one soul inspiring all, Form'd in a wedge, the foot approach the wall.

Without the town, an unprovided train
Of gaping, gazing citizens are slain.
Some firebrands, others scaling ladders
bear,

And those they toss aloft, and these they
rear:

The flames now launch'd, the feather'd
arrows fly,

And clouds of missive arms obscure the
sky.

Advancing to the front, the hero stands,
And, stretching out to heav'n his pious
hands, 850

Attests the gods, asserts his innocence, Upbraids with breach of faith th' Ausonian
prince;

Declares the royal honor doubly stain'd,
And twice the rites of holy peace profan'd.

Dissenting clamors in the town arise;
Each will be heard, and all at once advise.
One part for peace, and one for war contends;

Some would exclude their foes, and some admit their friends.

The helpless king is hurried in the throng,
And, whate'er tide prevails, is borne along.
Thus, when the swain, within a hollow
rock, 861

Invades the bees with suffocating smoke,
They run around, or labor on their wings,
Disus'd to flight, and shoot their sleepy
stings;

To shun the bitter fumes in vain they try;
Black vapors, issuing from the vent, involve the sky.

But fate and envious fortune now prepare
To plunge the Latins in the last despair.

The queen, who saw the foes invade the
town,

And brands on tops of burning houses
thrown, 870

Cast round her eyes, distracted with her
fear—

No troops of Turnus in the field appear.
Once more she stares abroad, but still in
vain,

And then concludes the royal youth is slain.
Mad with her anguish, impotent to bear

The mighty grief, she loathes the vital air.
She calls herself the cause of all this ill,

And owns the dire effects of her ungovern'd
will;

She raves against the gods; she beats her
breast;

She tears with both her hands her purple
vest: 880

Then round a beam a running noose she
tied,

And, fasten'd by the neck, obscenely died.
Soon as the fatal news by Fame was
blown,

And to her dames and to her daughter
known,

The sad Lavinia rends her yellow hair
And rosy cheeks; the rest her sorrow
share:

With shrieks the palace rings, and madness of despair.

The spreading rumor fills the public
place:

Confusion, fear, distraction, and disgrace,
And silent shame, are seen in ev'ry face.

Latinus tears his garments as he goes, 891
Both for his public and his private woes;

With filth his venerable beard besmears,
And sordid dust deforms his silver hairs.

And much he blames the softness of his
mind,

Obnoxious to the charms of womankind,
And soon seduc'd to change what he so well design'd;

To break the solemn league so long desir'd,
Nor finish what his fates, and those of Troy,

requir'd.

Now Turnus rolls aloof o'er empty plains,
And here and there some straggling foes he gleans. 901

His flying coursers please him less and less,
 Asham'd of easy fight and cheap success.
 Thus half-contented, anxious in his mind,
 The distant cries come driving in the wind,
 Shouts from the walls, but shouts in murmurs drown'd;

A jarring mixture, and a boding sound.
 "Alas!" said he, "what mean these dismal cries?"

What doleful clamors from the town
 arise?"

Confus'd, he stops, and backward pulls the reins. ⁹¹⁰

She who the driver's office now sustains, Replies: "Neglect, my lord, these new
 alarms;

Here fight, and urge the fortune of your
 arms:

There want not others to defend the wall.
 If by your rival's hand th' Italians fall,
 So shall your fatal sword his friends oppress,

In honor equal, equal in success."

To this, the prince: "O sister — for I knew

The peace infrin'g'd proceeded first from
 you;

I knew you, when you mingled first in fight;
 And now in vain you would deceive my sight — ⁹²¹

Why, goddess, this unprofitable care?

Who sent you down from heav'n, involv'd
 in air,

Your share of mortal sorrows to sustain,
 And see your brother bleeding on the plain?
 For to what pow'r can Turnus have re-
 course,

Or how resist his fate's prevailing force?
 These eyes beheld Murranus bite the
 ground:

Mighty the man, and mighty was the
 wound.

I heard my dearest friend, with dying breath, ⁹³⁰

My name invoking to revenge his death.
 Brave Ufens fell with honor on the place,
 To shun the shameful sight of my disgrace.
 On earth supine, a manly corpse he lies;
 His vest and armor are the victor's prize.
 Then, shall I see Laurentum in a flame,
 Which only wanted, to complete my shame?
 How will the Latins hoot their champion's
 flight!

How Drances will insult and point them to the sight!

Is death so hard to bear? Ye gods below, ⁹⁴⁰
 (Since those above so small compassion
 show,)

Receive a soul unsullied yet with shame,
 Which not belies my great forefather's
 name!"

He said; and while he spoke, with flying
 speed

Came Sages urging on his foamy steed:
 Fix'd on his wounded face a shaft he bore,
 And, seeking Turnus, sent his voice before:
 "Turnus, on you, on you alone, depends
 Our last relief: compassionate your friends!
 Like lightning, fierce Æneas, rolling on, ⁹⁵⁰ With arms invests, with flames invades the
 town:

The brands are toss'd on high; the winds conspire

To drive along the deluge of the fire.
 All eyes are fix'd on you: your foes rejoice;

Ev'n the king staggers, and suspends his
 choice;

Doubts to deliver or defend the town,
 Whom to reject, or whom to call his son.
 The queen, on whom your utmost hopes were plac'd,

Herself suborning death, has breath'd her
 last.

'Tis true, Messapus, fearless of his fate, ⁹⁶⁰
 With fierce Atinas' aid, defends the gate:

On ev'ry side surrounded by the foe,
 The more they kill, the greater numbers
 grow;

An iron harvest mounts, and still remains to mow.

You, far aloof from your forsaken bands,
 Your rolling chariot drive o'er empty
 sands."

Stupid he sate, his eyes on earth declin'd,
 And various cares revolving in his mind:
 Rage, boiling from the bottom of his breast,
 And sorrow mix'd with shame, his soul
 oppress'd; ⁹⁷⁰

And conscious worth lay lab'ring in his
 thought,

And love by jealousy to madness wrought.
 By slow degrees his reason drove away
 The mists of passion, and resum'd her
 sway.

Then, rising on his car, he turn'd his look,
 And saw the town involv'd in fire and smoke.

A wooden tow'r with flames already blaz'd,

Which his own hands on beams and rafters
rais'd;

And bridges laid above to join the space,
And wheels below to roll from place to place. ⁹⁸⁰

"Sister, the Fates have vanquish'd: let us
go

The way which Heav'n and my hard fortune show.

The fight is fix'd; nor shall the branded
name

Of a base coward blot your brother's fame.
Death is my choice; but suffer me to try
My force, and vent my rage before I die."
He said; and, leaping down without delay, Thro' crowds of scatter'd foes he freed his
way.

Striding he pass'd, impetuous as the wind,
And left the grieving goddess far behind. ¹⁰²⁰
As when a fragment, from a mountain
torn

By raging tempests, or by torrents borne,
Or sapp'd by time, or loosen'd from the roots —

Prone thro' the void the rocky ruin shoots, Rolling from crag to crag, from steep to
steep;

Down sink, at once, the shepherds and their
sheep:

Involv'd alike, they rush to nether ground;
Stunn'd with the shock they fall, and stunn'd from earth rebound:

So Turnus, hasting headlong to the town, Should'ring and shoving, bore the squadrons down. ¹⁰⁰⁰

Still pressing onward, to the walls he
drew,

Where shafts, and spears, and darts pro-miseuous flew,

And sanguine streams the slipp'ry ground
embrue.

First stretching out his arm, in sign of
peace,

He cries aloud, to make the combat cease:

"Rutulians, hold! and Latin troops, retire!

The fight is mine; and me the gods require.

'Tis just that I should vindicate alone

The broken truce, or for the breach atone.

This day shall free from wars th' Ausonian
state, ¹⁰¹⁰

Or finish my misfortunes in my fate."

Both armies from their bloody work
desist,

And, bearing backward, form a spacious list.

The Trojan hero, who receiv'd from fame
The welcome sound, and heard the champion's name,

Soon leaves the taken works and mounted
walls,

Greedy of war where greater glory calls.

He springs to fight, exulting in his force;

His jointed armor rattles in the course.

Like Eryx, or like Athos, great he shows, ¹⁰²⁰

Or Father Apennine, when, white with snows,

His head divine obscure in clouds he hides,

And shakes the sounding forest on his sides.

The nations, overaw'd, surcease the fight;

Immovable their bodies, fix'd their sight.

Ev'n death stands still; nor from above
they throw

Their darts, nor drive their batt'ring-rams
below.

In silent order either army stands,

And drop their swords, unknowing, from
their hands.

Th' Ausonian king beholds, with wond'ring sight, ¹⁰³⁰

Two mighty champions match'd in single
fight,

Born under climes remote, and brought by
fate,

With swords to try their titles to the state.

Now, in clos'd field, each other from afar

They view; and, rushing on, begin the war.

They launch their spears; then hand to hand they meet;

The trembling soil resounds beneath their
feet:

Their bucklers clash; thick blows descend
from high,

And flakes of fire from their hard helmets
fly.

Courage conspires with chance, and both ingage ¹⁰⁴⁰

With equal fortune yet, and mutual rage.

As when two bulls for their fair female
fight

In Sila's shades, or on Taburnus' height;

With horns adverse they meet; the keeper
flies;

Mute stands the herd; the heifers roll their
eyes,

And wait th' event; which victor they shall
bear,

And who shall be the lord, to rule the lusty
year:

With rage of love the jealous rivals burn,

And push for push, and wound for wound return;

Their dewlaps gor'd, their sides are lav'd in
blood; 1050

Loud cries and roaring sounds rebellow
thro' the wood:

Such was the combat in the listed ground;
So clash their swords, and so their shields
resound.

Jove sets the beam: in either scale he lays

The champions' fate, and each exactly weighs.

On this side, life and lucky chance ascends;
Loaded with death, that other scale descends.

Rais'd on the stretch, young Turnus aims a
blow

Full on the helm of his unguarded foe:
Shrill shouts and clamors ring on either
side, 1060

As hopes and fears their panting hearts divide.

But all in pieces flies the traitor sword,
And, in the middle stroke, deserts his lord.
Now 't is but death, or flight; disarm'd he
flies,

When in his hand an unknown hilt he spies.
Fame says that Turnus, when his steeds }
he join'd,

Hurrying to war, disorder'd in his mind, }
Snatch'd the first weapon which his haste could find.

'T was not the fated sword his father bore,
But that his charioteer Metiscus wore. 1070
This, while the Trojans fled, the toughness
held;

But, vain against the great Vulcanian shield,
The mortal-temper'd steel deceiv'd his
hand:

The shiver'd fragments shone amid the sand.
Surpris'd with fear, he fled along the
field,

And now forthright, and now in orbits
wheel'd:

For here the Trojan troops the list sur-
round,

And there the pass is clos'd with pools and marshy ground.

Æneas hastens, tho' with heavier pace —
His wound, so newly knit, retards the
chase, 1080

And oft his trembling knees their aid refuse —

Yet, pressing foot by foot, his foe pursues.

Thus, when a fearful stag is clos'd around
With crimson toils, or in a river found,
High on the bank the deep-mouth'd hound
appears,

Still opening, following still, where'er he
steers;

The persecuted creature, to and fro,
Turns here and there, to scape his Umbrian
foe:

Steep is th' ascent, and, if he gains the land,
The purple death is pitch'd along the
strand. 1090

His eager foe, determin'd to the chase, Stretch'd at his length, gains ground at ev'ry pace;

Now to his beamy head he makes his way,
And now he holds, or thinks he holds, his
prey:

Just at the pinch, the stag springs out with
fear;

He bites the wind, and fills his sounding jaws with air:

The rocks, the lakes, the meadows ring
with cries;

The mortal tumult mounts, and thunders
in the skies.

Thus flies the Daunian prince, and, flying, blames

His tardy troops, and, calling by their names, 1100

Demands his trusty sword. The Trojan threats

The realm with ruin, and their ancient seats

To lay in ashes, if they dare supply
With arms or aid his vanquish'd enemy:

Thus menacing, he still pursues the course,
With vigor, tho' diminish'd of his force.

Ten times already round the listed place
One chief had fled, and t'other giv'n the
chase:

No trivial prize is play'd; for on the life
Or death of Turnus now depends the strife.

Within the space, an olive tree had
stood, 1111

A sacred shade, a venerable wood,
For vows to Faunus paid, the Latins' guardian god.

Here hung the vests, and tablets were ingrav'd,

Of sinking mariners from shipwreck sav'd.
With heedless hands the Trojans fell'd the
tree,

To make the ground inclos'd for combat
free.

Deep in the root, whether by fate, or chance,
Or erring haste, the Trojan drove his lance;
Then stoop'd, and tugg'd with force immense, to free 1120

Th' incumbent spear from the tenacious
tree;

That, whom his fainting limbs pursued in
vain,

His flying weapon might from far attain.

Confus'd with fear, bereft of human aid,
Then Turnus to the gods, and first to Faunus pray'd:

"O Faunus, pity! and thou Mother Earth,
Where I thy foster son receiv'd my birth,
Hold fast the steel! If my religious hand
Your plant has honor'd, which your foes
profan'd,

Propitious hear my pious pray'r!" He
said, 1130

Nor with successful vows invok'd their aid.
Th' incumbent hero wrench'd, and pull'd,
and strain'd;

But still the stubborn earth the steel de-
tain'd.

Juturna took her time; and, while in vain
He strove, assum'd Metiscus' form again,
And, in that imitated shape, restor'd
To the despairing prince his Daunian
sword.

The Queen of Love, who, with disdain and
grief,

Saw the bold nymph afford this prompt
relief,

T' assert her offspring with a greater deed,
From the tough root the ling'ring weapon
freed. 1141

Once more erect, the rival chiefs advance:

One trusts the sword, and one the pointed
lance;

And both resolv'd alike to try their fatal
chance.

Meantime imperial Jove to Juno spoke,
Who from a shining cloud beheld the
shock:

"What new arrest, O Queen of Heav'n, is sent

To stop the Fates now lab'ring in th'
event?

What farther hopes are left thee to pursue?

Divine Æneas, (and thou know'st it too,) 1150

Foredoom'd, to these celestial seats is due.

What more attempts for Turnus can be
made,

That thus thou ling'rest in this lonely
shade?

Is it becoming of the due respect

And awful honor of a god elect,

A wound unworthy of our state to feel,

Patient of human hands and earthly steel?

Or seems it just, the sister should restore

A second sword, when one was lost be-
fore,

And arm a conquer'd wretch against his conqueror? 1160

For what, without thy knowledge and avow,

Nay more, thy dictate, durst Juturna do?

At last, in deference to my love, forbear

To lodge within thy soul this anxious care;

Reclin'd upon my breast, thy grief unload:

Who should relieve the goddess, but the
god?

Now all things to their utmost issue tend,
Push'd by the Fates to their appointed end.

While leave was giv'n thee, and a lawful
hour

For vengeance, wrath, and unresisted
pow'r, 1170

Toss'd on the seas, thou couldst thy foes distress,

And, driv'n ashore, with hostile arms op-
press;

Deform the royal house; and, from the
side

Of the just bridegroom, tear the plighted
bride:

Now cease at my command." The Thun-
d'rer said;

And, with dejected eyes, this answer Juno
made:

"Because your dread decree too well I
knew,

From Turnus and from earth unwilling I withdrew.

Else should you not behold me here, alone,
Involv'd in empty clouds, my friends be-
moan, 1180

But, girt with vengeful flames, in open
sight

Engag'd against my foes in mortal fight.

'Tis true, Juturna mingled in the strife

By my command, to save her brother's life—

At least to try; but, by the Stygian lake,

(The most religious oath the gods can take,)

With this restriction, not to bend the bow,
Or toss the spear, or trembling dart to
throw.

And now, resign'd to your superior might,
And tir'd with fruitless toils, I loathe the
fight. 1190

This let me beg (and this no fates withstand)

Both for myself and for your father's land,
That, when the nuptial bed shall bind the
peace,

(Which I, since you ordain, consent to bless.)

The laws of either nation be the same;
But let the Latins still retain their name, Speak the same language which they spoke
before,

Wear the same habits which their grand-sires wore.

Call them not Trojans: perish the renown
And name of Troy, with that detested
town. 1200

Latium be Latium still; let Alba reign,
And Rome's immortal majesty remain."

Then thus the founder of mankind replies

(Unruffled was his front, serene his eyes):
"Can Saturn's issue, and heav'n's other heir,

Such endless anger in her bosom bear?
Be mistress, and your full desires obtain;
But quench the choler you foment in vain.
From ancient blood th' Ausonian people
sprung,

Shall keep their name, their habit, and their tongue. 1210

The Trojans to their customs shall be
tied:

I will, myself, their common rites provide;

The natives shall command, the foreigners subside.

All shall be Latium; Troy without a name;
And her lost sons forget from whence they
came.

From blood so mix'd, a pious race shall flow,

Equal to gods, excelling all below.

No nation more respect to you shall pay,
Or greater off'rings on your altars lay."

Juno consents, well pleas'd that her desires Had found success, and from the cloud retires. 1221

The peace thus made, the Thund'rer next prepares

To force the wat'ry goddess from the wars.
Deep in the dismal regions void of light,
Three daughters at a birth were born to
Night:

These their brown mother, brooding on her care,

Indued with windy wings to flit in air,
With serpents girt alike, and crown'd with hissing hair.

In heav'n the Diræ call'd, and still at hand,
Before the throne of angry Jove they stand,
His ministers of wrath, and ready still 1231
The minds of mortal men with fears to fill,
Whene'er the moody sire, to wreak his hate
On realms or towns deserving of their fate, Hurls down diseases, death, and deadly
care,

And terrifies the guilty world with war.
One sister plague of these from heav'n he
sent,

To fright Juturna with a dire portent.
The pest comes whirling down: by far more slow

Springs the swift arrow from the Parthian
bow, 1240

Or Cydon yew, when, traversing the skies,
And drench'd in pois'nous juice, the sure destruction flies.

With such a sudden and unseen a flight Shot thro' the clouds the daughter of the
night.

Soon as the field inclos'd she had in view,
And from afar her destin'd quarry knew,
Contracted, to the boding bird she turns,
Which haunts the ruin'd piles and hallow'd
urns,

And beats about the tombs with nightly
wings,

Where songs obscene on sepulchers she sings. 1250

Thus lessen'd in her form, with frightful
cries

The Fury round unhappy Turnus flies, Flaps on his shield, and flutters o'er his
eyes.

A lazy chillness crept along his blood;
Chok'd was his voice; his hair with horror
stood.

Juturna from afar beheld her fly,
And knew th' ill omen, by her screaming
cry

And stridor of her wings. Amaz'd with
fear,

Her beauteous breast she beat, and rent
her flowing hair.

"Ah me!" she cries, "in this unequal
strife 1260

What can thy sister more to save thy life?
Weak as I am, can I, alas! contend
In arms with that inexorable fiend?
Now, now, I quit the field! forbear to
fright

My tender soul, ye baleful birds of night!
The lashing of your wings I know too well,
The sounding flight, and fun'ral screams of hell!

These are the gifts you bring from haughty
Jove,

The worthy recompense of ravish'd love!
Did he for this exempt my life from fate?
O hard conditions of immortal state, 1271
Tho' born to death, not privileg'd to die,
But forc'd to bear impos'd eternity!

Take back your envious bribes, and let me
go

Companion to my brother's ghost below!
The joys are vanish'd: nothing now remains

Of life immortal, but immortal pains.
What earth will open her devouring womb,
To rest a weary goddess in the tomb!"
She drew a length of sighs; nor more she
said, 1280

But in her azure mantle wrapp'd her head,
Then plung'd into her stream, with deep
despair,

And her last sobs came bubbling up in air.
Now stern Æneas waves his weighty
spear

Against his foe, and thus upbraids his fear:
"What farther subterfuge can Turnus find?
What empty hopes are harbor'd in his
mind?"

'Tis not thy swiftness can secure thy flight;
Not with their feet, but hands, the valiant
fight.

Vary thy shape in thousand forms, and
dare 1290

What skill and courage can attempt in war;
Wish for the wings of winds, to mount
the sky;

Or hid, within the hollow earth to lie!"
The champion shook his head, and made this short reply:

"No threats of thine my manly mind can
move;

'Tis hostile heav'n I dread, and partial Jove."

He said no more, but, with a sigh, repress'd
The mighty sorrow in his swelling breast.

Then, as he roll'd his troubled eyes
around,

An antique stone he saw, the common
bound 1300

Of neigh'ring fields, and barrier of the
ground;

So vast, that twelve strong men of modern days

Th' enormous weight from earth could hardly raise.

He heav'd it at a lift, and, pois'd on high,
Ran stagg'ring on against his enemy,

But so disorder'd, that he scarcely knew
His way, or what unwieldy weight he threw.

His knocking knees are bent beneath the
load,

And shiv'ring cold congeals his vital blood.
The stone drops from his arms, and, falling short 1310

For want of vigor, mocks his vain effort.
And as, when heavy sleep has clos'd the
sight,

The sickly fancy labors in the night;
We seem to run; and, destitute of force,

Our sinking limbs forsake us in the course:
In vain we heave for breath; in vain we
cry;

The nerves, unbrae'd, their usual strength
deny;

And on the tongue the falt'ring accents
die:

So Turnus far'd; whatever means he
tried,

All force of arms and points of art em-
ploy'd, 1320

The Fury flew athwart, and made th'
endeavor void.

A thousand various thoughts his soul
confound;

He star'd about, nor aid nor issue found;
His own men stop the pass, and his own walls surround.

Once more he pauses, and looks out again,
And seeks the goddess charioteer in vain.

Trembling he views the thund'ring chief
advance,

And brandishing aloft the deadly lance:
Amaz'd he cower's beneath his conqu'ring
foe,

Forgets to ward, and waits the coming
blow. 1330

Astonish'd while he stands, and fix'd with
fear,

Aim'd at his shield he sees th' impending
spear.

The hero measur'd first, with narrow
view,
The destin'd mark; and, rising as he
threw,
With its full swing the fatal weapon flew.
Not with less rage the rattling thunder
falls,
Or stones from batt'ring-engines break the
walls:
Swift as a whirlwind, from an arm so strong,
The lance drove on, and bore the death
along.
Naught could his sev'nfold shield the prince avail,
Nor aught, beneath his arms, the coat of mail:
It pierc'd thro' all, and with a grisly
wound Transfix'd his thigh, and doubled him to
ground.
With groans the Latins rend the vaulted
sky:
Woods, hills, and valleys, to the voice
reply.
Now low on earth the lofty chief is laid,
With eyes cast upward, and with arms
display'd,
And, recreant, thus to the proud victor
pray'd:
"I know my death deserv'd, nor hope to
live:
Use what the gods and thy good fortune
give.
Yet think, O think, if mercy may be shown --
Thou hadst a father once, and hast a son -- Pity my sire, now sinking to the grave;
And for Anchises' sake old Daunus save!
Or, if thy vow'd revenge pursue my death,
Give to my friends my body void of
breath!
The Lation chiefs have seen me beg my
life;
Thine is the conquest, thine the royal
wife:
Against a yielded man, 't is mean ignoble
strife."
In deep suspense the Trojan seem'd to
stand,
And, just prepar'd to strike, repress'd his
hand.
He roll'd his eyes, and ev'ry moment felt
His manly soul with more compassion melt;
When, casting down a casual glance, he
spied

The golden belt that glitter'd on his side,
The fatal spoils which haughty Turnus
tore
From dying Pallas, and in triumph wore.
Then, rous'd anew to wrath, he loudly cries (Flames, while he spoke, came flashing from his eyes):
"Traitor, dost thou, dost thou to grace
pretend,
Clad, as thou art, in trophies of my friend?
To his sad soul a grateful off'ring go!
"T is Pallas, Pallas gives this deadly blow."
He rais'd his arm aloft, and, at the word,
Deep in his bosom drove the shining sword.
The streaming blood distain'd his arms
around,
And the disdainful soul came rushing thro'
the wound.

FINIS

POSTSCRIPT TO THE READER

WHAT Virgil wrote in the vigor of his age, in plenty and at ease, I have undertaken to trans- late in my declining years: struggling with wants, oppress'd with sickness, curb'd in my genius, liable to be misconstrued in all I write;
and my judges, if they are not very equitable, already prejudic'd against me, by the lying character which has been given them of my morals. Yet, steady to my principles, and not dispirited with my afflictions, I have, by the blessing of God on my endeavors, overcome all difficulties, and, in some measure, acquitted myself of the debt which I ow'd the public when I undertook this work. In the first place, therefore, I thankfully acknowledge to the Almighty Power the assistance he has given me in the beginning, the prosecution, and conclusion of my present studies, which are more happily perform'd than I could have promis'd to myself, when I labor'd under such discouragement-ments. For what I have done, imperfect as it is for want of health and leisure to correct it, will be judg'd in after ages, and possibly in the present, to be no dishonor to my native country, whose language and poetry would be more esteem'd abroad, if they were better understood.
Somewhat (give me leave to say) I have added to both of them in the choice of words, and harmony of numbers, which were wanting (especially the last) in all our poets, even in those who, being endued with genius, yet have not cultivated their mother tongue with sufficient care: or, relying on the beauty of their thoughts, have judg'd the ornament of words, and sweetness of sound, unnecessary. One is for raking in Chaucer (our English Ennius) for antiquated words, which are never to be reviv'd but when sound or significancy is wanting in the present language. But many of his deserve not this redemption, any more than the crowds of men who daily die, or are slain for sixpence in a battle, merit to be restor'd to life, if a wish could revive them. Others have no ear for verse, nor choice of words, nor distinction of thoughts; but mingle farthings with their gold, to make up the sum. Here is a field of satire open'd to me; but, since the Revolution, I have wholly renounc'd that talent: for who would give physic to the great, when he is uncall'd — to do his patient no good, and indanger himself for his prescription? Neither am I ignorant, but I may justly be condemn'd for many of those faults of which I have too liberally arraign'd others:

Cynthia aurem vellit, et admonuit.

'Tis enough for me, if the Government will let me pass unquestion'd. In the mean time, I am oblig'd, in gratitude, to return my thanks to many of them, who have not only distinguish'd me from others of the same party, by a particular exception of grace, but, without considering the man, have been bountiful to the poet; have encourag'd Virgil to speak such English as I could teach him, and rewarded his interpreter for the pains he has taken in bringing him over into Britain, by defraying the charges of his voyage. Even Cerberus, when he had receiv'd the sop, permitted Æneas to pass freely to Elysium. Had it been offer'd me, and I had refus'd it, yet still some gratitude is due to such who were willing to oblige me; but how much more to those from whom I have receiv'd the favors which they have offer'd to one of a different persuasion! Amongst whom I cannot omit naming the Earls of Darby and of Peterborough. To the first of these I have not the honor to be known; and therefore his liberality [was] as much unexpected as it was undeserv'd. The present Earl of Peterborough has been pleas'd long since to accept the tenders of my service: his favors are so frequent to me that I receive them almost by prescription. No difference of interests or opinion have been able to withdraw his protection from me; and I might justly be condemn'd for the most unthankful of mankind, if I did not always preserve for him a most profound respect and inviolable gratitude. I must also add, that, if the last Æneid shine amongst its fellows, 'tis owing to the commands of Sir William Trumball, one of the principal secretaries of state, who recommended it, as his favorite, to my care; and, for his sake particularly, I have made it mine: for who would confess weariness, when he enjoind a fresh labor? I could not but invoke the assistance of a Muse, for this last office:

Extremum hunc, Arcthusa —

— Negat quis carmina Gallo?

Neither am I to forget the noble present which was made me by Gilbert Dolben, Esq., the worthy son of the late Archbishop of York, who, when I began this work, enrich'd me with all the several editions of Virgil, and all the commentaries of those editions in Latine; amongst which I could not but prefer the Dolphin's, as the last, the shortest, and the most judicious. Fabrini I had also sent me from Italy; but either he understands Virgil very imperfectly, or I have no knowledge of my author.

Being invited by that worthy gentleman, Sir William Bowyer, to Denham Court, I translated the First Georgic at his house, and the greatest part of the last Æneid. A more friendly entertainment no man ever found. No wonder, therefore, if both those versions surpass the rest, and own the satisfaction I receiv'd in his converse, with whom I had the honor to be bred in Cambridge, and in the same college. The Seventh Æneid was made English at Burleigh, the magnificent abode of the Earl of Exeter. In a village belonging to his family I was born; and under his roof I endeavor'd to make that Æneid appear in English with as much luster as I could; tho' my author has not given the finishing strokes either to it, or to the Eleventh, as I perhaps could prove in both, if I durst presume to criticise my master.

By a letter from Will. Walsh, of Abberley, Esq., (who has so long honor'd me with his friendship, and who, without flattery, is the best critic of our nation.) I have been inform'd that his Grace the Duke of Shrewsbury has procur'd a printed copy of the Pastorals, Georgics, and six first Æneids, from my bookseller, and has read them in the country, together with my friend. This noble person having been pleas'd to give them a commendation, which I presume not to insert, has made me vain enough to boast of so great a favor, and to think I have succeeded beyond my hopes; the character of his excellent judgment, the acuteness of his wit, and his general knowledge of good letters, being known as well to all the world, as the sweetness of his disposition, his humanity, his easiness of access, and desire of obliging those who stand in need of his protection, are known to all who have approach'd him, and to me in particular, who have formerly had the honor of his conversation. Whoever has given the world the translation of part of the Third Georgic, which he calls The Power of Love, has put me to sufficient pains to make my own not inferior to his; as my Lord Roscommon's Silenus had formerly given me the same trouble. The most ingenious Mr. Addison of Oxford has also been as troublesome to me as the other two, and on the same account. After his Bees, my latter swarm is scarcely worth the hiving. Mr. Cowley's Praise of a Country Life is excellent, but 't is rather an imitation of Virgil than a version. That I have recover'd, in some measure, the health which I had lost by too much application to this work, is owing, next to God's mercy, to the skill and care of Dr. Gibbons and Dr. Hobbs, the two ornaments of their profession, whom I can only pay by this acknowledgment. The whole faculty has always been ready to oblige me, and the only one of them who endeavor'd to defame me had it not in his power. I desire pardon from my readers for saying so much in relation to myself, which concerns not them; and, with my acknowledgments to all my subscribers, have only to add, that the few Notes which follow are par manière d'acquit, because I had oblig'd myself by articles to do somewhat of that kind. These scattering observations are rather guesses at my author's meaning in some passages than proofs that so he meant. The unlearn'd may have recourse to any poetical dictionary in English, for the names of persons, places, or fables, which the learned need not; but that little which I say is either new or necessary. And the first of these qualifications never fails to invite a reader, if not to please him.

NOTES AND OBSERVATIONS ON VIRGIL'S WORKS IN ENGLISH

PASTORAL I, line 60. There first the youth of heavenly birth I view'd. Virgil means Octavius Cæsar, heir to Julius, who perhaps had not arriv'd to his twentieth year when Virgil saw him first. Vide his Life. Of heavenly birth, or heavenly blood, because the Julian family was deriv'd from Julius, son to Æneas, and grandson to Venus.

PAST. II, line 65. The short narcissus. That is, of short continuance.

PAST. III, line 95. For him, the god of shepherds and their sheep. Phœbus, not Pan, is here call'd the god of shepherds. The poet alludes to the same story which he touches in the beginning of the Second Georgic, where he calls Phœbus the Amphyrsian shepherd, because he fed the sheep and oxen of Admetus (with whom he was in love) on the hill Amphyrsus.

PAST. IV, line 72. Begin, auspicious boy, &c. In Latin thus, Incipe, parce puer, risu cognoscere matrem, &c. I have translated the passage to this sense; that the infant, smiling on his mother, singles her out from the rest of the company about him. Erythræus, Bembus, and Joseph Scaliger are of this opinion. Yet they and I may be mistaken; for, immediately after, we find these words, cui non risere parentes, which imply another sense, as if the parents smil'd on the newborn infant; and that the babe on whom they vouchsaf'd not to smile was born to ill fortune. For they tell a story, that when Vulcan, the only son of Jupiter and Juno, came into the world, he was so hard-favor'd that both his parents frown'd on him, and Jupiter threw him out of heaven: he fell on the island Lemnos, and was lame ever afterwards. The last line of the pastoral seems to justify this sense: Nec deus hunc mensa, dea nec dignata cubili est. For, tho' he married Venus, yet his mother Juno was not present at the nuptials to bless them; as appears by his wife's incontinence. They say also that he was banish'd from the banquets of the gods. If so, that punishment could be of no long continuance; for Homer makes him present at their feasts, and composing a quarrel betwixt his parents with a bowl of nectar. The matter is of no great consequence; and therefore I adhere to my translation, for these two reasons. First, Virgil had this following line, Matri longa decem tulerunt fastidia menses, as if the infant's smiling on his mother was a reward to her for bearing him ten months in her body, four weeks longer than the usual time. Secondly, Catullus is cited by Joseph Scaliger as favoring this opinion, in his Epithalamium of Manlius Torquatus:

*Torquatus, volo, parvulus, Matris e gremio sue Portugis teneras manus,
Dulce rubet ut patrem, &c.*

What if I should steer betwixt the two extremes, and conclude that the infant who was to be happy must not only smile on his parents, but also they on him? For Scaliger notes that the infants who smil'd not at their birth were observ'd to be ἀγέλαστοι, or sullen (as I have translated it) during all their life; and Servius and almost all the modern commentators affirm that no child was thought fortunate on whom his parents smil'd not at his birth. I observe farther, that the ancients thought the infant who came into the world at the end of the tenth month was born to some extraordinary fortune, good or bad. Such was the birth of the late Prince of Condé's father, of whom his mother was not brought to bed till almost eleven months were expir'd after his father's death; yet the College of Physicians at Paris concluded he was lawfully begotten. My ingenious friend, Anthony Henley, Esq., desir'd me to make a note on this passage of Virgil; adding (what I had not read) that the Jews have been so superstitious as to observe not only the first look or action of an infant, but also the first word which the parent or any of the assistants spoke after the birth; and from thence they gave a name to the child, alluding to it.

PAST. VI. My Lord Roscommon's notes on this pastoral are equal to his excellent translation of it; and thither I refer the reader.

PAST. VIII. The Eighth and Tenth Pastorals are already translated to all manner of advantage by my excellent friend Mr. Stafford. So is the episode of Camilla, in the Eleventh Æneid.

This Eighth Pastoral is copied by our author from two Bucolics of Theocritus. Spenser has follow'd both Virgil and Theocritus in the charms which he employs for curing Britomartis of her love. But he had also our poet's Ceiris in his eye; for there not only the enchantments are to be found, but also the very name of Britomartis.

PAST. IX. In the Ninth Pastoral Virgil has made a collection of many scattering passages which he had translated from Theocritus, and here he has bound them into a nosegay.

GEORGIC I. The poetry of this book is more sublime than any part of Virgil, if I have any taste. And if ever I have copied his majestic style, 'tis here. The compliment he makes Augustus, almost in the beginning, is ill imitated by his successors, Lucan and Statius. They dedicated to tyrants, and their flatteries are gross and fulsome. Virgil's address is both more lofty and more just. In the three last lines of this Georgic, I think I have discover'd a secret compliment to the emperor which none of the commentators have observ'd. Virgil had just before describ'd the miseries which Rome had undergone betwixt the triumvirs and the commonwealth party; in the close of all, he seems to excuse the crimes committed by his patron Cæsar, as if he were constrain'd against his own temper to those violent proceedings, by the necessity of the times in general, but more particularly by his two partners, Anthony and Lepidus:

Fertur equis auriga, nec audit currus habenas

They were the headstrong horses who hurried Octavius, the trembling charioteer, along, and were deaf to his reclaiming them. I observe, farther, that the present wars, in which all Europe and a part of Asia are engag'd at present, are wag'd in the same places here describ'd:

Atque hinc Euphrates, illinc Germania bellum, &c.

as if Virgil had prophesied of this age.

GEORG. II. The Praises of Italy (translated by the learned and every way excellent Mr. Chetwood), which are printed in one of my Miscellany Poems, are the greatest ornament of this book; wherein, for want of sufficient skill in gardening, agriculture, &c., I may possibly be mistaken in some terms. But concerning grafting, my honor'd friend Sir William Bowyer has assur'd me that Virgil has shewn more of poetry than skill, at least in relation to our more northern climates; and that many of our stocks will not receive such grafts as our poet tells us would bear in Italy. Nature has conspir'd with art to make the garden at Denham Court, of Sir William's own plantation, one of the most delicious spots of ground in England: it contains not above five acres (just the compass of Alcinoüs his garden, describ'd in the Odysseys); but Virgil says, in this very Georgic:

— Laudato ingentia rura;
Eriguum colito.

GEORG. III, line 45. Next him Niphates, with inverted urn, &c. It has been objected to me that I understood not this passage of Virgil, because I call Niphates a river, which is a mountain in Armenia. But the river arising from the same mountain is also call'd Niphates; and, having spoken of Nile before, I might reasonably think that Virgil rather meant to couple two rivers than a river and a mountain.

Line 224. The male has done, &c. The transition is obscure in Virgil. He began with cows, then proceeds to treat of horses, now returns to cows.

Line 476. Till the new Ram receives th' exalted sun. Astrologers tell us that the sun receives his exaltation in the sign Aries: Virgil perfectly understood both astronomy and astrology.

GEORG. IV, line 27. That, when the youthful prince. My most ingenious friend, Sir Henry Shere, has observ'd, thro' a glass hive, that the young prince of the bees, or heir presumptive of the crown, approaches the king's apartment with great reverence, and for three successive mornings demands permission to lead forth a colony of that year's bees. If his petition be granted, which he seems to make by humble hummings, the swarm arises under his conduct: if the answer be, le roi s'aviserà, that is, if the old monarch think it not convenient for the public good to part with so many of his subjects, the next morning the prince is found dead before the threshold of the palace.

Line 477. The poet here records the names of fifty river nymphs, and for once I have translated them all. But in the Æneis I thought not myself oblig'd to be so exact; for, in naming many men who were kill'd by heroes, I have omitted some which would not sound in English verse.

Line 656. The episode of Orpheus and Eurydice begins here, and contains the only machine which Virgil uses in the Georgics. I have observ'd, in the epistle before the Æneis, that our author seldom employs machines but to adorn his poem, and that the action which they seemingly perform is really produc'd without them. Of this nature is the legend of the bees restor'd by miracle, when the receipt which the poet gives would do the work without one. The only beautiful machine which I remember in the modern poets is in Ariosto, where God commands St. Michael to take care that Paris, then besieg'd by the Saracens, should be succor'd by Rinaldo. In order to this, he enjoins the archangel to find Silence and Discord; the first to conduct the Christian army to relieve the town, with so much secrecy that their march should not be discover'd; the latter to enter the camp of the infidels, and there to sow dissension among the principal commanders. The heavenly messenger takes his way to an ancient monastery, not doubting there to find Silence in her primitive abode; but, instead of Silence, finds Discord: the monks, being divided into factions about the choice of some new officer, were at snic and snee with their drawn knives. The satire needs no explanation. And here it may be also observ'd that ambition, jealousy, and worldly interest, and point of honor, had made variance both in the cloister and the camp; and strict discipline had done the work of Silence, in conducting the Christian army to surprise the Turks.

ÆNEID I, line 111. And make thee father of a happy line. This was an obliging promise to Æolus, who had been so unhappy in his former children, Macareus and Canace.

Line 196.

*The realms of ocean and the fields of air
Are mine, not his.*

Poetically speaking, the fields of air are under the command of Juno and her vicegerent Æolus. Why then does Neptune call them his? I answer, because, being god of the seas, Æolus could raise no tempest in the atmosphere above them without his leave. But why does Juno address to her own substitute? I answer, he had an immediate power over the winds, whom Juno desires to employ on her revenge. That power was absolute by land; which Virgil plainly insinuates: for, when Boreas and his brethren were let loose, he says at first, terras turbine perflant; then adds, incubere mari. To raise a tempest on the sea was usurpation on the prerogative of Neptune, who had given him no leave, and therefore was inrag'd at his attempt. I may also add, that they who are in a passion, as Neptune then was, are apt to assume to themselves more than is properly their due.

Line 451.

*O virgin! . . .
If, as you seem, the sister of the day,
Or one at least of chaste Diana's train.*

Thus in the original --

*O quam te memorem, virgo --- Aut Phœbi soror, aut nymphetum sanguinis una **

This is a family compliment, which Æneas here bestows on Venus. His father Anchises had us'd the very same to that goddess when he courted her. This appears by that very ancient Greek poem in which that amour is so beautifully describ'd, and which is thought Homer's, tho' it seems to be written before his age.

Line 980.

*Her princely guest
Was next her side.*

This, I confess, is improperly translated, and according to the modern fashion of sitting at table. But the ancient custom of lying on beds had not been understood by the unlearn'd reader.

ÆNEID II. The destruction of Veii is here shadow'd under that of Troy. Livy in his description of it seems to have emulated in his prose, and almost equal'd, the beauty of Virgil's verse.

ÆNEID III, line 132.

And children's children shall the crown sustain.

Et nati natorum, et qui nascentur ab illis.

Virgil translated this verse from Homer, Homer had it from Orpheus, and Orpheus from an ancient oracle of Apollo. On this account it is that Virgil immediately subjoins these words, hæc Phæbus, &c. Eustathius takes notice that the old poets were wont to take whole paragraphs from one another, which justifies our poet for what he borrows from Homer. Bochartus, in his letter to Segrais, mentions an oracle which he found in the fragments of an old Greek historian, the sense whereof is this in English, that, when the empire of the Priamidae should be destroy'd, the line of Anchises should succeed. Venus therefore, says the historian, was desirous to have a son by Anchises, tho' he was then in his decrepid age; accordingly she had Æneas. After this she sought occasion to ruin the race of Priam, and set on foot the intrigue of Alexander (or Paris) with Helena. She being ravish'd, Venus pretended still to favor the Trojans, lest they should restore Helen, in case they should be reduc'd to the last necessity. Whence it appears that the controversy betwixt Juno and Venus was on no trivial account, but concern'd the succession to a great empire.

ÆNEID IV, line 944.

*And, "Must I die," she said,
"And unreveng'd? 'Tis doubly to be dead!
Yet even this death with pleasure I receive:
On any terms, 'tis better than to live."*

This is certainly the sense of Virgil, on which I have paraphras'd, to make it plain. His words are these:

— Moriemur vultus?

Sed moriamur, ait; sic, sic jurat ire sub umbras.

Servius makes an interrogation at the word sic: thus: Sic? Sic jurat ire sub umbras; which Mr. Cowley justly censures. But his own judgment may perhaps be question'd; for he would retrench the latter part of the verse, and leave it a hemistich. Sed moriamur, ait. That Virgil never intended to have left any hemistich, I have prov'd already in the preface. That this verse was fill'd up by him with these words, sic, [sic] jurat ire sub umbras, is very probable, if we consider the weight of them; for this procedure of Dido does not only contain that dura exoratio, qua nullo expiatur carmine, (as Horace observes in his Canidia.) but, besides that, Virgil, who is full of allusions to history, under another name describes the Decii devoting themselves to death this way, tho' in a better cause, in order to the destruction of the enemy. The reader who will take the pains to consult Livy in his accurate description of those Decii thus devoting themselves, will find a great resemblance betwixt these two passages. And 't is judiciously observ'd upon that verse:

— Nulla fides populis nec fœdera sunt,

that Virgil uses, in the word sunt, a verbum juris, a form of speaking on solemn and religious occasions. Livy does the like. Note also, that Dido puts herself into the habitus Gabinus, which was the girding herself round with one sleeve of her vest, which is also according to the Roman pontifical, in this dreadful ceremony, as Livy has observ'd; which is a farther confirmation of this conjecture. So that, upon the whole matter, Dido only doubts whether she should die before she had taken her revenge, which she rather wish'd; but, considering that this devoting herself was the most certain and infallible way of compassing her vengeance, she thus exclaims:

*Sic, sic juvat ire sub umbras!
Hauriat hunc oculis ignem crudelis ab alto
Dardanus, et nostræ secum ferat omnia mortis !*

Those flames from far may the false Trojan view;
Those boding omens his base flight pursue'

which translation I take to be according to the sense of Virgil. I should have added a note on that former verse,

Infelix Dido, nunc te fata impia tangunt — which, in the edition of Heinsius, is thus printed. nunc te facta impia tangunt? The word facta, instead of fata, is reasonably alter'd; for Virgil says afterwards, she died not by fate, nor by any deserv'd death, nec futo, merita nec morte peribat, &c. When I translated that passage, I doubted of the sense, and therefore omitted that hemistich, nunc te fata impia tangunt. But Heinsius is mistaken only in making an interrogation point instead of a period. The words facta impia I suppose are genuine; for she had perjur'd herself in her second marriage, having firmly resolv'd, as she told her sister in the beginning of this Æneid, never to love again, after the death of her first husband; and had confirm'd this resolution by a curse on herself, if she should alter it:

*Sed mihi vel tellus, optem, prius ima deliscat, &c.
Ante, pudor, quam te violam, aut tua jura resolvam.
Ille meos, primus qui me sibi junxit, amores
Abstulit: ille habuit secum, servetque sepulcro.*

ÆNEID V. A great part of this book is borrow'd from Apollonius Rhodius; and the reader may observe the great judgment and distinction of our author, in what he borrows from the ancients, by comparing them. I conceive the reason why he omits the horse race in the funeral games, was, because he shews Ascanius afterwards on horseback, with his troops of boys, and would not wear that subject threadbare, which Statius, in the next age, describ'd so happily. Virgil seems to me to have excell'd Homer in all those sports, and to have labor'd them the more in honor of Octavius, his patron, who instituted the like games for perpetuating the memory of his uncle Julius: piety, as Virgil calls it, or dutifulness to parents, being a most popular virtue among the Romans.

ÆNEID VI, line 586.

*The next, in place and punishment, are they
Who prodigally throw their lives away.*

*Proxima sorte tenent mæsti loca, qui sibi letum
Insontes peperere manu, lucemque perosi,
Profcere animas, &c.*

This was taken, amongst many other things, from the tenth book of Plato de Republica; no commentator besides Fabrini has taken notice of it. Self-murder was accounted a great crime by that divine philosopher; but the instances which he brings are too many to be inserted in these short notes. Sir Robert Howard, in his translation of this Æneid, which was printed with his poems in the year 1660, has given us the most learned and the most judicious observations on this book which are extant in our language.

Line 733.

*Lo! to the secret shadows I retire,
To pay my penance till my years expire.*

These two verses in English seem very different from the Latine:

Discedam, explebo numerum, reddarque tenebris.

Yet they are the sense of Virgil; at least, according to the common interpretation of this place: "I will withdraw from your company, retire to the shades, and perform my penance of a thousand years." But I must confess, the interpretation of those two words, explebo numerum, is somewhat violent, if it be thus understood, minuam numerum: that is: "I will lessen your company by my departure;" for Deiphobus, being a ghost, can hardly be said to be of their number. Perhaps the poet means by explebo numerum, absolvam sententiam; as if Deiphobus replied to the Sibyl, who was angry at his long visit: "I will only take my last leave of Æneas, my kinsman and my friend, with one hearty good wish for his health and welfare, and then leave you to prosecute your voyage." That wish is express'd in the words immediately following, i decus, i nostrum, &c., which contain a direct answer to what the Sibyl said before, when she upbraided their long discourse, nos flendo ducimus horas. This conjecture is new, and therefore left to the discretion of the reader.

Line 980.

*Know, first, that heav'n and earth's compacted
frame,*

*And flowing waters, and the starry flame,
And both the radiant lights, &c.*

Principio cœlum, et terras, camposque liquentes, Lucentemque globum lunæ, Titaniaque astra, &c.

Here the sun is not express'd, but the moon only, tho' a less, and also a less radiant light. Perhaps the copies of Virgil are all false, and that, instead of Titaniaque astra, he writ, Titanaque, et astra; and according to those words I have made my translation. 'Tis most certain that the sun ought not to be omitted, for he is frequently call'd the life and soul of all the world; and nothing bids so fair for a visible divinity to those who know no better, than that glorious luminary. The Platonists call God the archetypal sun, and the sun the visible deity, the inward vital spirit in the center of the universe, or that body to which that spirit is united, and by which it exerts itself most powerfully. Now it was the receiv'd hypothesis amongst the Pythagoreans, that the sun was situate in the center of the world. Plato had it from them, and was himself of the same opinion, as appears by a passage in the Timæus; from which noble dialogue is this part of Virgil's poem taken.

Line 1156.

Great Cato there, for gravity renown'd, &c.

Quis te, magne Cato, &c.

There is no question but Virgil here means Cato Major, or the Censor. But the name of Cato being also mention'd in the Eighth Æneid, I doubt whether he means the same man in both places. I have said in the preface that our poet was of republican principles; and have given this for one reason of my opinion, that he prais'd Cato in that line, Secretisque piis, his dantem jura Catonem.

and accordingly plac'd him in the Elysian fields. Montaigne thinks this was Cato the Utican, the great enemy of arbitrary power, and a profess'd foe to Julius Cæsar. Ruæus would persuade us that Virgil meant the Censor. But why should the poet name Cato twice, if he intended the same person? Our author is too frugal of his words and sense to commit tautologies in either. His memory was not likely to betray him into such an error. Nevertheless I continue in the same opinion concerning the principles of our poet. He declares them sufficiently in this book, where he praises the first Brutus for expelling the Tarquins, giving liberty to Rome, and putting to death his own children, who conspir'd to restore tyranny. He calls him only an unhappy man, for being forc'd to that severe action:

*Infelix, utcumque ferent ea facta minores,
Vincet amor patriæ, laetumque veniens cupido*

Let the reader weigh these two verses, and he must be convinc'd that I am in the right, and that I have not much injur'd my master in my translation of them.

Line 1143.

*Embrace again, my sons, be fous no more;
Nor stain your country with her children's gore!
And thou, the first, lay down thy lawless claim,
Thou, of my blood, who bear'st the Julian name!*

This note, which is out of its proper place, I deferr'd on purpose, to place it here, because it discovers the principles of our poet more plainly than any of the rest.

*Tuque prior, tu parces, genus quo ducens Olympo.
Proijce tela manu, sanguis meus!*

Anchises here speaks to Julius Cæsar, and commands him first to lay down arms; which is a plain condemnation of his cause. Yet observe our poet's incomparable address; for, tho' he shews himself sufficiently to be a Commonwealth's-man, yet in respect to Augustus, who was his patron, he uses the authority of a parent, in the person of Anchises, who had more right to lay this injunction on Cæsar than on Pompey, because the latter was not of his blood. Thus our author cautiously veils his own opinion, and takes sanctuary under Anchises; as if that ghost would have laid the same command on Pompey also, had he been lineally descended from him. What could be more judiciously contriv'd, when this was the Æneid which he chose to read before his master?

Line 1221. A new Marcellus shall arise in thee! In Virgil thus: Tu Marcellus eris.

How unpoetically and baldly had this been translated: "Thou shalt Marcellus be!" Yet some of my friends were of opinion that I mistook the sense of Virgil in my translation. The French interpreter observes nothing on this place, but that it appears by it the mourning of Octavia was yet fresh for the loss of her son Marcellus, whom she had by her first husband, and who died in the year ab urbe condita 731; and collects from thence that Virgil, reading this Æneid before her in the same year, had just finish'd it; that from this time to that of the poet's death was little more than four years; so that, supposing him to have written the whole Æneis in eleven years, the first six books must have taken up seven of those years; on which account the six last must of necessity be less correct.

Now, for the false judgment of my friends, there is but this little to be said for them: the words of Virgil in the verse preceding are these:

— Si qua fata aspera rumpas —

as if the poet had meant: "If you break thro' your hard destiny, so as to be born, you shall be call'd Marcellus." But this cannot be the sense; for, tho' Marcellus was born, yet he broke not thro' those hard decrees which doom'd him to so immature a death. Much less can Virgil mean: "You shall be the same Marcellus by the transmigration of his soul." For according to the system of our author a thousand years must be first elaps'd before the soul can return into a human body; but the first Marcellus was slain in the second Punic war; and how many hundred years were yet wanting to the accomplishing his penance, may with ease be gather'd by computing the time betwixt Scipio and Augustus. By which 't is plain that Virgil cannot mean the same Marcellus, but one of his descendants, whom I call a new Marcellus; who so much resembled his ancestor, perhaps in his features and his person, but certainly in his military virtues, that Virgil cries out: Quantum instar in ipso est! which I have translated:

How like the former, and almost the same!

Line 1235.

*Two gates the silent house of Sleep adorn ;
Of polish'd iv'ry this, that of transparent
horn.*

Virgil borrow'd this imagination from Homer, Odyssees the 19th, line 562. The translation gives the reason why true prophetic dreams are said to pass thro' the gate of horn, by adding the epithet transparent, which is not in Virgil, whose words are only these :

Sunt geminae Somni portae, quarum altera fertur Cornu —

What is pervious to the sight is clear ; and (alluding to this property) the poet infers such dreams are of divine revelation. Such as pass thro' the iv'ry gate are of the contrary nature, polish'd lies. But there is a better reason to be giv'n ; for the iv'ry alludes to the teeth, the horn to the eyes. What we see is more credible than what we only hear ; that is, words that pass thro' the portal of the mouth, or " hedge of the teeth ; " which is Homer's expression for speaking.

ÆNEID VII, line 109. (Strange to relate !) the flames, involv'd in smoke, &c. Virgil in this place takes notice of a great secret in the Roman divination : the lambent fires which rose above the head, or play'd about it, were signs of prosperity. Such were those which he observ'd in the Second Æneid, which were seen mounting from the crown of Ascanius :

*Ecce, levis summo de vertice visus Iuli
Fundere lumen apex.*

Smoky flames (or involv'd in smoke) were of a mix'd omen : such were those which are here describ'd ; for smoke signifies tears, because it produces them, and flames happiness. And therefore Virgil says that this omen was not only mirabile visu, but horrendum.

Line 367. One only daughter heirs my crown and state. This has seem'd to some an odd passage ; that a king should offer his daughter and heir to a stranger prince, and a wanderer, before he had seen him, and when he had only heard of his arrival on his coasts. But these critics have not well consider'd the simplicity of former times, when the heroines almost courted the marriage of illustrious men. Yet Virgil here observes the rule of decency : Lavinia offers not herself ; 'tis Latinus who propounds the match ; and he had been foretold, both by an augur and an oracle, that he should have a foreign son-in-law, who was also a hero ; fathers, in those ancient ages, considering birth and virtue, more than fortune, in the placing of their daughters ; which I could prove by various examples. The contrary of which being now practic'd, I dare not say in our nation, but in France, has not a little darken'd the luster of their nobility. That Lavinia was averse to this marriage, and for what reason, I shall prove in its proper place.

Line 1020.

*And where Abella sees,
From her high tow'rs, the harvest of her trees.*

I observe that Virgil names not Nola, which was not far distant from Abella ; perhaps because that city (the same in which Augustus died afterwards) had once refus'd to give him entertainment, if we may believe the author of his life. Homer heartily curses another city which had us'd him on the same manner ; but our author thought his silence of the Nolans a sufficient correction. When a poet passes by a place or person, tho' a fair occasion offers of rememb'ring them, 'tis a sign he is, or thinks himself, much disoblig'd.

ÆNEID VIII, line 34.

*So, when the sun by day, or moon by night,
light, &c.*

This similitude is literally taken from Apollonius Rhodius, and 'tis hard to say whether the original or the translation excels. But in the shield which he describes afterwards in this Æneid, he as much transcends his master Homer, as the arms of Glaucus were richer than those of Diomedes — χρυσέα χαλκείων.

Line 115.

*Æneas takes the mother and her brood,
And all on Juno's altar are bestow'd.*

The translation is infinitely short of Virgil, whose words are these :

— Tibi, enim, tibi matris Juno, Mactat, sacra ferens, et cum grege sistit ad aram —

for I could not turn the word enim into English with any grace, tho' it was of such necessity in the Roman rites that a sacrifice could not be perform'd without it. 'Tis of the same nature (if I may presume to name that sacred mystery) in our words of consecration at the altar.

ÆNEID IX, line 855.

*At the full stretch of both his hands he drew,
And almost join'd the horns of the tough yew.*

The first of these lines is all of monosyllables, and both verses are very rough, but of choice ; for it had been easy for me to have smooth'd them. But either my ear deceives me, or they express the thing which I intended in their sound ; for the stress of a bow which is drawn to the full extent is express'd in the harshness of the first verse, clogg'd not only with monosyllables, but with consonants ; and these words, the tough yew, which conclude the second line, seem as forceful as they are unharmonious. Homer and Virgil are both frequent in their adapting sounds to the thing they signify. One example will serve for both ; because Virgil borrow'd the following verses from Homer's Odyssees :

Una Eurysque Notusque ruunt, creberque procellis Africus, et vastos volvant ad litora fluctus.

ὃν δ' Εὐρώστῃ, Νότοσ' ἔπεισεν, Ζέφυροσ τε θυσαῖς, καὶ βορέης αἰθρηγενετής, μέγα κύμα κυλινδών.

Our language is not often capable of these beauties, tho' sometimes I have copied them, of which these verses are an instance.

Line 1094.

*His ample shield
Is falsified, and round with javelins fill'd.*

When I read this Æneid to many of my friends in company together, most of them quarrel'd at the word falsified, as an innovation in our language. The fact is confess'd; for I remember not to have read it in any English author, tho' perhaps it may be found in Spenser's Fairy Queen. But suppose it be not there, why am I forbidden to borrow from the Italian (a polish'd language) the word which is wanting in my native tongue? Terence has often Greciz'd; Lucretius has follow'd his example, and pleaded for it: Sic quia me cogit patrii sermonis egestas. Virgil has confirm'd it by his frequent practice; and even Cicero in prose, wanting terms of philosophy in the Latin tongue, has taken them from Aristotle's Greek. Horace has given us a rule for coining words, si Græco fonte cadunt; especially when other words are join'd with them, which explain the sense. I use the word falsify in this place to mean that the shield of Turnus was not of proof against the spears and jav'lines of the Trojans, which had pierc'd it thro' and thro' (as we say) in many places. The words which accompany this new one make my meaning plain, according to the precept which Horace gave. But I said I borrow'd the word from the Italian. Vide Ariosto, Cant. 26:

*Ma sì l'usbergo d' anchi era perfetto,
Che mai poter falsarlo in nessun canto.*

Falsar cannot otherwise be turn'd than by falsified; for his shield was fals'd is not English. I might indeed have contented myself with saying his shield was pierc'd, and bor'd, and stuck with javelins, nec sufficit unbo tectibus. They who will not admit a new word may take the old; the matter is not worth dispute.

ÆNEID X, line 241.

*Now, sacred sisters, open all your spring!
The Tuscan leaders, and their army sing.*

The poet here begins to tell the names of the Tuscan captains who follow'd Æneas to the war; and I observe him to be very particular in the description of their persons, and not forgetful of their manners; exact also in the relation of the numbers which each of them command. I doubt not but as, in the Fifth Book, he gave us the names of the champions who contended for the several prizes, that he might oblige many of the most ancient Roman families, their descendants; and as, in the Seventh Book, he muster'd the auxiliary forces of the Latins on the same account; so here he gratifies his Tuscan friends with the like remembrance of their ancestors, and, above the rest, Mæcenas, his great patron, who, being of a royal family in Etruria, was probably represented under one of the names here mention'd, then known among the Romans, tho' at so great a distance, unknown to us. And for his sake chiefly, as I guess, he makes Æneas (by whom he always means Augustus) to seek for aid in the country of Mæcenas, thereby to indear his protector to his emperor, as if there had been a former friendship betwixt their lines. And who knows but Mæcenas might pretend that the Cilnian family was deriv'd from Tarchon, the chief commander of the Tuscans?

Line 312. A choir of Nereids, &c. These were transform'd from ships to sea nymphs. This is almost as violent a machine as the death of Aruns by a goddess in the episode of Camilla. But the poet makes use of it with greater art; for here it carries on the main design. These new-made divinities not only tell Æneas what had pass'd in his camp during his absence, and what was the present distress of his besieg'd people, and that his horsemen, whom he had sent by land, were ready to join him at his descent; but warn him to provide for battle the next day, and foretell him good success: so that this episodical machine is properly a part of the great poem; for, besides what I have said, they push on his navy with celestial vigor, that it might reach the port more speedily, and take the enemy more unprovided to resist the landing. Whereas the machine relating to Camilla is only ornamental; for it has no effect which I can find, but to please the reader, who is concern'd that her death should be reveng'd.

Line 662. Nor I, his mighty sire, could ward the blow. I have mention'd this passage in my preface to the Æneis, to prove that fate was superior to the gods, and that Jove could neither defer nor alter its decrees. Sir Robert Howard has since been pleas'd to send me the concurrent testimony of Ovid: 'tis in the last book of his Metamorphoses, where Venus complains that her descendant, Julius Cæsar, was in danger of being murder'd by Brutus and Cassius, at the head of the commonwealth faction, and desires them to prevent that barbarous assassination. They are mov'd to compassion; they are concern'd for Cæsar; but the poet plainly tells us that it was not in their power to change destiny. All they could do was to testify their sorrow for his approaching death by foreshewing it with signs and prodigies, as appears by the following lines:

*Tanta nequicquam toto Venus aurea celo Vota facit: superasque movet: qui rumpere quanquam
Fertur non possunt veterum decreta sororum,
Signa tamen luctus dant haud incerta futuri.*

Then she addresses to her father, Jupiter, hoping aid from him, because he was thought omnipotent. But he, it seems, could do as little as the rest; for he answers thus:

— *sola insuperabile fatum.
Nata, movere paras? Intres licet ipsa sororum Tecta trium: cernis illic, malimine vasto,
Et arce et solido verum tubularia ferro,
Quæ neque concursus cœli, neque fulminis iram,
Nec metuant ullas, tuta atque æterna, ruinas
Intenies illic, incisa adamante perenni,*

*Fata tui generis. Legi ipse, animoque notavi;
Et referam, ne sis etiamnum ignara futuri.
Hic sua complevit (pro quo, Cytherea, laboras)
Tempora, perfectis, quos terræ debuit, annis, &c.*

Jupiter, you see, is only library keeper, or custos rotulorum, to the Fates; for he offers his daughter a cast of his office, to give her a sight of their decrees, which the inferior gods were not permitted to read without his leave. This agrees with what I have said already in the preface; that they, not having seen the records, might believe they were his own handwriting, and consequently at his disposing, either to blot out or alter, as he saw convenient. And of this opinion was Juno in those words, tua, qui potes, orsa reflectas. Now the abode of those Destinies being in hell, we cannot wonder why the swearing by Styx was an inviolable oath amongst the gods of heaven, and that Jupiter himself should fear to be accus'd of forgery by the Fates, if he alter'd anything in their decrees; Chaos, Night, and Erebus being the most ancient of the deities, and instituting those fundamental laws by which he was afterwards to govern. Hesiod gives us the genealogy of the gods, and I think I may safely infer the rest. I will only add, that Homer was more a fatalist than Virgil; for it has been observ'd that the word τύχη, or fortune, is not to be found in his two poems; but, instead of it, always μοίρα.

ÆNEID XII, line 100.

*At this, a flood of tears Lavinia shed:
A crimson blush her beauteous face o'er-
spread,
Varying her cheeks by turns with white and red.*

Amata, ever partial to the cause of Turnus, had just before desir'd him, with all manner of earnestness, not to engage his rival in single fight; which was his present resolution. Virgil, tho', in favor of his hero, he never tells us directly that Lavinia preferr'd Turnus to Æneas, yet has insinuated this preference twice before. For mark, in the Seventh Æneid she left her father, who had promis'd her to Æneas without asking her consent, and follow'd her mother into the woods, with a troop of Bacchanals, where Amata sung the marriage song, in the name of Turnus; which, if she had disliked, she might have oppos'd. Then, in the Eleventh Æneid, when her mother went to the temple of Pallas, to invoke her aid against Æneas, whom she calls by no better name than Phrygius prædo, Lavinia sits by her in the same chair or litter, juxtaque comes Lavinia virgo—oculos dejecta decoros. What greater sign of love than fear and concernment for the lover? In the lines which I have quoted, she not only sheds tears, but changes color. She had been bred up with Turnus, and Æneas was wholly a stranger to her. Turnus, in probability, was her first love, and favor'd by her mother, who had the ascendant over her father. But I am much deceiv'd if (besides what I have said) there be not a secret satire against the sex, which is lurking under this description of Virgil, who seldom speaks well of women; better, indeed, of Camilla than any other, for he commends her beauty and valor, because he would concern the reader for her death. But valor is no very proper praise for womankind, and beauty is common to the sex. He says also somewhat of Andromache, but transiently; and his Venus is a better mother than a wife; for she owns to Vulcan she had a son by another man. The rest are Junos, Dianas, Didos, Amatas, two mad prophetesses, three Harpies on earth, and as many Furies under ground. This fable of Lavinia includes a secret moral: that women, in their choice of husbands, prefer the younger of their suitors to the elder; are insensible of merit, fond of handsomeness, and, generally speaking, rather hurried away by their appetite than govern'd by their reason.

Line 808.

*Sea-born Messapus, with Atinas, heads
The Latin squadrons, and to battle leads.*

The poet had said, in the preceding lines, that Mnestheus, Seresthus, and Asylas led on the Trojans, the Tuscaus, and the Arcadians; but none of the printed copies which I have seen mention any leader of the Rutulians and Latins but Messapus the son of Neptune. Ruæus takes notice of this passage, and seems to wonder at it; but gives no reason why Messapus is alone without a coadjutor.

The four verses of Virgil run thus:

*Totæ adeo conversæ acies, omnesque Latini,
Omnes Dardanide; Mnestheus, acerque Seresthus,
Et Messapus equum domitor, et fortis Asylas, Tuscorumque phalanx, Evandrique Arculis alæ.*

I doubt not but the third line was originally thus:

Et Messapus equum domitor, et fortis Atinas;

for the two names of Asylas and Atinas are so like that one might easily be mistaken for the other by the transcribers. And to fortify this opinion, we find afterward, in the relation of Sages to Turnus, that Atinas is join'd with Messapus:

Soli, pro portis, Messapus et acer Atinas Sustinent aciem. —

In general I observe, not only in this Æneid, but in all the six last books, that Æneas is never seen on horseback, and but once before, as I remember, in the Fourth, when he hunts with Dido. The reason of this, if I guess aright, was a secret compliment which the poet made to his countrymen the Romans, the strength of whose armies consisted most in foot, which, I think, were all Romans and Italians. But their wings, or squadrons, were made up of their allies, who were foreigners.

Line 1191.

*This let me beg (and this no fates withstand)
Both for myself and for your father's land. &c.*

The words in the original are these: Pro Latio obtestor, pro majestate tuorum. Virgil very artfully uses here the word majestas.

which the Romans lov'd so well that they appropriated it to themselves: majestas populi Romani. This title, applied to kings, is very modern; and that is all I will say of it at present, tho' the word requires a larger note. In the word tuorum is included the sense of my translation, your father's land, because Saturn, the father of Jove, had govern'd that part of Italy after his expulsion from Crete. But that on which I most insist is the address of the poet in this speech of Juno. Virgil was sufficiently sensible, as I have said in the preface, that whatever the common opinion was concerning the descent of the Romans from the Trojans, yet the ancient customs, rites, laws, and habits of those Trojans were wholly lost, and perhaps also that they had never been; and, for this reason, he introduces Juno in this place, requesting of Jupiter that no memory might remain of Troy (the town she hated), that the people hereafter should not be call'd Trojans, nor retain anything which belong'd to their predecessors. And why might not this also be concerted betwixt our author and his friend Horace, to hinder Augustus from rebuilding Troy, and removing thither the seat of empire, a design so displeasing to the Romans? But of this I am not positive, because I have not consulted Dacier and the rest of the critics, to ascertain the time in which Horace writ the ode relating to that subject.

Line 1224.

*Deep in the dismal regions void of light,
Three sisters at a birth were born to Night.*

The father of these (not here mention'd) was Achæron; the names of the three were Alecto, Megæra, and Tisiphone. They were call'd Furies in hell, on earth Harpies, and in heaven Diræ. Two of these assisted at the throne of Jupiter, and were employ'd by him to punish the wickedness of mankind. These two must be Megæra and Tisiphone, not Alecto; for Juno expressly commands her to return to hell, from whence she came; and gives this reason:

*Te super ætherias errare licentius auras
Haud pater ipse velit, summi regnator Olympi:
Cede locis.*

Probably this Diræ, unnam'd by the poet in this place, might be Tisiphone; for, tho' we find her in hell, in the Sixth Æneid, employ'd in the punishment of the damn'd:

Continuo soutes ultrix accincta flagello Tisiphone quatit insultans, &c.,

yet afterwards she is on earth, in the Tenth Æneid, and amidst the battle: Pallida Tisiphone media inter millia sævit. Which I guess to be Tisiphone, the rather, by the etymology of her name, which is compounded of τίω, ulciscor, and φόνος, cædes; part of her errand being to affright Turnus with the stings of a guilty conscience, and denounce vengeance against him for breaking the first treaty, by refusing to yield Lavinia to Æneas, to whom she was promis'd by her father; and, consequently, for being the author of an unjust war; and also for violating the second treaty, by declining the single combat which he had stipulated with his rival and call'd the gods to witness before their altars. As for the names of the Harpies (so call'd on earth), Hesiod tells us they were Iris, Aello, and Ocypete. Virgil calls one of them Celæno: this, I doubt not, was Alecto, whom Virgil calls, in the Third Æneid, Furiarum maxima, and in the Sixth again by the same name: Furiarum maxima juxta accubat. That she was the chief of the Furies appears by her description in the Seventh Æneid: to which, for haste, I refer the reader.

TRANSLATIONS FROM OVID'S ART OF LOVE AND AMOURS

[None of the following translations were published during Dryden's lifetime. The only information that the present editor can find in regard to them is in a letter from Dryden to Tonson, written just before the second edition of the Virgil, 1698: "You told me not, but the town says you are printing Ovid de Arte Amandi. I know my translation is very incorrect; but at the same time I know, nobody else can do it better, with all their pains" (Malone, I, 2, 63). Thus it is at least probable that Dryden made his translation from The Art of Love while at work on his Virgil, or just after finishing it. Had he done the piece earlier, he would probably have inserted it in The Annual Miscellany for the Year 1694. It seems convenient also, in the absence of any exact information, to assign the two elegies from the Amores to the same period.

For some unknown reason, Tonson delayed the publication of these translations; the town talk to which Dryden refers apparently lacked foundation. In Poetical Miscellanies, the Fifth Part, 1704, he inserted the two elegies from the Amores, with titles as below; and two episodes from The Art of Love, lines 111-151 and 590-635, under the titles of The Rape of the Sabines and The Meeting of Bacchus with Ariadne. Finally, in 1709, he published a complete translation of Ovid's Art of Love, of which the first book is ascribed to Dryden and the third to Congreve; the translator of the second book is not named.]

OVID'S ART OF LOVE

BOOK I

IN Cupid's school whoe'er would take degree,
Must learn his rudiments, by reading me.
Seamen with sailing arts their vessels
move;
Art guides the chariot; art instructs to
love.
Of ships and chariots others know the rule;
But I am master in Love's mighty school.
Cupid indeed is obstinate and wild,
A stubborn god; but yet the god's a child,
Easy to govern in his tender age,
Like fierce Achilles in his pupilage: 10
That hero, born for conquest, trembling
stood
Before the Centaur, and receiv'd the rod.
As Chiron mollified his cruel mind
With art, and taught his warlike hands to
wind
The silver strings of his melodious lyre;
So love's fair goddess does my soul inspire
To teach her softer arts, to soothe the
mind,
And smooth the rugged breasts of human-
kind.
Yet Cupid and Achilles each with scorn
And rage were fill'd; and both were goddess-born. 20
The bull, reclaim'd and yok'd, the burden
draws;
The horse receives the bit within his jaws;
And stubborn Love shall bend beneath my
sway,
Tho' struggling oft he strives to disobey.
He shakes his torch, he wounds me with his darts;
But vain his force, and vainer are his arts.
The more he burns my soul, or wounds my
sight,
The more he teaches to revenge the spite.
I boast no aid the Delphian god affords,
Nor auspice from the flight of chattering birds; 30
Nor Clio, nor her sisters have I seen,
As Hesiod saw them on the shady green:
Experience makes my work a truth so
tried,
You may believe; and Venus be my guide.
Far hence, you vestals be, who bind your
hair;

And wives, who gowns below your ankles
wear.

I sing the brothels loose and unconfin'd, }
Th' unpunishable pleasures of the kind; }
Which all alike, for love, or money, find. }

You, who in Cupid's rolls inscribe your
name, 40

First seek an object worthy of your flame;
Then strive, with art, your lady's mind to
gain;

And last, provide your love may long remain.

On these three precepts all my work shall
move:

These are the rules and principles of love.

Before your youth with marriage is op-
press'd,

Make choice of one who suits your humor
best:

And such a damsel drops not from the sky;
She must be sought for with a curious eye.

The wary angler, in the winding brook, Knows what the fish, and where to bait his hook. 51

The fowler and the huntsman know by
name

The certain haunts and harbor of their game.

So must the lover beat the likeliest grounds,
Th' assemblies where his quarry most abounds.

Nor shall my novice wander far astray;

These rules shall put him in the ready way.

Thou shalt not sail around the continent,

As far as Perseus, or as Paris went:

For Rome alone affords thee such a store,
As all the world can hardly shew thee
more. 61

The face of heav'n with fewer stars is
crown'd,

Than beauties in the Roman sphere are
found.

Whether thy love is bent on blooming
youth,

On dawning sweetness, in unartful truth;

Or courts the juicy joys of riper growth;

Here mayst thou find thy full desires in both.

Or if autumnal beauties please thy sight, (An age that knows to give and take delight,)

Millions of matrons of the graver sort, 70
In common prudence, will not balk the sport.

In summer heats thou need'st but only go

To Pompey's cool and shady portico,
Or Concord's fane, or that proud edifice
Whose turrets near the bawdy suburb rise;
Or to that other portico, where stands
The cruel father, urging his commands,
And fifty daughters wait the time of rest,
To plunge their poniards in the bridegroom's
breast;

Or Venus' temple, where, on annual nights,
They mourn Adonis with Assyrian rites. ⁸¹
Nor shun the Jewish walk, where the foul
drove,
On Sabbaths, rest from everything but
love;

Nor Isis' temple, for that sacred whore Makes others what to Jove she was before.

And if the hall itself be not belied,
Even there the cause of love is often tried;
Near it at least, or in the palace yard,
From whence the noisy combatants are
heard.

The crafty counselors, in formal gown, ⁹⁰
There gain another's cause, but lose their
own.

There eloquence is nonplus'd in the suit,
And lawyers, who had words at will, are mute.

Venus, from her adjoining temple, smiles,
To see them caught in their litigious wiles.
Grave senators lead home the youthful
dame.

Returning clients, when they patrons came.
But above all, the playhouse is the place;
There's choice of quarry in that narrow
chase.

There take thy stand, and sharply looking out, ¹⁰⁰

Soon mayst thou find a mistress in the rout,

For length of time, or for a single bout. }

The theaters are berries for the fair:

Like ants on molehills, thither they repair;
Like bees to hives, so numerous they
throng,

It may be said, they to that place belong.
Thither they swarm, who have the public voice:

There choose, if plenty not distracts thy choice.

To see and to be seen, in heaps they run;
Some to undo, and some to be undone. ¹¹⁰

From Romulus the rise of plays began,
To his new subjects a commodious man;
Who, his unmarried soldiers to supply,

Took care the commonwealth should multiply;

Providing Sabine women for his braves,
Like a true king, to get a race of slaves:
His playhouse not of Parian marble made,
Nor was it spread with purple sails for
shade.

The stage with rushes or with leaves they strow'd: ¹¹⁹

No scenes in prospect, no machining god.
On rows of homely turf they sate to see,
Crown'd with the wreaths of every common
tree.

There, while they sit in rustic majesty,
Each lover had his mistress in his eye;
And whom he saw most suiting to his mind,
For joys of matrimonial rape design'd.

Scarce could they wait the plaudit in their
haste;

But, ere the dances and the song were past,
The monarch gave the signal from his
throne;

And, rising, bade his merry men fall on.
The martial crew, like soldiers ready press'd, ¹³¹

Just at the word (the word too was, The Best)

With joyful cries each other animate;
Some choose, and some at hazard seize their mate.

As doves from eagles, or from wolves the lambs,

So from their lawless lovers fly the dames.
Their fear was one, but not one face of
fear;

Some rend the lovely tresses of their
hair;

Some shriek, and some are struck with dumb despair. }

Her absent mother one invokes in vain;
One stands amaz'd, not daring to complain; ¹⁴¹

The nimble trust their feet, the slow remain. }

But naught availing, all are captives led,
Trembling and blushing, to the genial bed.

She who too long resisted, or denied,
The lusty lover made by force a bride;

And, with superior strength, compell'd her to his side: }

Then sooth'd her thus: "My soul's far better part,

Cease weeping, nor afflict thy tender heart;
For what thy father to thy mother was, ¹⁵⁰

That faith to thee, that solemn vow I pass."

Thus Romulus became so popular;
This was the way to thrive in peace and war;
To pay his army, and fresh whores to bring:
Who would not fight for such a gracious king!

Thus love in theaters did first improve;
And theaters are still the scene of love:
Nor shun the chariots, and the courser's race;

The Circus is no inconvenient place.
No need is there of talking on the hand; 160
Nor nods, nor signs, which lovers understand.

But boldly next the fair your seat provide;
Close as you can to hers, and side by side.
Pleas'd or unpleas'd, no matter; crowding sit,

For so the laws of public shows permit.
Then find occasion to begin discourse;
Enquire whose chariot this, and whose that horse:

To whatsoever side she is inclin'd,
Suit all your inclinations to her mind;
Like what she likes: from thence your court begin; 170

And whom she favors, wish that he may win.

But when the statues of the deities.
In chariots roll'd, appear before the prize;
When Venus comes, with deep devotion rise. }

If dust be on her lap, or grains of sand,
Brush both away with your officious hand.
If none be there, yet brush that nothing thence;

And still to touch her lap make some pretense.

Touch anything of hers; and if her train
Sweep on the ground, let it not sweep in vain; 180

But gently take it up, and wipe it clean;
And while you wipe it, with observing eyes,

Who knows but you may see her naked thighs!

Observe who sits behind her; and beware,
Lest his incroaching knee should press the fair.

Light service takes light minds; for some can tell

Of favors won by laying cushions well:
By fawning faces some their fortune meet;

And some by laying footstools for their feet.

These overtures of love the Circus gives;
Nor at the swordplay less the lover thrives: 191

For there the son of Venus fights his prize;

And deepest wounds are oft receiv'd from eyes.

One, while the crowd their acclamations make,

Or while he bets, and puts his ring to stake,
Is struck from far, and feels the flying dart,

And of the spectacle is made a part.

Cæsar would represent a naval fight,
For his own honor, and for Rome's delight.
From either sea the youths and maidens come, 200

And all the world was then contain'd in Rome!

In this vast concourse, in this choice of game,

What Roman heart but felt a foreign flame?

Once more our prince prepares to make us glad;

And the remaining East to Rome will add.
Rejoice, you Roman soldiers, in your urn;

Your ensigns from the Parthians shall return,

And the slain Crassi shall no longer mourn. }

A youth is sent those trophies to demand;
And bears his father's thunder in his hand:
Doubt not th' imperial boy in wars unseen; 211

In childhood all of Cæsar's race are men.

Celestial seeds shoot out before their day,
Prevent their years, and brook no dull delay.

Thus infant Hercules the snakes did press,
And in his cradle did his sire confess.

Bacchus, a boy, yet like a hero fought,
And early spoils from conquer'd India brought.

Thus you your father's troops shall lead to fight,

And thus shall vanquish in your father's right. 220

These rudiments you to your lineage owe;
Born to increase your titles, as you grow.

Brethren you had, revenge your brethren slain;

You have a father, and his rights maintain.
Arm'd by your country's parent, and your
own,

Redeem your country, and restore his
throne.

Your enemies assert an impious cause;
You fight both for divine and human laws.
Already in their cause they are o'ercome:
Subject them too, by force of arms, to Rome.

Great Father Mars with greater Cæsar²³⁰
join,

To give a prosperous omen to your line:
One of you is, and one shall be divine. }
I prophesy you shall, you shall o'ercome:
My verse shall bring you back in triumph
home.

Speak in my verse, exhort to loud alarms:
O were my numbers equal to your arms!
Then will I sing the Parthians' overthrow;
Their shot adverse sent from a flying bow:
The Parthians, who already flying fight,²⁴⁰
Already give an omen of their flight.

O when will come the day, by Heaven de-
sign'd,

When thou, the best and fairest of man-
kind,

Drawn by white horses shalt in triumph
ride,

With conquer'd slaves attending on thy
side:

Slaves, that no longer can be safe in
flight —

O glorious object, O surprising sight, O day of public joy, too good to end in
night! }

On such a day, if thou, and, next to thee,
Some beauty sits, the spectacle to see:²⁵⁰

If she enquire the names of conquer'd
kings,

Of mountains, rivers, and their hidden
springs,

Answer to all thou know'st; and, if need be,
Of things unknown seem to speak knowingly:

This is Euphrates, crown'd with reeds; and
there

Flows the swift Tigris, with his sea-green
hair.

Invent new names of things unknown be-
fore;

Call this Armenia, that the Caspian shore;
Call this a Mede, and that a Parthian
youth;

Talk probably: no matter for the truth.²⁶⁰

In feasts, as at our shows, new means abound;

More pleasure there than that of wine is
found.

The Paphian goddess there her ambush
lays;

And Love betwixt the horns of Bacchus
plays:

Desires encrease at ev'ry swilling draught;
Brisk vapors add new vigor to the thought.

There Cupid's purple wings no flight afford;

But, wet with wine, he flutters on the board.

He shakes his pinions, but he cannot
move;

Fix'd he remains, and turns a maudlin
Love.²⁷⁰

Wine warms the blood, and makes the spirits flow;

Care flies, and wrinkles from the forehead
go:

Exalts the poor, invigorates the weak;
Gives mirth and laughter, and a rosy cheek.

Bold truths it speaks; and spoken, dares
maintain;

And brings our old simplicity again.

Love sparkles in the cup, and fills it higher:

Wine feeds the flames, and fuel adds to
fire.

But choose no mistress in thy drunken fit;
Wine gilds too much their beauties and their wit.²⁸⁰

Nor trust thy judgment when the tapers
dance;

But sober, and by day, thy suit advance.

By daylight Paris judg'd the beauteous three,

And for the fairest did the prize decree.

Night is a cheat, and all deformities
Are hid, or lessen'd in her dark disguise.

The sun's fair light each error will confess,

In face, in shape, in jewels, and in dress.

Why name I ev'ry place where youths
abound?

'Tis loss of time, and a too fruitful ground.
The Baian baths, where ships at anchor ride,²⁹¹

And wholesome streams from sulphur fountains glide;

Where wounded youths are by experience
taught,

The waters are less healthful than they thought:

Or Dian's fane, which near the suburb lies,
Where priests, for their promotion, fight a prize.

That maiden goddess is Love's mortal foe,
And much from her his subjects undergo.

Thus far the sportful Muse, with myrtle bound,

Has sung where lovely lasses may be found.

Now let me sing, how she who wounds³⁰⁰
your mind,

With art, may be to cure your wounds inclin'd.

Young nobles, to my laws attention lend;
And all you vulgar of my school, attend.

First then believe, all women may be won;

Attempt with confidence, the work is done.
The grasshopper shall first forbear to sing

In summer season, or the birds in spring,
Than women can resist your flattering skill:

Ev'n she will yield, who swears she never will.

To secret pleasure both the sexes move;³¹⁰
But women most, who most dissemble love.

'T were best for us, if they would first declare,

Avow their passion, and submit to prayer.
The cow, by lowing, tells the bull her flame;

The neighing mare invites her stallion to the game.

Man is more temp'rate in his lust than they,
And, more than women, can his passion sway.

Biblis, we know, did first her love declare,
And had recourse to death in her despair.

Her brother she, her father Myrrha sought,
And lov'd, but lov'd not as a daughter ought.

Now from a tree she stills her odorous³²⁰
tears,

Which yet the name of her who shed 'em bears.

In Ida's shady vale a bull appear'd,
White as the snow, the fairest of the herd;
A beauty spot of black there only rose,
Betwixt his equal horns and ample brows:
The love and wish of all the Cretan cows.
The queen beheld him as his head he rear'd;

330

And envied ev'ry leap he gave the herd.

A secret fire she nourish'd in her breast,
And hated ev'ry heifer he caress'd.

A story known, and known for true, I tell;
Nor Crete, tho' lying, can the truth conceal.

She cut him grass, (so much can Love command;)

She strok'd, she fed him with her royal hand:

Was pleas'd in pastures with the herd to roam;

And Minos by the bull was overcome.

Cease, queen, with gems t' adorn thy beauteous brows;

The monarch of thy heart no jewel knows.³⁴⁰
Nor in thy glass compose thy looks and eyes;

Secure from all thy charms thy lover lies:
Yet trust thy mirror, when it tells thee true;

Thou art no heifer to allure his view.

Soon wouldst thou quit thy royal diadem

To thy fair rivals, to be horn'd like them.

If Minos please, no lover seek to find;

If not, at least seek one of human kind.

The wretched queen the Cretan court forsakes;

In woods and wilds her habitation makes:

She curses ev'ry beauteous cow she sees:

"Ah, why dost thou my lord and master please!

And think'st, ungrateful creature as thou art,

With frisking awkwardly, to gain his heart!"

She said, and straight commands, with frowning look,

To put her, undeserving, to the yoke;

Or feigns some holy rites of sacrifice,

And sees her rival's death with joyful eyes:

Then, when the bloody priest has done his part,

Pleas'd, in her hand she holds the beating³⁶⁰
heart;

Nor from a scornful taunt can scarce refrain:

"Go, fool, and strive to please my love again."

Now she would be Europa, lo now:

(One bore a bull, and one was made a cow.)

Yet she at last her brutal bliss obtain'd,

And in a wooden cow the bull sustain'd;

Fill'd with his seed, accomplish'd her desire;

Till by his form the son betray'd the sire.

If Atreus' wife to incest had not run, ³⁷⁰
(But, ah, how hard it is to love but one !)
His coursers Phœbus had not driv'n away,
To shun that sight, and interrupt the day.
Thy daughter, Nisus, pull'd thy purple
hair,
And barking sea-dogs yet her bowels
tear.

At sea and land Atrides sav'd his life,
Yet fell a prey to his adult'rous wife.
Who knows not what revenge Medea
sought,
When the slain offspring bore the father's fault ?

Thus Phenix did a woman's love bewail;
And thus Hippolytus by Phædra fell. ³⁸¹
These crimes revengeful matrons did commit:

Hotter their lust, and sharper is their wit.
Doubt not from them an easy victory:
Scarce of a thousand dames will one deny.
All women are content that men should woo;

She who complains, and she who will not do.

Rest then secure, whate'er thy luck may prove,

Not to be hated for declaring love.

And yet how canst thou miss, since woman-kind ³⁸⁹

Is frail and vain, and still to change in-clin'd ?

Old husbands and stale gallants they despise,

And more another's than their own they
prize.

A larger crop adorns our neighbor's field;
More milk his kine from swelling udders
yield.

First gain the maid; by her thou shalt be sure

A free access and easy to procure:
Who knows what to her office does belong,

Is in the secret, and can hold her tongue.
Bribe her with gifts, with promises, and pray'rs; ⁴⁰⁰

For her good word goes far in love affairs.
The time and fit occasion leave to her,

When she most aptly can thy suit prefer.
The time for maids to fire their lady's

blood,
Is, when they find her in a merry mood;

When all things at her wish and pleasure
move:

Her heart is open then, and free to love.

Then mirth and wantonness to lust betray,
And smooth the passage to the lover's way.
Troy stood the siege, when fill'd with anxious care: ⁴¹⁰

One merry fit concluded all the war.

If some fair rival vex her jealous mind,
Offer thy service to revenge in kind.

Instruct the damsel, while she combs her
hair,

To raise the choler of that injur'd fair;
And, sighing, make her mistress under-
stand,

She has the means of vengeance in her
hand:

Then, naming thee, thy humble suit prefer,
And swear thou languishest and di'st for
her. ⁴¹⁹

Then let her lose no time, but push at all;
For women soon are rais'd, and soon they
fall.

Give their first fury leisure to relent,
They melt like ice, and suddenly repent.

T' enjoy the maid, will that thy suit advance ?

'T is a hard question and a doubtful chance.
One maid, corrupted, bawds the better
for 't;

Another for herself would keep the sport.
Thy bus'ness may be farther'd or delay'd;

But by my counsel, let alone the maid:
Ev'n tho' she should consent to do the feat, ⁴³⁰

The profit's little and the danger great.
I will not lead thee thro' a rugged road;

But where the way lies open, safe, and broad.

Yet if thou find'st her very much thy
friend,

And her good face her diligence commend,
Let the fair mistress have thy first embrace,

And let the maid come after in her place.
But this I will advise, and mark my
words;

For 't is the best advice my skill affords:
If needs thou with the damsel wilt begin,

Before th' attempt is made, make sure to win; ⁴⁴¹

For then the secret better will be kept;
And she can tell no tales when once she's dipp'd.

'T is for the fowler's interest to beware,
The bird intangled should not scape the snare.

The fish, once prick'd, avoids the bearded
hook,

And spoils the sport of all the neighb'ring brook.

But if the wench be thine, she makes thy
way,

And, for thy sake, her mistress will betray;
Tell all she knows, and all she hears her say. ⁴⁵⁰

Keep well the counsel of thy faithful spy:
So shalt thou learn whene'er she treads awry.

All things the stations of their seasons
keep;

And certain times there are to sow and reap.

Plowmen and sailors for the season stay,
One to plow land, and one to plow the
sea:

So should the lover wait the lucky day.

Then stop thy suit, it hurts not thy design;

But think, another hour she may be thine.

And when she celebrates her birth at home, ⁴⁶⁰

Or when she views the public shows of Rome,

Know, all thy visits then are troublesome.

Defer thy work, and put not then to sea,

For that's a boding and a stormy day.

Else take thy time, and when thou canst,
begin:

To break a Jewish Sabbath, think no sin:

Nor ev'n on superstitious days abstain;

Not when the Romans were at Allia slain.

Ill omens in her frowns are understood;

When she's in humor, ev'ry day is good.

But than her birthday seldom comes a worse; ⁴⁷¹

When bribes and presents must be sent
of course;

And that's a bloody day, that costs thy purse.

Be stanch; yet parsimony will be vain:

The craving sex will still the lover drain.

No skill can shift 'em off, nor art remove;

They will be begging, when they know we
love.

The merchant comes upon th' appointed
day,

Who shall before thy face his wares display.

To choose for her she craves thy kind advice; ⁴⁸⁰

Then begs again, to bargain for the price:

But when she has her purchase in her eye,

She hugs thee close, and kisses thee to buy:

"'Tis what I want, and 'tis a pen'orth too;
In many years I will not trouble you."

If you complain you have no ready coin;

No matter, 'tis but writing of a line,

A little bill, not to be paid at sight;

(Now curse the time when thou wert taught to write.)

She keeps her birthday; you must send the cheer, ⁴⁹⁰

And she'll be born a hundred times a year.

With daily lies she dribs thee into cost;

That earring dropp'd a stone, that ring is
lost.

They often borrow what they never pay;
Whate'er you lend her, think it thrown
away.

Had I ten mouths and tongues to tell each
art,

All would be wearied ere I told a part.

By letters, not by words, thy love begin;
And ford the dangerous passage with thy pen.

If to her heart thou aim'st to find the way,

Extremely flatter, and extremely pray. ⁵⁰¹

Priam by pray'rs did Hector's body gain;

Nor is an angry god invok'd in vain.

With promis'd gifts her easy mind be-witch;

For ev'n the poor in promise may be rich.

Vain hopes a while her appetite will stay;

'Tis a deceitful but commodious way.

Who gives is mad, but make her still believe

'T will come, and that's the cheapest way
to give.

Ev'n barren lands fair promises afford, ⁵¹⁰

But the lean harvest cheats the starving
lord.

Buy not thy first enjoyment, lest it prove

Of bad example to thy future love:

But get it gratis; and she'll give thee
more,

For fear of losing what she gave before.

The losing gamester shakes the box in
vain,

And bleeds, and loses on, in hopes to gain.

Write then, and in thy letter, as I said,

Let her with mighty promises be fed.

Cydippe by a letter was betray'd, ⁵²⁰

Writ on an apple to th' unwary maid.

She read herself into a marriage vow;

(And ev'ry cheat in love the gods allow.)

Learn eloquence, ye noble youth of Rome;

It will not only at the bar o'ercome:

Sweet words the people and the senate move;

But the chief end of eloquence is love.
But in thy letter hide thy moving arts;
Affect not to be thought a man of parts.
None but vain fools to simple women preach: 530

A learned letter oft has made a breach.
In a familiar style your thoughts convey,
And write such things as present you would
say;

Such words as from the heart may seem to move:

'Tis wit enough to make her think you love.
If seal'd she sends it back, and will not read,

Yet hope, in time, the business may succeed.

In time the steer will to the yoke submit;
In time the restiff horse will bear the bit.
Ev'n the hard plowshare use will wear
away, 540

And stubborn steel in length of time decay.
Water is soft, and marble hard; and yet
We see soft water thro' hard marble eat.
'Tho' late, yet 'Troy at length in flames
expir'd;

And ten years more Penelope had tir'd.
Perhaps thy lines unanswer'd she retain'd;
No matter; there's a point already gain'd:
For she who reads, in time will answer too;
Things must be left by just degrees to grow.

Perhaps she writes, but answers with dis-
dain, 550

And sharply bids you not to write again:
What she requires, she fears you should accord;

The jilt would not be taken at her word.
Meantime, if she be carried in her chair, Approach, but do not seem to know she's
there.

Speak softly, to delude the standers-by;
Or, if aloud, then speak ambiguously.
If saunt'ring in the portico she walk,
Move slowly too, for that's a time for talk;
And sometimes follow, sometimes be her
guide; 560

But, when the crowd permits, go side by
side.

Nor in the playhouse let her sit alone;
For she's the playhouse and the play in one.
There thou mayst ogle, or by signs advance Thy suit, and seem to touch her hand by chance.

Admire the dancer who her liking gains,
And pity in the play the lover's pains;

For her sweet sake the loss of time de-
spise;

Sit while she sits, and when she rises rise.
But dress not like a fop, nor curl your hair,
Nor with a pumice make your body bare.
Leave those effeminate and useless toys 570
To eunuchs, who can give no solid joys.
Neglect becomes a man: this Theseus
found;

Uncurl'd, uncomb'd, the nymph his wishes
crown'd.

The rough Hippolytus was Phædra's care;
And Venus thought the rude Adonis fair.
Be not too finical; but yet be clean;
And wear well-fashion'd clothes, like other
men.

Let not your teeth be yellow, or be foul;
Nor in wide shoes your feet too loosely
roll. 581

Of a black muzzle and long beard beware;
And let a skilful barber cut your hair:
Your nails be pick'd from filth, and even
par'd;

Nor let your nasty nostrils bud with beard.
Cure your unsav'ry breath, gargle your throat,

And free your armpits from the ram and goat.

Dress not, in short, too little or too much;
And be not wholly French nor wholly Dutch.

Now Bacchus calls me to his jolly rites:
Who would not follow, when a god invites?
He helps the poet, and his pen inspires, 590
Kind and indulgent to his former fires.

Fair Ariadne wander'd on the shore,
Forsaken now; and Theseus loves no more:
Loose was her gown, dishevel'd was her
hair;

Her bosom naked, and her feet were bare.
Exclaiming, in the water's brink she stood;
Her briny tears augment the briny flood.
She shriek'd, and wept, and both became her face: 600

No posture could that heav'nly form dis-
grace.

She beat her breast: "The traitor's gone,"
said she,

"What shall become of poor forsaken me?
What shall become —" she had not time
for more;

The sounding cymbals rattled on the shore.
She swoons for fear, she falls upon the
ground;

No vital heat was in her body found.
The Mimallonian dames about her stood;

And scudding Satyrs ran before their god.
Silenus on his ass did next appear, ⁶¹⁰
And held upon the mane; (the god was clear:)

The drunken sire pursues, the dames retire;

Sometimes the drunken dames pursue the drunken sire.

At last he topples over on the plain;
The Satyrs laugh, and bid him rise again.
And now the God of Wine came driving on,
High on his chariot by swift tigers drawn.
Her color, voice, and sense forsook the
fair;

Thrice did her trembling feet for flight
prepare,
And thrice affrighted did her flight forbear. ⁶²⁰

She shook, like leaves of corn when tem-
pests blow,

Or slender reeds that in the marshes grow.
To whom the god: "Compose thy fearful
mind;

In me a truer husband thou shalt find.
With heav'n I will endow thee, and thy star

Shall with propitious light be seen afar,
And guide on seas the doubtful mariner." }
He said, and from his chariot leaping light, Lest the grim tigers should the nymph
affright,

His brawny arms around her waist he threw; ⁶³⁰

(For gods, whate'er they will, with ease can do;)

And swiftly bore her thence: th' attending
throng

Shout at the sight, and sing the nuptial
song.

Now in full bowls her sorrow she may
steep:

The bridegroom's liquor lays the bride
asleep.

But thou, when flowing cups in triumph
ride,

And the lov'd nymph is seated by thy side;
Invoke the god, and all the mighty powers,
That wine may not defraud thy genial hours.

Then in ambiguous words thy suit prefer,
Which she may know were all address'd to
her. ⁶⁴¹

In liquid purple letters write her name, Which she may read, and reading find thy
flame.

Then may your eyes confess your mutual
fires;

(For eyes have tongues, and glances tell desires.)

Whene'er she drinks, be first to take the cup;

And, where she laid her lips, the blessing sup.

When she to carving does her hand advance,

Put out thy own, and touch it as by chance. ⁶⁴⁹

Thy service ev'n her husband must attend:
(A husband is a most convenient friend.)

Seat the fool cuckold in the highest place,
And with thy garland his dull temples
grace.

Whether below, or equal in degree,
Let him be lord of all the company,
And what he says be seconded by thee. }

'Tis common to deceive thro' friendship's
name;

But, common tho' it be, 'tis still to blame:
Thus factors frequently their trust betray,
And to themselves their masters' gains convey. ⁶⁶⁰

Drink to a certain pitch, and then give
o'er;

Thy tongue and feet may stumble, drinking more.

Of drunken quarrels in her sight beware;
Pot-valor only serves to fright the fair.

Eurytion justly fell, by wine oppress'd,
For his rude riot at a wedding feast.

Sing, if you have a voice; and shew your
parts

In dancing, if endued with dancing arts.
Do anything within your power to please;

Nay, ev'n affect a seeming drunkenness:
Clip every word; and if by chance you speak ⁶⁷¹

Too home, or if too broad a jest you break,
In your excuse the company will join,

And lay the fault upon the force of wine.
True drunkenness is subject to offend;

But when 'tis feign'd, 'tis oft a lover's
friend.

Then safely you may praise her beauteous
face,

And call him happy, who is in her grace.
Her husband thinks himself the man de-
sign'd;

But curse the cuckold in your secret mind.
When all are risen and prepare to go, ⁶⁸¹
Mix with the crowd, and tread upon her toe.

This is the proper time to make thy court,
For now she's in the vein, and fit for sport.
Lay bashfulness, that rustic virtue, by;
To manly confidence thy thoughts apply.
On Fortune's foretop timely fix thy hold;
Now speak and speed, for Venus loves the bold.

No rules of rhetoric here I need afford;
Only begin, and trust the following word;
It will be witty of its own accord.

Act well the lover; let thy speech abound
In dying words, that represent thy wound.
Distrust not her belief; she will be mov'd:
All women think they merit to be lov'd.

Sometimes a man begins to love in jest.
And, after, feels the torments he profess'd.
For your own sakes be pitiful, ye fair;
For a feign'd passion may a true prepare.
By flatteries we prevail on womankind,
As hollow banks by streams are undermin'd.

Tell her, her face is fair, her eyes are sweet;

Her taper fingers praise, and little feet.
Such praises ev'n the chaste are pleas'd to
hear;

Both maids and matrons hold their beauty
dear.

Once mak'd Pallas with Jove's queen appear'd;
And still they grieve that Venus was prefer'd.

Praise the proud peacock, and he spreads
his train;

Be silent, and he pulls it in again.
Pleas'd is the courser in his rapid race;

Applaud his running, and he mends his pace.
But largely promise, and devoutly swear;

And, if need be, call ev'ry god to hear
Jove sits above, forgiving with a smile
The perjuries that easy maids beguile.

He swore to Juno by the Stygian lake;
Forsworn, he dares not an example make,
Or punish falsehood, for his own dear sake.

'Tis for our int'rest that the gods should
be;

Let us believe 'em: I believe they see.

And both reward and punish equally ---
Not that they live above, like lazy drones,
Or kings below, supine upon their thrones.

Lead then your lives as present in their
sight;

Be just in dealings, and defend the right;
By fraud betray not, nor oppress by might.

But 'tis a venial sin to cheat the fair;

All men have liberty of conscience there.
On cheating nymphs a cheat is well design'd;

'T is a profane and a deceitful kind.

'T is said, that Egypt for nine years was
dry,

Nor Nile did floods, nor heav'n did rain
supply.

A foreigner at length inform'd the king
That slaughter'd guests would kindly moisture bring.

The king replied: "On thee the lot shall
fall;

Be thou, my guest, the sacrifice for all."
Thus Phalaris Perillus taught to low,

And made him season first the brazen cow.
A rightful doom, the laws of nature cry;

'T is the artificers of death should die.

Thus justly women suffer by deceit;
Their practice authorizes us to cheat.

Beg her, with tears, thy warm desires to grant;

For tears will pierce a heart of adamant.
If tears will not be squeez'd, then rub your
eye,

Or nomt the lids, and seem at least to cry.
Kiss, if you can: resistance if she make,

And will not give you kisses, let her take.
En, fin, you naughty man, are words of

course;

She struggles, but to be subdued by force.
Kiss only soft, I charge you, and beware,

With your hard bristles not to brush the
fair.

He who has gain'd a kiss, and gains no
more,

Deserves to lose the bliss he got before.
If once she kiss, her meaning is express'd;

There wants but little pushing for the rest:
Which if thou dost not gain, by strength or art.

The name of clown then suits with thy desert:

'T is downright dulness, and a shameful
part.

Perhaps, she calls it force; but, if she
scape,

She will not thank you for th' omitted rape.

The sex is cunning to conceal their fires;
They would be forc'd ev'n to their own desires.

They seem t' accuse you, with a downcast
sight,

But in their souls confess you did them
right.

Who might be forc'd, and yet untouch'd depart,
Thank with their tongues, but curse you with their heart.

Fair Phœbe and her sister did prefer
To their dull mates the noble ravisher.

What Deidamia did, in days of yore, ⁷⁷⁰
The tale is old, but worth the reading o'er.

When Venus had the golden apple
gain'd,

And the just judge fair Helen had obtain'd;
When she with triumph was at Troy re-
ceiv'd,

The Trojans joyful while the Grecians
griev'd;

They vow'd revenge of violated laws,
And Greece was arming in the cuckold's
cause:

Achilles, by his mother warn'd from war, Disguis'd his sex, and lurk'd among the
fair.

What means Æacides to spin and sew ?

With spear and sword, in field thy valor show; ⁷⁸¹

And, leaving this, the nobler Pallas
know.

Why dost thou in that hand the distaff
wield,

Which is more worthy to sustain a shield ?
Or with that other draw the woolly twine,
The same the Fates for Hector's thread assign ?

Brandish thy fauchion in thy pow'rful
hand,

Which can alone the pond'rous lance
command.

In the same room by chance the royal
maid

Was lodg'd, and, by his seeming sex betray'd, ⁷⁹⁰

Close to her side the youthful hero laid.

I know not how his courtship he began,

But, to her cost, she found it was a man.

'Tis thought she struggled; but withal
'tis thought,

Her wish was to be conquer'd, when she fought.

For when disclos'd, and hast'ning to the
field,

He laid his distaff down, and took the
shield,

With tears her humble suit she did prefer,
And thought to stay the grateful ravisher.
She sighs, she sobs, she begs him not to part; ⁸⁰⁰

And now 'tis nature, what before was art.
She strives by force her lover to detain,
And wishes to be ravish'd once again.
This is the sex: they will not first begin,
But, when compell'd, are pleas'd to suffer sin.

Is there, who thinks that women first should woo ?

Lay by thy self-conceit, thou foolish beau.
Begin, and save their modesty the shame;
'Tis well for thee, if they receive thy
flame.

'Tis decent for a man to speak his mind;
They but expect th' occasion to be kind. ⁸¹¹
Ask, that thou mayst enjoy; she waits for this;

And on thy first advance depends thy bliss.
Ev'n Jove himself was forc'd to sue for
love;

None of the nymphs did first solicit Jove.
But if you find your pray'rs encrease her
pride,

Strike sail awhile, and wait another tide.
They fly when we pursue; but make delay,
And, when they see you slacken, they will stay.

Sometimes it profits to conceal your end;
Name not yourself her lover, but her friend. ⁸²¹

How many skittish girls have thus been caught ?

He prov'd a lover, who a friend was
thought.

Sailors by sun and wind are swarthy
made;

A tann'd complexion best becomes their trade.

'Tis a disgrace to plowmen to be fair;
Bluff cheeks they have, and weather-beaten
hair.

Th' ambitious youth who seeks an olive crown

Is sunburnt with his daily toil, and brown.
But if the lover hopes to be in grace, ⁸³⁰

Wan be his looks, and meager be his face.
That color from the fair compassion draws:
She thinks you sick, and thinks herself the
cause.

Orion wander'd in the woods for love:
His paleness did the nymphs to pity
move;

His ghastly visage argued hidden love.
Nor fail a nightcap, in full health, to wear;
Neglect thy dress, and discompose thy hair:
All things are decent that in love avail.

Read long by night, and study to be pale: 840
 Forsake your food, refuse your needful
 rest;
 Be miserable, that you may be blest.
 Shall I complain, or shall I warn you }
 most ?
 Faith, truth, and friendship in the world }
 are lost;
 A little and an empty name they boast. } Trust not thy friend, much less thy mistress praise:
 If he believe, thou mayst a rival raise.
 'T is true, Patroclus, by no lust misled, Sought not to stain his dear companion's
 bed.
 Nor Pylades Hermione embrac'd; 850
 Ev'n Phædra to Perithous still was chaste.
 But hope not thou, in this vile age, to find
 Those rare examples of a faithful mind:
 The sea shall sooner with sweet honey flow,
 Or from the furzes pears and apples grow.
 We sin with gust, we love by fraud to
 gain;
 And find a pleasure in our fellows' pain.
 From rival foes you may the fair defend;
 But, would you ward the blow, beware your
 friend:
 Beware your brother, and your next of kin; 860
 But from your bosom friend your care
 begin.
 Here I had ended, but experience finds
 That sundry women are of sundry minds;
 With various crotchets fill'd, and hard to
 please:
 They therefore must be caught by various ways.
 All things are not produc'd in any soil;
 This ground for wine is proper, that for
 oil.
 So 't is in men, but more in women-kind; } Diff'rent in face, in manners, and in }
 mind:
 But wise men shift their sails with ev'ry }
 wind; 870
 As changeful Proteus varied oft his shape,
 And did in sundry forms and figures
 scape;
 A running stream, a standing tree became,
 A roaring lion, or a bleating lamb.
 Some fish with harpons, some with darts are struck,
 Some drawn with nets, some hang upon the
 hook:

So turn thyself; and, imitating them,
 Try sev'ral tricks, and change thy strata-
 gem.
 One rule will not for diff'rent ages hold;
 The jades grow cunning, as they grow more
 old. 880
 Then talk not bawdy to the bashful maid;
 Bug words will make her innocence afraid.
 Nor to an ign'rant girl of learning speak;
 She thinks you conjure, when you talk in Greek.
 And hence 't is often seen, the simple shun
 The learn'd, and into vile embraces run.
 Part of my task is done, and part to do:
 But here 't is time to rest myself and you.

OVID'S AMOURS

BOOK I, ELEGY I

FOR mighty wars I thought to tune my lute,
 And make my measures to my subject
 suit.
 Six feet for ev'ry verse the Muse de-
 sign'd; }
 But Cupid, laughing, when he saw my }
 mind,
 From ev'ry second verse a foot purloin'd. }
 "Who gave thee, boy, this arbitrary }
 sway,
 On subjects, not thy own, commands to }
 lay,
 Who Phœbus only and his laws obey ? }
 'T is more absurd, than if the Queen of }
 Love
 Should in Minerva's arms to battle move;
 Or manly Pallas from that queen should
 take " }
 Her torch, and o'er the dying lover shake.
 In fields as well may Cynthia sow the corn,
 Or Ceres wind in woods the bugle horn.
 As well may Phœbus quit the trembling string
 For sword and shield; and Mars may learn to sing.
 Already thy dominions are too large;
 Be not ambitious of a foreign charge.
 If thou wilt reign o'er all, and ev'rywhere,
 The God of Music for his harp may fear.
 Thus when with soaring wings I seek renown. 21
 Thou pluck'st my pinions, and I flutter
 down.

Could I on such mean thoughts my Muse
employ,
I want a mistress or a blooming boy."

Thus I complain'd: his bow the stripling
bent,
And chose an arrow fit for his intent.
The shaft his purpose fatally pursues:
"Now, poet, there's a subject for thy Muse."

He said: too well, alas, he knows his trade;
For in my breast a mortal wound he made.
Far hence, ye proud hexameters, remove;
My verse is pac'd and travel'd into love. 32
With myrtle wreaths my thoughtful brows
inclose,
While in unequal verse I sing my woes.

BOOK I, ELEGY IV

To his mistress, whose husband is invited to a feast with them. The poet instructs her how to behave herself in his company.

YOUR husband will be with us at the treat;
May that be the last supper he shall eat.
And am poor I a guest invited there.
Only to see, while he may touch the fair?
To see you kiss and hug your nauseous
lord,

While his lewd hand descends below the board?

Now wonder not that Hippodamia's charms,
At such a sight, the Centaurs urg'd to
arms;

That in a rage they threw their cups aside, Assail'd the bridegroom, and would force
the bride. 13

I am not half a horse. (I would I were,) Yet hardly can from you my hands for-
bear.

Take, then, my counsel; which, observ'd,
may be

Of some importance both to you and me.
Be sure to come before your man be there:
There's nothing can be done; but come howe'er.

Sit next him, (that belongs to decency,)
But tread upon my foot in passing by.
Read in my looks what silently they speak,
And slyly, with your eyes, your answer
make. 20

My lifted eyebrow shall declare my pain;
My right hand to his fellow shall complain,
And on the back a letter shall design,

Besides a note that shall be writ in wine.
Whene'er you think upon our last embrace,
With your forefinger gently touch your face.
If any word of mine offend my dear, Pull, with your hand, the velvet of your
ear.

If you are pleas'd with what I do or say, Handle your rings, or with your fingers
play. 30

As suppliants use at altars, hold the board, Whene'er you wish the devil may take your lord.

When he fills for you, never touch the cup,
But bid th' officious cuckold drink it up.

The waiter on those services employ:
Drink you, and I will snatch it from the
boy;

Watching the part where your sweet mouth has been,

And thence, with eager lips, will suck it in.
If he, with clownish manners, thinks it fit

To taste, and offers you the nasty bit, 40
Reject his greasy kindness, and restore

Th' unsav'ry morsel he had chew'd before.
Nor let his arms embrace your neck, nor
rest

Your tender cheek upon his hairy breast.
Let not his hand within your bosom stray,
And rudely with your pretty bobbies play.

But, above all, let him no kiss receive:
That's an offense I never can forgive.

Do not, O do not that sweet mouth resign, Lest I rise up in arms, and cry: "Tis
mine!" 50

I shall thrust in betwixt, and void of fear
The manifest adult'rer will appear.

These things are plain to sight, but more
I doubt

What you conceal beneath your petticoat.
Take not his leg between your tender
thighs,

Nor, with your hand, provoke my foe to
rise.

How many love-inventions I deplore,
Which I myself have practis'd all before?
How oft have I been forc'd the robe to lift
In company; to make a homely shift 60
For a bare bout, ill huddled o'er in haste, While o'er my side the fair her mantle
cast.

You to your husband shall not be so kind;
But, lest you should, your mantle leave
behind.

Encourage him to tope; but kiss him not,
Nor mix one drop of water in his pot.

If he be fuddled well, and snores apace,
Then we may take advice from time and
place.
When all depart, when compliments are
loud, 69
Be sure to mix among the thickest crowd;
There I will be, and there we cannot miss,
Perhaps to grubble, or at least to kiss.
Alas! what length of labor I employ,
Just to secure a short and transient joy!
For night must part us; and, when night is
come,
Tuck'd underneath his arms he leads you
home.

He locks you in; I follow to the door,
His fortune envy, and my own deplore.
He kisses you, he more than kisses too;
Th' outrageous cuckold thinks it all his due.
But add not to his joy by your consent, 81
And let it not be giv'n, but only lent.
Return no kiss, nor move in any sort;
Make it a dull and a malignant sport.
Had I my wish, he should no pleasure take,
But slubber o'er your business for my sake.
And whate'er fortune shall this night be-
fall,
Coax me to-morrow, by forswearing all.

ALEXANDER'S FEAST

OR, THE POWER OF MUSIC; AN ODE IN HONOR OF ST. CECILIA'S DAY

[Dryden wrote this greatest of his lyric poems for the celebration of the Feast of St. Cecilia (November 22), 1697: compare note, p. 252, above. It was first set to music by Jeremiah Clarke; next, in 1711, by Thomas Clayton; finally, in 1736, by Handel (Malone, I. 1, 296-307). It was published as a folio pamphlet in 1697, and was reprinted in the volume of Fables, 1700. In a letter to Tonson, written about the close of 1697, Dryden says: "I am glad to heare from all hands, that my Ode is esteem'd the best of all my poetry, by all the town: I thought so my self when I writ it: but being old, I mistrusted my own judgment. I hope it has done you service, and will do more" (Malone, I. 2, 63).]

I

'T WAS at the royal feast, for Persia won
By Philip's warlike son:
Aloft in awful state
The godlike hero sate
On his imperial throne:
His valiant peers were plac'd around;
Their brows with roses and with myrtles
bound:
(So should desert in arms be
crown'd.)
The lovely Thais, by his side,
Sate like a blooming Eastern bride 10
In flow'r of youth and beauty's pride.
Happy, happy, happy pair!
None but the brave,
None but the brave,
None but the brave deserves the
fair.

CHORUS

Happy, happy, happy pair!
None but the brave,
None but the brave,
None but the brave deserves the fair.

II

Timotheus, plac'd on high 20
Amid the tuneful choir,
With thyng fingers touch'd the lyre:
The trembling notes ascend the sky,
And heav'nly joys inspire.
The song began from Jove,
Who left his blissful seats above,
(Such is the pow'r of mighty love.)
A dragon's fiery form belied the god:
Sublime on radiant spires he rode,
When he to fair Olympia press'd; 30
And while he sought her snowy breast:
Then, round her slender waist he curl'd,
And stamp'd an image of himself, a sov'- reign of the world.
The list'ning crowd admire the lofty sound;
"A present deity," they shout around;
"A present deity," the vaulted roofs re-
bound:
With ravish'd ears
The monarch hears,
Assumes the god,
Affects to nod,
And seems to shake the spheres.

CHORUS

*With ravish'd ears
The monarch hears,
Assumes the god,
Affects to nod,
And seems to shake the spheres.*

III

The praise of Bacchus then the sweet musician sung,
Of Bacchus ever fair and ever young:
The jolly god in triumph comes; 49
Sound the trumpets; beat the drums;
Flush'd with a purple grace
He shews his honest face:
Now give the hautboys breath; he comes,
he comes.
Bacchus, ever fair and young,
Drinking joys did first ordain;
Bacchus' blessings are a treasure,
Drinking is the soldier's pleasure:
Rich the treasure,
Sweet the pleasure,
Sweet is pleasure after pain. 60

CHORUS

*Bacchus' blessings are a treasure,
Drinking is the soldier's pleasure:
Rich the treasure,
Sweet the pleasure,
Sweet is pleasure after pain.*

IV

Sooth'd with the sound, the king grew vain;
Fought all his battles o'er again;
And thrice he routed all his foes; and thrice he slew the slain.
The master saw the madness rise;
His glowing cheeks, his ardent eyes; 70
And, while he heav'n and earth defied,
Chang'd his hand, and check'd his pride.
He chose a mournful Muse,
Soft pity to infuse:
He sung Darius great and good,
By too severe a fate,
Fallen, fallen, fallen, fallen,
Fallen from his high estate,
And weltring in his blood;
Deserted, at his utmost need, 80
By those his former bounty fed;
On the bare earth expos'd he lies,
With not a friend to close his eyes.

With downcast looks the joyless victor sate,
Revolving in his alter'd soul

The various turns of chance below;
And, now and then, a sigh he stole;
And tears began to flow.

CHORUS

*Revolving in his alter'd soul
The various turns of chance below; 90
And, now and then, a sigh he stole;
And tears began to flow.*

The mighty master smil'd, to see
That love was in the next degree:
'T was but a kindred sound to move,
For pity melts the mind to love.
Softly sweet, in Lydian measures,
Soon he sooth'd his soul to pleasures.
"War," he sung, "is toil and trouble;
Honor, but an empty bubble; 100
Never ending, still beginning,
Fighting still, and still destroying:
If the world be worth thy winning,
Think, O think it worth enjoying;
Lovely Thais sits beside thee,
Take the good the gods provide thee."

The many rend the skies with loud applause;
So Love was crown'd, but Music won the
cause.

The prince, unable to conceal his pain,
Gaz'd on the fair 110
Who caus'd his care,
And sigh'd and look'd, sigh'd and look'd,
Sigh'd and look'd, and sigh'd again:
At length, with love and wine at once oppress'd,
The vanquish'd victor sunk upon her breast.

CHORUS

*The prince, unable to conceal his pain,
Gaz'd on the fair
Who caus'd his care,
And sigh'd and look'd, sigh'd and look'd,
Sigh'd and look'd, and sigh'd again: 120
At length, with love and wine at once oppress'd,
The vanquish'd victor sunk upon her breast.*

VI

Now strike the golden lyre again:
A louder yet, and yet a louder strain.
Break his bands of sleep asunder,
And rouse him, like a rattling peal of thunder.

Hark, hark, the horrid sound
 Has rais'd up his head:
 As awak'd from the dead,
 And amaz'd, he stares around. 130
 "Revenge, revenge!" Timotheus cries,
 "See the Furies arise!
 See the snakes that they rear,
 How they hiss in their hair,
 And the sparkles that flash from their eyes!
 Behold a ghastly band,
 Each a torch in his hand!
 Those are Grecian ghosts, that in battle were slain,
 And unburied remain
 Inglorious on the plain: 140
 Give the vengeance due
 To the valiant crew.
 Behold how they toss their torches on high,
 How they point to the Persian abodes,
 And glitt'ring temples of their hostile
 gods!"
 The princes applaud, with a furious joy;
 And the king seiz'd a flambeau with zeal to destroy;
 Thais led the way,
 To light him to his prey, 149
 And, like another Helen, fir'd another Troy.

CHORUS

*And the king seiz'd a flambeau with zeal to destroy;
 Thais led the way,
 To light him to his prey,
 And, like another Helen, fir'd another Troy.*

TO MR. GRANVILLE, ON HIS EXCELLENT TRAGEDY CALL'D HEROIC LOVE

[Heroic Love, a tragedy by George Granville, based on the story of Briseis in the Iliad, was probably first acted in 1697; it had great success on the stage (Downes). Dryden's epistle, with heading as above, was printed with the first edition of the play, which was published on February 19, 1698 (Malone, I, I, 310, on the authority of an advertisement in the London Gazette). Granville, who was created Lord Lansdowne in 1711, is known in literature as the friend of Pope as well as of Dryden.]

Auspicious poet, wert thou not my friend,
 How could I envy, what I must commend!
 But since 't is nature's law, in love and wit,

VII

Thus, long ago,
 Ere heaving bellows learn'd to blow,
 While organs yet were mute;
 Timotheus, to his breathing flute,
 And sounding lyre,
 Could swell the soul to rage, or kindle soft
 desire. 160
 At last, divine Cecilia came,
 Inventress of the vocal frame;
 The sweet enthusiast, from her sacred
 store,
 Enlarg'd the former narrow bounds,
 And added length to solemn sounds,
 With nature's mother wit, and arts unknown before.
 Let old Timotheus yield the prize,
 Or both divide the crown;
 He rais'd a mortal to the skies;
 She drew an angel down. 170

GRAND CHORUS

*At last, divine Cecilia came,
 Inventress of the vocal frame;
 The sweet enthusiast, from her sacred store,
 Enlarg'd the former narrow bounds,
 And added length to solemn sounds,
 With nature's mother wit, and arts unknown
 before.
 Let old Timotheus yield the prize,
 Or both divide the crown;
 He rais'd a mortal to the skies;
 She drew an angel down. 180*

That youth should reign, and with'ring age submit,
 With less regret those laurels I resign,
 Which, dying on my brows, revive on
 thine.
 With better grace an ancient chief may
 yield
 The long contended honors of the field,
 Than venture all his fortune at a cast,
 And fight, like Hannibal, to lose at last. 190
 Young princes, obstinate to win the prize,
 Tho' yearly beaten, yearly yet they rise;
 Old monarchs, tho' successful, still in doubt,
 Catch at a peace, and wisely turn devout.
 Thine be the laurel then; thy blooming
 age
 Can best, if any can, support the stage;

Which so declines, that shortly we may see
 Players and plays reduc'd to second infancy.
 Sharp to the world, but thoughtless of renown,
 They plot not on the stage, but on the town,²⁰
 And, in despair their empty pit to fill,
 Set up some foreign monster in a bill.
 Thus they jog on, still tricking, never thriving,
 And murd'ring plays, which they miscall reviving.
 Our sense is nonsense, thro' their pipes convey'd;
 Scarce can a poet know the play he made,
 'T is so disguis'd in death; nor thinks 't is he
 That suffers in the mangled tragedy.
 Thus Itys first was kill'd, and after dress'd
 For his own sire, the chief invited guest.³⁰
 I say not this of thy successful scenes,
 Where thine was all the glory, theirs the gains.
 With length of time, much judgment, and more toil,
 Not ill they acted, what they could not spoil.
 Their setting sun still shoots a glimm'ring ray,
 Like ancient Rome, majestic in decay:
 And better gleanings their worn soil can boast,
 Than the crab vintage of the neighb'ring coast.
 This difference yet the judging world will see;
 Thou copiest Homer, and they copy thee.⁴⁰

TO MY FRIEND MR. MOTTEUX

[Peter Anthony Motteux was a French Huguenot who settled in England in 1685, and soon became noted as a man of letters; he is best known in our day as a translator of Rabelais and of Don Quixote. The following epistle was prefixed to his tragedy, Beauty in Distress, on its publication in 1698. The play is entered in the Term Catalogue for Trinity Term (June) of that year; it was probably acted late in 1697 or early in 1698.]

'T is hard, my friend, to write in such an age,
 As damns not only poets, but the stage.

That sacred art, by heav'n itself infus'd,
 Which Moses, David, Solomon have us'd,
 Is now to be no more: the Muses' foes
 Would sink their Maker's praises into prose.
 Were they content to prune the lavish vine
 Of straggling branches, and improve the wine,
 Who but a madman would his faults defend?
 All would submit; for all but fools will mend.¹⁰
 But when to common sense they give the lie,
 And turn distorted words to blasphemy,
 They give the scandal; and the wise discern,
 Their glosses teach an age too apt to learn.
 What I have loosely or profanely writ,
 Let them to fires, (their due desert,) commit;
 Nor, when accus'd by me, let them complain:
 Their faults and not their function I arraign.
 Rebellion, worse than witchcraft, they pursued;
 The pulpit preach'd the crime, the people rued.²⁰
 The stage was silenc'd; for the saints would see
 In fields perform'd their plotted tragedy.
 But let us first reform, and then so live,
 That we may teach our teachers to forgive.
 Our desk be plac'd below their lofty chairs;
 Ours be the practice, as the precept theirs.
 The moral part at least we may divide,
 Humility reward, and punish pride;
 Ambition, int'rest, avarice accuse:
 These are the province of the Tragic Muse.
 These hast thou chosen; and the public voice³¹
 Has equal'd thy performance with thy choice.
 Time, action, place, are so preserv'd by thee,
 That ev'n Corneille might with envy see
 Th' alliance of his tripled unity.
 Thy incidents, perhaps, too thick are sown;
 But too much plenty is thy fault alone:
 At least but two can that good crime commit,
 Thou in design, and Wycherley in wit.
 Let thy own Gauls condemn thee, if they dare;⁴⁰
 Contented to be thinly regular.

Born there, but not for them, our fruitful soil

With more increase rewards thy happy toil.
Their tongue, infeeble'd, is refin'd so much,
That, like pure gold, it bends at ev'ry touch;

Our sturdy Teuton yet will art obey,
More fit for manly thought, and strengthen'd with allay.

But whence art thou inspir'd, and thou
alone,

To flourish in an idiom not thine own?
It moves our wonder, that a foreign guest Should overmatch the most, and match the
best. 51

In underpraising, thy deserts I wrong;
Here, find the first deficiency of our
tongue:

Words, once my stock, are wanting, to commend

So great a poet and so good a friend.

EPIGRAM ON TONSON

[In the third report of the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts, p. 193, there is printed the following excerpt from a letter of R. Powys to Matthew Prior, dated July 14, 1698:]

Mr. Godfrey Kneller has drawn at length the picture of your friend Jacob Tonson, which he shewed Mr. Dryden, who desired to give a touch of his pensill, and underneath it writ these 3 verses:—

With leering look, bull faced and freckled fair,
With frowy pores poisoning the ambient air,
With two left legs and Judas coloured hair.

LINES TO MRS. CREED

[Mrs. Elizabeth Creed was the granddaughter of Sir John Pickering and of Susan, sister of Erasmus Driden, the poet's father. She was born in 1642. Malone (I, 1; 341, 342) prints the following anecdote, from a manuscript note which he conjectures to have been written by a daughter of Mrs. Creed. Words in brackets were supplied by Malone. The date of the lines of course cannot be determined; they are printed in the present place for convenience.]

Conversation one day after dinner, at Mrs. Creed's, running upon the origin of names].

Mr. Dryden bowed to the good old lady, and spoke extempore the following verses]:

So much religion in your name doth dwell,
Your soul must needs with piety excel.
Thus names, like [well-wrought] pictures drawn of old,
Their owners' nature and their story told. —
Your name but half expresses; for in you Belief and practice do together go.
My prayers shall be, while this short life endures,
These may go hand in hand with you and yours;
Till faith hereafter is in vision drown'd,
And practice is with endless glory crown'd.

THE MONUMENT OF A FAIR MAIDEN LADY WHO DIED AT BATH AND IS THERE INTERR'D

[This epitaph was first printed, with title as above, in the volume of Fables, 1700. It is found on a mural tablet in Bath Abbey, where it is preceded by the following words:

"Here lyes the Body of Mary, third Daughter of Richard Frampton of Moreton in Dorsetshire, Esq^r and of Iane his Wife, sole Daughter of S^r Francis Cottington of Founthill in Wilts, who was born January y^e Jth 1674. And Dyed after Seven Weeks sickness on the 6th of 7ber 1698 This Monument was Erected by Cath. Frampton, her second Sister and Executress in testimony of her Grief, Affection, and Gratitude."

The tablet is surmounted by a bust of Mary Frampton.

The text above is from a copy of the tablet, kindly furnished the present editor by the Reverend S. A. Boyd, Rector of Bath. The text of the poem follows that printed in the Fables.]

BELOW this marble monument is laid
All that heav'n wants of this celestial maid.
Preserve, O sacred tomb, thy trust consign'd,

The mold was made on purpose for the
mind;

And she would lose, if, at the latter day,
One atom could be mix'd of other clay.
Such were the features of her heav'nly
face,

Her limbs were form'd with such harmonious
grace;

So faultless was the frame, as if the whole
Had been an emanation of the soul, 10
Which her own inward symmetry reveal'd;
And like a picture shone, in glass anneal'd;
Or like the sun eclips'd, with shaded light;
Too piercing, else, to be sustain'd by sight.
Each thought was visible that roll'd within;

As thro' a crystal case the figur'd hours
are seen.
And Heav'n did this transparent veil provide,
Because she had no guilty thought to hide.
All white, a virgin saint, she sought the
skies;
For marriage, tho' it sullies not, it dyes. 20
High tho' her wit, yet humble was her
mind;
As if she could not, or she would not find
How much her worth transcended all her
kind.
Yet she had learn'd so much of heav'n below,

That, when arriv'd, she scarce had more to
know;
But only to refresh the former hint,
And read her Maker in a fairer print:
So pious, as she had no time to spare
For human thoughts, but was confin'd to
pray'r.
Yet in such charities she pass'd the day, 30
'T was wondrous how she found an hour to pray.
A soul so calm, it knew not ebbs or flows;
Which passion could but curl, not discompose.
A female softness, with a manly mind;
A daughter duteous, and a sister kind;
In sickness patient, and in death resign'd.

FABLES, ANCIENT AND MODERN

[In March, 1700 (Malone, I, 1, 327, on the authority of an advertisement in the Flying Post), Tonson published a folio volume with title-page reading as follows:

FABLES

Ancient and Modern ;

Translated into VERSE,

FROM

Homer, Ovid,

Boccace, & Chaucer :

WITH

ORIGINAL POEMS.

By Mr DRYDEN.

*Nunc ultro ad Cineres ipsius & ossa parentis (Haud equidem sine mente, reor, sine numine divum)
Adsumus.* Virg. Aen. lib. 5.

LONDON.

Printed for Jacob Tonson, within Gray's Inn Gate next Gray's Inn Lane. MDC.C.

This volume, the "last fruit off an old tree," contained, besides the material printed below, the epitaph on The Monument of a Fair Maiden Lady (p. 735, above) and a reprint of Alexander's Feast. The earliest of the new poems contained in it were probably written late in 1697 or early in 1698.

In Dryden's correspondence there are several charming references to this last great work of his pen. On February 2, 1699, he writes to his kinswoman Mrs. Steward :

"In the mean time, betwixt my intervalls of physique and other remedies which I am using for my gravell, I am still drudgeing on : always a poet, and never a good one. I pass my time sometimes with Ovid, and sometimes with our old English poet, Chaucer; translateing such stories as best please my fancy; and intend besides them to add somewhat of my own: so that it is not impossible, but ere the summer be pass'd, I may come down to you with a volume in my hand, like a dog out of the water, with a duck in his mouth." (Malone, I, 2; 74, 75.)

In another letter, written March 4 of the same year, he tells the same correspondent:

"I am still drudging at a book of Miscellanys, which I hope will be well enough; if otherwise, threescore and seven may be pardon'd." (Ibid. I, 2; 82, 83.)

On July 14, 1699, he writes to Samuel Pepys, the diarist:

"PADRON MIO,

"I REMEMBER, last year, when I had the honour of dining with you, you were pleas'd to recommend to me the character of Chaucer's GOOD PARSON. Any desire of yours is a command to me; and accordingly I have put it into my English, with such additions and alterations as I thought fit. Having translated as many Fables from Ovid, and as many Novills from Boccace and Tales from Chaucer, as will make an indifferent large volume in folio, I intend them for the press in Michaelmass term next. In the mean time my PARSON desires the favour of being known to you, and promises, if you find any fault in his character, he will reform it. Whenever you please, he shall wait on you, and for the safer conveyance, I will carry him in my pocket; who am

My Padrons most obedient Servant,
JOHN DRYDEN." (Ibid. I, 2, 84-86.)

On November 7 the poet again writes to Mrs. Steward.

"If you desire to hear any thing more of my affairs, the Earl of Dorsett and your Cousin Montague [Charles Montague, later Earl of Halifax] have both seen the two poems, to the Duchess of Ormond, and my worthy Cousin Driden: and are of opinion that I never writt better. My other friends are divided in their judgments, which to prefer; but the greater part are for those to my dear kinsman; which I have corrected with so much care, that they will now be worthy of his sight, and do neither of us any dishonour after our death." (Ibid. I, 2; 93, 94.)

On March 12, 1700, Dryden writes once more to the same person, announcing the publication of his book:

"MADAM,

"T is a week since I receiv'd the favour of a letter, which I have not yet acknowledg'd to you. About that time my new Poems were publish'd, which are not come till this day into my hands. They are a debt to you, I must confess; and I am glad, because they are so unworthy to be made a present. Your sisters, I hope, will be so kind to have them convey'd to you; that my writings may have the honour of waiting on you, which is deny'd to me. The Town encourages them with more applause than any thing of mine deserves: and particularly my Cousin Driden accepted one from me so very indulgently, that it makes me more and more in love with him." (Ibid. I, 2; 127, 128.)

Finally, on April 11, 1700, only twenty days before his death, Dryden sends to Mrs. Steward a letter beginning:

"MADAM,

"THE ladies of the town have infected you at a distance: they are all of your opinion, and like my last book of Poems better than any thing they have formerly seen of mine. I always thought my Verses to my Cousin Driden were the best of the whole; and to my comfort, the Town thinks them so; and he, which pleases me most, is of the same judgment, as appears by a noble present he has sent me, which surpris'd me, because I did not in the least expect it." (Ibid. I, 2; 129, 130.)

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF ORMOND

MY LORD,

SOME estates are held in England by paying a fine at the change of every lord. I have enjoy'd the patronage of your family, from the time of your excellent grandfather to this present day. I have dedicated the Lives of Plu-tarch to the first duke; and have celebrated the memory of your heroic father. Tho' I am very short of the age of Nestor, yet I have liv'd to a third generation of your house; and by your Grace's favor am admitted still to hold from you by the same tenure.

I am not vain enough to boast that I have deserv'd the value of so illustrious a line; but my fortune is the greater, that for three descents they have been pleas'd to distinguish my poems from those of other men; and have accordingly made me their peculiar care. May it be permitted me to say, that as your grandfather and father were cherish'd and adorn'd with honors by two successive monarchs, so I have been esteem'd and patroniz'd by the grandfather, the father, and the son, descended from one of the most ancient, most conspicuous, and most deserving families in Europe.

'Tis true that by delaying the payment of my last fine, when it was due by your Grace's accession to the titles and patrimonies of your house, I may seem, in rigor of law, to have made a forfeiture of my claim; yet my heart has always been devoted to your service; and since you have been graciously pleas'd, by your permission of this address, to accept the tender of my duty, 'tis not yet too late to lay these poems at your feet.

The world is sensible that you worthily succeed, not only to the honors of your ancestors, but also to their virtues. The long chain of magnanimity, courage, easiness of access, and desire of doing good, even to the prejudice of your fortune, is so far from being broken in your Grace, that the precious metal yet runs pure to the newest link of it; which I will not call the last, because I hope and pray it may descend to late posterity; and your flourishing youth, and that of your excellent duchess, are happy omens of my wish.

'Tis observ'd by Livy and by others that some of the noblest Roman families retain'd a resemblance of their ancestry, not only in their shapes and features, but also in their manners, their qualities, and the distinguishing characters of their minds. Some lines were noted for a stern, rigid virtue, salvage, haughty, parsimonious, and unpopular: others were more sweet and affable, made of a more pliant paste, humble, courteous, and obliging; studious of doing charitable offices, and diffusive of the goods which they enjoy'd. The last of these is the proper and indelible character of your Grace's family. God Almighty has endued you with a softness, a beneficence, an attractive behavior winning on the hearts of others: and so sensible of their misery, that the wounds of fortune seem not inflicted on them, but on yourself. You are so ready to redress, that you almost prevent their wishes, and always exceed their expectations; as if what was yours was not your own, and not given you to possess, but to bestow on wanting merit. But this is a topic which I must cast in shades, lest I offend your modesty, which is so far from being ostentations of the good you do that it blushes even to have it known; and therefore I must leave you to the satisfaction and testimony of your own conscience, which, tho' it be a silent panegyric, is yet the best.

You are so easy of access, that Poplicola was not more, whose doors were open'd on the outside to save the people even the common civility of asking entrance; where all were equally admitted; where nothing that was reasonable was denied; where misfortune was a powerful recommendation, and where, I can scarce forbear saying, that want itself was a powerful mediator, and was next to merit.

The history of Peru assures us that their Incas, above all their titles, esteem'd that the highest, which call'd them Lovers of the Poor: a name more glorious than the Felix, Pius, and Augustus of the Roman emperors; which were epithets of flattery, deserv'd by few of them, and not running in a blood, like the perpetual gentleness and inherent goodness of the Ormond family.

Gold, as it is the purest, so it is the softest and most ductile of all metals. Iron, which is the hardest, gathers rust, corrodes itself, and is therefore subject to corruption; it was never intended for coins and medals, or to bear the faces and inscriptions of the great. Indeed 'tis fit for armor, to bear off insults, and preserve the wearer in the day of battle; but the danger once repell'd, 'tis laid aside by the brave, as a garment too rough for civil conversation: a necessary guard in war, but too harsh and cumbersome in peace, and which keeps off the embraces of a more human life.

For this reason, my Lord, tho' you have courage in a heroic degree, yet I ascribe it to you but as your second attribute: mercy, beneficence, and compassion claim precedence, as they are first in the divine nature. An intrepid courage, which is inherent in your Grace, is at best but a holiday kind of virtue, to be seldom exercis'd, and never but in cases of necessity; affability, mildness, tenderness, and a word which I would fain bring back to its original signification of virtue, I mean good-nature, are of daily use: they are the bread of mankind, and staff of life: neither sighs, nor tears, nor groans, nor curses of the vanquish'd, follow acts of compassion and of charity; but a sincere pleasure and serenity of mind in him who performs an action of mercy, which cannot suffer the misfortunes of another without redress, lest they should bring a kind of contagion along with them, and pollute the happiness which he enjoys.

Yet since the perverse tempers of mankind, since oppression on one side, and ambition on the other, are sometimes the unavoidable occasions of war; that courage, that magnanimity and resolution, which is born with you, cannot be too much commended. And here it grieves me that I am scant in the pleasure of dwelling on many of your actions; but αἰδέσθαι τῶνας is an expression which Tully often uses, when he would do what he dares not, and fears the censure of the Romans.

I have sometimes been forc'd to amplify on others; but here, where the subject is so fruitful that the harvest overcomes the reaper, I am shorten'd by my chain, and can only see what is forbidden me to reach; since it is not permitted me to commend you according to the extent of my wishes, and much less is it in my power to make my commendations equal to your merits.

Yet in this frugality of your praises, there are some things which I cannot omit, without detracting from your character. You have so form'd your own education, as enables you to pay the debt you owe your country, or, more properly speaking, both your countries; because you were born, I may almost say, in purple, at the Castle of Dublin, when your grandfather was Lord Lieutenant, and have since been bred in the Court of England.

If this address had been in verse, I might have call'd you, as Claudian calls Mercury, Numen commune, gemino faciens commercia mundo. The better to satisfy this double obligation, you have early cultivated the genius you have to arms, that when the service of Britain or Ireland shall require your courage and your conduct, you may exert them both to the benefit of either country. You began in the cabinet what you afterwards practis'd in the camp; and thus both Lucullus and Cæsar (to omit a crowd of shining Romans) form'd themselves to the war by the study of history, and by the examples of the greatest captains, both of Greece and Italy, before their time. I name those two commanders in particular, because they were better read in chronicle than any of the Roman leaders; and that Lucullus in particular, having only the theory of war from books, was thought fit, without practice, to be sent into the field against the most formidable enemy of Rome. Tully indeed was call'd the Learn'd Consul in derision; but then he was not born a soldier: his head was turn'd another way; when he read the tactics, he was thinking on the bar, which was his field of battle. The knowledge of warfare is thrown away on a general who dares not make use of what he knows. I commend it only in a man of courage and of resolution: in him it will direct his martial spirit, and teach him the way to the best victories, which are those that are least bloody, and which, tho' achiev'd by the hand, are manag'd by the head. Science distinguishes a man of honor from one of those athletic brutes whom undeservedly we call heroes. Curst be the poet who first honor'd with that name a mere Ajax, a man-killing idiot. The Ulysses of Ovid upbraids his ignorance, that he understood not the shield for which he pleaded: there was engraven on it plans of cities, and maps of countries, which Ajax could not comprehend, but look'd on them as stupidly as his fellow beast, the lion. But on the other side, your Grace has given yourself the education of his rival; you have studied every spot of ground in Flanders, which for these ten years past has been the scene of battles and of sieges. No wonder if you perform'd your part with such applause on a theater which you understood so well.

If I design'd this for a poetical encomium, it were easy to enlarge on so copious a subject; but confining myself to the severity of truth, and to what is becoming me to say, I must not only pass over many instances of your military skill, but also those of your assiduous diligence in the war; and of your personal bravery, attended with an ardent thirst of honor; a long train of generosity; profuseness of doing good; a soul unsatisfied with all it has done; and an unextinguish'd desire of doing more. But all this is matter for your own historians; I am, as Virgil says, Spatii exclusus iniquis.

Yet not to be wholly silent of all your charities, I must stay a little on one action, which prefer'd the relief of others to the consideration of yourself. When, in the battle of Landen, your heat of courage (a fault only pardonable to your youth) had transported you so far before your friends that they were unable to follow, much less to succor you; when you were not only dangerously, but, in all appearance, mortally wounded; when in that desperate condition you were made prisoner, and carried to Namur, at that time in possession of the French; then it was, my Lord, that you took a considerable part of what was remitted to you of your own revenues, and, as a memorable instance of your heroic charity, put it into the hands of Count Guiscard, who was governor of the place, to be distributed among your fellow prisoners. The French commander, charm'd with the greatness of your soul, accordingly consign'd it to the use for which it was intended by the donor; by which means the lives of so many miserable men were sav'd, and a comfortable provision made for their subsistence, who had otherwise perish'd, had not you been the companion of their misfortune; or rather sent by Providence, like another Joseph, to keep out famine from invading those whom in humility you call'd your brethren. How happy was it for those poor creatures, that your Grace was made their fellow sufferer! And how glorious for you, that you chose to want, rather than not relieve the wants of others! The heathen poet, in commending the charity of Dido to the Trojans, spoke like a Christian:

Non ignara mali, miseris succurrere disco.

All men, even those of a different interest and contrary principles, must praise this action, as the most eminent for piety, not only in this degenerate age, but almost in any of the former; when men were made de meliore luto, when examples of charity were frequent, and when there were in being:

Teucri pulcherrima proles, Magnanimi heroes nati melioribus annis.

No envy can detract from this: it will shine in history; and, like swans, grow whiter the longer it endures; and the name of ORMOND will be more celebrated in his captivity than in his greatest triumphs.

But all actions of your Grace are of a piece, as waters keep the tenor of their fountains; your compassion is general, and has the same effect as well on enemies as friends. 'Tis so much in your nature to do good, that your life is but one continued act of placing benefits on many, as the sun is always carrying his light to some part or other of the world. And were it not that your reason guides you where to give, I might almost say that you could not help bestowing more than is consisting with the fortune of a private man, or with the will of any but an Alexander.

What wonder is it then, that, being born for a blessing to mankind, your suppos'd death in that engagement was so generally lamented thro' the nation? The concernment for it was as universal as the loss; and tho' the gratitude might be counterfeit in some, yet the tears of all were real: where every man deplor'd his private part in that calamity, and even those who had not tasted of your favors, yet built so much on the fame of your beneficence, that they bemoan'd the loss of their expectations.

This brought the untimely death of your great father into fresh remembrance: as if the same decree had pass'd on two short successive generations of the virtuous; and I repeated to myself the same verses which I had formerly applied to him:

Ostendunt terris hunc tantum fata, nec ultra Esse sinunt.

But to the joy not only of all good men, but of mankind in general, the unhappy omen took not place. You are still living to enjoy the blessings and applause of all the good you have perform'd, the prayers of multitudes whom you have oblig'd, for your long prosperity, and that your power of doing generous and charitable actions may be as extended as your will; which is by none more zealously desir'd than by

Your Grace's most humble, most obliged, and most obedient Servant,
JOHN DRYDEN.

PREFACE

'Tis with a poet, as with a man who designs to build, and is very exact, as he supposes, in casting up the cost beforehand; but, generally speaking, he is mistaken in his account, and reckons short of the expense he first intended. He alters his mind as the work proceeds, and will have this or that convenience more, of which he had not thought when he began. So has it happen'd to me; I have built a house, where I intended but a lodge; yet with better success than a certain nobleman, who, beginning with a dog kennel, never liv'd to finish the palace he had contriv'd.

From translating the first of Homer's Iliads (which I intended as an essay to the whole work) I proceeded to the translation of the twelfth book of Ovid's Metamorphoses, because it contains, among other things, the causes, the beginning, and ending, of the Trojan war. Here I ought in reason to have stopp'd; but the speeches of Ajax and Ulysses lying next in my way, I could not balk 'em. When I had compass'd them, I was so taken with the former part of the fifteenth book, (which is the masterpiece of the whole Metamorphoses,) that I enjoin'd myself the pleasing task of rend'ring it into English. And now I found, by the number of my verses, that they began to swell into a little volume; which gave me an occasion of looking backward on some beauties of my author, in his former books. There occur'd to me the Hunting of the Boar, Cinyras and Myrrha, the good-natur'd story of Baucis and Philemon, with the rest, which I hope I have translated closely enough, and given them the same turn of verse which they had in the original; and this, I may say without vanity, is not the talent of every poet. He who has arriv'd the nearest to it, is the ingenious and learned Sandys, the best versifier of the former age; if I may properly call it by that name, which was the former part of this concluding century. For Spenser and Fairfax both flourish'd in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; great masters in our language, and who saw much farther into the beauties of our numbers than those who immediately follow'd them. Milton was the poetical son of Spenser, and Mr. Waller of Fairfax, for we have our lineal descents and clans as well as other families. Spenser more than once insinuates that the soul of Chaucer was transfus'd into his body, and that he was begotten by him two hundred years after his decease. Milton has acknowledg'd to me that Spenser was his original, and many besides myself have heard our famous Waller own that he deriv'd the harmony of his numbers from the Godfrey of Bulloign, which was turn'd into English by Mr. Fairfax. But to return. Having done with Ovid for this time, it came into my mind that our old English poet, Chaucer, in many things resembled him, and that with no disadvantage on the side of the modern author, as I shall endeavor to prove when I compare them; and as I am, and always have been, studious to promote the honor of my native country, so I soon resolv'd to put their merits to the trial, by turning some of the Canterbury Tales into our language, as it is now refin'd; for by this means, both the poets being set in the same light, and dress'd in the same English habit, story to be compar'd with story, a certain judgment may be made betwixt them by the reader, without obtruding my opinion on him. Or, if I seem partial to my countryman and predecessor in the laurel, the friends of antiquity are not few; and besides many of the learn'd, Ovid has almost all the beaux, and the whole fair sex, his declar'd patrons. Perhaps I have assum'd somewhat more to myself than they allow me, because I have adventur'd to sum up the evidence; but the readers are the jury, and their privilege remains entire, to decide according to the merits of the cause, or, if they please, to bring it to another hearing before some other court. In the mean time, to follow the thrif of my discourse. (as thoughts, according to Mr. Hobbes, have always some connection,) so from Chaucer I was led to think on Boccace, who was not only his contemporary, but also pursued the same studies; wrote novels in prose, and many works in verse; particularly is said to have invented the octave rhyme, or stanza of eight lines, which ever since has been maintain'd by the practice of all Italian writers, who are, or at least assume the title of, heroic poets. He and Chaucer, among other things, had this in common, that they refin'd their mother tongues; but with this difference, that Dante had begun to file their language, at least in verse, before the time of Boccace, who likewise receiv'd no little help from his master Petrarch. But the reformation of their prose was wholly owing to Boccace himself, who is yet the standard of purity in the Italian tongue; tho' many of his phrases are become obsolete, as in process of time it must needs happen. Chaucer (as you have formerly been told by our learn'd Mr. Rymers) first adorn'd and amplified our barren tongue from the Provencal, which was then the most polish'd of all the modern languages; but this subject has been copiously treated by that great critic, who deserves no little commendation from us his countrymen. For these reasons of time, and resemblance of genius in Chaucer and Boccace, I resolv'd to join them in my present work; to which I have added some original papers of my own; which, whether they are equal or inferior to my other poems, an author is the most improper judge, and therefore I leave them wholly to the mercy of the reader. I will hope the best, that they will not be condemn'd; but if they should, I have the excuse of an old gentleman, who mounting on horseback before some ladies, when I was present, got up somewhat heavily, but desir'd of the fair spectators that they would count fourscore and eight before they judg'd him. By the mercy of God, I am already come within twenty years of his number, a cripple in my limbs; but what decays are in my mind, the reader must determine. I think myself as vigorous as ever in the faculties of my soul, excepting only my memory, which is not impair'd to any great degree; and if I lose not more of it, I have no great reason to complain. What judgment I had, increases rather than diminishes; and thoughts, such as they are, come crowding in so fast upon me, that my only difficulty is to choose or to reject; to run them into verse, or to give them the other harmony of prose. I have so long studied and practic'd both, that they are grown into a habit, and become familiar to me. In short, tho' I may lawfully plead some part of the old gentleman's excuse, yet I will reserve it till I think I have greater need, and ask no grains of allowance for the faults of this my present work, but those which are given of course to human frailty. I will not trouble my reader with the shortness of time in which I writ it, or the several intervals of sickness. They who think too well of their own performances are apt to boast in their prefaces how little time their works have cost them, and what other business of more importance interfer'd; but the reader will be as apt to ask the question, why they allow'd not a longer time to make their works more perfect, and why they had so despicable an opinion of their judges as to thrust their indigested stuff upon them, as if they deserv'd no better.

With this account of my present undertaking, I conclude the first part of this discourse; in the second part, as at a second sitting, tho' I alter not the draught, I must touch the same features over again, and change the dead coloring of the whole. In general, I will only say that I have written nothing which savors of immorality or profaneness; at least, I am not conscious to myself of any such intention. If there happen to be found an irreverent expression, or a thought too wanton, they are crept into my verses thro' my inadvertency; if the searchers find any in the cargo, let them be stay'd or forfeited, like counterbanded goods; at least, let their authors be answerable for them, as being but imported merchandise, and not of my own manufacture. On the other side, I have endeavor'd to choose such fables, both ancient and modern, as contain in each of them some instructive moral; which I could prove by induction, but the way is tedious, and they leap foremost into sight, without the reader's trouble of looking after them. I wish I could affirm, with a safe conscience, that I had taken the same care in all my former writings; for it must be own'd, that supposing verses are never so beautiful or pleasing, yet if they contain anything which shocks religion, or good manners, they are at best what Horace says of good numbers without good sense, Versus inopes rerum, nugæque canoræ. Thus far, I hope, I am right in court, without renouncing to my other right of self-defense, where I have been wrongfully accus'd, and my sense wiredrawn into blasphemy or bawdry, as it has often been by a religious lawyer, in a late pleading against the stage; in which he mixes truth with falsehood, and has not forgotten the old rule of calumniating strongly, that something may remain.

I resume the thrird of my discourse with the first of my translations, which was the First Iliad of Homer. If it shall please God to give me longer life, and moderate health, my intentions are to translate the whole Ilias; provided still that I meet with those encouragements from the public which may enable me to proceed in my undertaking with some cheerfulness. And this I dare assure the world beforehand, that I have found by trial Homer a more pleasing task than Virgil, (tho' I say not the translation will be less laborious.) For the Grecian is more according to my genius than the Latin poet. In the works of the two authors we may read their manners and natural inclinations, which are wholly different. Virgil was of a quiet, sedate temper; Homer was violent, impetuous, and full of fire. The chief talent of Virgil was propriety of thoughts, and ornament of words; Homer was rapid in his thoughts, and took all the liberties, both of numbers and of expressions, which his language, and the age in which he liv'd, allow'd him. Homer's invention was more copious, Virgil's more confin'd; so that if Homer had not led the way, it was not in Virgil to have begun heroic poetry; for nothing can be more evident than that the Roman poem is but the second part of the Ilias; a continuation of the same story, and the persons already form'd; the manners of Æneas are those of Hector super-added to those which Homer gave him. The adventures of Ulysses in the Odysseys are imitated in the first six books of Virgil's Æneis; and tho' the accidents are not the same, (which would have argued him of a servile, copying, and total barrenness of invention,) yet the seas were the same, in which both the heroes wander'd; and Dido cannot be denied to be the poetical daughter of Calypso. The six latter books of Virgil's poem are the four and twenty Iliads contracted: a quarrel occasion'd by a lady, a single combat, battles fought, and a town besieg'd. I say not this in derogation to Virgil, neither do I contradict anything which I have formerly said in his just praise: for his episodes are almost wholly of his own invention; and the form which he has given to the telling makes the tale his own, even tho' the original story had been the same. But this proves, however, that Homer taught Virgil to design; and if invention be the first virtue of an epic poet, then the Latin poem can only be allow'd the second place. Mr. Hobbes, in the preface to his own bald translation of the Ilias (studying poetry as he did mathematics, when it was too late) — Mr. Hobbes, I say, begins the praise of Homer where he should have ended it. He tells us that the first beauty of an epic poem consists in diction, that is, in the choice of words, and harmony of numbers; now the words are the coloring of the work, which in the order of nature is last to be consider'd. The design, the disposition, the manners, and the thoughts, are all before it: where any of those are wanting or imperfect, so much wants or is imperfect in the imitation of human life; which is in the very definition of a poem. Words, indeed, like glaring colors, are the first beauties that arise and strike the sight: but if the draught be false or lame, the figures ill dispos'd, the manners obscure or inconsistent, or the thoughts unnatural, then the finest colors are but daubing, and the piece is a beautiful monster at the best. Neither Virgil nor Homer were deficient in any of the former beauties; but in this last, which is expression, the Roman poet is at least equal to the Grecian, as I have said elsewhere; supplying the poverty of his language by his musical ear, and by his diligence. But to return: our two great poets, being so different in their tempers, one choleric and sanguine, the other phlegmatic and melancholic; that which makes them excel in their several ways is that each of them has follow'd his own natural inclination, as well in forming the design as in the execution of it. The very heroes shew their authors: Achilles is hot, impatient, revengeful, Impiger, iracundus, inextorabilis, acer &c; Æneas patient, considerate, careful of his people, and merciful to his enemies; ever submissive to the will of Heaven — Quo fata trahunt retrahuntque sequamur. I could please myself with enlarging on this subject, but am forc'd to defer it to a fitter time. From all I have said I will only draw this inference, that the action of Homer being more full of vigor than that of Virgil, according to the temper of the writer, is of consequence more pleasing to the reader. One warms you by degrees; the other sets you on fire all at once, and never intermits his heat. 'Tis the same difference which Longinus makes betwixt the effects of eloquence in Demosthenes and Tully. One persuades; the other commands. You never cool while you read Homer, even not in the second book (a graceful flattery to his countrymen); but he hastens from the ships, and concludes not that book till he has made you an amends by the violent playing of a new machine. From thence he hurries on his action with variety of events, and ends it in less compass than two months. This vehemence of his, I confess, is more suitable to my temper; and therefore I have translated his first book with greater pleasure than any part of Virgil; but it was not a pleasure without pains. The continual agitations of the spirits must needs be a weak'ning of any constitution, especially in age; and many pauses are requir'd for refreshment betwixt the heats; the Iliad of itself being a third part longer than all Virgil's works together.

This is what I thought needful in this place to say of Homer. I proceed to Ovid and Chaucer, considering the former only in relation to the latter. With Ovid ended the golden age of the Roman tongue; from Chaucer the purity of the English tongue began. The manners of the poets were not unlike: both of them were well bred, well natur'd, amorous, and libertine, at least in their writings, it may be also in their lives. Their studies were the same, philosophy and philology. Both of them were knowing in astronomy, of which Ovid's books of the Roman feasts, and Chaucer's treatise of the Astrolabe, are sufficient witnesses. But Chaucer was likewise an astrologer, as were Virgil, Horace, Persius, and Manilius. Both writ with wonderful facility and clearness: neither were great inventors; for Ovid only copied the Grecian fables; and most of Chaucer's stories were taken from his Italian contemporaries, or their predecessors. Boccace his Decameron was first publish'd; and from thence our Englishman has borrow'd many of his Canterbury Tales: yet that of Palamon and Arcite was written in all probability by some Italian wit in a former age, as I shall prove hereafter. The tale of Grizild was the invention of Petrarch; by him sent to Boccace; from whom it came to Chaucer. Troilus and Cressida was also written by a Lombard author; but much amplified by our English translator, as well as beautified: the genius of our countrymen, in general, being rather to improve an invention, than to invent themselves; as is evident not only in our poetry, but in many of our manufactures. I find I have anticipated already, and taken up from Boccace before I come to him; but there is so much less behind; and I am of the temper of most kings, who love to be in debt, are all for present money, no matter how they pay it afterwards: besides, the nature of a preface is rambling; never wholly out of the way, nor in it. This I have learn'd from the practice of honest Montaigne, and return at my pleasure to Ovid and Chaucer, of whom I have little more to say. Both of them built on the inventions of other men; yet since Chaucer had something of his own, as The Wife of Bath's Tale, The Cock and the Fox, which I have translated, and some others, I may justly give our countryman the precedence in that part; since I can remember nothing of Ovid which was wholly his. Both of them understood the manners, under which name I comprehend the passions, and, in a larger sense, the descriptions of persons, and their very habits; for an example, I see Baucis and Philemon as perfectly before me, as if some ancient painter had drawn them; and all the pilgrims in the Canterbury Tales, their humors, their features, and the very dress, as distinctly as if I had suppd with them at the Tabard in Southwark; yet even there too the figures of Chaucer are much more lively, and set in a better light: which tho' I have not time to prove, yet I appeal to the reader, and am sure he will clear me from partiality. The thoughts and words remain to be consider'd in the comparison of the two poets: and I have sav'd myself one half of that labor, by owning that Ovid liv'd when the Roman tongue was in its meridian, Chaucer in the dawning of our language; therefore that part of the comparison stands not on an equal foot, any more than the diction of Ennius and Ovid, or of Chaucer and our present English. The words are given up as a post not to be defended in our poet, because he wanted the modern art of fortifying. The thoughts remain to be consider'd, and they are to be measur'd only by their propriety: that is, as they flow more or less naturally from the persons describ'd, on such and such occasions. The vulgar judges, which are nine parts in ten of all nations, who call conceits and jingles wit, who see Ovid full of them, and Chaucer altogether without them, will think me little less than mad, for preferring the Englishman to the Roman: yet, with their leave, I must presume to say that the things they admire are only glittering trifles, and so far from being witty, that in a serious poem they are nauseous, because they are unnatural. Would any man who is ready to die for love describe his passion like Narcissus? Would he think of inopem me copia fecit, and a dozen more of such expressions, pour'd on the neck of one another, and signifying all the same thing? If this were wit, was this a time to be witty, when the poor wretch was in the agony of death? This is just John Littlewit in Bartholomew Fair, who had a conceit (as he tells you) left him in his misery; a miserable conceit. On these occasions the poet should endeavor to raise pity; but instead of this, Ovid is tickling you to laugh. Virgil never made use of such machines, when he was moving you to commiserate the death of Dido: he would not destroy what he was building. Chaucer makes Arcite violent in his love, and unjust in the pursuit of it; yet when he came to die, he made him think more reasonably: he repents not of his love, for that had alter'd his character; but acknowledges the injustice of his proceedings, and resigns Emilia to Palamon. What would Ovid have done on this occasion? He would certainly have made Arcite witty on his death-bed. He had complain'd he was farther off from possession by being so near, and a thousand such boyisms, which Chaucer rejected as below the dignity of the subject. They who think otherwise would by the same reason prefer Lucan and Ovid to Homer and Virgil, and Martial to all four of them. As for the turn of words, in which Ovid particularly excels all poets, they are sometimes a fault, and sometimes a beauty, as they are us'd properly or improperly; but in strong passions always to be shunn'd, because passions are serious, and will admit no playing. The French have a high value for them; and I confess, they are often what they call delicate, when they are introduc'd with judgment; but Chaucer writ with more simplicity, and follow'd nature more closely, than to use them. I have thus far, to the best of my knowledge, been an upright judge betwixt the parties in competition, not meddling with the design nor the disposition of it; because the design was not their own, and in the disposing of it they were equal. It remains that I say somewhat of Chaucer in particular.

In the first place, as he is the father of English poetry, so I hold him in the same degree of veneration as the Grecians held Homer or the Romans Virgil. He is a perpetual fountain of good sense, learn'd in all sciences, and therefore speaks properly on all subjects: as he knew what to say, so he knows also when to leave off, a continence which is practic'd by few writers, and scarcely by any of the ancients, excepting Virgil and Horace. One of our late great poets is sunk in his reputation, because he could never forgive any conceit which came in his way, but swept like a dragnet, great and small. There was plenty enough, but the dishes were ill sorted; whole pyramids of sweetmeats for boys and women, but little of solid meat for men. All this proceeded not from any want of knowledge, but of judgment; neither did he want that in discerning the beauties and faults of other poets; but only indulg'd himself in the luxury of writing; and perhaps knew it was a fault, but hop'd the reader would not find it. For this reason, tho' he must always be thought a great poet, he is no longer esteem'd a good writer; and for ten impressions, which his works have had in so many successive years, yet at present a hundred books are scarcely purchas'd once a twelvemonth: for, as my last Lord Rochester said, tho' somewhat profanely, "Not being of God, he could not stand."

Chaucer follow'd Nature everywhere, but was never so bold to go beyond her; and there is a great difference of being poeta and nimis poeta, if we may believe Catullus, as much as betwixt a modest behavior and affectation. The verse of Chaucer, I confess, is not harmonious to us; but 't is like the eloquence of one whom Tacitus commends, it was auribus istius temporis accommodata: they who liv'd with him, and some time after him, thought it musical; and it continues so even in our judgment, if compar'd with the numbers of Lydgate and Gower, his contemporaries: there is the rude sweetness of a Scotch tune in it, which is natural and pleasing, tho' not perfect. 'T is true, I cannot go so far as he who publish'd the last edition of him; for he would make us believe the fault is in our ears, and that there were really ten syllables in a verse where we find but nine: but this opinion is not worth confuting; 't is so gross and obvious an error, that common sense (which is a rule in everything but matters of faith and revelation) must convince the reader that equality of numbers in every verse which we call heroic was either not known, or not always practic'd, in Chaucer's age. It were an easy matter to produce some thousands of his verses, which are lame for want of half a foot, and sometimes a whole one, and which no pronunciation can make otherwise. We can only say, that he liv'd in the infancy of our poetry, and that nothing is brought to perfection at the first. We must be children before we grow men. There was an Ennius, and in process of time a Lucilius and a Lucretius, before Virgil and Horace; even after Chaucer there was a Spenser, a Harrington, a Fairfax, before Waller and Denham were in being: and our numbers were in their nonage till these last appear'd. I need say little of his parentage, life, and fortunes; they are to be found at large in all the editions of his works. He was employ'd abroad and favor'd by Edward the Third, Richard the Second, and Henry the Fourth, and was poet, as I suppose, to all three of them. In Richard's time, I doubt, he was a little dipp'd in the rebellion of the commons, and being brother-in-law to John of Ghant, it was no wonder if he follow'd the fortunes of that family, and was well with Henry the Fourth, when he had depos'd his predecessor. Neither is it to be admir'd, that Henry, who was a wise as well as a valiant prince, who claim'd by succession, and was sensible that his title was not sound, but was rightfully in Mortimer, who had married the heir of York; it was not to be admir'd, I say, if that great politician should be pleas'd to have the greatest wit of those times in his interests, and to be the trumpet of his praises. Augustus had given him the example, by the advice of Mæcenas, who recommended Virgil and Horace to him; whose praises help'd to make him popular while he was alive, and after his death have made him precious to posterity. As for the religion of our poet, he seems to have some little bias towards the opinions of Wycliffe, after John of Ghant his patron; somewhat of which appears in the tale of Piers Plowman. Yet I cannot blame him for inveighing so sharply against the vices of the clergy in his age; their pride, their ambition, their pomp, their avarice, their worldly interest, deserv'd the lashes which he gave them, both in that and in most of his Canterbury Tales: neither has his contemporary Boccaccio spar'd them. Yet both those poets liv'd in much esteem with good and holy men in orders; for the scandal which is given by particular priests reflects not on the sacred function. Chaucer's Monk, his Canon, and his Friar, took not from the character of his Good Parson. A satirical poet is the check of the laymen on bad priests. We are only to take care that we involve not the innocent with the guilty in the same condemnation. The good cannot be too much honor'd, nor the bad too coarsely us'd: for the corruption of the best becomes the worst. When a clergyman is whipp'd, his gown is first taken off, by which the dignity of his order is secur'd; if he be wrongfully accus'd, he has his action of slander; and 'tis at the poet's peril if he transgress the law. But they will tell us that all kind of satire, tho' never so well deserv'd by particular priests, yet brings the whole order into contempt. Is then the peerage of England anything dishonor'd, when a peer suffers for his treason? If he be libel'd or any way defam'd, he has his scandalum magnatum to punish the offender. They who use this kind of argument seem to be conscious to themselves of somewhat which has deserv'd the poet's lash, and are less concern'd for their public capacity than for their private: at least there is pride at the bottom of their reasoning. If the faults of men in orders are only to be judg'd among themselves, they are all in some sort parties: for, since they say the honor of their order is concern'd in every member of it, how can we be sure that they will be impartial judges? How far I may be allow'd to speak my opinion in this case, I know not; but I am sure a dispute of this nature caus'd mischief in abundance betwixt a king of England and an archbishop of Canterbury; one standing up for the laws of his land, and the other for the honor (as he call'd it) of God's Church; which ended in the murder of the prelate, and in the whipping of his Majesty from post to pillar for his penance. The learn'd and ingenious Dr. Drake has sav'd me the labor of inquiring into the esteem and reverence which the priests have had of old; and I would rather extend than diminish any part of it: yet I must needs say, that when a priest provokes me without any occasion given him, I have no reason, unless it be the charity of a Christian, to forgive him: prior læsit is justification sufficient in the civil law. If I answer him in his own language, self-defense, I am sure, must be allow'd me; and if I carry it farther, even to a sharp re-primand, somewhat may be indulg'd to human frailty. Yet my resentment has not wrought so far, but that I have follow'd Chaucer in his character of a holy man, and have enlarg'd on that subject with some pleasure, reserving to myself the right, if I shall think fit hereafter, to describe another sort of priests, such as are more easily to be found than the Good Parson; such as have given the last blow to Christianity in this age, by a practice so contrary to their doctrine. But this will keep cold till another time. In the mean while I take up Chaucer where I left him. He must have been a man of a most wonderful comprehensive nature, because, as it has been truly observ'd of him, he has taken into the compass of his Canterbury Tales the various manners and humors (as we now call them) of the whole English nation, in his age. Not a single character has escap'd him. All his pilgrims are severally distinguish'd from each other; and not only in their inclinations, but in their very physiognomies and persons. Baptista Porta could not have describ'd their natures better, than by the marks which the poet gives them. The matter and manner of their tales, and of their telling, are so suited to their different educations, humors, and callings, that each of them would be improper in any other mouth. Even the grave and serious characters are distinguish'd by their several sorts of gravity: their discourses are such as belong to their age, their calling, and their breeding; such as are becoming of them, and of them only. Some of his persons are vicious, and some virtuous; some are unlearn'd, or (as Chaucer calls them) lewd, and some are learn'd. Even the ribaldry of the low characters is different: the Reeve, the Miller, and the Cook are several men, and distinguish'd from each other, as much as the mincing Lady Prioress and the broad-speaking gap-tooth'd Wife of Bath. But enough of this: there is such a variety of game springing up before me, that I am distracted in my choice, and know not which to follow. 'Tis sufficient to say, according to the proverb, that here is God's plenty. We have our forefathers and great-grandames all before us, as they were in Chaucer's days; their general characters are still remaining in mankind, and even in England, tho' they are call'd by other names than those of Monks and Friars, and Canons, and Lady Abbesses, and Nuns: for mankind is ever the same, and nothing lost out of nature, tho' everything is alter'd. May I have leave to do myself the justice — since my enemies will do me none, and are so far from granting me to be a good poet, that they will not allow me so much as to be a Christian, or a moral man — may I have leave, I say, to inform my reader that I have confin'd my choice to such tales of Chaucer as savor nothing of immodesty. If I had desir'd more to please than to instruct, the Reeve, the Miller, the Shipman, the Merchant, the Sumner, and, above all, the Wife of Bath, in the prologue to her tale, would have procur'd me as many friends and readers, as there are beaux and ladies of pleasure in the town. But I will no more offend against good manners: I am sensible, as I ought to be, of the scandal I have given by my loose writings; and make what reparation I am able, by this public acknowledgment. If anything of this nature, or of profaneness, be crept into these poems, I am so far from defending it, that I disown it. Totum hoc indictum volo. Chaucer makes another manner of apology for his broad speaking, and Boccace makes the like; but I will follow neither of them. Our countryman, in the end of his characters, before the Canterbury Tales, thus excuses the ribaldry, which is very gross in many of his novels

But first, I pray you of your courtesy,
That ye ne arrete it nought my villany.
Though that I plainly speak in this matiere
To tellen you her words, and eke her chere.
Ne though I speak her words properly,
For this ye knowen as well as I,
Who shall tellen a tale after a man.
He mote rehearse as nye as ever he can Everich word of it been in his charge.
All speke he never so rudely ne large.
Or else he mote tellen his tale untrue.
Or feine things, or find words new
He may not spare, altho he were his brother,
He mote as well say o word as another.
Christ spake himself full broad in holy writ,
And well I wote no villany is it.
Eke Plato saith, who so can him rede,
The words mote been couns to the dede.

Yet if a man should have enquir'd of Boccace or of Chaucer, what need they had of introducing such characters, where obscene words were proper in their mouths, but very undecent to be heard; I know not what answer they could have made: for that reason, such tales shall be left untold by me. You have here a specimen of Chaucer's language, which is so obsolete that his sense is scarce to be understood; and you have likewise more than one example of his unequal numbers, which were mention'd before. Yet many of his verses consist of ten syllables, and the words not much behind our present English: as for example, these two lines, in the description of the carpenter's young wife:

Winning she was, as is a jolly colt,
Long as a mast, and upright as a bolt.

I have almost done with Chaucer, when I have answer'd some objections relating to my present work. I find some people are offended that I have turn'd these tales into modern English; because they think them unworthy of my pains, and look on Chaucer as a dry, old-fashion'd wit, not worth reviving. I have often heard the late Earl of Leicester say that Mr. Cowley himself was of that opinion; who having read him over at my lord's request, declar'd he had no taste of him. I dare not advance my opinion against the judgment of so great an author; but I think it fair, however, to leave the decision to the public: Mr. Cowley was too modest to set up for a dictator; and being shock'd perhaps with his old style, never examin'd into the depth of his good sense. Chaucer, I confess, is a rough diamond, and must first be polish'd, ere he shines. I deny not, likewise, that, living in our early days of poetry, he writes not always of a piece, but sometimes mingles trivial things with those of greater moment. Sometimes also, tho' not often, he runs riot, like Ovid, and knows not when he has said enough. But there are more great wits, beside Chaucer, whose fault is their excess of conceits, and those ill sorted. An author is not to write all he can, but only all he ought. Having observ'd this redundancy in Chaucer, (as it is an easy matter for a man of ordinary parts to find a fault in one of greater,) I have not tied myself to a literal translation; but have often omitted what I judg'd unnecessary, or not of dignity enough to appear in the company of better thoughts. I have presum'd farther, in some places, and added somewhat of my own where I thought my author was deficient, and had not given his thoughts their true luster, for want of words in the beginning of our language. And to this I was the more embolden'd, because (if I may be permitted to say it of myself) I found I had a soul congenial to his, and that I had been conversant in the same studies. Another poet, in another age, may take the same liberty with my writings; if at least they live long enough to deserve correction. It was also necessary sometimes to restore the sense of Chaucer, which was lost or mangled in the errors of the press. Let this example suffice at present; in the story of Palamon and Arcite, where the temple of Diana is describ'd, you find these verses, in all the editions of our author:

There saw I Danè turned unto a tree,
I mean not the goddess Diane,
But Venus daughter, which that hight Danè:

which after a little consideration I knew was to be reform'd into this sense, that Daphne, the daughter of Peneus, was turn'd into a tree. I durst not make thus bold with Ovid, lest some future Milbourne should arise, and say I varied from my author, because I understood him not.

But there are other judges, who think I ought not to have translated Chaucer into English, out of a quite contrary notion: they suppose there is a certain veneration due to his old language; and that it is little less than profanation and sacrilege to alter it. They are farther of opinion that somewhat of his good sense will suffer in this transfusion, and much of the beauty of his thoughts will infallibly be lost, which appear with more grace in their old habit. Of this opinion was that excellent person whom I mention'd, the late Earl of Leicester, who valued Chaucer as much as Mr. Cowley despis'd him. My lord dissuaded me from this attempt, (for I was thinking of it some years before his death,) and his authority prevail'd so far with me as to defer my undertaking while he liv'd, in deference to him: yet my reason was not convinc'd with what he urg'd against it. If the first end of a writer be to be understood, then as his language grows obsolete, his thoughts must grow obscure:

*Multa renascentur quæ nunc occidere: caduntque,
Quæ nunc sunt in honore vocabula, si volet usus,
Quem penes arbitrium est et juss et norma loquendi*

When an ancient word for its sound and significance deserves to be reviv'd, I have that reasonable veneration for antiquity, to restore it. All beyond this is superstition. Words are not like landmarks, so sacred as never to be remov'd; customs are chang'd, and even statutes are silently repeal'd, when the reason ceases for which they were enacted. As for the other part of the argument, that his thoughts will lose of their original beauty, by the innovation of words; in the first place, not only their beauty, but their being is lost, where they are no longer understood, which is the present case. I grant that something must be lost in all transfusion, that is, in all translations; but the sense will remain, which would otherwise be lost, or at least be maim'd, when it is scarce intelligible; and that but to a few. How few are there who can read Chaucer so as to understand him perfectly! And if imperfectly, then with less profit and no pleasure. 'Tis not for the use of some old Saxon friends that I have taken these pains with him: let them neglect my version, because they have no need of it. I made it for their sakes who understand sense and poetry as well as they, when that poetry and sense is put into words which they understand. I will go farther, and dare to add, that what beauties I lose in some places, I give to others which had them not originally; but in this I may be partial to myself; let the reader judge, and I submit to his decision. Yet I think I have just occasion to complain of them, who, because they understand Chaucer, would deprive the greater part of their countrymen of the same advantage, and hoard him up, as misers do their grandam gold, only to look on it themselves and hinder others from making use of it. In sum, I seriously protest that no man ever had, or can have, a greater veneration for Chaucer, than myself. I have translated some part of his works, only that I might perpetuate his memory, or at least refresh it, amongst my countrymen. If I have alter'd him anywhere for the better, I must at the same time acknowledge that I could have done nothing without him: facile est inventis addere, is no great commendation; and I am not so vain to think I have deserv'd a greater. I will conclude what I have to say of him singly, with this one remark: a lady of my acquaintance, who keeps a kind of correspondence with some authors of the fair sex in France, has been inform'd by them, that Mademoiselle de Scudéry, who is as old as Sibly, and inspir'd like her by the same God of Poetry, is at this time translating Chaucer into modern French. From which I gather that he has been formerly translated into the old Provencal (for how she should come to understand old English I know not). But the matter of fact being true, it makes me think that there is something in it like fatality; that, after certain periods of time, the fame and memory of great wits should be renew'd, as Chaucer is both in France and England. If this be wholly chance, 'tis extraordinary, and I dare not call it more, for fear of being tax'd with superstition.

Boccace comes last to be consider'd, who, living in the same age with Chaucer, had the same genius, and follow'd the same studies: both writ novels, and each of them cultivated his mother tongue. But the greatest resemblance of our two modern authors being in their familiar style, and pleasing way of relating comical adventures, I may pass it over, because I have translated nothing from Boccace of that nature. In the serious part of poetry, the advantage is wholly on Chaucer's side; for tho' the Englishman has borrow'd many tales from the Italian, yet it appears that those of Boccace were not generally of his own making, but taken from authors of former ages, and by him only model'd; so that what there was of invention in either of them may be judg'd equal. But Chaucer has refin'd on Boccace, and has mended the stories which he has borrow'd, in his way of telling; tho' prose allows more liberty of thought, and the expression is more easy when unconfined by numbers. Our countryman carries weight, and yet wins the race at disadvantage. I desire not the reader should take my word, and therefore I will set two of their discourses on the same subject, in the same light, for every man to judge betwixt them. I translated Chaucer first, and, amongst the rest, pitch'd on The Wife of Bath's Tale; not daring, as I have said, to adventure on her prologue, because 't is too licentious: there Chaucer introduces an old woman of mean parentage, whom a youthful knight of noble blood was forc'd to marry, and consequently loath'd her; the crone being in bed with him on the wedding night, and finding his aversion, endeavors to win his affection by reason, and speaks a good word for herself (as who could blame her?) in hope to mollify the sullen bridegroom. She takes her topics from the benefits of poverty, the advantages of old age and ugliness, the vanity of youth, and the silly pride of ancestry and titles without inherent virtue, which is the true nobility. When I had clos'd Chaucer, I return'd to Ovid, and translated some more of his fables; and by this time had so far forgotten The Wife of Bath's Tale, that, when I took up Boccace, unawares I fell on the same argument of preferring virtue to nobility of blood, and titles, in the story of Sigismonda; which I had certainly avoided for the resemblance of the two discourses, if my memory had not fail'd me. Let the reader weigh them both; and if he thinks me partial to Chaucer, 't is in him to right Boccace.

I prefer in our countryman, far above all his other stories, the noble poem of Palamon and Arcite, which is of the epic kind, and perhaps not much inferior to the Ilias or the Aeneis: the story is more pleasing than either of them, the manners as perfect, the diction as poetical, the learning as deep and various, and the disposition full as artful; only it includes a greater length of time, as taking up seven years at least; but Aristotle has left undecided the duration of the action; which yet is easily reduc'd into the compass of a year, by a narration of what preceded the return of Palamon to Athens. I had thought for the honor of our nation, and more particularly for his, whose laurel, tho' unworthy, I have worn after him, that this story was of English growth, and Chaucer's own; but I was undeceiv'd by Boccace; for, casually looking on the end of his seventh Giornata, I found Dioneo (under which name he shadows himself) and Fiametta (who represents his mistress, the natural daughter of Robert, King of Naples), of whom these words are spoken: Dioneo e Fiametta gran pezza cantarono insieme d' Arcita, e di Palamone: by which it appears that this story was written before the time of Boccace; but, the name of its author being wholly lost, Chaucer is now become an original; and I question not but the poem has receiv'd many beauties by passing thro' his noble hands. Besides this tale, there is another of his own invention, after the manner of the Provençals, call'd The Flower and the Leaf; with which I was so particularly pleas'd, both for the invention and the moral, that I cannot hinder myself from recommending it to the reader.

As a corollary to this preface, in which I have done justice to others, I owe somewhat to myself: not that I think it worth my time to enter the lists with one M——, or one B——, but barely to take notice, that such men there are who have written scurrilously against me, without any provocation. M——, who is in orders, pretends amongst the rest this quarrel to me, that I have fallen foul on priesthood: if I have, I am only to ask pardon of good priests, and am afraid his part of the reparation will come to little. Let him be satisfied that he shall not be able to force himself upon me for an adversary. I condemn him too much to enter into competition with him. His own translations of Virgil have answer'd his criticisms on mine. If (as they say he has declar'd in print) he prefers the version of Ogleby to mine, the world has made him the same compliment: for 't is agreed on all hands, that he writes even below Ogleby: that, you will say, is not easily to be done; but what cannot M—— bring about? I am satisfied, however, that while he and I live together, I shall not be thought the worst poet of the age. It looks as if I had desir'd him underhand to write so ill against me; but upon my honest word I have not brib'd him to do me this service, and am wholly guiltless of his pamphlet. 'T is true, I should be glad if I could persuade him to continue his good offices, and write such another critique on anything of mine: for I find by experience he has a great stroke with the reader, when he condemns any of my poems, to make the world have a better opinion of them. He has taken some pains with my poetry, but nobody will be persuaded to take the same with his. If I had taken to the Church, (as he affirms, but which was never in my thoughts,) I should have had more sense, if not more grace, than to have turn'd myself out of my benefice by writing libels on my parishioners. But his account of my manners and my principles are of a piece with his cavils and his poetry; and so I have done with him for ever.

As for the City Bard, or Knight Physician, I hear his quarrel to me is that I was the author of Absalom and Achitophel, which, he thinks, is a little hard on his fanatic patrons in London.

But I will deal the more civilly with his two poems, because nothing ill is to be spoken of the dead; and therefore peace be to the manes of his Arthurs. I will only say that it was not for this noble knight that I drew the plan of an epic poem on King Arthur, in my preface to the translation of Juvenal. The guardian angels of kingdoms were machines too ponderous for him to manage; and therefore he rejected them, as Dares did the whirlbats of Eryx, when they were thrown before him by Entellus. Yet from that preface he plainly took his hint: for he began immediately upon the story, tho' he had the baseness not to acknowledge his benefactor, but, instead of it, to traduce me in a libel.

I shall say the less of Mr. Collier, because in many things he has tax'd me justly; and I have pleaded guilty to all thoughts and expressions of mine which can be truly argued of obscenity, profaneness, or immorality; and retract them. If he be my enemy, let him triumph; if he be my friend, as I have given him no personal occasion to be otherwise, he will be glad of my repentance. It becomes me not to draw my pen in the defense of a bad cause, when I have so often drawn it for a good one. Yet it were not difficult to prove that in many places he has perverted my meaning by his glosses, and interpreted my words into blasphemy and bawdry, of which they were not guilty. Besides that, he is too much given to horseplay in his raillery, and comes to battle like a dictator from the plow. I will not say: "The zeal of God's house has eaten him up;" but I am sure it has devour'd some part of his good manners and civility. It might also be doubted whether it were altogether zeal which prompted him to this rough manner of proceeding: perhaps it became not one of his function to rake into the rubbish of ancient and modern plays; a divine might have employ'd his pains to better purpose than in the nastiness of Plantus and Aristophanes; whose examples, as they excuse not me, so it might be possibly suppos'd that he read them not without some pleasure. They who have written commentaries on those poets, or on Horace, Juvenal, and Martial, have explain'd some vices which, without their interpretation, had been unknown to modern times. Neither has he judg'd impartially betwixt the former age and us.

There is more bawdry in one play of Fletcher's, call'd The Custom of the Country, than in all ours together. Yet this has been often acted on the stage in my remembrance. Are the times so much more reform'd now than they were five and twenty years ago? If they are, I congratulate the amendment of our morals. But I am not to prejudice the cause of my fellow poets, tho' I abandon my own defense: they have some of them answer'd for themselves, and neither they nor I can think Mr. Collier so formidable an enemy that we should shun him. He has lost ground at the latter end of the day, by pursuing his point too far, like the Prince of Condé at the battle of Seneffe: from immoral plays to no plays, ab abusu ad usum, non valet consequentia. But being a party, I am not to erect myself into a judge. As for the rest of those who have written against me, they are such scoundrels that they deserve not the least notice to be taken of them. B—— and M—— are only distinguish'd from the crowd by being remember'd to their infamy:

TO HER GRACE THE DUCHESS OF ORMOND

WITH THE FOLLOWING POEM OF PALAMON AND ARCITE
FROM CHAUCER

MADAM,
THE bard who first adorn'd our native
tongue,
Tun'd to his British lyre this ancient song;
Which Homer might without a blush rehearse,
And leaves a doubtful palm in Virgil's verse:
He match'd their beauties, where they most excel;
Of love sung better, and of arms as well.
Vouchsafe, illustrious Ormond, to behold
What pow'r the charms of beauty had of
old;
Nor wonder if such deeds of arms were
done,
Inspir'd by two fair eyes, that sparkled like your own.
If Chaucer by the best idea wrought,
And poets can divine each other's thought,

The fairest nymph before his eyes he set;
And then the fairest was Plantagenet;
Who three contending princes made her prize,
And rul'd the rival nations with her eyes;
Who left immortal trophies of her fame,
And to the noblest order gave the name.

Like her, of equal kindred to the throne,
You keep her conquests, and extend your own:

As when the stars, in their ethereal race, }
At length have roll'd around the liquid }
space, }
At certain periods they resume their }
place, }
From the same point of heav'n their course }
advance, }
And move in measures of their former } dance; }

Thus, after length of ages, she returns,
Restor'd in you, and the same place adorns;
Or you perform her office in the sphere,
Born of her blood, and make a new Platonian year.

O true Plantagenet, O race divine, }
(For beauty still is fatal to the line,) }
Had Chaucer liv'd that angel face to view, }
Sure he had drawn his Emily from you; }
Or had you liv'd to judge the doubtful }
right, }

Your noble Palamon had been the knight;
And conquer'd Theseus from his side had sent

Your gen'rous lord, to guide the Theban government.

Time shall accomplish that; and I shall see

A Palamon in him, in you an Emily.

Already have the Fates your path prepar'd,

And sure presage your future sway declar'd:

When westward, like the sun, you took your way,

And from benighted Britain bore the day,
Blue Triton gave the signal from the shore,
The ready Nereids heard, and swam before,
To smooth the seas; a soft Etesian gale
But just inspir'd, and gently swell'd the sail;
Portunus took his turn, whose ample hand

Heav'd up the lighten'd keel, and sunk the sand, }
And steer'd the sacred vessel safe to land. }

The land, if not restrain'd, had met your way,
Projected out a neck, and jutt'd to the sea.

Hibernia, prostrate at your feet, ador'd,
In you, the pledge of her expected lord,
Due to her isle; a venerable name;
His father and his grandsire known to fame:

Aw'd by that house, accustom'd to command, }
The sturdy kerns in due subjection stand, }
Nor hear the reins in any foreign hand. }
At your approach, they crowded to the port;

And scarcely landed, you create a court:
As Ormond's harbinger, to you they run;
For Venus is the promise of the sun.

The waste of civil wars, their towns destroy'd,

Pales unhonor'd, Ceres unemploy'd,
Were all forgot; and one triumphant day
Wip'd all the tears of three campaigns away.

Blood, rapines, massacres, were cheaply bought,
So mighty recompense your beauty brought.

As when the dove returning bore the mark

Of earth restor'd to the long-lab'ring ark, }
The relics of mankind, secure of rest, }
Op'd ev'ry window to receive the guest, }
And the fair bearer of the message }
bless'd; }

So, when you came, with loud repeated cries,

The nation took an omen from your eyes, } And God advanc'd his rainbow in the }
skies, }

To sign inviolable peace restor'd;
The saints, with solemn shouts, proclaim'd the new accord.

When at your second coming you appear,

(For I foretell that millenary year,) }
The sharpen'd share shall vex the soil no }
more, }

But earth unbidden shall produce her store;
The land shall laugh, the circling ocean smile,

And Heav'n's indulgence bless the holy isle.
Heav'n from all ages has reserv'd for you

That happy clime which venom never knew;

Or if it had been there, your eyes alone
Have pow'r to chase all poison but their
own.

Now in this interval, which fate has cast⁹⁰
Betwixt your future glories and your past,
This pause of pow'r, 't is Ireland's hour to
mourn,
While England celebrates your safe return,
By which you seem the seasons to command,
And bring our summers back to their forsaken land.

The vanquish'd isle our leisure must
attend,
Till the fair blessing we vouchsafe to
send;
Nor can we spare you long, tho' often we may lend.

The dove was twice employ'd abroad, before
The world was dried and she return'd no more.¹⁰⁰

Nor dare we trust so soft a messenger,
New from her sickness, to that northern
air;
Rest here a while your luster to restore,
That they may see you as you shone be-
fore,
For yet, th' eclipse not wholly past, you
wade
Thro' some remains, and dimness of a
shade.

A subject in his prince may claim a
right,
Nor suffer him with strength impair'd to
fight;
Till force returns, his ardor we restrain,
And curb his warlike wish to cross the main.¹¹⁰

Now past the danger, let the learn'd begin
Th' enquiry where disease could enter in;
How those malignant atoms forc'd their
way,
What in the faultless frame they found to make their prey;
Where ev'ry element was weigh'd so
well,
That Heav'n alone, who mix'd the mass,
could tell
Which of the four ingredients could rebel;
And where, imprison'd in so sweet a cage.
A soul might well be pleas'd to pass an age.

And yet the fine materials made it weak;¹²⁰

Porcelain, by being pure, is apt to break:
Ev'n to your breast the sickness durst
aspire;
And, forc'd from that fair temple to retire,
Profanely set the holy place on fire.
In vain your lord, like young Vespasian,
mourn'd,

When the fierce flames the sanctuary
burn'd;

And I prepar'd to pay in verses rude
A most detested act of gratitude:
Ev'n this had been your elegy, which now
Is offer'd for your health, the table of my vow.¹³⁰

Your angel sure our Morley's mind in-
spir'd,

To find the remedy your ill requir'd;
As once the Macedon, by Jove's decree,
Was taught to dream an herb for Ptole-mee:

Or Heav'n, which had such over-cost be-
stow'd,

As scarce it could afford to flesh and blood,
So lik'd the frame, he would not work
anew,

To save the charges of another you.
Or by his middle science did he steer,
And saw some great contingent good appear,¹⁴⁰

Well worth a miracle to keep you here;
And, for that end, preserv'd the precious
mold,

Which all the future Ormonds was to hold;
And meditated in his better mind

An heir from you, who may redeem the failing kind.

Blest be the pow'r which has at once restor'd

The hopes of lost succession to your lord;
Joy to the first and last of each degree, Virtue to courts, and, what I long'd to
see,

To you the Graces, and the Muse to me.

O daughter of the rose, whose cheeks
unite¹⁵¹

The diff'ring titles of the red and white;
Who heav'n's alternate beauty well dis-
play.

The blush of morning, and the milky way;
Whose face is paradise, but fenc'd from sin:
For God in either eye has plac'd a cherubin.

All is your lord's alone; ev'n absent, he Employs the care of chaste Penelope.
 For him you waste in tears your widow'd
 hours,
 For him your curious needle paints the flow'rs; ¹⁶⁰
 Such works of old imperial dames were taught;
 Such, for Ascanius, fair Elisa wrought.
 The soft recesses of your hours improve
 The three fair pledges of your happy love:
 All other parts of pious duty done,
 You owe your Ormond nothing but a son;
 To fill in future times his father's place,
 And wear the garter of his mother's race.

PALAMON AND ARCITE

OR, THE KNIGHT'S TALE

IN THREE BOOKS

BOOK I

In days of old, there liv'd, of mighty fame,
 A valiant prince, and Theseus was his
 name:
 A chief, who more in feats of arms excell'd,
 The rising nor the setting sun beheld.
 Of Athens he was lord; much land he won,
 And added foreign countries to his crown.
 In Scythia with the warrior queen he
 strove,
 Whom first by force he conquer'd, then by
 love;
 He brought in triumph back the beauteous
 dame,
 With whom her sister, fair Emilia, came. ¹⁰
 With honor to his home let Theseus ride,
 With Love to friend, and Fortune for his
 guide,
 And his victorious army at his side. }
 I pass their warlike pomp, their proud
 array,
 Their shouts, their songs, their welcome on
 the way:
 But, were it not too long, I would recite }
 The feats of Amazons, the fatal fight
 Betwixt the hardy queen and hero knight; }
 The town besieg'd, and how much blood it
 cost
 The female army and th' Athenian host; ²⁰
 The spousals of Hippolyta the queen;
 What tilts and turneys at the feast were
 seen;

The storm at their return, the ladies' fear:
 But these, and other things, I must forbear.
 The field is spacious I design to sow,
 With oxen far unfit to draw the plow:
 The remnant of my tale is of a length
 To tire your patience, and to waste my
 strength;
 And trivial accidents shall be forborne,
 That others may have time to take their
 turn;
 As was at first enjoin'd us by mine host — ³⁰
 That he whose tale is best, and pleases
 most,
 Should win his supper at our common cost.
 And therefore where I left, I will pursue

This ancient story, whether false or true,
 In hope it may be mended with a new.
 The prince I mention'd, full of high renown,
 In this array drew near th' Athenian town;
 When in his pomp and utmost of his pride,
 Marching, he chanc'd to cast his eye aside, ⁴⁰
 And saw a choir of mourning dames, who
 lay

By two and two across the common way:
 At his approach they rais'd a rueful cry,
 And beat their breasts, and held their hands
 on high,
 Creeping and crying, till they seiz'd at last
 His courser's bridle, and his feet embrac'd.
 "Tell me," said Theseus, "what and whence you are,

And why this funeral pageant you prepare.
 Is this the welcome of my worthy deeds,
 To meet my triumph in ill-omen'd weeds? ⁵⁰
 Or envy you my praise, and would destroy With grief my pleasures, and pollute my
 joy?

Or are you injur'd, and demand relief?
 Name your request, and I will ease your
 grief."

The most in years of all the mourning
 train
 Began; (but sounded first away for pain;)
 Then, scarce recover'd, spoke: "Nor envy
 we

Thy great renown, nor grudge thy victory;
 'Tis thine, O king, th' afflicted to redress,
 And fame has fill'd the world with thy success: ⁶⁰

We wretched women sue for that alone,
 Which of thy goodness is refus'd to none.
 Let fall some drops of pity on our grief,
 If what we beg be just, and we deserve
 relief:

For none of us, who now thy grace implore,
But held the rank of sovereign queen
before;

Till, thanks to giddy Chance, which never
bears

That mortal bliss should last for length of
years,

She cast us headlong from our high estate,
And here in hope of thy return we wait; ⁷⁰
And long have waited in the temple nigh,
Built to the gracious goddess Clemency.

But rev'rence thou the pow'r whose name
it bears,

Relieve th' oppress'd, and wipe the widows'
tears.

I, wretched I, have other fortune seen,
The wife of Capaneus, and once a queen:
At Thebes he fell; curst be the fatal day!
And all the rest thou seest in this array,
To make their moan, their lords in battle
lost

Before that town besieg'd by our con-fed'rate host: ⁸⁰

But Creon, old and impious, who commands
The Theban city, and usurps the lands, Denies the rites of fun'ral fires to those Whose breathless bodies yet he calls his foes.

Unburn'd, unburied, on a heap they lie;
Such is their fate, and such his tyranny;
No friend has leave to bear away the dead,
But with their lifeless limbs his hounds are
fed.

At this she shriek'd aloud; the mournful
train

Echo'd her grief, and grov'ling on the plain, ⁹⁰

With groans, and hands upheld, to move
his mind,

Besought his pity to their helpless kind!

The prince was touch'd, his tears began to flow,

And, as his tender heart would break in
two,

He sigh'd; and could not but their fate de-
plore,

So wretched now, so fortunate before.

Then lightly from his lofty steed he flew,
And, raising one by one the suppliant crew,
To comfort each, full solemnly he swore,
That by the faith which knights to knighthood bore, ¹⁰⁰

And whate'er else to chivalry belongs,
He would not cease, till he reveng'd their wrongs;

That Greece should see perform'd what he
declar'd,

And cruel Creon find his just reward.

He said no more, but, shunning all delay,
Rode on, nor enter'd Athens on his way;
But left his sister and his queen behind,
And wav'd his royal banner in the wind:
Where in an argent field the God of War
Was drawn triumphant on his iron car; ¹¹⁰
Red was his sword, and shield, and whole attire,

And all the godhead seem'd to glow with
fire;

Ev'n the ground glitter'd where the standard flew,

And the green grass was dyed to sanguine hue.

High on his pointed lance his pennon bore
His Cretan fight, the conquer'd Minotaur:
The soldiers shout around with generous
rage,

And in that victory their own presage.

He prais'd their ardor, inly pleas'd to see
His host the flow'r of Grecian chivalry. ¹²⁰
All day he march'd, and all th' ensuing
night,

And saw the city with returning light.

The process of the war I need not tell,
How Theseus conquer'd, and how Creon
fell;

Or after, how by storm the walls were won,
Or how the victor sack'd and burn'd the
town;

How to the ladies he restor'd again

The bodies of their lords in battle slain;

And with what ancient rites they were interr'd —

All these to fitter time shall be deferr'd. ¹³⁰
I spare the widows' tears, their woful cries,
And howling at their husbands' obsequies;
How Theseus at these fun'erals did assist,
And with what gifts the mourning dames
dismiss'd.

Thus when the victor chief had Creon
slain,

And conquer'd Thebes, he pitch'd upon the
plain

His nightly camp, and, when the day re-
turn'd,

The country wasted, and the hamlets burn'd,
And left the pillagers, to rapine bred, ¹³⁹
Without control to strip and spoil the dead.

There, in a heap of slain, among the rest
Two youthful knights they found beneath a load oppress'd

Of slaughter'd foes, whom first to death
they sent,
The trophies of their strength, a bloody monument.
Both fair, and both of royal blood they
seem'd,
Whom kinsmen to the crown the heralds
deem'd:
That day in equal arms they fought for
fame;
Their swords, their shields, their surcoats
were the same.
Close by each other laid, they press'd the
ground,
Their manly bosoms pierc'd with many a grievous wound.¹⁵⁰
Nor well alive nor wholly dead they were,
But some faint signs of feeble life appear;
The wand'ring breath was on the wing to
part,
Weak was the pulse, and hardly heav'd the
heart.
These two were sisters' sons; and Arcite one,
Much fam'd in fields, with valiant Palamon.
From these their costly arms the spoilers
rent,
And softly both convey'd to Theseus' tent:
Whom, known of Creon's line, and cur'd with care,¹⁵⁰
He to his city sent as pris'ners of the war.
Hopeless of ransom, and condemn'd to lie
In durance, doom'd a ling'ring death to die.
This done, he march'd away with warlike sound,
And to his Athens turn'd with laurels
crown'd,
Where happy long he liv'd, much lov'd,
and more renown'd.
But in a tow'r, and never to be loos'd,
The woful captive kinsmen are enclos'd.
Thus year by year they pass, and day by
day,
Till once 't was on the morn of cheerful
May)
The young Emilia, fairer to be seen¹⁷⁰
Than the fair lily on the flow'ry green,
More fresh than May herself in blossoms
new,
For with the rosy color strove her hue,
Wak'd, as her custom was, before the day,
To do th' observance due to sprightly May:
For sprightly May commands our youth to keep
The vigils of her night, and breaks their sluggard sleep;

Each gentle breast with kindly warmth
she moves,
Inspires new flames, revives extinguish'd
loves.
In this remembrance Emily ere day¹⁸⁰
Arose, and dress'd herself in rich array;
Fresh as the month, and as the morning
fair:
Adown her shoulders fell her length of
hair;
A riband did the braided tresses bind,
The rest was loose, and wanton'd in the
wind.
Aurora had but newly chas'd the night,
And purpled o'er the sky with blushing
light,
When to the garden walk she took her
way,
To sport and trip along in cool of day,
And offer maiden vows in honor of the May.¹⁹⁰
At ev'ry turn she made a little stand,
And thrust among the thorns her lily hand
To draw the rose, and ev'ry rose she drew,
She shook the stalk, and brush'd away the dew;
Then party-color'd flow'rs of white and red
She wove, to make a garland for her head:
This done, she sung and carol'd out so
clear
That men and angels might rejoice to hear;
Ev'n wond'ring Philomel forgot to sing,
And learn'd from her to welcome in the spring.²⁰⁰
The tow'r, of which before was mention
made,
Within whose keep the captive knights were laid,
Built of a large extent, and strong withal,
Was one partition of the palace wall;
The garden was enclos'd within the square
Where young Emilia took the morning air.
It happen'd Palamon, the pris'ner knight,
Restless for woe, arose before the light,
And with his jailer's leave desir'd to breathe
An air more wholesome than the damps
beneath.²¹⁰
This granted, to the tow'r he took his way,
Cheer'd with the promise of a glorious day;
Then cast a languishing regard around,
And saw, with hateful eyes, the temples
crown'd
With golden spires, and all the hostile
ground.

He sigh'd, and turn'd his eyes, because he
knew

'T was but a larger jail he had in view:
Then look'd below, and from the castle's
height

Beheld a nearer and more pleasing sight;
The garden, which before he had not
seen,

In spring's new livery clad of white and
green,

Fresh flow'rs in wide parterres, and shady walks between.

This view'd, but not enjoy'd, with arms across

He stood, reflecting on his country's loss;
Himself an object of the public scorn,

And often wish'd he never had been born.
At last, (for so his destiny requir'd,)

With walking giddy, and with thinking
tir'd,

He thro' a little window cast his sight,
Tho' thick of bars, that gave a scanty
light;

But ev'n that glimmering serv'd him to descry

Th' inevitable charms of Emily.

Scarce had he seen, but seiz'd with sudden smart,

Stung to the quick, he felt it at his heart;
Struck blind with overpowering light he
stood,

Then started back amaz'd, and cried aloud.

Young Arcite heard, and up he ran with
haste

To help his friend, and in his arms em-
brace'd;

And ask'd him why he look'd so deadly wan,

And whence and how his change of cheer
began,

Or who had done th' offense. "But if,"
said he,

"Your grief alone is hard captivity,
For love of heav'n with patience undergo

A cureless ill, since fate will have it so:
So stood our horoscope in chains to lie,

And Saturn in the dungeon of the sky,
Or other baleful aspect, rul'd our birth,

When all the friendly stars were under
earth:

Whate'er betides, by destiny 't is done;
And better bear like men than vainly seek to shun."

"Nor of my bonds," said Palamon again,
"Nor of unhappy planets I complain;

But when my mortal anguish caus'd my cry,
That moment I was hurt thro' either eye;
Pierc'd with a random shaft, I faint away,
And perish with insensible decay:

A glance of some new goddess gave the
wound,

Whom, like Actæon, unaware I found.

Look how she walks along yon shady
space:

Not Juno moves with more majestic
grace;

And all the Cyprian queen is in her face.)

If thou art Venus, (for thy charms confess That face was form'd in heav'n, nor art thou less;

Disguis'd in habit, undisguis'd in shape,) O help us captives from our chains to escape;

But if our doom be past in bonds to lie
For life, and in a loathsome dungeon die,
Then be thy wrath appeas'd with our dis-
grace,

And shew compassion to the Theban race, Oppress'd by tyrant pow'r!" While yet he
spoke,

Arcite on Emily had fix'd his look;

The fatal dart a ready passage found,
And deep within his heart infix'd the
wound:

So that if Palamon were wounded sore,
Arcite was hurt as much as he, or more.

Then from his inmost soul he sigh'd, and
said:

"The beauty I behold has struck me dead:
Unknowingly she strikes, and kills by
chance;

Poison is in her eyes, and death in ev'ry glance.

O, I must ask; nor ask alone, but move
Her mind to mercy, or must die for love."

Thus Arcite: and thus Palamon replies (Eager his tone, and ardent were his eyes):

"Speak'st thou in earnest, or in jesting vein?"

"Jesting," said Arcite, "suits but ill
with pain."

"It suits far worse," said Palamon
again,

And bent his brows, "with men who honor
weigh,

Their faith to break, their friendship to betray;

But worst with thee, of noble lineage born,
My kinsman, and in arms my brother sworn.

Have we not plighted each our holy oath,
That one should be the common good of
both;

One soul should both inspire, and neither prove

His fellow's hindrance in pursuit of love?
To this before the gods we gave our hands,
And nothing but our death can break the
bands.

This binds thee, then, to farther my design,
As I am bound by vow to farther thine.

Nor canst, nor dar'st thou, traitor, on the
plain

Appeach my honor, or thy own maintain, ³⁰⁰
Since thou art of my council, and the friend Whose faith I trust, and on whose care depend.

And wouldst thou court my lady's love, which I

Much rather than release would choose to die?

But thou, false Arcite, never shalt obtain
Thy bad pretense; I told thee first my pain,
For first my love began ere thine was born:
Thou, as my council, and my brother sworn,
Art bound t' assist my eldership of right,
Or justly to be deem'd a perjurd knight."

Thus Palamon; but Arcite with disdain
In haughty language thus replied again: ³¹²
"Forsworn thyself: the traitor's odious
name

I first return, and then disprove thy claim.
If love be passion, and that passion nurs'd
With strong desires, I lov'd the lady first.
Canst thou pretend desire, whom zeal in-flam'd

To worship, and a pow'r celestial nam'd?
Thine was devotion to the blest above;
I saw the woman, and desir'd her love; ³²⁰
First own'd my passion, and to thee commend

Th' important secret, as my chosen friend.
Suppose (which yet I grant not) thy desire
A moment elder than my rival fire;
Can chance of seeing first thy title prove?
And know'st thou not, no law is made for
love?

Law is to things which to free choice re-
late;

Love is not in our choice, but in our fate:
Laws are but positive; love's pow'r, we see,
Is Nature's sanction, and her first decree. ³³⁰
Each day we break the bond of human laws
For love, and vindicate the common cause.
Laws for defense of civil rights are plac'd,

Love throws the fences down, and makes a general waste:

Maids, widows, wives, without distinction
fall;

The sweeping deluge, love, comes on, and covers all.

If then the laws of friendship I transgress,
I keep the greater, while I break the less;
And both are mad alike, since neither can possess.

Both hopeless to be ransom'd, never more
To see the sun, but as he passes o'er. ³⁴¹

"Like Æsop's hounds contending for the bone—

Each pleaded right, and would be lord
alone:

The fruitless fight continued all the day;
A cur came by and snatch'd the prize away.
As courtiers therefore juggle for a grant,
And when they break their friendship,
plead their want,

So thou, if fortune will thy suit advance,
Love on, nor envy me my equal chance:
For I must love, and am resolv'd to try ³⁵⁰
My fate, or failing in th' adventure die."

Great was their strife, which hourly was
renew'd,

Till each with mortal hate his rival view'd:
Now friends no more, nor walking hand in
hand;

But when they met, they made a surly stand;
And glar'd like angry lions as they pass'd,
And wish'd that ev'ry look might be their
last.

It chanc'd at length, Perithous came t'
attend

This worthy Theseus, his familiar friend:
Their love in early infancy began, ³⁶⁰
And rose as childhood ripen'd into man.
Companions of the war; and lov'd so well,
That when one died, as ancient stories
tell,

His fellow to redeem him went to hell.

But to pursue my tale; to welcome home
His warlike brother is Perithous come:
Arcite of Thebes was known in arms long since,

And honor'd by this young Thessalian
prince.

Theseus, to gratify his friend and guest,
Who made our Arcite's freedom his request, ³⁷⁰

Restor'd to liberty the captive knight,
But on these hard conditions I recite:
That if hereafter Arcite should be found

Within the compass of Athenian ground,
By day or night, or on whate'er pretense,
His head should pay the forfeit of th'
offense.

To this Perithous for his friend agreed,
And on his promise was the pris'ner freed.

Unpleas'd and pensive hence he takes
his way,

At his own peril; for his life must pay. 380
Who now but Arcite mourns his bitter fate, Finds his dear purchase, and repents too
late?

"What have I gain'd," he said, "in prison
pent,

If I but change my bonds for banishment?
And, banish'd from her sight, I suffer more
In freedom than I felt in bonds before; Forc'd from her presence, and condemn'd
to live;

Unwelcome freedom, and unthank'd reprieve:

Heav'n is not but where Emily abides,
And where she's absent, all is hell besides. 390

Next to my day of birth, was that accurst
Which bound my friendship to Perithous
first:

Had I not known that prince, I still had been

In bondage, and had still Emilia seen;
For tho' I never can her grace deserve,
'Tis recompense enough to see and serve.
O Palamon, my kinsman and my friend,
How much more happy fates thy love
attend!

Thine is th' adventure; thine the victory:
Well has thy fortune turn'd the dice for
thee: 400

Thou on that angel's face may'st feed thy
eyes—

In prison, no; but blissful paradise!
Thou daily see'st that sun of beauty shine,
And lov'st at least in love's extremest
line.

I mourn in absence, love's eternal night; }
And who can tell but since thou hast her
sight,

And art a comely, young, and valiant }
knight,

Fortune (a various pow'r) may cease to frown,

And by some ways unknown thy wishes
crown?

But I, the most forlorn of humankind, 410
Nor help can hope, nor remedy can find;

But doom'd to drag my loathsome life in
care,

For my reward, must end it in despair.

Fire, water, air, and earth, and force of fates,

That governs all, and Heav'n that all creates,

Nor art, nor Nature's hand can ease my
grief;

Nothing but death, the wretch's last relief:
Then farewell youth, and all the joys that dwell

With youth and life, and life itself, farewell!

"But why, alas! do mortal men in vain 420
Of Fortune, Fate, or Providence complain?
God gives us what he knows our wants require,

And better things than those which we desire:

Some pray for riches; riches they obtain;

But, watch'd by robbers, for their wealth
are slain:

Some pray from prison to be freed; and
come,

When guilty of their vows, to fall at home;
Murder'd by those they trusted with their
life,

A favor'd servant, or a bosom wife.

Such dear-bought blessings happen ev'ry
day, 430

Because we know not for what things to pray.

Like drunken sots about the streets we roam:

Well knows the sot he has a certain home;
Yet knows not how to find th' uncertain
place,

And blunders on, and staggers ev'ry pace.

Thus all seek happiness; but few can find,
For far the greater part of men are blind.

This is my case, who thought our utmost
good

Was in one word of freedom understood:

The fatal blessing came; from prison free,
I starve abroad, and lose the sight of Emily." 440

Thus Arcite: but if Arcite thus deplore
His suff'rings, Palamon yet suffers more.
For when he knew his rival freed and gone,
He swells with wrath; he makes outrageous moun:

He frets, he fumes, he stares, he stamps
the ground;

The hollow tow'r with clamors rings
around.

With briny tears he bath'd his fetter'd feet,
And dropp'd all o'er with agony of sweat.
"Alas!" he cried, "I, wretch, in prison
pine, 450

Too happy rival, while the fruit is thine.
Thou liv'st at large, thou draw'st thy native air,
Pleas'd with thy freedom, prond of my despair:

Thou may'st, since thou hast youth and courage join'd,

A sweet behavior and a solid mind,
Assemble ours, and all the Theban race,
To vindicate on Athens thy disgrace;
And after (by some treaty made) possess
Fair Emily, the pledge of lasting peace.
So thine shall be the beauteous prize,
while I 460

Must languish in despair, in prison die.
Thus all th' advantage of the strife is thine;

Thy portion double joys, and double sorrows mine."

The rage of jealousy then fir'd his soul,
And his face kindled like a burning coal:
Now cold despair, succeeding in her stead,
To livid paleness turns the glowing red.
His blood, scarce liquid, creeps within his veins,

Like water which the freezing wind con- strains.

Then thus he said: "Eternal deities, 470
Who rule the world with absolute decrees,
And write whatever time shall bring to pass,

With pens of adamant, on plates of brass;
What is the race of humankind your care
Beyond what all his fellow creatures are?

He with the rest is liable to pain,
And like the sheep, his brother beast, is slain.

Cold, hunger, prisons, ills without a cure,
All these he must, and guiltless oft, endure:
Or does your justice, pow'r, or prescience fail; 480

When the good suffer, and the bad prevail?
What worse to wretched virtue could befall,
If Fate or giddy Fortune govern'd all?

Nay, worse than other beasts is our estate;
Them, to pursue their pleasures, you create;
We, bound by harder laws, must curb our will,

And your commands, not our desires, fulfil:
Then, when the creature is unjustly slain,
Yet after death at least he feels no pain;

But man in life surcharg'd with woe before,
Not freed when dead, is doomed to suffer more. 491

A serpent shoots his sting at unaware;
An ambush'd thief forelays a traveler:
The man lies murder'd, while the thief and snake,

One gains the thickets, and one thrids the brake.

This let divines decide; but well I know,
Just, or unjust, I have my share of woe,
Thro' Saturn seated in a luckless place,
And Juno's wrath, that persecutes my race;
Or Mars and Venus, in a quartil, move 500
My pangs of jealousy for Arcite's love."

Let Palamon oppress'd in bondage mourn,
While to his exil'd rival we return.

By this, the sun, declining from his height,
The day had shorten'd to prolong the night;
The lengthen'd night gave length of misery
Both to the captive lover and the free;

For Palamon in endless prison mourns,
And Arcite forfeits life if he returns: 509
The banish'd never hopes his love to see,
Nor hopes the captive lord his liberty.

'T is hard to say who suffers greater pains:
One sees his love, but cannot break his chains;

One free, and all his motions uncontroll'd,
Beholds what'er he would, but what he would behold.

Judge as you please, for I will haste to tell
What fortune to the banish'd knight befell.

When Arcite was to Thebes return'd again,

The loss of her he lov'd renew'd his pain;
What could be worse, than never more to see 520

His life, his soul, his charming Emily?
He rav'd with all the madness of despair,
He roar'd, he beat his breast, he tore his hair;
Dry sorrow in his stupid eyes appears,
For, wanting nourishment, he wanted tears:
His eyeballs in their hollow sockets sink,
Bereft of sleep; he loathes his meat and drink.

He withers at his heart, and looks as wan
As the pale specter of a murder'd man:
That pale turns yellow, and his face re- ceives 530

The faded hue of sapless boxen leaves.
In solitary groves he makes his moan,
Walks early out, and ever is alone;
Nor, mix'd in mirth, in youthful pleasure shares,

But sighs when songs and instruments he hears.

His spirits are so low, his voice is drown'd, }
He hears as from afar, or in a swoond, }
Like the deaf murmurs of a distant sound: }
Uncomb'd his locks, and squalid his attire,
Unlike the trim of love and gay desire; ⁵⁴⁰
But full of museful mopings, which presage
The loss of reason, and conclude in rage.

This when he had endured a year and more,
Now wholly chang'd from what he was before,

It happen'd once that slumb'ring as he lay,
He dreamt (his dream began at break of day)

That Hermes o'er his head in air appear'd,
And with soft words his drooping spirits cheer'd:

His hat, adorn'd with wings, disclos'd the god,
And in his hand he bore the sleep-compelling rod; ⁵⁵⁰

Such as he seem'd, when, at his sire's command,

On Argus' head he laid the snaky wand.

"Arise," he said, "to conquer Athens go,
There Fate appoints an end of all thy woe."
The fright awaken'd Arcite with a start;
Against his bosom bound his heaving heart;

But soon he said, with scarce-recover'd breath:

"And thither will I go, to meet my death,
Sure to be slain; but death is my desire,
Since in Emilia's sight I shall expire." ⁵⁶⁰

By chance he spied a mirror while he spoke,
And gazing there beheld his alter'd look;
Wond'ring, he saw his features and his hue
So much were chang'd, that scarce himself he knew.

A sudden thought then starting in his mind:
"Since I in Arcite cannot Arcite find,
The world may search in vain with all their eyes,

But never penetrate thro' this disguise.
Thanks to the change which grief and sickness give,

In low estate I may securely live, ⁵⁷⁰
And see unknown my mistress day by day."
He said, and cloth'd himself in coarse array,
A lab'ring hind in shew; then forth he went,
And to th' Athenian tow'rs his journey bent.

One squire attended in the same disguise,

Made conscious of his master's enterprise.
Arriv'd at Athens, soon he came to court,
Unknown, unquestion'd, in that thick resort:
Proff'ring for hire his service at the gate,
To drudge, draw water, and to run or wait.

So fair befell him, that for little gain ⁵⁸¹
He serv'd at first Emilia's chamberlain;
And, watchful all advantages to spy,
Was still at hand, and in his master's eye;
And as his bones were big, and sinews strong,
Refus'd no toil that could to slaves belong;
But from deep wells with engines water drew,

And us'd his noble hands the wood to hew.
He pass'd a year at least attending thus
On Emily, and call'd Philostratus. ⁵⁹⁰

But never was there man of his degree
So much esteem'd, so well belov'd as he.

So gentle of condition was he known,
That thro' the court his courtesy was blown:
All think him worthy of a greater place,
And recommend him to the royal grace;
That, exercis'd within a higher sphere,
His virtues more conspicuous might appear.
Thus by the general voice was Arcite prais'd, ⁵⁹⁹

And by great Theseus to high favor rais'd;
Among his menial servants first enroll'd,
And largely entertain'd with sums of gold:
Besides what secretly from Thebes was sent,
Of his own income and his annual rent.

This well employ'd, he purchas'd friends and fame,
But cautiously conceal'd from whence it came.

Thus for three years he liv'd with large increase,

In arms of honor, and esteem in peace;
To Theseus' person he was ever near, ⁶⁰⁹
And Theseus for his virtues held him dear.

THE END OF THE FIRST BOOK

PALAMON AND ARCITE

OR, THE KNIGHT'S TALE

BOOK II

WHILE Arcite lives in bliss, the story turns
Where hopeless Palamon in prison mourns.
For six long years immur'd, the captive knight
Had dragg'd his chains and scarcely seen
the light:

Lost liberty and love at once he bore;
His prison pain'd him much, his passion
more;

Nor dares he hope his fetters to remove,
Nor ever wishes to be free from love.

But when the sixth revolving year was
run,

And May within the Twins receiv'd the
sun —

Were it by chance or forceful destiny,
Which forms in causes first whate'er shall
be —

Assisted by a friend, one moonless night,
This Palamon from prison took his flight:
A pleasant beverage he prepar'd before
Of wine and honey mix'd, with added store
Of opium; to his keeper this he brought,
Who swallow'd unaware the sleepy draught,
And snor'd secure till morn, his senses
bound

In slumber, and in long oblivion drown'd.
Short was the night, and careful Palamon
Sought the next covert ere the rising sun.
A thick-spread forest near the city lay,
To this with lengthen'd strides he took his

way
(For far he could not fly, and fear'd the
day).

Safe from pursuit, he meant to shun the
light,

Till the brown shadows of the friendly
night

To Thebes might favor his intended flight.
When to his country come, his next design
Was all the Theban race in arms to join,
And war on Theseus, till he lost his life,
Or won the beauteous Emily to wife.

Thus while his thoughts the ling'ring day
beguile,

To gentle Arcite let us turn our style;
Who little dreamt how nigh he was to care, Till treacherous Fortune caught him in the snare.

The morning lark, the messenger of day,
Saluted in her song the morning gray;
And soon the sun arose with beams so
bright,

That all th' horizon laugh'd to see the joyous sight:

He with his tepid rays the rose renews,
And licks the dropping leaves, and dries
the dews;

When Arcite left his bed, resolv'd to pay Observance to the mouth of merry May.
Forth on his fiery steed betimes he rode,

That scarcely prints the turf on which he trod:

At ease he seem'd, and, prancing o'er the
plains,

Turn'd only to the grove his horse's reins,
The grove I nam'd before; and, lighting
there,

A woodbind garland sought to crown his
hair;

Then turn'd his face against the rising
day,

And rais'd his voice to welcome in the May:
"For thee, sweet month, the groves green
liv'ries wear,

If not the first, the fairest of the year;
For thee the Graces lead the dancing hours,
And Nature's ready pencil paints the flow'rs:

When thy short reign is past, the fev'rish
sun

The sultry tropic fears, and moves more slowly on.

So may thy tender blossoms fear no blight,
Nor goats with venom'd teeth thy tendrils
bite,

As thou shalt guide my wand'ring feet to
find

The fragrant greens I seek, my brows to bind."

His vows address'd, within the grove
he stray'd,

Till Fate, or Fortune, near the place con-
vey'd

His steps where secret Palamon was laid.
Full little thought of him the gentle
knight,

Who, flying death, had there conceal'd
his flight,

In brakes and brambles hid, and shunning mortal sight.

And less he knew him for his hated foe,
But fear'd him as a man he did not know.

But as it has been said of ancient years,
That fields are full of eyes, and woods have
ears;

For this the wise are ever on their guard,
For, unforeseen, they say, is unprepar'd.

Uncautious Arcite thought himself alone,
And less than all suspected Palamon,

Who list'ning heard him, while he search'd
the grove,

And loudly sung his roundelay of love:
But on the sudden stopp'd, and silent stood,

As lovers often muse, and change their
mood;

As lovers often muse, and change their
mood;

Now high as heav'n, and then as low as hell;
Now up, now down, as buckets in a well;
For Venus, like her day, will change her cheer,

And seldom shall we see a Friday clear.
Thus Arcite having sung, with alter'd hue Sunk on the ground, and from his bosom drew

A desp'rate sigh, accusing Heav'n and Fate,
And angry Juno's unrelenting hate.

"Curst be the day when first I did appear;

Let it be blotted from the calendar, ⁹⁰
Lest it pollute the month, and poison all
the year.

Still will the jealous queen pursue our race?

Cadmus is dead, the Theban city was :

Yet ceases not her hate; for all who come From Cadmus are involv'd in Cadmus'
doom.

I suffer for my blood: unjust decree!
That punishes another's crime on me.
In mean estate I serve my mortal foe,
The man who caus'd my country's overthrow.

This is not all; for Juno, to my shame, ¹⁰⁰
Has forc'd me to forsake my former
name;

Arcite I was, Philostratus I am.

That side of heav'n is all my enemy:
Mars ruin'd Thebes; his mother ruin'd me.
Of all the royal race remains but one
Beside myself, th' unhappy Palamon, Whom Theseus holds in bonds, and will not free;

Without a crime, except his kin to me.

Yet these, and all the rest, I could endure;

But love's a malady without a cure: ¹¹⁰

Fierce Love has pierc'd me with his fiery
dart;

He fries within, and hisses at my heart.

Your eyes, fair Emily, my fate pursue;

I suffer for the rest, I die for you.

Of such a goddess no time leaves record,
Who burn'd the temple where she was
ador'd:

And let it burn, I never will complain,

Pleas'd with my suff'rings, if you knew my pain." ¹¹⁸

At this a sickly qualm his heart assail'd,
His ears ring inward, and his senses fail'd.
No word miss'd Palamon of all he spoke,
But soon to deadly pale he chang'd his look:
He trembled ev'ry limb, and felt a smart,
As if cold steel had glided thro' his heart;

Nor longer stay'd, but, starting from his
place,

Discover'd stood, and shew'd his hostile
face:

"False traitor Arcite, traitor to thy blood,
Bound by thy sacred oath to seek my good,
Now art thou found forsworn, for Emily;

And dar'st attempt her love, for whom I die.

So hast thou cheated Theseus with a wife,

Against thy vow, returning to beguile ¹³²

Under a borrow'd name: as false to me,

So false thou art to him who set thee free.

But rest assur'd, that either thou shalt die,

Or else renounce thy claim in Emily:

For, tho' unarm'd I am, and (freed by chance)

Am here without my sword or pointed lance,

Hope not, base man, unquestion'd hence to
go,

For I am Palamon, thy mortal foe." ¹⁴⁰

Arcite, who heard his tale, and knew the
man,

His sword unsheath'd, and fiercely thus
began:

"Now by the gods who govern heav'n
above,

Wert thou not weak with hunger, mad
with love,

That word had been thy last, or in this grove
This hand should force thee to renounce thy love.

The surety which I gave thee, I defy:

Fool, not to know that love endures no tie, }
And Jove but laughs at lovers' perjury.

Know, I will serve the fair in thy despite;

But, since thou art my kinsman, and a knight, ¹⁵¹

Here, have my faith, to-morrow in this
grove

Our arms shall plead the titles of our love:

And Heav'n so help my right, as I alone

Will come, and keep the cause and quarrel
both unknown,

With arms of proof both for myself and
thee:

Choose thou the best, and leave the worst
to me.

And, that at better ease thou may'st abide,

Bedding and clothes I will this night provide,

And needful sustenance, that thou may'st
be ¹⁶⁰

A conquest better won, and worthy me."

His promise Palamon accepts; but pray'd,

To keep it better than the first he made.

Thus fair they parted till the morrow's dawn,
For each had laid his plighted faith to pawn.

O Love! thou sternly dost thy pow'r maintain,
And wilt not bear a rival in thy reign:
Tyrants and thou all fellowship disdain. }
This was in Arcite prov'd, and Palamon:
Both in despair, yet each would love alone.

Arcite return'd, and, as in honor tied, ¹⁷¹
His foe with bedding and with food supplied;

Then, ere the day, two suits of armor sought,
Which borne before him on his steed he brought:

Both were of shining steel, and wrought so pure
As might the strokes of two such arms endure.

Now, at the time, and in th' appointed place,

The challenger and challeng'd, face to face,
Approach; each other from afar they knew,
And from afar their hatred chang'd their hue. ¹⁸⁰

So stands the Thracian herdsman with his spear,

Full in the gap, and hopes the hunted bear,
And hears him rustling in the wood, and sees

His course at distance by the bending trees,
And thinks: "Here comes my mortal enemy,

And either he must fall in fight, or I."
This while he thinks, he lifts aloft his dart; }
A gen'rous chillness seizes ev'ry part;
The veins pour back the blood, and fortify } the heart.

Thus pale they meet; their eyes with fury burn; ¹⁹⁰

None greets, for none the greeting will return;

But in dumb surliness, each arm'd with care
His foe profess'd, as brother of the war:
Then both, no moment lost, at once advance
Against each other, arm'd with sword and lance:

They lash, they foil, they pass, they strive to bore

Their corslets, and the thinnest parts explore.

Thus two long hours in equal arms they stood,

And, wounded, wound; till both were bath'd in blood;

And not a foot of ground had either got, ²⁰⁰
As if the world depended on the spot.

Fell Arcite like an angry tiger far'd,
And like a lion Palamon appear'd:
Or, as two boars, whom love to battle draws,
With rising bristles, and with frothy jaws —
Their adverse breasts with tusks oblique they wound;

With grunts and groans the forest rings around —

So fought the knights, and fighting must abide,

Till Fate an umpire sends their diff'rence to decide. ²⁰⁹

The pow'r that ministers to God's decrees,
And executes on earth what Heav'n foresees,
Call'd Providence, or Chance, or Fatal Sway,

Comes with resistless force, and finds or makes her way.

Nor kings, nor nations, nor united pow'r,
One moment can retard th' appointed hour,
And some one day, some wondrous chance appears,

Which happen'd not in centuries of years:
For sure, whate'er we mortals hate, or love,
Or hope, or fear, depends on pow'rs above;
They move our appetites to good or ill, ²²⁰
And by foresight necessitate the will.

In Theseus this appears; whose youthful joy
Was beasts of chase in forests to destroy:
This gentle knight, inspir'd by jolly May, } Forsook his easy couch at early day,
And to the wood and wilds pursued his }
way.

Beside him rode Hippolyta the queen,
And Emily attir'd in lively green,
With horns, and hounds, and all the tuneful cry,

To hunt a royal hart within the covert nigh; ²³⁰

And as he follow'd Mars before, so now
He serves the goddess of the silver bow.

The way that Theseus took was to the wood
Where the two knights in cruel battle stood:
The laud on which they fought, th' appointed place

In which th' uncoupled hounds began the chase.

Thither forthright he rode to rouse the prey.
That shaded by the fern in harbor lay;

And thence dislodg'd, was wont to leave the wood ²³⁹

For open fields, and cross the crystal flood.
Approach'd, and looking underneath the sun,
He saw proud Arcite and fierce Palamon
In mortal battle doubling blow on blow:
Like lightning flam'd their fauchions to and fro,

And shot a dreadful gleam; so strong they strook,
There seem'd less force requir'd to fell an oak.

He gaz'd with wonder on their equal might,
Look'd eager on, but knew not either knight:

Resolv'd to learn, he spurr'd his fiery steed
With goring rowels to provoke his speed.
The minute ended that began the race, 251
So soon he was betwixt 'em on the place;
And with his sword unsheath'd, on pain of life

Commands both combatants to cease their strife:

Then with imperious tone pursues his threat:

"What are you? why in arms together met?
How dares your pride presume against my laws,

As in a listed field to fight your cause?
Unask'd the royal grant; no marshal by,
As knightly rites require; nor judge to try?"

Then Palamon, with scarce recover'd breath, 261

Thus hasty spoke: "We both deserve the death,

And both would die; for, look the world around,

A pair so wretched is not to be found.
Our life's a load; encumber'd with the charge,

We long to set th' imprison'd soul at large.
Now, as thou art a sovereign judge, decree
The rightful doom of death to him and me;

Let neither find thy grace, for grace is cruelty. 269

Me first, O kill me first, and cure my woe;
Then sheathe the sword of justice on my foe:
Or kill him first; for when his name is heard,

He foremost will receive his due reward.
Arcite of Thebes is he; thy mortal foe,
On whom thy grace did liberty bestow,
But first contracted, that, if ever found
By day or night upon th' Athenian ground,
His head should pay the forfeit: see return'd

The perjurd knight, his oath and honor scorn'd. 279

For this is he, who, with a borrow'd name,
And proffer'd service, to thy palace came,
Now call'd Philostratus: retain'd by thee, }
A traitor trusted, and in high degree, }
Aspiring to the bed of beauteous Emily. }
My part remains; from Thebes my birth I own,

And call myself th' unhappy Palamon.
Think me not like that man; since no disgrace

Can force me to renounce the honor of my race.

Know me for what I am: I broke thy chain,
Nor promis'd I thy pris'ner to remain: 290

The love of liberty with life is giv'n,
And life itself th' inferior gift of Heav'n.
Thus without crime I fled; but farther know,
I, with this Arcite, am thy mortal foe:

Then give me death, since I thy life pursue;

For safeguard of thyself, death is my due.
More wouldst thou know? I love bright Emily,

And, for her sake, and in her sight, will die.

But kill my rival too, for he no less
Deserves; and I thy righteous doom will bless, 300
Assur'd that what I lose he never shall possess."

To this replied the stern Athenian prince,
And sourly smil'd: "In owning your offense
You judge yourself; and I but keep record
In place of law, while you pronounce the word.

Take your desert, the death you have decreed;

I seal your doom and ratify the deed:
By Mars, the patron of my arms, you die."

He said; dumb sorrow seiz'd the standers-by.

The queen, above the rest, by nature good,
(The pattern form'd of perfect womanhood,) 311

For tender pity wept: when she began,
Thro' the bright choir th' infectious virtue ran.

All dropp'd their tears, ev'n the contended maid;

And thus among themselves they softly said:

"What eyes can suffer this unworthy sight!

Two youths of royal blood, renown'd in fight,
 The mastership of heav'n in face and mind,
 And lovers, far beyond their faithless kind:
 See their wide streaming wounds; they neither came ³²⁰
 From pride of empire, nor desire of fame.
 Kings fight for kingdoms, madmen for applause;
 But love for love alone; that crowns the lover's cause."
 This thought, which ever bribes the beautiful kind,
 Such pity wrought in ev'ry lady's mind,
 They left their steeds, and, prostrate on the
 place,
 From the fierce king implor'd th' offenders' grace.

He paus'd a while, stood silent in his mood,
 (For yet his rage was boiling in his blood;)
 But soon his tender mind th' impression felt; ³³⁰
 (As softest metals are not slow to melt,
 And pity soonest runs in gentle minds:)
 Then reasons with himself; and first he finds
 His passion cast a mist before his sense,
 And either made or magnified th' offense.
 Offense! of what? to whom? who judg'd
 the cause?

The prison'r freed himself by nature's laws:
 Born free, he sought his right: the man he
 freed

Was perjur'd, but his love excus'd the deed.
 Thus pond'ring, he look'd under with his eyes ³⁴⁰

And saw the women's tears, and heard their
 cries;

Which mov'd compassion more: he shook
 his head,

And softly sighing to himself he said:

"Curse on th' unpard'ning prince, whom tears can draw

To no remorse; who rules by lions' law;
 And deaf to pray'rs, by no submission
 bow'd,

Rends all alike; the penitent and proud!"
 At this, with look serene, he rais'd his
 head;

Reason resum'd her place, and passion fled:
 Then thus aloud he spoke: "The pow'r of Love, ³⁵⁰

In earth, and seas, and air, and heav'n
 above,

Rules, unresisted, with an awful nod;
 By daily miracles declar'd a god:

He blinds the wise, gives eyesight to the blind,
 And molds and stamps anew the lover's
 mind.

Behold that Arcite, and this Palamon,
 Freed from my fetters, and in safety gone —
 What hinder'd either in their native soil
 At ease to reap the harvest of their toil?
 But Love, their lord, did otherwise ordain,
 And brought 'em in their own despite again,
 To suffer death deserv'd; for well they know, ³⁶²

'Tis in my pow'r, and I their deadly foe.
 The proverb holds, that to be wise and love,
 Is hardly granted to the gods above.
 See how the madmen bleed! behold the gains
 With which their master, Love, rewards
 their pains.

For sev'n long years, on duty ev'ry day,
 Lo their obedience, and their monarch's pay!
 Yet, as in duty bound, they serve him on;
 And, ask the fools, they think it wisely done;
 Nor ease, nor wealth, nor life itself regard,
 For 'tis their maxim, love is love's reward.
 This is not all; the fair, for whom they strove, ³⁷⁴

Nor knew before, nor could suspect their love,
 Nor thought, when she beheld the fight
 from far,

Her beauty was th' occasion of the war.
 But sure a gen'ral doom on man is pass'd,
 And all are fools and lovers, first or last:
 This, both by others and myself, I know, ³⁸⁰
 For I have serv'd their sovereign, long ago;
 Oft have been caught within the winding
 train

Of female snares, and felt the lover's
 pain,
 And learn'd how far the god can human hearts constrain.

To this remembrance, and the pray'rs of those

Who for th' offending warriors interpose,
 I give their forfeit lives; on this accord,
 To do me homage as their sov'reign lord;
 And as my vassals, to their utmost might,
 Assist my person, and assert my right." ³⁹⁰

This freely sworn, the knights their grace
 obtain'd;

Then thus the king his secret thoughts explain'd:

"If wealth, or honor, or a royal race,
 Or each, or all, may win a lady's grace,
 Then either of you knights may well deserve

A princess born; and such is she you serve;
For Emily is sister to the crown,
And but too well to both her beauty known:
But should you combat till you both were
dead,

Two lovers cannot share a single bed. 400
As therefore both are equal in degree,
The lot of both be left to destiny.
Now hear th' award, and happy may it prove
To her, and him who best deserves her love.
Depart from hence in peace, and, free as air, Search the wide world, and where you
please repair;

But on the day when this returning sun
To the same point thro' ev'ry sign has run,
Then each of you his hundred knights shall
bring,

In royal lists, to fight before the king; 410
And then the knight, whom fate or happy
chance

Shall with his friends to victory advance,
And grace his arms so far in equal fight,
From out the bars to force his opposite,
Or kill, or make him recreant on the plain,
The prize of valor and of love shall gain;
The vanquish'd party shall their claim release,

And the long jars conclude in lasting peace.
'The charge be mine t' adorn the chosen
ground,

The theater of war, for champions so re-
nown'd;

And take the patron's place of either 420
knight,

With eyes impartial to behold the fight;
And Heav'n of me so judge as I shall judge aright.

If both are satisfied with this accord, Swear by the laws of knighthood on my
sword."

Who now but Palamon exults with joy?
And ravish'd Arcite seems to touch the sky:
The whole assembled troop was pleas'd as
well,

Extoll'd th' award, and on their knees
they fell

To bless the gracious king. The knights, with leave 430

Departing from the place, his last commands receive;

On Emily with equal ardor look,
And from her eyes their inspiration took;
From thence to Thebes' old walls pursue
their way,

Each to provide his champions for the day.

It might be deem'd, on our historian's
part,

Or too much negligence, or want of art,
If he forgot the vast magnificence
Of royal Theseus, and his large expense.
He first enclos'd for lists a level ground,
The whole circumference a mile around: 441
The form was circular; and all without
A trench was sunk, to moat the place about.
Within an amphitheater appear'd,
Rais'd in degrees; to sixty paces rear'd:
That when a man was plac'd in one degree,

Height was allow'd for him above to see.
Eastward was built a gate of marble
white;

The like adorn'd the western opposite.
A nobler object than this fabric was, 450
Rome never saw; nor of so vast a space:
For, rich with spoils of many a conquer'd
land,

All arts and artists Theseus could command;

Who sold for hire, or wrought for better
fame;

The master painters and the carvers came.
So rose within the compass of the year
An age's work, a glorious theater.

Then o'er its eastern gate was rais'd above
A temple, sacred to the Queen of Love:

An altar stood below; on either hand 460
A priest with roses crown'd, who held a myrtle wand.

The dome of Mars was on the gate op-
pos'd,

And on the north a turret was enclos'd,
Within the wall, of alabaster white,
And crimson coral, for the Queen of Night,
Who takes in sylvan sports her chaste
delight.

Within these oratories might you see
Rich carvings, portraitures, and imagery,
Where ev'ry figure to the life express'd
The godhead's pow'r to whom it was ad-
dress'd. 470

In Venus' temple, on the sides were seen
The broken slumbers of inamor'd men, Pray'rs that ev'n spoke, and pity seem'd to call,

And issuing sighs that smok'd along the wall;

Complaints, and hot desires, the lover's
hell,

And scalding tears that wore a channel
where they fell:

And all around were nuptial bonds, the ties
 Of love's assurance, and a train of lies,
 That, made in lust, conclude in perjuries.
 Beauty, and Youth, and Wealth, and Luxury, ⁴⁸⁰
 And sprightly Hope, and short-enduring
 Joy;
 And Sorceries to raise th' infernal pow'rs.
 And Sigils fram'd in planetary hours;
 Expense, and Afterthought, and idle Care,
 And Doubts of motley hue, and dark Despair;
 Suspicions, and fantastical Surmise.
 And Jealousy suffus'd, with jaundice in her
 eyes,
 Discoloring all she view'd, in tawny dress'd,
 Down-look'd, and with a cuckow on her fist.
 Oppos'd to her, on t'other side, advance ⁴⁹⁰
 The costly feast, the carol, and the dance,
 Minstrels, and music, poetry, and play,
 And balls by night, and tournaments by day.
 All these were painted on the wall, and
 more,
 With acts and monuments of times before,
 And others added by prophetic doom,
 And lovers yet unborn, and loves to come:
 For there th' Idalian mount, and Citheron,
 The court of Venus, was in colors drawn.
 Before the palace gate, in careless dress, ⁵⁰⁰
 And loose array, sat portress Idleness;
 There, by the fount, Narcissus pin'd
 alone;
 There Samson was, with wiser Solomon,
 And all the mighty names by love un-
 done.
 Medea's charms were there, Circean feasts,
 With bowls that turn'd inamor'd youth to beasts.
 Here might be seen that beauty, wealth,
 and wit,
 And prowess, to the pow'r of love submit:
 The spreading snare for all mankind is
 laid;
 And lovers all betray, and are betray'd. ⁵¹⁰
 The goddess' self some noble hand had
 wrought;
 Smiling she seem'd, and full of pleasing
 thought:
 From ocean as she first began to rise,
 And smooth'd the ruffled seas, and clear'd
 the skies;
 She trode the brine all bare below the breast,
 And the green waves but ill conceal'd the
 rest.

A lute she held, and on her head was seen
 A wreath of roses red and myrtles green;
 Her turtles fann'd the buxom air above;
 And, by his mother, stood an infant Love,
 With wings unfledg'd; his eyes were banded o'er; ⁵²¹
 His hands a bow, his back a quiver bore, Supplied with arrows bright and keen, a deadly store.

But in the dome of mighty Mars the red
 With different figures all the sides were
 spread;

This temple, less in form, with equal grace,
 Was imitative of the first in Thrace:
 For that cold region was the lov'd abode
 And sov'reign mansion of the warrior god.
 The landscape was a forest wide and bare,
 Where neither beast nor humankind repair;
 The fowl that scent afar the borders fly,
 And shun the bitter blast, and wheel about the sky. ⁵³³

A cake of scurf lies baking on the ground,
 And prickly stubs, instead of trees, are
 found;

Or woods with knots and knares deform'd
 and old;

Headless the most, and hideous to behold:
 A rattling tempest thro' the branches went,
 That stripp'd 'em bare, and one sole way they bent.

Heav'n froze above, severe; the clouds congeal, ⁵⁴⁰

And thro' the crystal vault appear'd the standing hail.

Such was the face without: a mountain
 stood

Threat'ning from high, and overlook'd the
 wood;

Beneath the low'ring brow, and on a bent,
 The temple stood of Mars arripotent:

The frame of burnish'd steel, that cast a glare

From far, and seem'd to thaw the freezing
 air.

A strait, long entry to the temple led,
 Blind with high walls, and horror over
 head:

Thence issued such a blast and hollow roar,
 As threaten'd from the hinge to heave the door. ⁵⁵¹

In thro' that door, a northern light there shone;

'T was all it had, for windows there were none.

The gate was adamant; eternal frame!

Which, hew'd by Mars himself, from Indian quarries came,
The labor of a god; and all along Tough iron plates were clench'd to make it
strong.

A tun about was ev'ry pillar there;
A polish'd mirror shone not half so clear.
There saw I how the secret felon wrought,
And treason lab'ring in the traitor's
thought,

And midwife Time the ripen'd plot to murder brought.

There the red Anger dar'd the pallid Fear;
Next stood Hypocrisy, with holy leer;
Soft smiling, and demurely looking down,
But hid the dagger underneath the gown:
Th' assassinating wife, the household fiend;
And, far the blackest there, the traitor-
friend.

Out'other side there stood Destruction bare;
Unpunish'd Rapine, and a waste of war;
Contest, with sharpen'd knives, in cloisters
drawn,

And all with blood bespread the holy lawn.
Loud menaces were heard, and foul dis-
grace,

And bawling infamy, in language base;
Till sense was lost in sound, and silence fled the place.

The slayer of himself yet saw I there;
The gore congeal'd was clotter'd in his hair:
With eyes half clos'd and gaping mouth he
lay,

And grim, as when he breath'd his sullen soul away.

In midst of all the dome Misfortune sat,
And gloomy Discontent, and fell Debate,
And Madness laughing in his ireful mood,
And arm'd complaint on theft, and cries
of blood.

There was the murder'd corpse, in covert laid,
And violent death in thousand shapes dis-
play'd;

The city to the soldier's rage resign'd;
Successful wars, and poverty behind;
Ships burnt in fight, or forc'd on rocky shores,
And the rash hunter strangled by the boars;
The newborn babe by nurses overlaid;
And the cook caught within the raging fire
he made.

All ills of Mars his nature, flame, and steel;
The gasping charioteer, beneath the wheel
Of his own car; the ruin'd house that falls
And intercepts her lord betwixt the walls;
The whole division that to Mars pertains,

All trades of death that deal in steel for
gains,

Were there: the butcher, armorer, and smith,

Who forges sharpen'd fauchions, or the scythe.

The scarlet conquest on a tow'r was plac'd,
With shouts and soldiers' acclamations
grac'd;

A pointed sword hung threat'ning o'er his
head,

Sustain'd but by a slender twine of thread.

There saw I Mars his ides, the Capitol,
The seer in vain foretelling Cæsar's fall;
The last triumvirs, and the wars they move,
And Antony, who lost the world for love.

These, and a thousand more, the fane adorn;
Their fates were painted ere the men were
born,

All copied from the heav'ns, and ruling
force

Of the red star, in his revolving course.

The form of Mars high on a chariot stood,
All sheath'd in arms, and gruffly look'd the
god;

Two geomantic figures were display'd Above his head, a * warrior * Rubeus and a maid, & Puella.

One when direct and one when retrograde.

Tir'd with deformities of death, I haste
To the third temple of Diana chaste.

A sylvan scene with various greens was drawn.

Shades on the sides, and on the midst a lawn:

The silver Cynthia, with her nymphs around, Pursued the flying deer, the woods with horns resound;

Calisto there stood manifest of shame,
And, turn'd a bear, the northern star be-
came;

Her son was next, and by peculiar grace
In the cold circle held the second place;
The stag Actæon in the stream had spied
The naked huntress, and, for seeing, died;
His hounds, unknowing of his change, pursue

The chase, and their mistaken master slew.
Peneian Daphne too was there to see,
Apollo's love before, and now his tree.

Th' adjoining fane th' assembled Greeks
express'd,

And hunting of the Caledonian beast:
Enides' valor, and his envied prize;

The fatal pow'r of Atalanta's eyes;
 Diana's vengeance on the victor shown;
 The murd'ress mother, and consuming son;
 The Volscian queen extended on the plain;
 The treason punish'd, and the traitor slain.
 The rest were various huntings, well de-
 sign'd,

And salvage beasts destroy'd, of ev'ry kind.
 The graceful goddess was array'd in
 green;

About her feet were little beagles seen,
 That watch'd with upward eyes the motions of their queen.

Her legs were buskin'd, and the left
 before

In act to shoot; a silver bow she bore,
 And at her back a painted quiver wore.
 She trod a waxing moon, that soon would wane,

And, drinking borrow'd light, be fill'd again;
 With downcast eyes, as seeming to survey
 The dark dominions, her alternate sway.
 Before her stood a woman in her throes,
 And call'd Lucina's aid her burden to disclose.

All these the painter drew with such command,

That Nature snatch'd the pencil from his
 hand,

Asham'd and angry that his art could feign
 And mend the tortures of a mother's pain.
 Theseus beheld the fanes of ev'ry god,
 And thought his mighty cost was well be-
 stow'd.

So princes now their poets should regard;
 But few can write, and fewer can reward.

The theater thus rais'd, the lists enclos'd,
 And all with vast magnificence dispos'd,
 We leave the monarch pleas'd, and haste to
 bring

The knights to combat, and their arms to sing.

THE END OF THE SECOND BOOK

PALAMON AND ARCITE

OR, THE KNIGHT'S TALE

BOOK III

THE day approach'd when Fortune should decide

Th' important enterprise, and give the bride;
 For now the rivals round the world had
 sought,

And each his number, well appointed,
 brought.

The nations, far and near, contend in choice,
 And send the flow'r of war by public voice;
 That after, or before, were never known
 Such chiefs, as each an army seem'd alone.
 Beside the champions, all of high degree
 Who knighthood lov'd, and deeds of chivalry,

Throng'd to the lists, and envied to behold

The names of others, not their own, in-
 roll'd.

Nor seems it strange; for ev'ry noble
 knight

Who loves the fair, and is endued with
 might,

In such a quarrel would be proud to fight.
 There breathes not scarce a man on British
 ground

(An isle for love and arms of old renown'd)
 But would have sold his life to purchase
 fame,

To Palamon or Arcite sent his name;
 And had the land selected of the best,
 Half had come hence, and let the world
 provide the rest.

A hundred knights with Palamon there
 came,

Approv'd in fight, and men of mighty name;
 Their arms were sev'ral, as their nations
 were,

But furnish'd all alike with sword and spear.
 Some wore coat armor, imitating scale;
 And next their skins were stubborn shirts of mail.

Some wore a breastplate and a light juppon,

Their horses cloth'd with rich caparison:
 Some for defense would leathern bucklers
 use,

Of folded hides; and others shields of Pruce.
 One hung a poleax at his saddlebow,
 And one a heavy mace to stun the foe;
 One for his legs and knees provided well,
 With jambeux arm'd, and double plates of
 steel;

This on his helmet wore a lady's glove,
 And that a sleeve embroider'd by his love.

With Palamon, above the rest in place,
 Lycurgus came, the surly king of Thrace;
 Black was his beard, and manly was his
 face;

The balls of his broad eyes roll'd in his
 head,

And glar'd betwixt a yellow and a red:
 He look'd a lion with a gloomy stare,
 And o'er his eyebrows hung his matted
 hair;
 Big-bon'd, and large of limbs, with sinews
 strong,
 Broad-shoulder'd, and his arms were round and long.
 Four milk-white bulls (the Thracian use of old)
 Were yok'd to draw his ear of burnish'd
 gold.
 Upright he stood, and bore aloft his shield, Conspicuous from afar, and overlook'd the
 field. 50
 His surcoat was a bearskin on his back;
 His hair hung long behind, and glossy raven-black.
 His ample forehead bore a coronet
 With sparkling diamonds and with rubies set.
 Ten brace, and more, of greyhounds, }
 And tall as stags, ran loose, and cours'd } around his chair,
 A match for pards in flight, in grappling, }
 for the bear;
 With golden muzzles all their mouths were
 bound,
 And collars of the same their necks sur-
 round.
 Thus thro' the fields Lyncurgus took his way;
 His hundred knights attend in pomp and proud array. 61
 To match this monarch, with strong Arcite
 came Emetrius, King of Inde, a mighty name,
 On a bay courser, goodly to behold,
 The trappings of his horse emboss'd with barb'rous gold.
 Not Mars bestrode a steed with greater
 grace;
 His surcoat o'er his arms was cloth of Thrace,
 Adorn'd with pearls, all orient, round, and great;
 His saddle was of gold, with emeralds set;
 His shoulders large a mantle did attire, 70
 With rubies thick, and sparkling as the
 fire;
 His amber-color'd locks in ringlets run,
 With graceful negligence, and shone against the sun.
 His nose was aquiline, his eyes were blue,
 Ruddy his lips, and fresh and fair his hue;

Some sprinkled freckles on his face were
 seen,
 Whose dusk set off the whiteness of the skin.
 His awful presence did the crowd surprise,
 Nor durst the rash spectator meet his eyes;
 Eyes that confess'd him born for kingly
 sway, 80
 So fierce, they flash'd intolerable day.
 His age in nature's youthful prime appear'd,
 And just began to bloom his yellow beard.
 Whene'er he spoke, his voice was heard
 around,
 Loud as a trumpet, with a silver sound:
 A laurel wreath'd his temples, fresh, and
 green;
 And myrtle sprigs, the marks of love, were mix'd between.
 Upon his fist he bore, for his delight,
 An eagle well reclaim'd, and lily-white.
 His hundred knights attend him to the
 war, 90
 All arm'd for battle; save their heads were
 bare.
 Words and devices blaz'd on ev'ry shield,
 And pleasing was the terror of the field.
 For kings, and dukes, and barons you might see,
 Like sparkling stars, tho' diff'rent in degree,
 All for th' increase of arms, and love of chivalry.
 Before the king tame leopards led the way,
 And troops of lions innocently play.
 So Bacehus thro' the conquer'd Indies rode,
 And beasts in gambols frisk'd before their honest god. 100
 In this array the war of either side
 Thro' Athens pass'd with military pride.
 At prime, they enter'd on the Sunday morn;
 Rich tap'stry spread the streets, and flow'rs the posts adorn.
 The town was all a jubilee of feasts;
 So Theseus will'd, in honor of his guests:
 Himself with open arms the kings embrac'd,
 Then all the rest in their degrees were
 grac'd.
 No harbinger was needful for the night,
 For ev'ry house was proud to lodge a
 knight. 110
 I pass the royal treat, nor must relate
 The gifts bestow'd, nor how the champions
 sate:
 Who first, who last, or how the knights
 address'd

Their vows, or who was fairest at the feast;

Whose voice, whose graceful dance did most surprise;

Soft am'rous sighs, and silent love of eyes.
The rivals call my Muse another way,
To sing their vigils for th' ensuing day.

'T was ebbing darkness, past the noon of night;

And Phosphor, on the confines of the light,
Promis'd the sun; ere day began to spring,

The tuneful lark already stretch'd her wing,

And, flick'ring on her nest, made short essays to sing;

When wakeful Palamon, preventing day,
Took to the royal lists his early way,

To Venus at her fane, in her own house, to pray.

There, falling on his knees before her shrine,

He thus implor'd with pray'rs her pow'r divine:

"Creator Venus, genial pow'r of love,
The bliss of men below and gods above!

Beneath the sliding sun thou runn'st thy race,

Dost fairest shine, and best become thy place;

For thee the winds their eastern blasts forbear,

Thy month reveals the spring, and opens all the year.

Thee, goddess, thee the storms of winter fly,

Earth smiles with flow'rs renewing, laughs the sky,

And birds to lays of love their tuneful notes apply.

For thee the lion loathes the taste of blood,
And roaring hunts his female thro' the wood;

For thee the bulls rebellow thro' the groves,

And tempt the stream, and snuff their absent loves.

'T is thine, whate'er is pleasant, good, or fair;

All nature is thy province, life thy care:
Thou mad'st the world, and dost the world repair.

Thou gladder of the mount of Cytheron,
Increase of Jove, companion of the sun;

If e'er Adonis touch'd thy tender heart,

Have pity, goddess, for thou know'st the smart.

Alas! I have not words to tell my grief;
To vent my sorrow would be some relief;

Light suff'rings give us leisure to complain;
We groan, but cannot speak, in greater pain.

O goddess, tell thyself what I would say;
Thou know'st it, and I feel too much to pray.

So grant my suit, as I enforce my might,
In love to be thy champion and thy knight;

A servant to thy sex, a slave to thee,
A foe profess'd to barren chastity.

Nor ask I fame or honor of the field,
Nor choose I more to vanquish than to yield:

In my divine Emilia make me blest,
Let Fate, or partial Chance, dispose the rest:

Find thou the manner, and the means prepare;

Possession, more than conquest, is my care.

Mars is the warrior's god; in him it lies,
On whom he favors to confer the prize:

With smiling aspect you serenely move
In your fifth orb, and rule the realm of love.

The Fates but only spin the coarser clue,
The finest of the wool is left for you.

Spare me but one small portion of the twine,

And let the sisters cut below your line:
The rest among the rubbish may they sweep,

Or add it to the yarn of some old miser's heap.

But, if you this ambitious pray'r deny,
(A wish, I grant, beyond mortality,)

Then let me sink beneath proud Arcite's arms,

And I once dead, let him possess her charms."

Thus ended he; then with observance due

The sacred incense on her altar threw:

The curling smoke mounts heavy from the fires;

At length it catches flame, and in a blaze expires;

At once the gracious goddess gave the sign;
Her statue shook, and trembled all the shrine.

Pleas'd Palamon the tardy omen took:
For, since the flames pursued the trailing smoke,

He knew his boon was granted, but the
day

To distance driv'n, and joy adjourn'd with long delay.

Now morn with rosy light had streak'd
the sky:

Up rose the sun, and up rose Emily; ¹⁹⁰
Address'd her early steps to Cynthia's fane,
In state attended by her maiden train,
Who bore the vests that holy rites require,
Incense, and od'rous gums, and cover'd fire.
The plenteous horns with pleasant mead
they crown,

Nor wanted aught besides in honor of the moon.

Now while the temple smok'd with hallow'd
steam,

They wash the virgin in a living stream:

The secret ceremonies I conceal,
Uncouth, perhaps unlawful to reveal; ²⁰⁰
But such they were as pagan use requir'd,
Perform'd by women when the men retir'd,
Whose eyes profane their chaste mysterious rites

Might turn to scandal, or obscene delights.

Well-meaners think no harm; but for the
rest,

Things sacred they pervert, and silence is the best.

Her shining hair, uncomb'd, was loosely
spread;

A crown of mastless oak adorn'd her head.
When, to the shrine approach'd, the spotless maid

Had kindling fires on either altar laid, ²¹⁰
(The rites were such as were observ'd of
old,

By Statius in his Theban story told.)

Then, kneeling with her hands across her
breast,

Thus lowly she preferr'd her chaste request:

"O goddess, haunter of the woodland
green,

To whom both heav'n and earth and seas
are seen;

Queen of the nether skies, where half the year

Thy silver beams descend, and light the gloomy sphere;

Goddess of maids, and conscious of our hearts,

So keep me from the vengeance of thy darts,
(Which Niobe's devoted issue felt, ²²¹

When hissing thro' the skies the feather'd deaths were dealt;)

As I desire to live a virgin life,

Nor know the name of mother or of wife.

Thy votress from my tender years I am,
And love, like thee, the woods and sylvan
game.

Like death, thou know'st, I loathe the nuptial state,

And man, the tyrant of our sex, I hate—

A lowly servant, but a lofty mate;

Where love is duty on the female side; ²³⁰

On theirs mere sensual gust, and sought with surly pride.

Now by thy triple shape, as thou art seen
In heav'n, earth, hell, and ev'rywhere a
queen,

Grant this my first desire: let discord
cease,

And make betwixt the rivals lasting peace;
Quench their hot fire, or far from me re-
move

The flame, and turn it on some other love;
Or, if my frowning stars have so decreed,

That one must be rejected, one succeed,
Make him my lord, within whose faithful breast ²⁴⁰

Is fix'd my image, and who loves me best.

But, O, ev'n that avert; I choose it not,

But take it as the least unhappy lot.

A maid I am, and of thy virgin train;

O let me still that spotless name retain!

Frequent the forests, thy chaste will obey,
And only make the beasts of chase my
prey!"

The flames ascend on either altar clear,
While thus the blameless maid address'd her pray'r.

When lo! the burning fire that shone so bright ²⁵⁰

Flew off, all sudden, with extinguish'd light,

And left one altar dark, a little space;

Which turn'd self-kindled, and renew'd
the blaze:

That other victor flame a moment stood,
Then fell, and lifeless left th' extinguish'd
wood;

For ever lost. th' irrevocable light Forsook the black'ning coals, and sunk to

night:

At either end it whistled as it flew,

And as the brands were green, so dropp'd

the dew,

Infected as it fell with sweat of sanguine

hue. ²⁶⁰

The maid from that ill omen turn'd her eyes,
And with loud shrieks and clamors rent the skies,
Nor knew what signified the boding sign,
But found the pow'r displeas'd, and fear'd the wrath divine.

Then shook the sacred shrine, and sudden light
Sprung thro' the vaulted roof, and made the temple bright.

The pow'r, behold! the pow'r in glory shone,
By her bent bow and her keen arrows known;

The rest, a huntress issuing from the wood,
Reclining on her cornel spear she stood: ²⁷⁰
Then gracious thus began: "Dismiss thy fear,

And Heav'n's unchang'd decrees attentive hear:

More pow'rful gods have torn thee from my side,

Unwilling to resign, and doom'd a bride.
The two contending knights are weigh'd above;

One Mars protects, and one the Queen of Love:

But which the man, is in the Thund'rer's breast —

This he pronounc'd, 'T is he who loves thee best.'

The fire that, once extinct, reviv'd again,
Foreshews the love allotted to remain: ²⁸⁰
Farewell!" she said, and vanish'd from the place;

The sheaf of arrows shook, and rattled in the case.

Aghast at this the royal virgin stood,
Disclaim'd, and now no more a sister of the wood;

But to the parting goddess thus she pray'd:

"Propitious still be present to my aid,
Nor quite abandon your once favor'd maid."

Then sighing she return'd; but smil'd betwixt,

With hopes, and fears, and joys with sorrows mix'd.

The next returning planetary hour ²⁹⁰
Of Mars, who shar'd the heptarchy of pow'r,
His steps bold Arcite to the temple bent,
T'adore with pagan rites the pow'r armipotent;

Then prostrate, low before his altar lay,

And rais'd his manly voice, and thus began to pray:

"Strong God of Arms, whose iron scepter sways

The freezing North, and Hyperborean seas,
And Seythian colds, and Thracia's wintry coast,

Where stand thy steeds, and thou art honor'd most —

There most; but ev'rywhere thy pow'r is known, ³⁰⁰

The fortune of the fight is all thy own:
Terror is thine, and wild amazement, flung
From out thy chariot, withers ev'n the strong;

And disarray and shameful rout ensue,
And force is added to the fainting crew.

Acknowledg'd as thou art, accept my pray'r,

If aught I have achiev'd deserve thy care;
If to my utmost pow'r with sword and shield

I dar'd the death, unknowing how to yield,

And falling in my rank, still kept the field: ³¹⁰

Then let my arms prevail, by thee sustain'd,
That Emily by conquest may be gain'd.

Have pity on my pains; nor those unknown
To Mars, which, when a lover, were his own.

Venus, the public care of all above,
Thy stubborn heart has soften'd into love:

Now, by her blandishments and pow'rful charms,

When yielded she lay curling in thy arms,
Ev'n by thy shame, if shame it may be call'd,

When Vulcan had thee in his net intrall'd;
(O envied ignominy, sweet disgrace, ³²⁰

When ev'ry god that saw thee wish'd thy place!)

By those dear pleasures, aid my arms in fight,

And make me conquer in my patron's right:

For I am young, a novice in the trade,
The fool of love, unpractic'd to persuade;

And want the soothing arts that catch the fair,

But, caught myself, lie struggling in the snare:

And she I love, or laughs at all my pain,
Or knows her worth too well; and pays me with disdain. ³³⁰

For sure I am, unless I win in arms,
To stand excluded from Emilia's charms;
Nor can my strength avail, unless, by thee
Endued with force, I gain the victory:
Then for the fire which warm'd thy gen'rous
heart,

Pity thy subject's pains, and equal smart.
So be the morrow's sweat and labor mine,
The palm and honor of the conquest thine:
Then shall the war, and stern debate, and
strife

Immortal, be the bus'ness of my life; 340
And in thy fane, the dusty spoils among,
High on the burnish'd roof, my banner shall be hung;

Rank'd with my champions' bucklers, and
below,

With arms revers'd, th' achievements of my foe:

And while these limbs the vital spirit feeds,
While day to night, and night to day
succeeds,

Thy smoking altar shall be fat with food
Of incense, and the grateful steam of blood;
Burnt off'rings morn and ev'ning shall be
thine,

And fires eternal in thy temple shine. 350
This bush of yellow beard, this length of
hair,

Which from my birth inviolate I bear,
Guiltless of steel, and from the razor free, Shall fall a plenteous crop, reserv'd for
thee.

So may my arms with victory be blest,
I ask no more; let fate dispose the rest."

The champion ceas'd; there follow'd in the close

A hollow groan; a murm'ring wind arose;
The rings of ir'n that on the doors were
hung 359

Sent out a jarring sound, and harshly rung:
The bolted gates flew open at the blast;
The storm rush'd in, and Arcite stood
aghast:

The flames were blown aside, yet shone
they bright.

Fann'd by the wind, and gave a ruffled
light.

Then from the ground a scent began to
rise,

Sweet smelling, as accepted sacrifice.

This omen pleas'd, and, as the flames aspire,
With od'rous incense Arcite heaps the fire;
Nor wanted hymns to Mars, or heathen
charms.

At length the nodding statue clash'd his
arms, 370

And, with a sullen sound and feeble cry, Half sunk, and half pronounc'd the word of victory.

For this, with soul devout, he thank'd the
god;

And, of success secure, return'd to his abode.

These vows, thus granted, rais'd a strife
above,

Betwixt the God of War and Queen of
Love.

She, granting first, had right of time to plead;
But he had granted too, nor would recede.

Jove was for Venus; but he fear'd his wife,
And seem'd unwilling to decide the strife; 380

Till Saturn from his leaden throne arose,
And found a way the diff'rence to compose:

Tho', sparing of his grace, to mischief bent,
He seldom does a good with good intent.

Wayward, but wise; by long experience
taught,

To please both parties, for ill ends, he
sought:

For this advantage age from youth has won,
As not to be outridden, tho' outrun.

By fortune he was now to Venus trin'd,
And with stern Mars in Capricorn was
join'd: 390

Of him disposing in his own abode,

He sooth'd the goddess, while he gull'd
the god:

"Cease, daughter, to complain, and stint
the strife:

Thy Palamon shall have his promis'd wife;
And Mars, the lord of conquest, in the
fight

With palm and laurel shall adorn his knight.
Wide is my course, nor turn I to my place Till length of time, and move with tardy
pace.

Man feels me, when I press th' ethereal
plains; 399

My hand is heavy, and the wound remains.
Mine is the shipwreck in a wat'ry sign;

And in an earthy, the dark dungeon mine.
Cold shivering agues, melancholy care,

And bitter blasting winds, and poison'd air,
Are mine, and wilful death, resulting from
despair.

The throttling quinsy 't is my star appoints,
And rheumatisms I send to rack the joints:
When churls rebel against their native
prince,

I arm their hands, and furnish the pretense;

And, housing in the Lion's hateful sign, ⁴¹⁰
Bought senates, and deserting troops are mine.

Mine is the privy pois'ning; I command
Unkindly seasons and ungrateful land.
By me kings' palaces are push'd to ground,
And miners crush'd beneath their mines are found.

'T was I slew Samson, when the pillar'd hall

Fell down and crush'd the many with the fall.

My looking is the sire of pestilence,
That sweeps at once the people and the prince.

Now weep no more, but trust thy grand-sire's art; ⁴²⁰

Mars shall be pleas'd, and thou perform thy part.

'T is ill, tho' diff'rent your complexions are,
The family of heav'n for men should war."
Th' expedient pleas'd, where neither lost his right;

Mars had the day, and Venus had the night.
The management they left to Chronos' care;
Now turn we to th' effect, and sing the war.

In Athens all was pleasure, mirth, and play, ⁴²⁵

All proper to the spring and sprightly May;
Which ev'ry soul inspir'd with such delight,
'T was justing all the day, and love at night.
Heav'n smil'd, and gladdened was the heart of man,

And Venus had the world as when it first began.

At length in sleep their bodies they compose,

And dreamt the future fight, and early rose.

Now scarce the dawning day began to spring,

As at a signal giv'n, the streets with clamors ring:

At once the crowd arose; confus'd and high,

Ev'n from the heav'n was heard a shouting cry;

For Mars was early up, and rous'd the sky. ⁴⁴⁰

The gods came downward to behold the wars,

Sharp'ning their sights, and leaning from their stars.

The neighing of the gen'rous horse was heard,

For battle by the busy groom prepar'd;
Rustling of harness, rattling of the shield,
Clatt'ring of armor, furbish'd for the field.
Crowds to the castle mounted up the street,
Batt'ring the pavement with their coursers' feet:

The greedy sight might there devour the gold ⁴⁴⁹

Of glitt'ring arms, too dazzling to behold;
And polish'd steel, that cast the view aside,
And crested morions, with their plummy pride.

Knights, with a long retinue of their squires,
In gaudy liv'ries march, and quaint attires.
One lac'd the helm, another held the lance;
A third the shining buckler did advance.

The courser paw'd the ground with restless feet,

And snorting foam'd, and champ'd the golden bit.

The smiths and armorers on palfreys ride,
Files in their hands, and hammers at their side, ⁴⁶⁰

And nails for loosen'd spears, and thongs for shields provide.

The yeomen guard the streets, in seemly bands;

And clowns come crowding on with cudgels in their hands.

The trumpets, next the gate, in order plac'd,

Attend the sign to sound the martial blast;
The palace yard is fill'd with floating tides,
And the last comers bear the former to the sides.

The throng is in the midst; the common crew

Shut out, the hall admits the better few.

In knots they stand, or in a rank they walk,
Serious in aspect, earnest in their talk: ⁴⁷¹

Factions, and fav'ring this or t'other side,
As their strong fancies and weak reason guide.

Their wagers back their wishes; numbers hold

With the fair freckled king, and beard of gold:

So vig'rous are his eyes, such rays they cast,
So prominent his eagle's beak is plac'd.

But most their looks on the black monarch bend,

His rising muscles and his brawn commend;

His double-biting ax, and beamy spear, ⁴⁸⁰
Each asking a gigantic force to rear.

All spoke as partial favor mov'd the mind;
And, safe themselves, at others' cost divin'd.

Wak'd by the cries, th' Athenian chief arose,

The knightly forms of combat to dispose;
And passing thro' th' obsequious guards, he
sate

Conspicuous on a throne, sublime in state;
There for the two contending knights he
sent:

Arm'd cap-a-pe, with rev'rence low they
bent;

He smil'd on both, and with superior look Alike their offer'd adoration took. ⁴⁹¹

The people press on ev'ry side to see Their awful prince and hear his high decree.

Then, signing to the heralds with his hand,
They gave his orders from their lofty stand.
Silence is thrice enjoin'd; then thus aloud
The king at arms bespeaks the knights and list'ning crowd:

"Our sovereign lord has ponder'd in his
mind

The means to spare the blood of gentle kind;
And of his grace, and inborn clemency, ⁵⁰⁰

He modifies his first severe decree;
The keener edge of battle to rebate.

The troops for honor fighting, not for hate.
He wills, not death should terminate their
strife;

And wounds, if wounds ensue, be short of
life;

But issues, ere the fight, his dread command,

That slings afar, and poniards hand to hand,
Be banish'd from the field; that none shall
dare

With shorten'd sword to stab in closer war;
But in fair combat fight with manly strength, ⁵¹⁰

Nor push with biting point, but strike at length.

The turney is allow'd but one career
Of the tough ash, with the sharp-grinded
spear;

But knights unhors'd may rise from off the
plain,

And fight on foot their honor to regain;
Nor, if at mischief taken, on the ground
Be slain, but pris'ners to the pillar bound,
At either barrier plac'd; nor, captives made,
Be freed, or arm'd anew the fight invade.

The chief of either side, bereft of life, ⁵²⁰
Or yielded to his foe, concludes the strife.

Thus dooms the lord: now valiant knights
and young,
Fight each his fill with swords and maces
long."

The herald ends; the vaulted firmament
With loud acclains and vast applause is rent:

"Heav'n guard a prince so gracious and so
good,

So just, and yet so provident of blood!"

This was the gen'ral cry. The trumpets
sound,

And warlike symphony is heard around.

The marching troops thro' Athens take their way, ⁵³⁰

The great earl-marshal orders their array.
The fair from high the passing pomp be-
hold;

A rain of flow'rs is from the windows roll'd.
The casements are with golden tissue
spread,

And horses' hoofs, for earth, on silken
tap'stry tread.

The king goes midmost, and the rivals ride
In equal rank, and close his either side.

Next after these, there rode the royal wife,
With Emily, the cause and the reward of
strife.

The following cavalcade, by three and three, ⁵⁴⁰

Proceed by titles marshal'd in degree.

Thus thro' the southern gate they take their
way.

And at the lists arriv'd ere prime of day.
There, parting from the king, the chiefs
divide,

And wheeling east and west, before their many ride.

Th' Athenian monarch mounts his throne
on high,

And after him the queen and Emily;

Next these, the kindred of the crown are
grac'd

With nearer seats, and lords by ladies
plac'd.

Scarce were they seated, when with clamors loud ⁵⁵⁰

In rush'd at once a rude promiscuous crowd;
The guards, and then each other overbare,
And in a moment throng the spacious theater.

Now chang'd the jarring noise to whispers
low,

As winds forsaking seas more softly blow;
When, at the western gate, on which the car

Is plac'd aloft, that bears the God of War, Proud Arcite, ent'ring arm'd before his
train,

Stops at the barrier, and divides the plain.
Red was his banner, and display'd abroad
The bloody colors of his patron god. 561

At that self moment enters Palamon
The gate of Venus and the rising Sun; Wav'd by the wanton winds, his banner
flies,

All maiden white, and shares the people's
eyes.

From east to west, look all the world
around,

Two troops so match'd were never to be
found;

Such bodies built for strength, of equal age,
In stature siz'd; so proud an equipage:
The nicest eye could no distinction make,
Where lay th' advantage, or what side to
take. 571

Thus rang'd, the herald for the last
proclaims

A silence, while they answer'd to their names:

For so the king decreed, to shun with care
The fraud of musters false, the common bane of war.

The tale was just, and then the gates were
clos'd;

And chief to chief, and troop to troop
oppos'd.

The heralds last retir'd, and loudly cried:
"The fortune of the field be fairly tried!"

At this, the challenger with fierce defy His trumpet sounds; the challeng'd makes reply: 581

With clangor rings the field, resounds the vaulted sky.

Their vizors clos'd, their lances in the rest,
Or at the helmet pointed, or the crest,
They vanish from the barrier, speed the
race,

And spurring see decrease the middle space.
A cloud of smoke envelops either host,
And all at once the combatants are lost:
Darkling they join adverse, and shock un-
seen,

Courasers with courasers justling, men with
men; 590

As lab'ring in eclipse, a while they stay,
Till the next blast of wind restores the day.

They look anew; the beauteous form of
fight

Is chang'd, and war appears a grisly sight.
Two troops in fair array one moment
show'd,

The next, a field with fallen bodies strow'd:
Not half the number in their seats are
found;

But men and steeds lie grov'ling on the
ground.

The points of spears are stuck within the
shield,

The steeds without their riders scour the
field. 600

The knights, unhors'd, on foot renew the
fight;

The glitt'ring fauchions cast a gleaming
light:

Hauberks and helms are hew'd with many a wound;

Out spins the streaming blood and dyes the
ground.

The mighty maces with such haste descend,

They break the bones, and make the solid armor bend.

This thrusts amid the throng with furious
force;

Down goes, at once, the horseman and the
horse:

That courser stumbles on the fallen steed,
And, flound'ring, throws the rider o'er his
head. 610

One rolls along, a football to his foes;
One with a broken truncheon deals his
blows.

This halting, this disabled with his wound,
In triumph led, is to the pillar bound,

Where by the king's award he must abide;
There goes a captive led on t'other side.

By fits they cease; and, leaning on the
lance,

Take breath a while, and to new fight advance.

Full oft the rivals met, and neither spar'd 619

His utmost force, and each forgot to ward.
The head of this was to the saddle bent,

That other backward to the crupper sent:
Both were by turns unhors'd; the jealous
blows

Fall thick and heavy, when on foot they
close.

So deep their fauchions bite, that ev'ry stroke

Pierc'd to the quick; and equal wounds
they gave and took.

Borne far asunder by the tides of men,
Like adamant and steel they meet again.

So when a tiger sucks the bullock's blood, ⁶²⁹
A famish'd lion issuing from the wood Roars lordly fierce, and challenges the
food.

Each claims possession, neither will obey,
But both their paws are fasten'd on the
prey;

They bite, they tear; and while in vain
they strive,

The swains come arm'd between, and both to distance drive.

At length, as Fate foredoom'd, and all things tend

By course of time to their appointed end;
So when the sun to west was far declin'd,
And both afresh in mortal battle join'd,
The strong Emetrius came in Arcite's aid,
And Palamon with odds was overlaid: ⁶⁴¹
For, turning short, he struck with all his might

Full on the helmet of th' unwary knight.
Deep was the wound; he stagger'd with the blow

And turn'd him to his unexpected foe;
Whom with such force he struck, he fell'd him down,

And cleft the circle of his golden crown.
But Arcite's men, who now prevail'd in
fight,

Twice ten at once surround the single
knight:

O'erpower'd at length, they force him to the ground, ⁶⁵⁰

Unyielded as he was, and to the pillar
bound;

And King Lycurgus, while he fought in
vain

His friend to free, was tumbled on the
plain.

Who now laments but Palamon, com-
pell'd

No more to try the fortune of the field!
And, worse than death, to view with hateful eyes

His rival's conquest, and renounce the
prize!

The royal judge on his tribunal plac'd,
Who had beheld the fight from first to last,
Bade cease the war; pronouncing from on high, ⁶⁶⁰

Arcite of Thebes had won the beauteous
Emily.

The sound of trumpets to the voice replied,

And round the royal lists the heralds
cried:

"Arcite of Thebes has won the beauteous
bride."

The people rend the skies with vast
applause:

All own the chief, when Fortune owns the
cause.

Arcite is own'd ev'n by the gods above,
And conquer'ing Mars insults the Queen of
Love:

So laugh'd he, when the rightful Titan
fail'd,

And Jove's usurping arms in heav'n prevail'd. ⁶⁷⁰

Laugh'd all the pow'rs who favor tyranny;
And all the standing army of the sky.

But Venus with dejected eyes appears,
And weeping on the lists distill'd her tears;
Her will refus'd, which grieves a woman
most,

And, in her champion foil'd, the cause of Love is lost:

Till Saturn said: "Fair daughter, now be still,

The blust'ring fool has satisfied his will;
His boon is giv'n; his knight has gain'd the
day,

But lost the prize — th' arrears are yet to
pay. ⁶⁸⁰

Thy hour is come, and mine the care shall be

To please thy knight, and set thy promise
free."

Now while the heralds run the lists
around,

And "Arcite, Arcite," heav'n and earth
resound;

A miracle (nor less it could be call'd)
Their joy with unexpected sorrow pall'd.

The victor knight had laid his helm aside,
Part for his ease, the greater part for pride.

Bareheaded, popularly low he bow'd,
And paid the salutations of the crowd; ⁶⁹⁰

Then, spurring at full speed, ran endlong on Where Theseus sat on his imperial throne;

Furious he drove, and upward cast his eye,
Where next the queen was plac'd his

Emily;

Then passing, to the saddlebow he bent —
A sweet regard the gracious virgin lent;

(For women, to the brave an easy prey,
Still follow Fortune, where she leads the way.)

Just then, from earth sprung out a flashing fire,

By Pluto sent, at Saturn's bad desire; ⁷⁰⁰
The startling steed was seiz'd with sudden
fright,

And, bounding, o'er the pommel cast the
knight:

Forward he flew, and pitching on his head,
He quiver'd with his feet, and lay for
dead.

Black was his count'nance in a little space,
For all the blood was gather'd in his face.

Help was at hand: they rear'd him from
the ground,

And from his cumbrous arms his limbs
unbound;

Then lanc'd a vein, and watch'd returning
breath;

It came, but clogg'd with symptoms of his death. ⁷¹⁰

The saddlebow the noble parts had press'd,
All bruise'd and mortified his manly breast.

Him still entranc'd, and in a litter laid,
They bore from field, and to his bed con-
vey'd.

At length he wak'd, and with a feeble cry,
The word he first pronounc'd was Emily.

Meantime the king, tho' inwardly he
mourn'd,

In pomp triumphant to the town return'd, Attended by the chiefs, who fought the
field;

(Now friendly mix'd, and in one troop compell'd;) ⁷²⁰

Compos'd his looks to counterfeited cheer,
And bade them not for Arcite's life to fear.

But that which gladdened all the warrior
train,

Tho' most were sorely wounded, none were
slain.

The surgeons soon despoil'd 'em of their
arms,

And some with salves they cure, and some
with charms;

Foment the bruises, and the pains assuage,
And heal their inward hurts with sov'reign draughts of sage.

The king in person visits all around, ⁷²⁹
Comforts the sick, congratulates the sound;
Honors the princely chiefs, rewards the rest,
And holds for thrice three days a royal
feast.

None was disgrac'd; for falling is no
shame,

And cowardice alone is loss of fame.

The vent'rous knight is from the saddle
thrown;

But 'tis the fault of Fortune, not his own.
If crowds and palms the conqu'ring side
adorn,

The victor under better stars was born:
The brave man seeks not popular applause,

Nor, overpower'd with arms, deserts his cause; ⁷⁴⁰

Unsham'd, tho' foil'd, he does the best he
can;

Force is of brutes, but honor is of man.

Thus Theseus smil'd on all with equal
grace;

And each was set according to his place.
With ease were reconcil'd the diff'ring
parts,

For envy never dwells in noble hearts.
At length they took their leave, the time
expir'd,

Well pleas'd, and to their sev'ral homes
retir'd.

Meanwhile the health of Arcite still impairs;

From bad proceeds to worse, and mocks
the leeches' cares: ⁷⁵⁰

Swoln is his breast, his inward pains increase;

All means are us'd, and all without success.

The clotted blood lies heavy on his heart,
Corrupts, and there remains in spite of art:

Nor breathing veins, nor cupping will prevail;

All outward remedies and inward fail.
The mold of Nature's fabric is destroy'd,

Her vessels compos'd, her virtue void;
The bellows of his lungs begins to swell:

All out of frame is ev'ry secret cell, ⁷⁶⁰
Nor can the good receive, nor bad expel.

Those breathing organs, thus within op-
press'd,

With venom soon distend the sinews of his
breast.

Naught profits him to save abandon'd life,
Nor vomit's upward aid, nor downward laxative.

The midmost region batter'd and destroy'd,
When nature cannot work, th' effect of art is void:

For physic can but mend our crazy state,
Patch an old building, not a new create.

Arcite is doom'd to die in all his pride;
 Must leave his youth, and yield his beau-teous bride, 771
 Gain'd hardly, against right, and unen-joy'd.
 When 't was declar'd all hope of life was
 past,
 Conscience, that of all physic works the
 last,
 Caus'd him to send for Emily in haste.
 With her, at his desire, came Palamon;
 Then, on his pillow rais'd, he thus begun:
 "No language can express the smallest
 part
 Of what I feel, and suffer in my heart, 779
 For you, whom best I love and value most;
 But to your service I bequeath my ghost;
 Which from this mortal body when untied,
 Unseen, unheard, shall hover at your side;
 Nor fright you waking, nor your sleep of-
 fend,
 But wait officious, and your steps attend.
 How I have lov'd, excuse my falt'ring
 tongue,
 My spirit's feeble, and my pains are strong:
 This I may say, I only grieve to die,
 Because I lose my charming Emily:
 To die, when Heav'n had put you in my
 pow'r, 790
 Fate could not choose a more malicious
 hour!
 What greater curse could envious Fortune
 give,
 Than just to die, when I began to live!
 Vain men, how vanishing a bliss we crave,
 Now warm in love, now with'ring in the grave!
 Never, O never more to see the sun!
 Still dark, in a damp vault, and still alone!
 This fate is common; but I lose my breath Near bliss, and yet not blest before my
 death. 799
 Farewell; but take me dying in your arms,
 'Tis all I can enjoy of all your charms:
 This hand I cannot but in death resign;
 Ah, could I live! but while I live 't is mine.
 I feel my end approach, and thus embrac'd, Am pleas'd to die; but hear me speak my
 last.
 Ah, my sweet foe, for you, and you alone,
 I broke my faith with injur'd Palamon.
 But love the sense of right and wrong
 confounds,
 Strong love and proud ambition have no
 bounds.

And much I doubt, should Heav'n my life prolong, 810
 I should return to justify my wrong:
 For while my former flames remain within,
 Repentance is but want of pow'r to sin.
 With mortal hatred I pursued his life;
 Nor he, nor you, were guilty of the strife;
 Nor I, but as I lov'd: yet all combin'd,
 Your beauty and my impotence of mind,
 And his concurrent flame, that blew my
 fire;
 For still our kindred souls had one desire.
 He had a moment's right in point of time;
 Had I seen first, then his had been the
 crime. 821
 Fate made it mine, and justified his right;
 Nor holds this earth a more deserving
 knight,
 For virtue, valor, and for noble blood,
 Truth, honor, all that is compris'd in good;
 So help me Heav'n, in all the world is none
 So worthy to be lov'd as Palamon.
 He loves you too, with such a holy fire,
 As will not, cannot, but with life expire:
 Our vow'd affections both have often tried,
 Nor any love but yours could ours divide.
 Then, by my love's inviolable band, 832
 By my long suff'ring, and my short command,
 If e'er you plight your vows when I am
 gone,
 Have pity on the faithful Palamon."
 This was his last; for Death came on
 amain,
 And exercis'd below his iron reign;
 Then upward to the seat of life he goes:
 Sense fled before him; what he touch'd he froze.
 Yet could he not his closing eyes withdraw,
 Tho' less and less of Emily he saw: 841
 So, speechless, for a little space he lay;
 Then grasp'd the hand he held, and sigh'd his soul away.
 But whither went his soul, let such re-
 late
 Who search the secrets of the future state:
 Divines can say but what themselves believe;
 Strong proofs they have, but not demonstrative:
 For, were all plain, then all sides must
 agree,
 And faith itself be lost in certainty.
 To live uprightly then is sure the best, 850
 To save ourselves, and not to damn the rest.

The soul of Arcite went where heathens go,
Who better live than we, tho' less they
know.

In Palamon a manly grief appears;
Silent, he wept, asham'd to shew his tears:
Emilia shriek'd but once, and then, op-
press'd

With sorrow, sunk upon her lover's breast:
Till Theseus in his arms convey'd with care, ⁸⁵⁸

Far from so sad a sight, the swooning fair.
'T were loss of time her sorrow to relate; }
Ill bears the sex a youthful lover's fate, }
When just approaching to the nuptial
state. }

But like a low-hung cloud, it rains so fast,
That all at once it falls, and cannot last.

The face of things is chang'd, and Athens
now,

That laugh'd so late, becomes the scene of
woe:

Matrons and maids, both sexes, ev'ry state,
With tears lament the knight's untimely
fate.

Not greater grief in falling Troy was seen
For Hector's death; but Hector was not then. ⁸⁷⁰

Old men with dust deform'd their hoary
hair;

The women beat their breasts, their cheeks
they tear.

"Why wouldst thou go," with one consent
they cry,

"When thou hadst gold enough, and Emily?"

Theseus himself, who should have cheer'd
the grief

Of others, wanted now the same relief;
Old Ægeus only could revive his son,
Who various changes of the world had
known,

And strange vicissitudes of human fate,
Still alt'ring, never in a steady state; ⁸⁸⁰
Good after ill, and, after pain, delight;
Alternate like the scenes of day and night.
Since ev'ry man who lives is born to die,
And none can boast sincere felicity,
With equal mind, what happens, let us
bear,

Nor joy nor grieve too much for things
beyond our care.

Like pilgrims to th' appointed place we
tend;

The world's an inn, and death the journey's
end.

Ev'n kings but play; and when their part is done,

Some other, worse or better, mount the throne. ⁸⁹⁰

With words like these the crowd was satisfied,

And so they would have been, had Theseus
died.

But he, their king, was lab'ring in his
mind,

A fitting place for fun'ral pomps to find,
Which were in honor of the dead de-
sign'd.

And after long debate, at last he found (As love itself had mark'd the spot of
ground)

That grove for ever green, that conscious
laund,

Where he with Palamon fought hand to
hand:

That, where he fed his amorous desires ⁹⁰⁰
With soft complaints, and felt his hottest
fires,

There other flames might waste his earthly
part,

And burn his limbs, where love had burn'd
his heart.

This once resolv'd, the peasants were enjoin'd

Sear wood, and firs, and dodder'd oaks to
find.

With sounding axes to the grove they go,
Fell, split, and lay the fuel on a row,
Vulcanian food: a bier is next prepar'd,
On which the lifeless body should be
rear'd,

Cover'd with cloth of gold, on which was laid ⁹¹⁰

The corpse of Arcite, in like robes array'd.
White gloves were on his hands, and on his
head

A wreath of laurel, mix'd with myrtle,
spread.

A sword keen-edg'd within his right he
held,

The warlike emblem of the conquer'd field:
Bare was his manly visage on the bier;
Menac'd his count'nance, ev'n in death severe.

Then to the palace hall they bore the
knight,

To lie in solemn state, a public sight.

Groans, cries, and howlings fill the crowded place, ⁹²⁰

And unaffected sorrow sat on ev'ry face.

Sad Palamon above the rest appears,
 In sable garments, dew'd with gushing tears:
 His auburn locks on either shoulder flow'd,
 Which to the fun'ral of his friend he vow'd:
 But Emily, as chief, was next his side,
 A virgin widow, and a Mourning Bride.
 And that the princely obsequies might be Perform'd according to his high degree,
 The steed that bore him living to the
 fight

Was trapp'd with polish'd steel, all shining bright,
 And cover'd with th' achievements of the
 knight.

The riders rode abreast, and one his shield,
 His lance of cornel wood another held;
 The third his bow, and, glorious to behold,
 The costly quiver, all of burnish'd gold.
 The noblest of the Grecians next appear,
 And, weeping, on their shoulders bore the
 bier;

With sober pace they march'd, and often
 stay'd,
 And thro' the master-street the corpse
 convey'd.

The houses to their tops with black were
 spread,
 And ev'n the pavements were with mourning hid.

The right side of the pall old Ægeus kept,
 And on the left the royal Theseus wept;
 Each bore a golden bowl, of work divine,

With honey fill'd, and milk, and mix'd with ruddy wine.

Then Palamon, the kinsman of the slain,
 And after him appear'd th' illustrious train:
 To grace the pomp, came Emily the bright,
 With cover'd fire, the fun'ral pile to light.
 With high devotion was the service made,
 And all the rites of pagan honor paid:
 So lofty was the pile, a Parthian bow,
 With vigor drawn, must send the shaft
 below.

The bottom was full twenty fathom broad,
 With crackling straw beneath in due proportion strow'd.

The fabric seem'd a wood of rising green,
 With sulphur and bitumen cast between,
 To feed the flames: the trees were unc-
 tuous fir,

And mountain-ash, the mother of the
 spear;

The mourner yew and builder oak were
 there;

The beech, the swimming alder, and the plane,

Hard box, and linden of a softer grain,
 And laurels, which the gods for conqu'r-ing chiefs ordain.

How they were rank'd shall rest untold by
 me,

With nameless Nymphs that liv'd in ev'ry
 tree;

Nor how the Dryads and the woodland train,
 Disherited, ran howling o'er the plain;

Nor how the birds to foreign seats repair'd,
 Or beasts, that bolted out, and saw the forest bar'd;

Nor how the ground, now clear'd, with ghastly fright

Beheld the sudden sun, a stranger to the
 light.

The straw, as first I said, was laid be-
 low:

Of chips and sear wood was the second row;
 The third of greens and timber newly fell'd;
 The fourth high stage the fragrant odors
 held,

And pearls, and precious stones, and rich
 array,

In midst of which, embalm'd, the body lay.
 The service sung, the maid, with mourning
 eyes,

The stubble fir'd; the smold'ring flames
 arise:

This office done, she sunk upon the ground;
 But what she spoke, recover'd from her swoond,

I want the wit in moving words to dress;
 But by themselves the tender sex may guess.

While the devouring fire was burning fast,
 Rich jewels in the flame the wealthy cast;
 And some their shields, and some their lances threw,

And gave the warrior's ghost a warrior's
 due.

Full bowls of wine, of honey, milk, and
 blood,

Were pour'd upon the pile of burning
 wood,

And hissing flames receive, and hungry lick the food.

Then thrice the mounted squadrons ride
 around

The fire, and Arcite's name they thrice re-
 sound:

"Hail, and farewell!" they shouted thrice
 again,

Thrice facing to the left, and thrice they turn'd again:
 Still as they turn'd, they beat their clat-t'ring shields;
 The women mix their cries; and clamor fills the fields.
 The warlike wakes continued all the night,
 And fun'ral games were play'd at new returning light:
 Who naked wrestled best, besmear'd with
 oil, 1000
 Or who with gauntlets gave or took the foil,
 I will not tell you, nor would you attend;
 But briefly haste to my long story's end.
 I pass the rest; the year was fully
 mourn'd,
 And Palamon long since to Thebes return'd:
 When, by the Grecians' general consent,
 At Athens Theseus held his parliament.
 Among the laws that pass'd it was decreed,
 That conquer'd Thebes from bondage should be freed; 1009
 Reserving homage to th' Athenian throne,
 To which the sov'reign summon'd Palamon.
 Unknowing of the cause, he took his way,
 Mournful in mind, and still in black array.
 The monarch mounts the throne, and,
 plac'd on high,
 Commands into the court the beauteous
 Emily:
 So call'd, she came; the senate rose, and
 paid
 Becoming rev'rence to the royal maid.
 And first, soft whispers thro' th' assembly
 went;
 With silent wonder then they watch'd th'
 event: 1019
 All hush'd, the king arose with awful grace;
 Deep thought was in his breast, and counsel in his face.
 At length he sigh'd; and having first pre-
 par'd
 Th' attentive audience, thus his will de-
 clar'd:
 "The Cause and Spring of motion, from
 above,
 Hung down on earth the golden chain of
 love:
 Great was th' effect, and high was his in-
 tent,
 When peace among the jarring seeds he
 sent.
 Fire, flood, and earth, and air by this were
 bound,

And love, the common link, the new creation crown'd.
 The chain still holds; for, tho' the forms
 decay, 1030
 Eternal matter never wears away.
 The same First Mover certain bounds has
 plac'd,
 How long those perishable forms shall last;
 Nor can they last beyond the time assign'd
 By that all-seeing, and all-making mind:
 Shorten their hours they may, for will is
 free,
 But never pass th' appointed destiny.
 So men oppress'd, when weary of their
 breath,
 Throw off the burden, and suborn their
 death.
 Then, since those forms begin, and have their end, 1040
 On some unalter'd cause they sure depend:
 Parts of the whole are we; but God the whole,
 Who gives us life and animating soul.
 For nature cannot from a part derive
 That being which the whole can only give:
 He perfect, stable; but imperfect we,
 Subject to change, and diff'rent in degree;
 Plants, beasts, and man; and as our organs
 are,
 We more or less of his perfection share.
 But by a long descent, th' ethereal fire
 Corrupts; and forms, the mortal part, expire: 1051
 As he withdraws his virtue, so they pass,
 And the same matter makes another mass.
 This law th' Omniscient Pow'r was pleas'd
 to give,
 That ev'ry kind should by succession live:
 That individuals die, his will ordains;
 The propagated species still remains.
 The monarch oak, the patriarch of the trees,
 Shoots rising up, and spreads by slow degrees;
 Three centuries he grows, and three he stays, 1060
 Supreme in state, and in three more decays:
 So wears the paving pebble in the street,
 And towns and tow'rs their fatal periods
 meet;
 So rivers, rapid once, now naked lie, Forsaken of their springs, and leave their channels dry.
 So man, at first a drop, dilates with heat;
 Then, form'd, the little heart begins to
 beat;

Secret he feeds, unknowing, in the cell;
 At length, for hatching ripe, he breaks the shell, ¹⁰⁶⁹
 And struggles into breath, and cries for aid;
 Then, helpless, in his mother's lap is laid.
 He creeps, he walks, and issuing into man,
 Grudges their life, from whence his own
 began;

Reckless of laws, affects to rule alone,
 Anxious to reign, and restless on the throne:
 First vegetive, then feels, and reasons last;
 Rich of three souls, and lives all three to waste.

Some thus; but thousands more in flow'r of age:

For few arrive to run the latter stage.
 Sunk in the first, in battle some are slain,
 And others whelm'd beneath the stormy main. ¹⁰⁸¹

What makes all this, but Jupiter the king,
 At whose command we perish, and we spring?

Then 't is our best, since thus ordain'd to die,
 To make a virtue of necessity;
 Take what he gives, since to rebel is vain;
 The bad grows better, which we well sus-tain:

And could we choose the time, and choose
 aright,

'T is best to die, our honor at the height.
 When we have done our ancestors no shame, ¹⁰⁹⁰

But serv'd our friends, and well secur'd our
 fame;

Then should we wish our happy life to
 close,

And leave no more for fortune to dispose:
 So should we make our death a glad relief From future shame, from sickness, and from grief;

Enjoying while we live the present hour,
 And dying in our excellence and flow'r.
 Then round our deathbed ev'ry friend should run,

And joy us of our conquest, early won;
 While the malicious world with envious
 tears ¹¹⁰⁰

Should grudge our happy end, and wish it theirs.

Since then our Arcite is with honor dead, }
 Why should we mourn, that he so soon is }
 freed,

Or call untimely what the gods decreed? }
 With grief as just, a friend may be de- }
 plor'd,

From a foul prison to free air restor'd.
 Ought he to thank his kinsman or his wife,
 Could tears recall him into wretched life!
 Their sorrow hurts themselves; on him is
 lost;

And, worse than both, offends his happy ghost. ¹¹¹⁰

What then remains, but, after past annoy,
 To take the good vicissitude of joy?

To thank the gracious gods for what they
 give,

Possess our souls, and while we live, to
 live?

Ordain we then two sorrows to combine,
 And in one point th' extremes of grief to
 join;

That thence resulting joy may be renew'd,
 As jarring notes in harmony conclude.

Then I propose that Palamon shall be
 In marriage join'd with beauteous Emily;
 For which already I have gain'd th' assent
 Of my free people in full parliament. ¹¹²²

Long love to her has borne the faithful
 knight,

And well deserv'd, had Fortune done him
 right:

'T is time to mend her fault, since Emily
 By Arcite's death from former vows is free.
 If you, fair sister, ratify th' accord,
 And take him for your husband and your
 lord,

'T is no dishonor to confer your grace
 On one descended from a royal race; ¹¹³⁰
 And were he less, yet years of service past
 From grateful souls exact reward at last:
 Pity is Heav'n's and yours; nor can she find
 A throne so soft as in a woman's mind."

He said; she blush'd; and, as o'eraw'd by might,
 Seem'd to give Theseus what she gave the
 knight.

Then, turning to the Theban, thus he said:
 "Small arguments are needful to persuade Your temper to comply with my command;" ¹¹³⁹

And speaking thus, he gave Emilia's hand.
 Smil'd Venus, to behold her own true
 knight

Obtain the conquest, tho' he lost the fight;
 And bless'd with nuptial bliss the sweet laborious night. }

Eros and Anteros, on either side,
 One fir'd the bridegroom, and one warm'd
 the bride;

And long-attending Hymen from above

Shower'd on the bed the whole Idalian grove.
 All of a tenor was their after life,
 No day discolor'd with domestic strife;
 No jealousy, but mutual truth believ'd,
 Secure repose, and kindness undeceiv'd.
 Thus Heav'n, beyond the compass of his
 thought, 1152
 Sent him the blessing he so dearly bought.
 So may the Queen of Love long duty
 bless,
 And all true lovers find the same success.

THE END OF THE THIRD BOOK

TO MY HONOR'D KINSMAN, JOHN DRIDEN, OF CHESTER-TON, IN THE COUNTY OF HUNTINGDON, ESQUIRE

How blest is he, who leads a country life, Unvex'd with anxious cares, and void of
 strife!

Who, studying peace and shunning civil
 rage,

Enjoy'd his youth, and now enjoys his age:
 All who deserve his love, he makes his own;
 And, to be lov'd himself, needs only to be
 known.

Just, good, and wise, contending neighbors come,
 From your award to wait their final doom;
 And, foes before, return in friendship
 home.

Without their cost, you terminate the
 cause, 10

And save th' expense of long litigious laws:
 Where suits are travers'd, and so little won,
 That he who conquers is but last undone.

Such are not your decrees; but so de-
 sign'd,
 The sanction leaves a lasting peace behind:

Like your own soul, serene; a pattern of
 your mind.

Promoting concord, and composing strife,
 Lord of yourself, uncumber'd with a wife;
 Where, for a year, a month, perhaps a
 night,

Long penitence succeeds a short delight: 20 Minds are so hardly match'd, that ev'n the
 first,

Tho' pair'd by Heav'n, in Paradise were
 curst.

For man and woman, tho' in one they grow,
 Yet, first or last, return again to two.

He to God's image, she to his was made;
 So, farther from the fount, the stream at random stray'd.

How could he stand, when, put to double
 pain,

He must a weaker than himself sustain!
 Each might have stood perhaps, but each
 alone;

Two wrestlers help to pull each other
 down.

Not that my verse would blemish all the fair;

But yet if some be bad, 't is wisdom to beware;

And better shun the bait than struggle in the snare. 30

Thus have you shunn'd, and shun, the married state,

Trusting as little as you can to fate.

No porter guards the passage of your
 door,

T' admit the wealthy, and exclude the poor;
 For God, who gave the riches, gave the
 heart,

To sanctify the whole, by giving part.
 Heav'n, who foresaw the will, the means has wrought, 40

And to the second son a blessing brought;
 The first-begotten had his father's share,
 But you, like Jacob, are Rebecca's heir.

So may your stores and fruitful fields
 increase;

And ever be you blest, who live to bless.
 As Ceres sow'd, where'er her chariot flew;
 As Heav'n in desarts rain'd the bread of
 dew;

So free to many, to relations most,
 You feed with manna your own Israel host.

With crowds attended of your ancient
 race, 50

You seek the champion sports or sylvan
 chase;

With well-breath'd beagles you surround
 the wood,

Ev'n then industrious of the common good;
 And often have you brought the wily fox
 To suffer for the firstlings of the flocks; Chas'd ev'n amid the folds, and made to bleed,

Like felons, where they did the murd'rous deed.

This fiery game your active youth main-
 tain'd,

Not yet by years extinguish'd, tho' re-
 strain'd:

You season still with sports your serious
hours; 60

For age but tastes of pleasures, youth devours.

The hare in pastures or in plains is found,
Emblem of human life, who runs the round;
And after all his wand'ring ways are }
done,

His circle fills and ends where he begun, }
Just as the setting meets the rising sun. }

Thus princes ease their cares; but happier he

Who seeks not pleasure thro' necessity, Than such as once on slipp'ry thrones were
plac'd;

And chasing, sigh to think themselves are chas'd. 70

So liv'd our sires, ere doctors learn'd to kill,

And multiplied with theirs the weekly bill.
The first physicians by debauch were made;
Excess began, and sloth sustains the trade.
Pity the gen'rous kind their cares bestow
To search forbidden truths; (a sin to know:)
To which if human science could attain,
The doom of death, pronounc'd by God,
were vain.

In vain the leech would interpose delay;
Fate fastens first, and vindicates the prey.
What help from art's endeavors can we
have? 81

Gibbons but guesses, nor is sure to save; }
But Maurus sweeps whole parishes, and } peoples ev'ry grave;

And no more mercy to mankind will use,
Than when he robb'd and murder'd Maro's
Muse.

Wouldst thou be soon dispatch'd, and perish whole?

Trust Maurus with thy life, and M-lb-rne with thy soul.

By chase our long-liv'd fathers earn'd their food;

Toil strung the nerves and purified the
blood:

But we, their sons, a pamper'd race of men,
Are dwindled down to threescore years and
ten. 91

Better to hunt in fields for health un-
bought

Than fee the doctor for a nauseous draught.
The wise for cure on exercise depend;
God never made his work for man to mend.

The tree of knowledge, once in Eden
plac'd,

Was easy found, but was forbid the taste:
O had our grandsire walk'd without his
wife,

He first had sought the better plant of life!
Now, both are lost; yet, wand'ring in the dark, 100

Physicians, for the tree, have found the bark.

They, lab'ring for relief of humankind, }
With sharpen'd sight some remedies may }
find;

Th' apothecary train is wholly blind.
From files a random recipe they take,
And many deaths of one prescription make.
Garth, gen'rous as his Muse, prescribes and gives;

The shopman sells, and by destruction lives:
Ungrateful tribe! who, like the viper's
brood,

From med'cine issuing, suck their mother's
blood! 110

Let these obey, and let the learn'd prescribe,

That men may die without a double bribe:
Let them but under their superiors kill,
When doctors first have sign'd the bloody bill;

He escapes the best, who, nature to repair,
Draws physic from the fields, in draughts of vital air.

You hoard not health for your own private use,

But on the public spend the rich produce;
When, often urg'd, unwilling to be great,
Your country calls you from your lov'd
retreat, 120

And sends to senates, charg'd with common care,

Which none more shuns, and none can better bear.

Where could they find another form'd so
fit,

To poise with solid sense a sprightly wit?
Were these both wanting, (as they both abound,)

Where could so firm integrity be found?
Well-born, and wealthy, wanting no support,

You steer betwixt the country and the court;

Nor gratify whate'er the great desire,
Nor grudging give what public needs require. 130

Part must be left, a fund when foes invade;
And part employ'd to roll the wat'ry trade:

Ev'n Canaan's happy land, when worn with toil,
Requir'd a sabbath year to mend the meager
soil.

Good senators (and such are you) so give,
That kings may be supplied, the people thrive.

And he, when want requires, is truly wise,
Who slights not foreign aids, nor over-buys,
But on our native strength, in time of need, relies.

Munster was bought, we boast not the success;
Who fights for gain, for greater makes his
peace.

Our foes, compell'd by need, have peace
embrac'd;

The peace both parties want is like to last:
Which if secure, securely we may trade;
Or, not secure, should never have been
made.

Safe in ourselves, while on ourselves we
stand,

The sea is ours, and that defends the land.
Be, then, the naval stores the nation's care,
New ships to build, and batter'd to repair.

Observe the war, in ev'ry annual course;
What has been done was done with British
force:

Namur subdued is England's palm alone;
The rest besieg'd, but we constrain'd the
town:

We saw th' event that follow'd our success;
France, tho' pretending arms, pursued the
peace;

Oblig'd, by one sole treaty, to restore
What twenty years of war had won before.
Enough for Europe has our Albion fought:
Let us enjoy the peace our blood has
bought.

When once the Persian king was put to
flight,

The weary Macedons refus'd to fight,
Themselves their own mortality confess'd,
And left the son of Jove to quarrel for the
rest.

Ev'n victors are by victories undone;
Thus Hannibal, with foreign laurels won,
To Carthage was recall'd, too late to keep his own.

While sore of battle, while our wounds are
green,

Why should we tempt the doubtful die
again?

In wars renew'd, uncertain of success;
Sure of a share, as umpires of the peace.

A patriot both the king and country serves;

Prerogative and privilege preserves:
Of each our laws the certain limit show;
One must not ebb, nor t'other overflow.

Between the prince and parliament we
stand;

The barriers of the state on either hand:
May neither overflow, for then they drown the land!

When both are full, they feed our blest
abode;

Like those that water'd once the paradise
of God.

Some overpoise of sway by turns they
share;

In peace the people, and the prince in
war:

Consuls of mod'rate pow'r in calms were
made;

When the Gauls came, one sole dictator
sway'd.

Patriots, in peace, assert the people's
right;

With noble stubbornness resisting might:
No lawless mandates from the court receive,

Nor lend by force, but in a body give.
Such was your gen'rous grandsire; free to grant

In parliaments that weigh'd their prince's want:

But so tenacious of the common cause,
As not to lend the king against his laws;
And, in a loathsome dungeon doom'd to
lie,

In bonds retain'd his birthright liberty,
And sham'd oppression, till it set him
free.

O true descendant of a patriot line,
Who, while thou shar'st their luster, lend'st
'em thine,

Vouchsafe this picture of thy soul to see;
'T is so far good, as it resembles thee.

The beauties to th' original I owe;
Which when I miss, my own defects I show:
Nor think the kindred Muses thy disgrace;
A poet is not born in ev'ry race.

Two of a house few ages can afford;
One to perform, another to record.

Praiseworthy actions are by thee embrac'd;
And 't is my praise, to make thy praises
last.

For ev'n when death dissolves our human
frame,
The soul returns to heav'n, from whence it came;
Earth keeps the body, verse preserves the
fame.

MELEAGER AND ATALANTA

OUT OF THE EIGHTH BOOK OF OVID'S
METAMORPHOSES

CONNECTION TO THE FORMER STORY

Ovid, having told how Theseus had freed Athens from the tribute of children which was impos'd on them by Minos, King of Creta, by killing the Minotaur, here makes a digression to the story of Meleager and Atalanta, which is one of the most inartificial connections in all the Metamorphoses: for he only says that Theseus obtain'd such honor from that combat that all Greece had recourse to him in their necessities: and, amongst others, Calydon, tho' the hero of that country, Prince Meleager, was then living.

FROM him the Calydonians sought relief,
Tho' valiant Meleagrus was their chief.
The cause, a boar, who ravag'd far and
near,
Of Cynthia's wrath th' avenging minister.
For (Eneus, with autumnal plenty blest,
By gifts to Heav'n his gratitude express'd:
Cull'd sheafs, to Ceres; to Lyæus, wine;
To Pan and Pales, offer'd sheep and kine;
And fat of olives, to Minerva's shrine.
Beginning from the rural gods, his hand
Was lib'ral to the pow'rs of high command:
Each deity in ev'ry kind was blest,
Till at Diana's fane th' invidious honor ceas'd.

Wrath touches ev'n the gods; the Queen of Night,
Fir'd with disdain, and jealous of her right:
"Unhonor'd tho' I am, at least," said she,
"Not unreveng'd that impious act shall be."
Swift as the word, she sped the boar away,
With charge on those devoted fields to prey.
No larger bulls th' Egyptian pastures feed,
And none so large Sicilian meadows breed:
His eyeballs glare with fire, suffus'd with
blood;
His neck shoots up a thickset thorny wood;
His bristled back a trench impal'd appears,

And stands erected, like a field of spears.
Froth fills his chaps, he sends a grunting
sound,
And part he churns, and part befoams the
ground.
For tusks with Indian elephants he strove,
And Jove's own thunder from his mouth
he drove.

He burns the leaves; the scorching blast
invades
The tender corn, and shrivels up the blades:
Or, suff'ring not their yellow beards to
rear,

He tramples down the spikes, and intercepts
the year.

In vain the barns expect their promis'd
load;

Nor barns at home, nor reeks are heap'd abroad:

In vain the hinds the threshing-floor pre-
pare,

And exercise their flails in empty air.

With olives ever green the ground is
strow'd,

And grapes ungather'd shed their gen'rous
blood.

Amid the fold he rages, nor the sheep
Their shepherds, nor the grooms their bulls can keep.

From fields to walls the frighted rabble
run,

Nor think themselves secure within the
town;

Till Meleagros, and his chosen crew,
Contemn the danger, and the praise pursue.
Fair Leda's twins — in time to stars decreed —

One fought on foot, one curb'd the fiery
steed;

Then issued forth fam'd Jason after these,
Who mann'd the foremost ship that sail'd
the seas;

Then Theseus, join'd with bold Perithous,
came,

A single concord in a double name:

The Thestian sons, Idas who swiftly ran,
And Cæneus, once a woman, now a man.

Lyceus, with eagle's eyes, and lion's heart;
Leucippus, with his never-erring dart:

Acæstus, Phileus, Phœnix, Telamon,

Echion, Lelex, and Eurytion,

Achilles' father, and great Phocus' son;

Dryas the fierce, and Hippasus the strong,

With twice old Iolas, and Nestor then but
young;

Laertes active, and Ancæus bold;
 Mopsus the sage, who future things fore-
 told,
 And *t'other seer yet by his wife *Amphi-unsold. *Amphiaraus.

A thousand others of immortal fame;
 Among the rest fair Atalanta came,
 Grace of the woods: a diamond buckle
 bound
 Her vest behind, that else had flow'd upon
 the ground,
 And shew'd her buskin'd legs; her head was
 bare,
 But for her native ornament of hair,
 Which in a simple knot was tied above: 70
 Sweet negligence! unheeded bait of love!
 Her sounding quiver on her shoulder tied,
 One hand a dart, and one a bow supplied.
 Such was her face, as in a nymph dis-
 play'd

A fair fierce boy, or in a boy betray'd
 The blushing beauties of a modest maid. }
 The Calydonian chief at once the dame
 Beheld, at once his heart receiv'd the flame, With heav'n's averse. "O happy youth," he
 cried,
 "For whom thy fates reserve so fair a
 bride!" 80

He sigh'd, and had no leisure more to say;
 His honor call'd his eyes another way,
 And forc'd him to pursue the now neglected prey.

There stood a forest on a mountain's brow,
 Which overlook'd the shaded plains below.
 No sounding ax presum'd those trees to
 bite;
 Coeval with the world, a venerable sight.
 The heroes there arriv'd, some spread
 around
 The toils, some search the footsteps on
 the ground,
 Some from the chains the faithful dogs
 unbound. 90

Of action eager, and intent in thought,
 The chiefs their honorable danger sought.
 A valley stood below; the common drain
 Of waters from above, and falling rain:
 The bottom was a moist and marshy ground,
 Whose edges were with bending osiers
 crown'd;
 The knotty bulrush next in order stood,
 And all within of reeds a trembling wood.
 From hence the boar was rous'd, and sprung amain, 99
 Like lightning sudden, on the warrior train;

Beats down the trees before him, shakes
 the ground;
 The forest echoes to the crackling sound;
 Shout the fierce youth, and clamors ring
 around.

All stood with their protended spears pre-
 par'd;
 With broad steel heads the brandish'd weapons glar'd.

The beast impetuous with his tusks aside Deals glancing wounds; the fearful dogs
 divide:
 All spend their mouth aloof, but none
 abide.

Echion threw the first, but miss'd his mark,
 And stuck his boar-spear on a maple's bark.
 Then Jason; and his javelin seem'd to take,
 But fail'd with overforce, and whizz'd above his back. 112

Mopsus was next; but, ere he threw, ad-
 dress'd
 To Phœbus thus: "O patron, help thy priest;
 If I adore, and ever have ador'd
 Thy pow'r divine, thy present aid afford;
 That I may reach the beast." The god allow'd

His pray'r, and, smiling, gave him what he could:
 He reach'd the savage, but no blood he
 drew;

Dian unarm'd the javelin as it flew. 120
 This chaf'd the boar, his nostrils flames expire,
 And his red eyeballs roll with living fire.
 Whirl'd from a sling, or from an engine
 thrown,
 Amid the foes, so flies a mighty stone,
 As flew the beast; the left wing put to
 flight,
 The chiefs o'erborne, he rushes on the right.
 Empalamos and Pelagon he laid In dust, and next to death, but for their fellows' aid.

Onesimus far'd worse, prepar'd to fly; 129
 The fatal fang drove deep within his thigh,
 And cut the nerves; the nerves no more
 sustain
 The bulk; the bulk unpropp'd falls headlong on the plain.

Nestor had fail'd the fall of Troy to see;
 But, leaning on his lance, he vaulted on a
 tree;
 Then gath'ring up his feet, look'd down
 with fear,

And thought his monstrous foe was still too near.

Against a stump his tusk the monster grinds,

And in the sharpen'd edge new vigor finds;
Then, trusting to his arms, young Othrys found,

And ranch'd his hips with one continued wound. ¹⁴⁰

Now Leda's twins, the future stars, appear;
White were their habits, white their horses were;

Conspicuous both, and both in act to throw,
Their trembling lances brandish'd at the foe:
Nor had they miss'd; but he to thickets fled,
Conceal'd from aiming spears, not pervious to the steed.

But Telamon rush'd in, and happ'd to meet
A rising root, that held his fasten'd feet;
So down he fell; whom, sprawling on the ground,

His brother from the wooden gyves unbound. ¹⁵⁰

Meantime the virgin huntress was not slow

T' expel the shaft from her contracted bow:
Beneath his ear the fasten'd arrow stood,
And from the wound appear'd the trickling blood.

She blush'd for joy; but Meleagros rais'd
His voice with loud applause, and the fair archer prais'd.

He was the first to see, and first to show
His friends the marks of the successful blow.

"Nor shall thy valor want the praises due,"
He said; a virtuous envy seiz'd the crew.
They shout; the shouting animates their hearts, ¹⁶¹

And all at once employ their thronging darts;

But out of order thrown, in air they join;
And multitude makes frustrate the design.
With both his hands the proud Ancæus takes,

And flourishes his double-liting ax;
Then forward to his fate, he took a stride
Before the rest, and to his fellows cried:
"Give place, and mark the diff'rence, if you can,

Between a woman warrior and a man. ¹⁷⁰

The boar is doom'd; nor, tho' Diana lend Her aid, Diana can her beast defend."

Thus boasted he; then stretch'd, on tiptoe stood,

Secure to make his empty promise good.
But the more wary beast prevents the blow,
And upward rips the groin of his audacious foe.

Ancæus falls; his bowels from the wound
Rush out, and clotted blood distains the ground.

Perithous, no small portion of the war,
Press'd on, and shook his lance; to whom from far ¹⁸⁰

Thus Theseus cried: "O stay, my better part,

My more than mistress; of my heart, the heart:

The strong may fight aloof; Ancæus tried
His force too near, and by presuming died."
He said, and, while he spake, his javelin threw:

Hissing in air th' unerring weapon flew;
But on an arm of oak, that stood betwixt
The marksman and the mark, his lance he fix'd.

Once more bold Jason threw, but fail'd } to wound
The boar, and slew an undeserving }
hound; ¹⁹⁰
And thro' the dog the dart was nail'd to }
ground.

Two spears from Meleager's hand were sent,

With equal force, but various in th' event:
The first was fix'd in earth, the second stood
On the boar's bristled back, and deeply drank his blood.

Now while the tortur'd salvage turns around,

And flings about his foam, impatient of the wound,

The wound's great author, close at hand, provokes

His rage, and plies him with redoubled strokes;

Wheels as he wheels, and with his pointed dart ²⁰⁰

Explores the nearest passage to his heart.
Quick and more quick he spins in giddy gires,

Then falls, and in much foam his soul expires.

This act with shouts heav'n-high the friendly band

Applaud, and strain in theirs the victor hand.

Then all approach the slain with vast surprise,

Admire on what a breadth of earth he lies;
And, scarce secure, reach out their spears
afar,

And blood their points, to prove their partnership of war.

But he, the conqu'ring chief, his foot
impress'd 210

On the strong neck of that destructive beast;
And, gazing on the nymph with ardent eyes,
"Accept," said he, "fair Nonacrine, my
prize;

And, tho' inferior, suffer me to join My labors, and my part of praise, with thine:"

At this presents her with the tusky head
And chine, with rising bristles roughly
spread.

Glad, she receiv'd the gift; and seem'd to
take

With double pleasure, for the giver's sake.
The rest were seiz'd with sullen discontent,
And a deaf murmur thro' the squadron went:
All envied; but the Thestyan brethren
show'd 222

The least respect, and thus they vent their spleen aloud:

"Lay down those honor'd spoils, nor think
to share,

Weak woman as thou art, the prize of war:
Ours is the title, thine a foreign claim,
Since Meleagros from our lineage came.

Trust not thy beauty; but restore the prize,
Which he, besotted on that face and eyes,
Would rend from us." At this, inflam'd with spite, 230

From her they snatch the gift, from him the giver's right.

But soon th' impatient prince his fauchion
drew,

And cried: "Ye robbers of another's due,
Now learn the diff'rence, at your proper
cost,

Betwixt true valor and an empty boast."

At this advanc'd, and, sudden as the word,
In proud Plexippus' bosom plung'd the
sword:

Toxeus amaz'd, and with amazement slow,
Or to revenge, or ward the coming blow, Stood doubting; and, while doubting thus
he stood, 240

Receiv'd the steel bath'd in his brother's
blood.

Pleas'd with the first, unknown the second
news,

Althæa to the temples pays their dues

For her son's conquest; when at length }
appear

Her grisly brethren stretch'd upon the bier.

Pale at the sudden sight, she chang'd her
cheer,

And with her cheer her robes; but hearing
tell

The cause, the manner, and by whom they fell,

'T was grief no more, or grief and rage were
one 249

Within her soul; at last 't was rage alone;
Which burning upwards in succession dries
The tears that stood consid'ring in her eyes.

There lay a log unlighted on the hearth:
When she was lab'ring in the throes of birth
For th' unborn chief, the Fatal Sisters came,
And rais'd it up, and toss'd it on the flame:
Then on the rock a scanty measure place
Of vital flax, and turn'd the wheel apace;
And turning sung: "To this red brand and
thee,

O newborn babe, we give an equal destiny:" 260

So vanish'd out of view. The frightened dame Sprung hasty from her bed, and quench'd
the flame:

The log, in secret lock'd, she kept with care;
And that, while thus preserv'd, preserv'd her heir.

This brand she now produc'd; and first she strows

The hearth with heaps of chips, and after
blows;

Thrice heav'd her hand, and heav'd, she thrice repress'd:

The sister and the mother long contest,
Two doubtful titles in one tender breast;
And now her eyes and cheeks with fury
glow, 270

Now pale her cheeks, her eyes with pity flow;
Now low'ring looks presage approaching storms,

And now prevailing love her face reforms.
Resolv'd, she doubts again; the tears she dried

With burning rage are by new tears sup-
plied;

And as a ship, which winds and waves
assail,

Now with the current drives, now with the gale,

Both opposite, and neither long prevail —
She feels a double force; by turns obeys

Th' imperious tempest, and th' impetuous
seas: 280

So fares Althæa's mind; she first relents
With pity, of that pity then repents.
Sister and mother long the scales divide,
But the beam nodded on the sister's side.
Sometimes she softly sigh'd, then roar'd
aloud;

But sighs were stifled in the cries of blood.
The pious impious wretch at length de-
creed,

To please her brother's ghost, her son should
bleed;

And when the fun'ral flames began to rise,
"Receive," she said, "a sister's sacrifice: 290

A mother's bowels burn." High in her hand, Thus while she spoke, she held the fatal
brand;

Then thrice before the kindled pile she
bow'd,

And the three Furies thrice invok'd aloud:
"Come, come, revenging sisters, come and
view

A sister paying her dead brothers' due:
A crime I punish, and a crime commit;
But blood for blood, and death for death is
fit;

Great crimes must be with greater crimes repaid,

And second funerals on the former laid. 300

Let the whole household in one ruin fall,
And may Diana's curse o'ertake us all.
Shall fate to happy (Æneus still allow One son, while Thestius stands depriv'd of two?

Better three lost, than one unpunish'd go. } Take then, dear ghosts, (while yet, admitted
new

In hell, you wait my duty.) take your due;
A costly offering on your tomb is laid,
When with my blood the price of yours is
paid.

"Ah! whither am I hurried? Ah! for-
give, 310

Ye shades, and let your sister's issue live;
A mother cannot give him death; tho' he Deserves it, he deserves it not from me.

"Then shall th' unpunish'd wretch insult
the slain?

Triumphant live? nor only live, but reign?
While you, thin shades, the sport of winds,
are toss'd

O'er dreary plains, or dread the burning
coast.

I cannot, cannot bear; 't is past, 't is done;
Perish this impious, this detested son;
Perish his sire, and perish I withal; 320
And let the house's heir and the hop'd kingdom fall.

"Where is the mother fled, her pious love,
And where the pains with which ten months
I strove!

Ah! hadst thou died, my son, in infant years, Thy little hearse had been bedew'd with
tears.

"Thou liv'st by me; to me thy breath resign;

Mine is the merit, the demerit thine.
Thy life by double title I require,
Once giv'n at birth, and once preserv'd from
fire: 329

One murder pay, or add one murder more,
And me to them who fell by thee restore.

"I would, but cannot: my son's image
stands

Before my sight: and now their angry hands
My brothers hold, and vengeance these exact;

This pleads compassion, and repents the fact.
"He pleads in vain, and I pronounce his
doom:

My brothers, tho' unjustly, shall o'ercome.
But having paid their injur'd ghosts their
due,

My son requires my death, and mine shall his pursue." 339

At this, for the last time she lifts her hand, Averts her eyes, and half unwilling drops
the brand.

The brand, amid the flaming fuel thrown,
Or drew, or seem'd to draw, a dying groan;
The fires themselves but faintly lick'd their
prey,

Then loath'd their impious food, and would have shrunk away.

Just then the hero cast a doleful cry,
And in those absent flames began to fry:
The blind contagion rag'd within his veins,
But he with manly patience bore his pains;
He fear'd not fate, but only griev'd to die Without an honest wound, and by a death
so dry. 351

"Happy Anceus," thrice aloud he cried,
"With what becoming fate in arms he
died!"

Then call'd his brothers, sisters, sire, around,
And her to whom his nuptial vows were
bound;

Perhaps his mother; a long sigh he drew,

And his voice failing, took his last adieu:
For, as the flames augment, and as they stay
At their full height, then languish to decay;
They rise, and sink by fits; at last they soar
In one bright blaze, and then descend no more: ³⁶¹

Just so his inward heats, at height, impair, Till the last burning breath shoots out the soul in air.

Now lofty Calydon in ruins lies;
All ages, all degrees unsluice their eyes;
And heav'n and earth resound with murmurs, groans, and cries. }

Matrons and maidens beat their breasts, and tear

Their habits, and root up their scatter'd
hair.

The wretched father, father now no more,
With sorrow sunk, lies prostrate on the floor; ³⁷⁰

Deforms his hoary locks with dust obscene,
And curses age, and loathes a life prolong'd
with pain.

By steel her stubborn soul his mother freed,
And punish'd on herself her impious deed.

Had I a hundred tongues, a wit so large
As could their hundred offices discharge;
Had Phœbus all his Helicon bestow'd,
In all the streams inspiring all the god;
Those tongues, that wit, those streams, that god in vain

Would offer to describe his sisters' pain. ³⁸⁰
They beat their breasts with many a bruising
blow,

Till they turn'd livid, and corrupt the snow.
The corpse they cherish, while the corpse
remains,

And exercise and rub with fruitless pains;
And when to fun'ral flames 't is borne away,
They kiss the bed on which the body lay:
And when those fun'ral flames no longer
burn,

(The dust compos'd within a pious urn,)
Ev'n in that urn their brother they confess,
And hug it in their arms, and to their bosoms press. ³⁹⁰

His tomb is rais'd; then, stretch'd along
the ground,
Those living monuments his tomb surround:
Ev'n to his name, inscrib'd, their tears they
pay,

Till tears and kisses wear his name away.

But Cynthia now had all her fury spent,
Not with less ruin than a race content:
Excepting Gorge, perish'd all the seed,

And * her whom Heav'n for Hercules * Dejadecreed. nira.

Satiate at last, no longer she pursued ³⁹⁹
The weeping sisters; but with wings endued,
And horny beaks, and sent to flit in air;
Who yearly round the tomb in feather'd flocks repair.

SIGISMONDA AND GUISCARDO

FROM BOCCACE

WHILE Norman Tancred in Salerno
reign'd,

The title of a gracious prince he gain'd;
Till, turn'd a tyrant in his latter days,
He lost the luster of his former praise;
And, from the bright meridian where he
stood

Descending, dipp'd his hands in lovers'
blood.

This prince, of Fortune's favor long pos-
sess'd,

Yet was with one fair daughter only blest;
And blest he might have been with her alone: ⁹

But O! how much more happy had he none!
She was his care, his hope, and his de-
light,

Most in his thought, and ever in his sight:
Next, nay beyond his life, he held her dear;
She liv'd by him, and now he liv'd in her.
For this, when ripe for marriage, he delay'd
Her nuptial bands, and kept her long a
maid,

As envying any else should share a part
Of what was his, and claiming all her heart.
At length, as public decency requir'd,
And all his vassals eagerly desir'd, ²⁰
With mind averse, he rather underwent
His people's will than gave his own consent.
So was she torn as from a lover's side,
And made almost in his despite a bride.

Short were her marriage joys, for in the prime

Of youth her lord expir'd before his time;
And, to her father's court in little space
Restor'd anew, she held a higher place;
More lov'd, and more exalted into grace. }

This princess, fresh and young, and fair and wise, ³⁰
The worship'd idol of her father's eyes,
Did all her sex in ev'ry grace exceed,
And had more wit beside than women need.

Youth, health, and ease, and most an amorous mind,
 To second nuptials had her thoughts inclin'd;
 And former joys had left a secret sting
 behind.

But, prodigal in ev'ry other grant,
 Her sire left unsupplied her only want;
 And she, betwixt her modesty and pride,
 Her wishes, which she could not help, would hide. ⁴⁰

Resolv'd at last to lose no longer time,
 And yet to please herself without a crime,
 She cast her eyes around the court, to find
 A worthy subject suiting to her mind,
 To him in holy nuptials to be tied,
 A seeming widow, and a secret bride.

Among the train of courtiers, one she found
 With all the gifts of bounteous nature
 crown'd,

Of gentle blood; but one whose niggard fate
 Had set him far below her high estate. ⁵⁰
 Guiscard his name was call'd, of blooming
 age,

Now squire to Tancred, and before his page:

To him, the choice of all the shining crowd.
 Her heart the noble Sigismonda vow'd.

Yet hitherto she kept her love conceal'd,
 And with close glances ev'ry day beheld
 The graceful youth; and ev'ry day increas'd
 The raging fire that burn'd within her
 breast.

Some secret charm did all his acts attend,
 And what his fortune wanted, hers could mend; ⁶⁰

Till, as the fire will force its outward way,
 Or, in the prison pent, consume the prey;
 So long her earnest eyes on his were set,
 At length their twisted rays together met:
 And he, surpris'd with humble joy, survey'd
 One sweet regard, shot by the royal maid:
 Not well assur'd, while doubtful hopes he nurs'd,

A second glance came gliding like the first;
 And he, who saw the sharpness of the dart,
 Without defense receiv'd it in his heart. ⁷⁰
 In public tho' their passion wanted speech,
 Yet mutual looks interpreted for each:
 Time, ways, and means of meeting were
 denied;

But all those wants ingenious Love supplied.
 Th' inventive god, who never fails his part,
 Inspires the wit when once he warms the
 heart.

When Guiscard next was in the circle
 seen,

Where Sigismonda held the place of queen,
 A hollow cane within her hand she brought,
 But in the concave had enclos'd a note. ⁸⁰
 With this she seem'd to play, and, as in sport,

Toss'd to her love, in presence of the court:
 "Take it," she said, "and when your needs
 require,

This little brand will serve to light your
 fire."

He took it with a bow, and soon divin'd
 The seeming toy was not for naught design'd;

But when retir'd, so long with curious eyes
 He view'd the present, that he found the
 prize.

Much was in little writ; and all convey'd
 With cautious care, for fear to be betray'd
 By some false confident, or fav'rite maid. }
 The time, the place, the manner how to meet, ⁹²

Were all in punctual order plainly writ;
 But since a trust must be, she thought it
 best

To put it out of laymen's pow'r at least;
 And for their solemn vows prepar'd a priest.

Guiscard (her secret purpose understood)
 With joy prepar'd to meet the coming good;
 Nor pains nor danger was resolv'd to spare,
 But use the means appointed by the fair. ¹⁰⁰

Near the proud palace of Salerno stood A mount of rough ascent, and thick with
 wood.

Thro' this a cave was dug with vast expense;
 The work it seem'd of some suspicious
 prince,

Who, when abusing pow'r with lawless
 might,

From public justice would secure his flight.
 The passage made by many a winding way Reach'd ev'n the room in which the tyrant
 lay,

Fit for his purpose; on a lower floor ¹⁰⁹
 He lodg'd, whose issue was an iron door;
 From whence, by stairs descending to the
 ground,

In the blind grot a safe retreat he found.
 Its outlet ended in a brake o'ergrown
 With brambles, chok'd by time, and now unknown.

A rift there was, which from the mountain's
 height

Convey'd a glimm'ring and malignant light,
A breathing place to draw the damps away,
A twilight of an intercepted day.

The tyrant's den, whose use tho' lost to fame,¹¹⁹

Was now th' apartment of the royal dame;
The cavern, only to her father known,
By him was to his darling daughter shown.

Neglected long she let the secret rest,
Till love recall'd it to her lab'ring breast,
And hinted as the way by Heav'n design'd,
The teacher, by the means he taught, to blind.

What will not women do, when need inspires
Their wit, or love their inclination fires!
Tho' jealousy of state th' invention found,
Yet love refin'd upon the former ground.
That way the tyrant had reserv'd, to fly¹³¹ Pursuing hate, now serv'd to bring two lovers nigh.

The dame, who long in vain had kept
the key,
Bold by desire, explor'd the secret way;
Now tried the stairs, and, wading thro' the
night,
Search'd all the deep recess, and issued into
light.

All this her letter had so well explain'd.
Th' instructed youth might compass what
remain'd;

The cavern mouth alone was hard to find,
Because the path, disus'd, was out of mind:
But in what quarter of the copse it lay,¹⁴¹
His eye by certain level could survey.
Yet (for the wood perplex'd with thorns he knew)

A frock of leather o'er his limbs he drew;
And thus provided, search'd the brake
around,

Till the chok'd entry of the cave he found.

Thus, all prepar'd, the promis'd hour
arriv'd,

So long expected, and so well contriv'd:
With love to friend, th' impatient lover went,
Fenc'd from the thorns, and trod the deep descent.¹⁵¹

The conscious priest, who was suborn'd be-
fore,

Stood ready posted at the postern door;
The maids in distant rooms were sent to rest,
And nothing wanted but th' invited guest.
He came, and knocking thrice, without
delay,

The longing lady heard, and turn'd the key;
At once invaded him with all her charms,

And the first step he made was in her arms.
The leathern outside, boist'rous as it was,
Gave way, and bent beneath her strict embrace;¹⁶⁰

On either side the kisses flew so thick,
That neither he nor she had breath to speak.
The holy man, amaz'd at what he saw,
Made haste to sanctify the bliss by law,
And mutter'd fast the matrimony o'er,
For fear committed sin should get before.
His work perform'd, he left the pair alone,
Because he knew he could not go too soon;
His presence odious, when his task was
done.

What thoughts he had beseems not me to say;¹⁷⁰
Tho' some surmise he went to fast and
pray,
And needed both to drive the tempting
thoughts away.

The foe once gone, they took their full
delight;

'Twas restless rage and tempest all the
night;

For greedy love each moment would employ,

And grudg'd the shortest pauses of their joy.

Thus were their loves auspiciously begun,
And thus with secret care were carried on;
The stealth itself did appetite restore,¹⁷⁹
And look'd so like a sin, it pleas'd the more.

The cave was now become a common way;
The wicket, often open'd, knew the key:
Love rioted secure, and, long enjoy'd,
Was ever eager, and was never cloy'd.

But as extremes are short, of ill and good,
And tides at highest mark regorge the flood;
So Fate, that could no more improve their
joy,

Took a malicious pleasure to destroy.

Tancred, who fondly lov'd, and whose de-light¹⁸³

Was plac'd in his fair daughter's daily sight,
Of custom, when his state affairs were done,
Would pass his pleasing hours with her
alone;

And, as a father's privilege allow'd,
Without attendance of th' officious crowd.

It happen'd once, that when in heat of day
He tried to sleep, as was his usual way,
The balmy slumber fled his wakeful eyes,
And forc'd him, in his own despite, to rise.
Of sleep forsaken, to relieve his care,
He sought the conversation of the fair;²⁰⁰
But with her train of damsels she was gone,

In shady walks the scorching heat to shun.
He would not violate that sweet recess,
And found besides a welcome heaviness That seiz'd his eyes; and slumber, which forgot,

When call'd before, to come, now came unsought.

From light retir'd, behind his daughter's bed,

He for approaching sleep compos'd his head;
A chair was ready, for that use design'd,
So quilted, that he lay at ease reclin'd; ²¹⁰
The curtains closely drawn, the light to screen,

As if he had contriv'd to lie unseen:
Thus cover'd with an artificial night,
Sleep did his office soon, and seal'd his sight.

With Heav'n averse, in this ill-omen'd hour

Was Guiscard summon'd to the secret bow'r,
And the fair nymph, with expectation fir'd,
From her attending damsels was retir'd:

For, true to love, she measur'd time so right,
As not to miss one moment of delight. ²²⁰

The garden, seated on the level floor,
She left behind, and, locking ev'ry door,

Thought all secure; but little did she know,
Blind to her fate, she had inclos'd her foe.

Attending Guiscard, in his leathern frock,
Stood ready, with his thrice-repeated knock:

Thrice with a doleful sound the jarring grate

Rung deaf, and hollow, and presag'd their fate.

The door unlock'd, to known delight they haste,

And, panting, in each other's arms embrace'd, ²³⁰

Rush to the conscious bed, a mutual freight,
And heedless press it with their wonted weight.

The sudden bound awak'd the sleeping sire,

And shew'd a sight no parent can desire;
His opening eyes at once with odious view

The love discover'd, and the lover knew.
He would have cried; but, hoping that he dreamt,

Amazement tied his tongue, and stopp'd th' attempt.

Th' ensuing moment all the truth declar'd, }
But now he stood collected and prepar'd; }

For malice and revenge had put him on his guard. ²⁴¹

So, like a lion that unheeded lay,
Dissembling sleep, and watchful to betray, }
With inward rage he meditates his prey. }
The thoughtless pair, indulging their desires,

Alternate kindled, and then quench'd their fires;

Nor thinking in the shades of death they play'd,

Full of themselves, themselves alone survey'd,

And, too secure, were by themselves betray'd. }

Long time dissolv'd in pleasure thus they lay, ²⁵⁰

Till nature could no more suffice their play;
Then rose the youth, and thro' the cave again

Return'd; the princess mingled with her train.

Resolv'd his unripe vengeance to defer,
The royal spy, when now the coast was clear,

Sought not the garden, but retir'd unseen,
To brood in secret on his gather'd spleen,

And methodize revenge: to death he griev'd;

And, but he saw the crime, had scarce believ'd.

Th' appointment for th' ensuing night he heard, ²⁶⁰

And therefore in the cavern had prepar'd
Two brawny yeoman of his trusty guard.

Scarce had unwary Guiscard set his foot
Within the farthest entrance of the grot,

When these in secret ambush ready lay,
And rushing on the sudden seiz'd the prey.

Encumber'd with his frock, without defense,

An easy prize, they led the pris'ner thence,

And, as commanded, brought before the prince. }

The gloomy sire, too sensible of wrong ²⁷⁰
To vent his rage in words, restrain'd his tongue,

And only said: "Thus servants are preferred,

And, trusted, thus their sov'reigns they reward.

Had I not seen, had not these eyes receiv'd Too clear a proof, I could not have believ'd."

He paus'd and chok'd the rest. The youth, who saw

His forfeit life abandon'd to the law,
The judge th' accuser, and th' offense to him Who had both pow'r and will t' avenge the
crime,

No vain defense prepar'd, but thus replied:
"The faults of Love by Love are justified:
With unresisted might the monarch reigns,
He levels mountains, and he raises plains;
And, not regarding diff'rence of degree,
Abas'd your daughter, and exalted me."

This bold return with seeming patience
heard,

The pris'n'r was remitted to the guard.
The sullen tyrant slept not all the night,
But, lonely walking by a winking light, Sobb'd, wept, and groan'd, and beat his wither'd breast,

But would not violate his daughter's rest;
Who long expecting lay, for bliss prepar'd, List'n'g for noise, and griev'd that none
she heard;

Oft rose, and oft in vain employ'd the key,
And oft accus'd her lover of delay;
And pass'd the tedious hours in anxious thoughts away.

The morrow came, and at his usual hour
Old Tancred visited his daughter's bow'r;
Her cheek (for such his custom was) he kiss'd,

Then bless'd her kneeling, and her maids
dismiss'd.

The royal dignity thus far maintain'd,
Now left in private, he no longer feign'd;
But all at once his grief and rage appear'd,
And floods of tears ran trickling down his beard.

"O Sigismonda," he began to say:
Thrice he began, and thrice was forc'd to
stay,
Till words with often trying found their
way:

"I thought, O Sigismonda, (but how blind
Are parents' eyes, their children's faults to
find!)"

Thy virtue, birth, and breeding were above
A mean desire, and vulgar sense of love;
Nor less than sight and hearing could convince

So fond a father, and so just a prince,
Of such an unforeseen and unbelov'd
offense.

Then what indignant sorrow must I have,
To see thee lie subjected to my slave!
A man so smelling of the people's lee,
The court receiv'd him first for charity;

And since with no degree of honor grac'd,
But only suffer'd where he first was plac'd:
A grov'ling insect still, and so design'd
By Nature's hand, nor born of noble kind;
A thing, by neither man nor woman priz'd,
And scarcely known enough to be despis'd.
To what has Heav'n reserv'd my age? Ah!
why

Should man, when Nature calls, not choose
to die,

Rather than stretch the span of life, to find
Such ills as Fate has wisely cast behind,
For those to feel, whom fond desire to live
Makes covetous of more than life can give!
Each has his share of good; and when 't is
gone,

The guest, tho' hungry, cannot rise too soon.
But I, expecting more, in my own wrong
Protracting life, have liv'd a day too long.
If yesterday could be recall'd again,
Ev'n now would I conclude my happy reign;
But 't is too late, my glorious race is run,
And a dark cloud o'ertakes my setting sun.
Hadst thou not lov'd, or loving sav'd the
shame,

If not the sin, by some illustrious name,
This little comfort had reliev'd my mind,
'T was frailty, not unusual to thy kind;
But thy low fall beneath thy royal blood
Shews downward appetite to mix with mud.
Thus not the least excuse is left for thee,
Nor the least refuge for unhappy me.

"For him I have resolv'd: whom by surprise

I took, and scarce can call it in disguise;
For such was his attire, as, with intent
Of nature, suited to his mean descent.
The harder question yet remains behind,
What pains a parent and a prince can find
To punish an offense of this degenerate
kind.

"As I have lov'd, and yet I love thee,
more

Than ever father lov'd a child before;
So that indulgence draws me to forgive:
Nature, that gave thee life, would have thee live.

But, as a public parent of the state,
My justice, and thy crime, requires thy
fate.

Fain would I choose a middle course to steer;

Nature's too kind, and justice too severe:
Speak for us both, and to the balance bring,
On either side, the father and the king.

Heav'n knows, my heart is bent to favor thee;
Make it but scanty weight, and leave the rest to me."

Here stopping with a sigh, he pour'd a flood

Of tears, to make his last expression good.

She, who had heard him speak, nor saw alone ³⁶⁸

The secret conduct of her love was known,
But he was taken who her soul possess'd,
Felt all the pangs of sorrow in her breast:
And little wanted, but a woman's heart,
With cries and tears, had testified her smart;

But inborn worth, that fortune can control,
New strung, and stiffer bent her softer soul;
The heroine assum'd the woman's place,
Confirm'd her mind, and fortified her face.
Why should she beg, or what could she pretend,

When her stern father had condemn'd her friend?

Her life she might have had; but her despair ³⁸⁰

Of saving his had put it past her care:
Resolv'd on fate, she would not lose her breath,

But, rather than not die, solicit death.
Fix'd on this thought, she not, as women use,

Her fault by common frailty would excuse;
But boldly justified her innocence,
And, while the fact was own'd, denied th' offense:

Then with dry eyes, and with an open look,
She met his glance midway, and then undaunted spoke: ³⁸⁹

"Tancred, I neither am dispos'd to make Request for life, nor offer'd life to take;
Much less deny the deed; but least of all
Beneath pretended justice weakly fall.
My words to sacred truth shall be confin'd,
My deeds shall shew the greatness of my mind.

That I have lov'd, I own; that still I love,
I call to witness all the pow'rs above.
Yet more I own: to Guiscard's love I give
The small remaining time I have to live;
And if beyond this life desire can be, ⁴⁰⁰
Not fate itself shall set my passion free.

"This first avow'd; nor folly warp'd my mind,
Nor the frail texture of the female kind Betray'd my virtue; for too well I knew

What honor was, and honor had his due:
Before the holy priest my vows were tied;
So came I not a strumpet, but a bride.
This for my fame, and for the public voice:
Yet more, his merits justified my choice;
Which had they not, the first election thine,
That bond dissolv'd, the next is freely mine.

Or, grant I err'd, (which yet I must deny,) ⁴¹¹
Had parents pow'r ev'n second vows to tie,
Thy little care to mend my widow'd nights
Has forced me to recourse of marriage rites,

To fill an empty side, and follow known delights.

What have I done in this, deserving blame?
State laws may alter; nature's are the same:
Those are usurp'd on helpless womankind,
Made without our consent, and wanting pow'r to bind. ⁴²⁰

"Thou, Tancred, better shouldst have understood,

That as thy father gave thee flesh and blood,
So gav'st thou me: not from the quarry hew'd,

But of a softer mold, with sense endued;
Ev'n softer than thy own, of suppler kind,
More exquisite of taste, and more than man refin'd.

Nor need'st thou by thy daughter to be told,
Tho' now thy sprightly blood with age be cold,

Thou hast been young; and canst remember still,

That when thou hadst the pow'r, thou hadst the will; ⁴³⁰

And from the past experience of thy fires
Canst tell with what a tide our strong desires

Come rushing on in youth, and what their rage requires.

"And grant thy youth was exercis'd in arms,

When love no leisure found for softer charms;

My tender age in luxury was train'd,
With idle ease and pageants entertain'd;
My hours my own, my pleasures unrestrain'd.

So bred, no wonder if I took the bent
That seem'd ev'n warrant'd by thy consent; ⁴⁴⁰

For, when the father is too fondly kind,
Such seed he sows, such harvest shall he find.

Blame then thyself, as reason's law requires, (Since nature gave, and thou foment'st my fires.)

If still those appetites continue strong,
Thou may'st consider I am yet but young:
Consider too that, having been a wife,
I must have tasted of a better life,
And am not to be blam'd, if I renew,
By lawful means, the joys which then I
knew.

Where was the crime, if pleasure I procur'd,
Young, and a woman, and to bliss inur'd?
That was my case, and this is my defense:
I pleas'd myself, I shunn'd incontinence,
And, urg'd by strong desires, indulg'd my sense.

"Left to myself, I must avow, I strove
From public shame to screen my secret
love,

And, well acquainted with thy native
pride,
Endeavor'd, what I could not help, to hide;
For which a woman's wit an easy way
supplied.

How this, so well contriv'd, so closely laid,
Was known to thee, or by what chance be-
tray'd,

Is not my care; to please thy pride alone,
I could have wish'd it had been still unknown.

"Nor took I Guiscard by blind fancy led,
Or hasty choice, as many women wed;
But with deliberat' care, and ripen'd
thought,

At leisure first design'd, before I wrought:
On him I rested, after long debate,
And not without consid'ring, fix'd my fate.
His flame was equal, tho' by mine inspir'd;
(For so the difference of our birth requir'd;)
Had he been born like me, like me his love Had first begun what mine was forc'd to
move:

But thus beginning, thus we persevere;
Our passions yet continue what they were,
Nor length of trial makes our joys the less sincere."

"At this my choice, tho' not by thine al-
low'd, (Thy judgment herding with the common crowd,)

Thou tak'st unjust offense; and, led by them,
Dost less the merit than the man esteem.
Too sharply, Tancer'd, by thy pride betray'd,
Hast thou against the laws of kind inveigh'd;
For all th' offense is in opinion plac'd,

Which deems high birth by lowly choice debas'd.

This thought alone with fury fires thy breast,
(For holy marriage justifies the rest,)
That I have sunk the glories of the state,
And mix'd my blood with a plébeian mate;
In which I wonder thou shouldst oversee Superior causes, or impute to me
The fault of Fortune, or the Fates' decree.
Or call it Heav'n's imperial pow'r alone,
Which moves on springs of justice, tho' un-
known;

Yet this we see, tho' order'd for the best,
The bad exalted, and the good oppress'd;
Permitted laurels grace the lawless brow,
Th' unworthy rais'd, the worthy cast below.

"But, leaving that, search we the secret
springs,

And backward trace the principles of things:
There shall we find, that when the world
began,

One common mass compos'd the mold of
man;

One paste of flesh on all degrees bestow'd,
And kneaded up alike with moist'ning blood.
The same Almighty Pow'r inspir'd the
frame

With kindled life, and form'd the souls the same:

The faculties of intellect and will Dispens'd with equal hand, dispos'd with equal skill;

Like liberty indulg'd, with choice of good or ill.

Thus born alike, from virtue first began
The difference that distinguish'd man from
man:

He claim'd no title from descent of blood,
But that which made him noble made him
good;

Warm'd with more particles of heav'nly
flame,

He wing'd his upward flight, and soar'd
to fame,

The rest remain'd below, a tribe without a name.

"This law, tho' custom now diverts the
course,

As nature's institute, is yet in force;
Uncancel'd, tho' disus'd: and he, whose
mind

Is virtuous, is alone of noble kind;
Tho' poor in fortune, of celestial race;
And he commits the crime, who calls him
base.

"Now lay the line, and measure all thy court

By inward virtue, not external port;
And find whom justly to prefer above
The man on whom my judgment plac'd my love:"

So shalt thou see his parts and person shine;
And thus compar'd, the rest a base degen'rate line.

Nor took I, when I first survey'd thy court,
His valor, or his virtues, on report; ⁵³⁰
But trusted what I ought to trust alone,
Relying on thy eyes, and not my own.
Thy praise (and thine was then the public voice)

First recommended Guiscard to my choice:
Directed thus by thee, I look'd, and found
A man, I thought, deserving to be crown'd;
First by my father pointed to my sight,
Nor less conspicuous by his native light;
His mind, his mien, the features of his face
Excelling all the rest of human race. ⁵⁴⁰
These were thy thoughts, and thou couldst judge aright,

Till int'rest made a jaundice in thy sight.

"Or should I grant thou didst not rightly see;

Then thou wert first deceiv'd, and I deceiv'd by thee.

But if thou shalt allege, thro' pride of mind,

Thy blood with one of base condition join'd,
'Tis false; for 't is not baseness to be poor;
His poverty augments thy crime the more;
Upbraids thy justice with the scant regard
Of worth: whom princes praise, they should reward. ⁵⁵⁰

Are these the kings intrusted by the crowd
With wealth, to be dispens'd for common good?

The people sweat not for their king's delight,
T' enrich a pimp, or raise a parasite:

Theirs is the toil; and he who well has serv'd

His country, has his country's wealth deserv'd.

"Ev'n mighty monarchs oft are meanly born,

And kings by birth to lowest rank return;
All subject to the pow'r of giddy chance,
For fortune can depress, or can advance: ⁵⁶⁰
But true nobility is of the mind,
Not giv'n by chance, and not to chance resign'd.

"For the remaining doubt of thy decree,

What to resolve, and how dispose of me,
Be warn'd to cast that useless care aside;
Myself alone will for myself provide.
If in thy doting and decrepit age,
Thy soul, a stranger in thy youth to rage,
Begins in cruel deeds to take delight,
Gorge with my blood thy barb'rous appetite, ⁵⁷⁰

For I so little am dispos'd to pray
For life, I would not cast a wish away.
Such as it is, th' offense is all my own;
And what to Guiscard is already done,
Or to be done, is doom'd by thy decree; }
That, if not executed first by thee,
Shall on my person be perform'd by me. }

"Away! with women weep, and leave me here,

Fix'd like a man, to die without a tear; ⁵⁷⁹
Or save, or slay us both this present hour —
'T is all that fate has left within thy pow'r."

She said; nor did her father fail to find,
In all she spoke, the greatness of her mind;
Yet thought she was not obstinate to die,
Nor deem'd the death she promis'd was so nigh.

Secure in this belief, he left the dame,
Resolv'd to spare her life and save her shame;

But that detested object to remove,
To wreak his vengeance, and to cure her love.

Intent on this, a secret order sign'd ⁵⁹⁰
The death of Guiscard to his guards enjoin'd;

Strangling was chosen, and the night the time,

A mute revenge, and blind as was the crime.
His faithful heart, a bloody sacrifice,
Torn from his breast, to glut the tyrant's eyes,

Clos'd the severe command: for (slaves to pay)

What kings decree, the soldier must obey:
Wag'd against foes; and, when the wars are o'er,

Fit only to maintain despotic pow'r;
Dang'rous to freedom, and desir'd alone ⁶⁰⁰
By kings who seek an arbitrary throne.

Such were these guards; as ready to have slain

The prince himself, allur'd with greater gain:

So was the charge perform'd with better will,

By men inur'd to blood and exercis'd in ill.

Now, tho' the sullen sire had eas'd his
mind,
The pomp of his revenge was yet behind,
A pomp prepar'd to grace the present he
design'd.
A goblet rich with gems and rough with
gold,
Of depth and breadth the precious pledge to hold,
With cruel care he chose: the hollow part Inclos'd, the lid conceal'd the lover's heart.
Then of his trusted mischiefs one he sent,
And bade him with these words the gift present:
"Thy father sends thee this to cheer thy
breast,
And glad thy sight with what thou lov'st the
best;
As thou hast pleas'd his eyes and joy'd his
mind
With what he lov'd the most of human-
kind."
Ere this the royal dame, who well had weigh'd
The consequence of what her sire had said,
Fix'd on her fate, against th' expected hour,
Procur'd the means to have it in her pow'r.
For this she had distill'd, with early care,
The juice of simples friendly to despair,
A magazine of death, and thus prepar'd,
Secure to die, the fatal message heard:
Then smil'd severe, nor with a troubled
look
Or trembling hand the fun'ral present took;
Ev'n kept her count'nance, when the lid remov'd
Disclos'd the heart, unfortunately lov'd. 630
She needed not be told within whose breast
It lodg'd; the message had explain'd the
rest.
Or not amaz'd, or hiding her surprise,
She sternly on the bearer fix'd her eyes;
Then thus: "Tell Tancred, on his daughter's
part,
The gold, tho' precious, equals not the
heart:
But he did well to give his best; and I,
Who wish'd a worthier urn, forgive his poverty."
At this she curb'd a groan, that else had
come,
And pausing, view'd the present in the tomb;
Then, to the heart ador'd devoutly glued
Her lips, and raising it, her speech renew'd:

"Ev'n from my day of birth, to this, the
bound
Of my unhappy being, I have found
My father's care and tenderness express'd;
But this last act of love excels the rest:
For this so dear a present, bear him back
The best return that I can live to make." The messenger dispatch'd, again she
view'd
The lov'd remains, and sighing thus pursued:
"Source of my life, and lord of my desires,
In whom I liv'd, with whom my soul expires!
Poor heart, no more the spring of vital heat, Curst be the hands that tore thee from thy seat!
The course is finish'd which thy fates de-
creed,
And thou from thy corporeal prison freed:
Soon hast thou reach'd the goal with mended
pace,
A world of woes dispatch'd in little space.
Forc'd by thy worth, thy foe, in death become
Thy friend, has lodg'd thee in a costly tomb.
There yet remain'd thy fun'ral exequies,
The weeping tribute of thy widow's eyes,
And those, indulgent Heav'n has found the
way
That I, before my death, have leave to pay.
My father ev'n in cruelty is kind,
Or Heav'n has turn'd the malice of his
mind
To better uses than his hate design'd;
And made th' insult, which in his gift ap-
pears,
The means to mourn thee with my pious
tears;
Which I will pay thee down, before I go,
And save myself the pains to weep below,
If souls can weep. Tho' once I meant to
meet
My fate with face unmov'd, and eyes un-wet,
Yet since I have thee here in narrow room,
My tears shall set thee first afloat within thy tomb:
Then (as I know thy spirit hovers nigh)
Under thy friendly conduct will I fly
To regions unexplor'd, secure to share
Thy state; nor hell shall punishment appear;
And heav'n is double heav'n, if thou art
there."

She said: her brimful eyes, that ready
 stood,
 And only wanted will to weep a flood,
 Releas'd their wat'ry store, and pour'd
 amain,
 Like clouds low hung, a sober show'r of
 rain;
 Mute solemn sorrow, free from female
 noise,
 Such as the majesty of grief destroys;
 For, bending o'er the cup, the tears she shed
 Seem'd by the posture to discharge her head, O'erfill'd before; and oft (her mouth ap-
 plied
 To the cold heart) she kiss'd at once and
 cried. 690
 Her maids, who stood amaz'd, nor knew
 the cause
 Of her complaining, nor whose heart it was;
 Yet all due measures of her mourning kept,
 Did office at the dirge, and by infection wept;
 And oft enquir'd th' occasion of her grief, (Unanswer'd but by sighs,) and offer'd vain
 relief.
 At length, her stock of tears already shed,
 She wip'd her eyes, she rais'd her drooping
 head,
 And thus pursued: "O ever faithful heart,
 I have perform'd the ceremonial part. 700
 The decencies of grief; it rests behind,
 That, as our bodies were, our souls be join'd;
 To thy whate'er abode my shade convey,
 And as an elder ghost, direct the way."
 She said; and bade the vial to be brought,
 Where she before had brew'd the deadly draught.
 First pouring out the med'cinable bane,
 The heart her tears had rins'd she bath'd
 again;
 Then down her throat the death securely
 throws,
 And quaffs a long oblivion of her woes. 710
 This done, she mounts the genial bed,
 and there
 (Her body first compos'd with honest care) Attends the welcome rest; her hands yet
 hold
 Close to her heart the monumental gold;
 Nor farther word she spoke, but clos'd her
 sight,
 And quiet sought the covert of the night.
 The damsels, who the while in silence
 mourn'd,

Not knowing, nor suspecting death suborn'd,
 Yet, as their duty was, to Tancred sent;
 Who, conscious of th' occasion, fear'd th'
 event. 720
 Alarm'd, and with presaging heart, he came,
 And drew the curtains, and expos'd the
 dame
 To loathsome light; then with a late relief
 Made vain efforts to mitigate her grief.
 She, what she could, excluding day, her
 eyes
 Kept firmly seal'd, and sternly thus replies:
 "Tancred, restrain thy tears, unsought by
 me,
 And sorrow, unavailing now to thee:
 Did ever man before afflict his mind 729
 To see th' effect of what himself design'd?
 Yet, if thou hast remaining in thy heart
 Some sense of love, some unextinguish'd
 part
 Of former kindness, largely once pro-
 fess'd,
 Let me by that adjure thy harden'd
 breast
 Not to deny thy daughter's last request.
 The secret love which I so long enjoy'd,
 And still conceal'd, to gratify thy pride,
 Thou hast disjoin'd; but, with my dying
 breath,
 Seek not, I beg thee, to disjoin our death:
 Where'er his corpse by thy command is laid,
 Thither let mine in public be convey'd; 741
 Expos'd in open view, and side by side,
 Acknowledg'd as a bridegroom and a bride."
 The prince's anguish hinder'd his reply;
 And she, who felt her fate approaching
 nigh, Seiz'd the cold heart, and heaving to her
 breast:
 "Here, precious pledge," she said, "securely
 rest."
 These accents were her last; the creeping
 death
 Benumb'd her senses first, then stopp'd her
 breath.
 Thus she for disobedience justly died; 750
 The sire was justly punish'd for his pride:
 The youth, least guilty, suffer'd for th' offense,
 Of duty violated to his prince;
 Who, late repenting of his cruel deed,
 One common sepulcher for both decreed;
 Intomb'd the wretched pair in royal state,
 And on their monument inscrib'd their
 fate.

BAUCIS AND PHILEMON

OUT OF THE EIGHTH BOOK OF OVID'S
METAMORPHOSES

The author, pursuing the deeds of Theseus, relates how he with his friend Perithous were invited by Acheloüs, the river god, to stay with him till his waters were abated. Acheloüs entertains them with a relation of his own love to Perimele, who was chang'd into an island by Neptune at his request. Perithous, being an atheist, derides the legend, and denies the power of the gods to work that miracle. Lelex, another companion of Theseus, to confirm the story of Acheloüs, relates another metamorphosis of Baucis and Philemon into trees; of which he was partly an eye witness.

THUS Acheloüs ends: his audience hear
With admiration, and, admiring, fear
The pow'rs of heav'n; except Ixion's son,
Who laugh'd at all the gods, believ'd in none.

He shook his impious head, and thus replies:
"These legends are no more than pious lies:
You attribute too much to heavenly sway,
To think they give us forms, and take away."

The rest, of better minds, their sense declar'd

Against this doctrine, and with horror heard.

Then Lelex rose, an old experienc'd man,
And thus with sober gravity began:

"Heav'n's pow'r is infinite; earth, air, and sea,

The manufactur'd mass, the making pow'r obey.

By proof to clear your doubt: in Phrygian ground

Two neighb'ring trees, with walls encompass'd round,

Stand on a moderate rise, with wonder shown,

One a hard oak, a softer linden one:

I saw the place and them, by Pittheus sent
To Phrygian realms, my grandsire's government.

Not far from thence is seen a lake, the haunt

Of coots, and of the fishing cormorant:
Here Jove with Hermes came; but in disguise

Of mortal men conceal'd their deities:

One laid aside his thunder, one his rod;
And many toilsome steps together trod;
For harbor at a thousand doors they knock'd —

Not one of all the thousand but was lock'd.

At last an hospitable house they found,
A homely shed; the roof, not far from ground,

Was thatch'd with reeds and straw together bound.

There Baucis and Philemon liv'd, and there
Had liv'd long married and a happy pair:
Now old in love; tho' little was their store,

Inur'd to want, their poverty they bore,
Nor aim'd at wealth, professing to be poor.
For master or for servant here to call,
Was all alike, where only two were all.

Command was none, where equal love was paid,

Or rather both commanded, both obey'd. 40
"From lofty roofs the gods repuls'd before,

Now, stooping, enter'd thro' the little door;
The man (their hearty welcome first express'd)

A common settle drew for either guest,
Inviting each his weary limbs to rest.

But ere they sat, officious Baucis lays
Two cushions stuff'd with straw, the seat to raise;

Coarse, but the best she had; then rakes the load

Of ashes from the hearth, and spreads abroad

The living coals, and, lest they should expire,

With leaves and barks she feeds her infant fire:

It smokes, and then with trembling breath she blows,

Till in a cheerful blaze the flames arose.

With brushwood and with chips she strengthens these,

And adds at last the boughs of rotten trees.

The fire thus form'd, she sets the kettle on —
Like burnish'd gold the little seether shone —

Next took the coleworts which her husband got

From his own ground (a small well-water'd spot);

She stripp'd the stalks of all their leaves;
the best

She cull'd, and then with handy care she dress'd.

High o'er the hearth a chine of bacon hung:
Good old Philemon seiz'd it with a prong,
And from the sooty rafter drew it down;
Then cut a slice, but scarce enough for one;
Yet a large portion of a little store,
Which for their sakes alone he wish'd were more.

This in the pot he plung'd without delay,
To tame the flesh and drain the salt away.
The time between, before the fire they sat, ⁷⁰
And shorten'd the delay by pleasing chat.

"A beam there was, on which a beechen pail

Hung by the handle, on a driven nail:
This fill'd with water, gently warm'd,
they set

Before their guests; in this they bath'd their feet,
And after with clean towels dried their sweat.

This done, the host produc'd the genial
bed,

Sallow the feet, the borders, and the
stead,

Which with no costly coverlet they
spread,

But coarse old garments; yet such robes as these ⁸⁰

They laid alone, at feasts, on holidays.
The good old housewife, tucking up her

gown,
The table sets; th' invited gods lie down.
The trivet table of a foot was lame —

A blot which prudent Baucis overcame,
Who thrusts beneath the limping leg a sherd;

So was the mended board exactly rear'd:
Then rubb'd it o'er with newly gather'd

mint,
A wholesome herb, that breath'd a grateful
scent.

Pallas began the feast, where first was seen ⁹⁰

The party-color'd olive, black and green;
Autumnal cornels next in order serv'd,
In lees of wine well pickled and preserv'd;
A garden salad was the third supply,
Of endive, radishes, and succory;
Then curds and cream, the flow'r of country fare,

And new-laid eggs, which Baucis' busy

care
Turn'd by a gentle fire, and roasted rare.

All these in earthenware were serv'd to
board;

And, next in place, an earthen pitcher,
stor'd ¹⁰⁰

With liquor of the best the cottage could afford.

This was the table's ornament and pride,
With figures wrought: like pages at his side Stood beechen bowls; and these were shining clean,

Vernish'd with wax without, and lin'd within.

By this the boiling kettle had prepar'd
And to the table sent the smoking lard,
On which with eager appetite they dine,
A sav'ry bit, that serv'd to relish wine;
The wine itself was suiting to the rest, ¹¹⁰
Still working in the must, and lately
press'd.

The second course succeeds like that before;
Plums, apples, nuts, and, of their wintry
store,

Dry figs and grapes, and wrinkled dates were set

In canisters, t' enlarge the little treat.
All these a milk-white honeycomb sur-
round,

Which in the midst the country banquet
crown'd.

But the kind hosts their entertainment
grace

With hearty welcome, and an open face:
In all they did you might discern with ease
A willing mind, and a desire to please. ¹²¹

"Meantime the beechen bowls went round, and still,

Tho' often emptied, were observ'd to fill;
Fill'd without hands, and of their own accord

Ran without feet, and danc'd about the board.

Devotion seiz'd the pair, to see the feast
With wine, and of no common grape, increas'd;

And up they held their hands, and fell to
pray'r,

Excusing, as they could, their country fare.
"One goose they had, ('t was all they could allow,) ¹³⁰

A wakeful sentry, and on duty now,
Whom to the gods for sacrifice they vow:

Her, with malicious zeal, the couple view'd;
She ran for life, and, limping, they pursued.
Full well the fowl perceiv'd their bad intent.

And would not make her masters' compliment;

But, persecuted, to the pow'rs she flies,
And close between the legs of Jove she lies.
He, with a gracious ear, the suppliant heard,
And sav'd her life; then what he was de-clar'd, ¹⁴⁰

And own'd the god. 'The neighborhood,'
said he,

'Shall justly perish for impiety:
You stand alone exempted; but obey
With speed, and follow where we lead the
way;

Leave these accurst, and to the mountain's
height

Ascend, nor once look backward in your
flight.'

"They haste, and what their tardy feet
denied,

The trusty staff (their better leg) supplied.
An arrow's flight they wanted to the top,
And there secure, but spent with travel,
stop; ¹⁵⁰

Then turn their now no more forbidden
eyes:

Lost in a lake the floated level lies;
A wat'ry desert covers all the plains;
Their cot alone, as in an isle, remains;
Wond'ring with weeping eyes, while they deplore

Their neighbors' fate, and country now no
more,

Their little shed, scarce large enough for
two,

Seems, from the ground increas'd, in height and bulk to grow.

A stately temple shoots within the skies;
The crotches of their cot in columns rise; ¹⁶⁰

The pavement polish'd marble they behold,
The gates with sculpture grac'd, the spires and tiles of gold.

"Then thus the Sire of Gods, with looks serene:

'Speak thy desire, thou only just of men;
And thou, O woman, only worthy found
To be with such a man in marriage bound.'

"A while they whisper; then, to Jove ad-
dress'd,

Philemon thus prefers their joint request:
'We crave to serve before your sacred
shrine,

And offer at your altars rites divine; ¹⁷⁰
And since not any action of our life
Has been polluted with domestic strife,

We beg one hour of death; that neither
she

With widow's tears may live to bury me,
Nor weeping I, with wither'd arms, may
bear

My breathless Baucis to the sepulcher.'

"The godheads sign their suit. They run their race

In the same tenor all th' appointed space;
Then, when their hour was come, while they relate

These past adventures at the temple gate,
Old Baucis is by old Philemon seen ¹⁸¹ Sprouting with sudden leaves of sprightly
green;

Old Baucis look'd where old Philemon
stood,

And saw his lengthen'd arms a sprouting
wood.

New roots their fasten'd feet begin to bind,
Their bodies stiffen in a rising rind:

Then, ere the bark above their shoulders
grew,

They give and take at once their last adieu;
At once: 'Farewell, O faithful spouse,'
they said;

At once th' incroaching rinds their closing lips invade. ¹⁹⁰

Ev'n yet, an ancient Tyanæan shows
A spreading oak, that near a linden grows;
The neighborhood confirm the prodigy, Grave men, not vain of tongue, or like to
lie.

I saw myself the garlands on their boughs,
And tablets hung for gifts of granted vows;
And off'ring fresher up, with pious pray'r,

'The good,' said I, 'are God's peculiar
care,

And such as honor Heav'n, shall heav'nly honor share.'"

PYGMALION AND THE STATUE

OUT OF THE TENTH BOOK OF OVID'S METAMORPHOSES

The Propœtides, for their impudent behavior, being turn'd into stone by Venus, Pygmalion, prince of Cyprus, detested all women for their sake, and resolv'd never to marry. He falls in love with a statue of his own making, which is chang'd into a maid, whom he marries. One of his descendants is Cinyras, the father of Myrrha: the daughter incestuously loves her own father; for which she is chang'd into the tree which bears her name.

These two stories immediately follow each other and are admirably well connected.

PYGMALION, loathing their lascivious life,
Abhor'd all womankind, but most a wife:
So single chose to live, and shunn'd to wed,
Well pleas'd to want a consort of his bed;
Yet fearing idleness, the nurse of ill,
In sculpture exercis'd his happy skill;
And carv'd in iv'ry such a maid, so fair,
As Nature could not with his art compare,
Were she to work ; but, in her own defense,
Must take her pattern here, and copy hence.
Pleas'd with his idol, he commends, admires, 11

Adores; and last, the thing ador'd desires.
A very virgin in her face was seen,
And, had she mov'd, a living maid had been.
One would have thought she could have stirr'd, but strove

With modesty, and was asham'd to move.
Art, hid with art, so well perform'd the
cheat,

It caught the carver with his own deceit:
He knows 't is madness, yet he must adore,
And still the more he knows it, loves the
more. 20

The flesh, or what so seems, he touches
oft,
Which feels so smooth, that he believes it soft.

Fir'd with this thought, at once he strained
the breast,

And on the lips a burning kiss impress'd.
'Tis true, the harden'd breast resists the gripe,

And the cold lips return a kiss unripe:
But when, retiring back, he look'd again,
'To think it iv'ry was a thought too mean;
So would believe she kiss'd, and courting
more,

Again embrac'd her naked body o'er; 30
And straining hard the statue, was afraid
His hands had made a dint and hurt his
maid;

Explor'd her, limb by limb, and fear'd to
find

So rude a gripe had left a livid mark behind.

With flatt'ry now he seeks her mind to move,
And now with gifts (the pow'rful bribes of
love).

He furnishes her closet first, and fills
The crowded shelves with rarities of shells;

Adds orient pearls, which from the conchs
he drew,

And all the sparkling stones of various
hue; 40

And parrots, imitating human tongue,
And singing-birds in silver cages hung;
And ev'ry fragrant flow'r, and od'rous
green,

Were sorted well, with lumps of amber laid between.

Rich, fashionable robes her person deck, Pendants her ears, and pearls adorn her neck;

Her taper'd fingers too with rings are
grac'd,

And an embroider'd zone surrounds her slender waist.

Thus like a queen array'd, so richly dress'd, Beauteous she shew'd, but naked shew'd
the best. 50

Then from the floor he rais'd a royal bed,
With cov'rings of Sidonian purple spread;
The solemn rites perform'd, he calls her
bride,

With blandishments invites her to his side;
And as she were with vital sense possess'd,
Her head did on a plumy pillow rest.

The feast of Venus came, a solemn day,
To which the Cypriots due devotion pay;
With gilded horns the milk-white heifers
led,

Slaughter'd before the sacred altars, bled. 60 Pygmalion, off'ring, first approach'd the
shrine,

And then with pray'rs implor'd the pow'rs
divine:

"Almighty gods, if all we mortals want,
If all we can require, be yours to grant,
Make this fair statue mine," he would have
said,

But chang'd his words for shame, and only
pray'd:

"Give me the likeness of my iv'ry maid."

The golden goddess, present at the pray'r,
Well knew he meant th' inanimated fair,
And gave the sign of granting his desire; 70
For thrice in cheerful flames ascends the
fire.

The youth, returning to his mistress, lies, }
And, impudent in hope, with ardent eyes }
And beating breast, by the dear statue }
lies.

He kisses her white lips, renews the bliss,
And looks and thinks they redder at the kiss —

He thought them warm before; nor longer
 stays,
 But next his hand on her hard bosom lays:
 Hard as it was, beginning to relent,
 It seem'd the breast beneath his fingers
 bent. 80
 He felt again, his fingers made a print;
 'T was flesh, but flesh so firm, it rose against the dint.
 The pleasing task he fails not to renew:
 Soft, and more soft at ev'ry touch it grew;
 Like pliant wax, when chafing hands reduce
 The former mass to form, and frame for
 use.
 He would believe, but yet is still in pain,
 And tries his argument of sense again;
 Presses the pulse, and feels the leaping
 vein. }
 Convinced, o'erjoy'd, his studied thanks and
 praise 90
 To her who made the miracle he pays:
 Then lips to lips he join'd; now freed from
 fear,
 He found the savor of the kiss sincere:
 At this the waken'd image op'd her eyes,
 And view'd at once the light and lover, with surprise.
 The goddess, present at the match she made,
 So bless'd the bed, such fruitfulness con-
 vey'd,
 That ere ten moons had sharpen'd either
 horn,
 To crown their bliss, a lovely boy was born;
 Paphos his name, who, grown to manhood,
 wall'd 100
 The city Paphos, from the founder call'd.

CINYRAS AND MYRRHA

OUT OF THE TENTH BOOK OF OVID'S
 METAMORPHOSES

There needs no connection of this story with the former: for the beginning of this immediately follows the end of the last. The reader is only to take notice that Orpheus, who relates both, was by birth a Thracian; and his country far distant from Cyprus, where Myrrha was born, and from Arabia, whither she fled. You will see the reason of this note, soon after the first lines of this fable.

NOR him alone produc'd the fruitful queen;
 But Cinyras, who like his sire had been

A happy prince, had he not been a sire.
 Daughters and fathers, from my song retire:

I sing of horror; and, could I prevail,
 You should not hear, or not believe my tale.
 Yet if the pleasure of my song be such,
 That you will hear, and credit me too much,
 Attentive listen to the last event,
 And with the sin believe the punishment: 10
 Since nature could behold so dire a crime,
 I gratulate at least my native clime,
 That such a land, which such a monster bore,
 So far is distant from our Thracian shore.
 Let Araby extol her happy coast,
 Her cinnamon and sweet amomum boast,
 Her fragrant flow'rs, her trees with precious tears, }

Her second harvests, and her double
 years —

How can the land be call'd so blest that Myrrha bears?

Not all her od'rous tears can cleanse her
 crime; 20

Her plant alone deforms the happy clime.
 Cupid denies to have inflam'd thy heart,
 Disowns thy love, and vindicates his dart;
 Some fury gave thee those infernal pains,
 And shot her venom'd vipers in thy veins.
 To hate thy sire, had merited a curse;
 But such an impious love deserv'd a worse.
 The neighb'ring monarchs, by thy beauty
 led,

Content in crowds, ambitious of thy bed:
 The world is at thy choice, except but one, 30
 Except but him thou canst not choose alone.
 She knew it too, the miserable maid, Ere impious love her better thoughts be-
 tray'd,

And thus within her secret soul she said:

"Ah Myrrha! whither would thy wishes
 tend?"

Ye gods, ye sacred laws, my soul defend
 From such a crime as all mankind detest,
 And never lodg'd before in human breast!
 But is it sin? Or makes my mind alone
 Th' imagin'd sin? For nature makes it
 none. 40

What tyrant then these envious laws began,
 Made not for any other beast but man!
 The father bull his daughter may bestride,
 The horse may make his mother mare a
 bride;

What piety forbids the lusty ram,
 Or more salacious goat, to rut their dam?
 The hen is free to wed the chick she bore,

And make a husband, whom she hatch'd
before.

All creatures else are of a happier kind,
Whom nor ill-natur'd laws from pleasure
bind,
Nor thoughts of sin disturb their peace of mind.

But man a slave of his own making lives;
The fool denies himself what nature gives:
Too busy senates, with an overcare
To make us better than our kind can bear,
Have dash'd a spice of envy in the laws,
And, straining up too high, have spoil'd the
cause.

Yet some wise nations break their cruel chains,
And own no laws, but those which love or-
dains;

Where happy daughters with their sires are
join'd,

And piety is doubly paid in kind.
O that I had been born in such a clime,
Not here, where 't is the country makes the
crime!

But whither would my impious fancy stray?
Hence hopes, and ye forbidden thoughts,
away!

His worth deserves to kindle my desires,
But with the love that daughters bear to sires.

Then had not Cinyras my father been,
What hinder'd Myrrha's hopes to be his
queen?

But the perverseness of my fate is such,
That he's not mine, because he's mine too much:

Our kindred blood debars a better tie;
He might be nearer, were he not so nigh.
Eyes and their objects never must unite;
Some distance is requir'd to help the sight:
Fain would I travel to some foreign shore,
Never to see my native country more,
So might I to myself myself restore;
So might my mind these impious thoughts
remove,

And, ceasing to behold, might cease to
love.

But stay I must, to feed my famish'd sight,
To talk, to kiss; and more, if more I might:
More, impious maid! What more canst thou design?

To make a monstrous mixture in thy line,
And break all statutes human and divine?
Canst thou be call'd (to save thy wretched
life)

Thy mother's rival, and thy father's wife?
Confound so many sacred names in one,
Thy brother's mother! sister to thy son!
And fear'st thou not to see th' infernal
bands,

Their heads with snakes, with torches arm'd
their hands,

Full at thy face th' avenging brands to bear,
And shake the serpents from their hissing
hair?

But thou in time th' increasing ill control,
Nor first debauch the body by the soul;
Secure the sacred quiet of thy mind,
And keep the sanctions nature has design'd.
Suppose I should attempt, th' attempt were
vain;

No thoughts like mine his sinless soul pro-
fane:

Observant of the right; and O, that he Could cure my madness, or be mad like
me!"

Thus she; but Cinyras, who daily sees
A crowd of noble suitors at his knees,
Among so many, knew not whom to choose,
Irresolute to grant, or to refuse.

But, having told their names, enquir'd of her

Who pleas'd her best, and whom she would prefer.

The blushing maid stood silent with surprise,

And on her father fix'd her ardent eyes,
And looking sigh'd; and, as she sigh'd, began

Round tears to shed, that scalded as they ran.

The tender sire, who saw her blush and
cry,

Ascrib'd it all to maiden modesty;
And dried the falling drops, and, yet more
kind,

He strok'd her cheeks, and holy kisses
join'd.

She felt a secret venom fire her blood,
And found more pleasure than a daughter should;

And, ask'd again, what lover of the crew
She lik'd the best; she answer'd: "One like
you."

Mistaking what she meant, her pious will
He prais'd, and bade her so continue still:
The word of "pious" heard, she blush'd with shame

Of secret guilt, and could not bear the
name.

'T was now the mid of night, when slumbers close
 Our eyes, and soothe our cares with soft repose;
 But no repose could wretched Myrrha find,
 Her body rolling, as she roll'd her mind.
 Mad with desire, she ruminates her sin,
 And wishes all her wishes o'er again: ¹²⁹
 Now she despairs, and now resolves to try;
 Would not, and would again, she knows not why;
 Stops and returns, makes and retracts the vow;
 Fain would begin, but understands not how.
 As when a pine is hew'd upon the plains,
 And the last mortal stroke alone remains,
 Lab'ring in pangs of death, and threat'ning
 all,
 This way and that she nods, consid'ring
 where to fall;
 So Myrrha's mind, impell'd on either side,
 Takes ev'ry bent, but cannot long abide:
 Irresolute on which she should rely, ¹⁴⁰
 At last unfix'd in all, is only fix'd to die.
 On that sad thought she rests; resolv'd on
 death,
 She rises, and prepares to choke her breath:
 Then while about the beam her zone she
 ties,
 "Dear Cinyras, farewell!" she softly cries;
 "For thee I die, and only wish to be Not hated, when thou know'st I die for
 thee:
 Pardon the crime, in pity to the cause."
 This said, about her neck the noose she draws.
 The nurse, who lay without, her faithful guard, ¹⁵⁰
 Tho' not the words, the murmurs over-
 heard,
 And sighs and hollow sounds: surpris'd
 with fright,
 She starts, and leaves her bed, and springs
 a light;
 Unlocks the door, and ent'ring out of breath,
 The dying saw, and instruments of death.
 She shrieks, she cuts the zone with trembling haste,
 And in her arms her fainting charge em-
 brace'd:
 Next (for she now had leisure for her tears)
 She weeping ask'd, in these her blooming
 years,
 What unforeseen misfortune caus'd her care, ¹⁶⁰

To loathe her life, and languish in despair!
 The maid, with downcast eyes, and mute
 with grief,
 For death unfinish'd, and ill-tim'd relief,
 Stood sullen to her suit; the beldame press'd
 The more to know, and bar'd her wither'd
 breast;
 Adjur'd her, by the kindly food she drew From those dry founts, her secret ill to shew.
 Sad Myrrha sigh'd, and turn'd her eyes
 aside;
 The nurse still urg'd, and would not be denied;
 Nor only promis'd secrecy, but pray'd ¹⁷⁰
 She might have leave to give her offer'd aid.
 "Good will," she said, "my want of strength
 supplies,
 And diligence shall give what age denies.
 If strong desires thy mind to fury move,
 With charms and med'cines I can cure thy
 love;
 If envious eyes their hurtful rays have cast,
 More pow'rful verse shall free thee from the blast;
 If Heav'n offended sends thee this disease, Offended Heav'n with pray'rs we can appease.
 What then remains that can these cares procure? ¹⁸⁰
 Thy house is flourishing, thy fortune sure;
 Thy careful mother yet in health survives,
 And, to thy comfort, thy kind father lives."
 The virgin started at her father's name,
 And sigh'd profoundly, conscious of the
 shame;
 Nor yet the nurse her impious love divin'd,
 But yet surmis'd that love disturb'd her
 mind.
 Thus thinking, she pursued her point, and
 laid
 And lull'd within her lap the mourning
 maid;
 Then softly sooth'd her thus: "I guess your grief: ¹⁹⁰
 You love, my child; your love shall find relief.
 My long-experienc'd age shall be your
 guide;
 Rely on that, and lay distrust aside:
 No breath of air shall on the secret blow,
 Nor shall (what most you fear) your father
 know."
 Struck once again, as with a thunderclap,
 The guilty virgin bounded from her lap,

And threw her body prostrate on the bed,
And, to conceal her blushes, hid her head:
There silent lay, and warn'd her with her hand ²⁰⁰

To go; but she receiv'd not the command,
Remaining still importunate to know.
Then Myrrha thus: "Or ask no more, or go:
I prethee go, or staying spare my shame;
What thou wouldst hear, is impious ev'n to
name."

At this, on high the beldame holds her
hands,
And trembling, both with age and terror,
stands;

Adjures, and falling at her feet intreats,
Soothes her with blandishments, and frights
with threats,

To tell the crime intended, or disclose ²¹⁰
What part of it she knew, if she no farther knows;

And last, if conscious to her counsel made,
Confirms anew the promise of her aid.

Now Myrrha rais'd her head; but soon,
oppress'd
With shame, reclin'd it on her nurse's
breast;
Bath'd it with tears, and strove to have confess'd;

Twice she began, and stopp'd; again she
tried;

The falt'ring tongue its office still denied:
At last her veil before her face she spread,
And drew a long preluding sigh, and said,
"O happy mother, in thy marriage bed!"
Then groan'd and ceas'd; the good old woman shook, ²²²

Stiff were her eyes, and ghastly was her look:
Her hoary hair upright with horror stood,
Made (to her grief) more knowing than she would.

Much she reproach'd, and many things she
said,

To cure the madness of th' unhappy maid:
In vain; for Myrrha stood convict of ill;
Her reason vanquish'd, but unchang'd her
will:

Perverse of mind, unable to reply, ²³⁰
She stood resolv'd or to possess, or die.

At length the fondness of a nurse prevail'd Against her better sense, and virtue fail'd:
"Enjoy, my child, since such is thy desire,
Thy love," she said — she durst not say,
"Thy sire;" —

"Live, tho' unhappy, live on any terms:"
Then with a second oath her faith confirms.

The solemn feast of Ceres now was near,
When long white linen stoles the matrons
wear;

Rank'd in procession walk the pious train, ²⁴⁰
Off'ring first fruits, and spikes of yellow
grain:

For nine long nights the nuptial bed they
shun,

And, sanctifying harvest, lie alone.

Mix'd with the crowd, the queen forsook her lord,

And Ceres' pow'r with secret rites ador'd.
The royal couch now vacant for a time,
The crafty crone, officious in her crime,
The curst occasion took: the king she found Easy with wine, and deep in pleasures
drown'd,

Prepar'd for love: the beldame blew the flame, ²⁵⁰

Confess'd the passion, but conceal'd the
name.

Her form she prais'd; the monarch ask'd
her years,

And she replied: "The same thy Myrrha
bears."

Wine and commended beauty fir'd his
thought;

Impatient, he commands her to be brought.
Pleas'd with her charge perform'd, she hies her home,

And gratulates the nymph, the task was overcome.

Myrrha was joy'd the welcome news to
hear;

But, clogg'd with guilt, the joy was un-sincere:

So various, so discordant is the mind, ²⁶⁰
That in our will a diff'rent will we find.

Ill she presag'd, and yet pursued her lust;
For guilty pleasures give a double gust.

'Twas depth of night: Aretophylax had
driv'n

His lazy wain half round the northern
heav'n,

When Myrrha hasten'd to the crime de-sir'd;

The moon beheld her first, and first retir'd;
The stars amaz'd ran backward from the
sight,

And, shrunk within their sockets, lost their
light.

Icarus first withdraws his holy flame; ²⁷⁰
The Virgin sign, in heav'n the second name,

Slides down the belt, and from her station
flies,

And night with sable clouds involves the
skies.

Bold Myrrha still pursues her black in-
tent:

She stumbled thrice (an omen of th'
event);

Thrice shriek'd the fun'ral owl, yet on she
went,

Secure of shame, because secure of sight —
Ev'n bashful sins are impudent by night.
Link'd hand in hand, th' accomplice and the dame, ²⁷⁹

Their way exploring, to the chamber came.
The door was ope, they blindly grope their
way,

Where dark in bed th' expecting monarch
lay:

Thus far her courage held, but here forsakes;

Her faint knees knock at ev'ry step she makes.

The nearer to her crime, the more within
She feels remorse, and horror of her sin;

Repents too late her criminal desire,
And wishes that unknown she could retire.

Her ling'ring thus, the nurse (who fear'd
delay

The fatal secret might at length betray) ²⁹⁰ Pull'd forward, to complete the work begun,

And said to Cinyras: "Receive thy own."

Thus saying, she deliver'd kind to kind,

Accurst, and their devoted bodies join'd.

The sire, unknowing of the crime, admits

His bowels, and profanes the hallow'd sheets:

He found she trembled, but believ'd she
strove,

With maiden modesty, against her love;

And sought with flatt'ring words vain fancies to remove.

Perhaps he said, "My daughter, cease thy fears," ³⁰⁰

(Because the title suited with her years;)

And, "Father," she might whisper him
again,

That names might not be wanting to the sin.

Full of her sire, she left th' incestuous bed,

And carried in her womb the crime she
bred.

Another, and another night she came;

For frequent sin had left no sense of shame:

Till Cinyras desir'd to see her face,

Whose body he had held in close embrace,

And brought a taper; the revealer, light, ³¹⁰

Expos'd both crime and criminal to sight.
Grief, rage, amazement, could no speech
afford,

But from the sheath he drew th' avenging
sword.

The guilty fled; the benefit of night,
That favor'd first the sin, secur'd the flight.
Long wand'ring thro' the spacious fields,
she bent

Her voyage to th' Arabian continent;
Then pass'd the region which Panchæa
join'd,

And, flying, left the palmy plains behind.
Nine times the moon had mew'd her horns;
at length, ³²⁰

With travel weary, unsupplied with
strength,

And with the burden of her womb op-
press'd,

Sabæan fields afford her needful rest.

There, loathing life, and yet of death afraid,

In anguish of her spirit, thus she pray'd:

"Ye pow'rs, if any so propitious are

T' accept my penitence, and hear my pray'r,

Your judgments, I confess, are justly sent;

Great sins deserve as great a punishment:

Yet since my life the living will profane, ³³⁰

And since my death the happy dead will
stain,

A middle state your mercy may bestow,

Betwixt the realms above and those be-
low:

Some other form to wretched Myrrha give,
Nor let her wholly die, nor wholly live."

The pray'rs of penitents are never vain:

At least, she did her last request obtain;

For, while she spoke, the ground began to
rise,

And gather'd round her feet, her legs and
thighs:

Her toes in roots descend, and, spreading wide, ³⁴⁰

A firm foundation for the trunk provide;

Her solid bones convert to solid wood,

To pith her marrow, and to sap her blood;

Her arms are boughs, her fingers change their kind,

Her tender skin is harden'd into rind.

And now the rising tree her womb invests;

Now, shooting upwards still, invades her breasts,

And shades the neck; when, weary with de-
lay,

She sunk her head within, and met it half
the way.

And tho' with outward shape she lost her
sense, 350
With bitter tears she wept her last offense;
And still she weeps, nor sheds her tears in
vain;
For still the precious drops her name retain.

Meantime the misbegotten infant grows,
And, ripe for birth, distends with deadly
throes

The swelling rind, with unavailing strife
To leave the wooden womb, and pushes into life.

The mother tree, as if oppress'd with pain,
Writhes here and there, to break the bark,
in vain;

And, like a lab'ring woman, would have
pray'd, 360

But wants a voice to call Lucina's aid:
The bending bole sends out a hollow sound,
And trickling tears fall thicker on the
ground.

The mild Lucina came uncall'd, and stood Beside the struggling boughs, and heard the groaning wood;

Then reach'd her midwife hand, to speed
the throes,

And spoke the pow'rful spells that babes to birth disclose.

The bark divides, the living load to free,
And safe delivers the convulsive tree. 369

The ready nymphs receive the crying child,
And wash him in the tears the parent plant
distill'd.

They swath'd him with their scarfs; beneath him spread

The ground with herbs; with roses rais'd
his head.

The lovely babe was born with ev'ry grace;
Ev'n envy must have prais'd so fair a face.
Such was his form, as painters, when they
show

Their utmost art, on naked Loves bestow;
And, that their arms no diff'rence might be-
tray,

Give him a bow, or his from Cupid take
away. 379

Time glides along, with undiscover'd haste,
The future but a length behind the past;
So swift are years: the babe, whom just be-
fore

His grandsire got, and whom his sister
bore;

The drop, the thing which late the tree in-
clos'd,

And late the yawning bark to life expos'd;
A babe, a boy, a beauteous youth appears;
And lovelier than himself at riper years.
Now to the Queen of Love he gave desires,
And, with her pains, reveng'd his mother's
fires.

THE FIRST BOOK OF HOMER'S ILIAS

THE ARGUMENT

Chryses, priest of Apollo, brings presents to the Grecian princes, to ransom his daughter Chryseis, who was prisoner in the fleet. Agamemnon, the general, whose captive and mistress the young lady was, refuses to deliver her, threatens the venerable old man, and dismisses him with contumely. The priest craves vengeance of his god; who sends a plague among the Greeks: which occasions Achilles, their great champion, to summon a council of the chief officers: he encourages Calchas, the high priest and prophet, to tell the reason why the gods were so much incens'd against them. Calchas is fearful of provoking Agamemnon, till Achilles engages to protect him; then, embolden'd by the hero, he accuses the general as the cause of all, by detaining the fair captive and refusing the presents offer'd for her ransom. By this proceeding, Agamemnon is oblig'd, against his will, to restore Chryseis, with gifts, that he might appease the wrath of Phœbus; but at the same time, to revenge himself on Achilles, sends to seize his slave Briseis. Achilles, thus affronted, complains to his mother Thetis; and begs her to revenge his injury, not only on the general, but on all the army, by giving victory to the Trojans, till the ungrateful king became sensible of his injustice. At the same time, he retires from the camp into his ships, and withdraws his aid from his countrymen. Thetis prefers her son's petition to Jupiter, who grants her suit. Juno suspects her errand, and quarrels with her husband for his grant; till Vulcan reconciles his parents with a bowl of nectar, and sends them peaceably to bed.

THE wrath of Peleus' son, O Muse, resound;
Whose dire effects the Grecian army found,
And many a hero, king, and hardy knight,
Were sent, in early youth, to shades of
night;
Their limbs a prey to dogs and vultures
made:

So was the sov'reign will of Jove obey'd:
From that ill-omen'd 'hour when strife begun

Betwixt Atrides great and Thetis' godlike son.

What pow'r provok'd, and for what cause, relate,

Sow'd in their breasts the seeds of stern debate:

Jove's and Latona's son his wrath express'd,
In vengeance of his violated priest,
Against the King of Men; who, swoln with pride,

Refus'd his presents, and his pray'rs denied.
For this the god a swift contagion spread
Amid the camp, where heaps on heaps lay dead.

For venerable Chryses came to buy,
With gold and gifts of price, his daughter's liberty.

Suppliant before the Grecian chiefs he stood;
Awful, and arm'd with ensigns of his god: 20
Bare was his hoary head; one holy hand
Held forth his laurel crown, and one his scepter of command.

His suit was common; but, above the rest,
To both the brother princes thus address'd.

"Ye sons of Atreus, and ye Grecian pow'rs,

So may the gods who dwell in heav'nly bow'rs

Succeed your siege, accord the vows you make,

And give you Troy's imperial town to take;
So, by their happy conduct, may you come
With conquest back to your sweet native home,

As you receive the ransom which I bring,
(Respecting Jove, and the far-shooting king,) 30

And break my daughter's bonds, at my desire,

And glad with her return her grieving sire."

With shouts of loud acclaim the Greeks decree

To take the gifts, to set the damsel free.
The King of Men alone with fury burn'd;
And, haughty, these opprobrious words return'd:

"Hence, holy dotard, and avoid my sight,
Ere evil intercept thy tardy flight; 40
Nor dare to tread this interdicted strand,
Lest not that idle scepter in thy hand,
Nor thy god's crown, my vow'd revenge withstand."

Hence on thy life: the captive maid is mine;

Whom not for price or pray'rs I will resign.

Mine she shall be, till creeping age and time

Her bloom have wither'd, and consum'd her prime:

Till then my royal bed she shall attend;
And, having first adorn'd it, late ascend.

This, for the night; by day, the web and loom, 50

And homely household task, shall be her doom,

Far from thy lov'd embrace, and her sweet native home."

He said; the helpless priest replied no more,

But sped his steps along the hoarse-resounding shore:

Silent he fled; secure at length he stood,
Devoutly curs'd his foes, and thus invok'd his god:

"O source of sacred light, attend my pray'r,

God with the silver bow and golden hair,
Whom Chrysa, Cilla, Tenedos obeys,

And whose broad eye their happy soil surveys. 60

If, Sinintheus, I have pour'd before thy shrine

The blood of oxen, goats, and ruddy wine,
And larded thighs on loaded altars laid,
Hear, and my just revenge propitious aid!
Pierce the proud Greeks, and with thy shafts attest

How much thy pow'r is injur'd in thy priest."

He pray'd, and Phœbus, hearing, urg'd his flight,

With fury kindl'd, from Olympus' height;
His quiver o'er his ample shoulders threw;
His bow twang'd, and his arrows rattled as they flew. 70

Black as a stormy night, he rang'd around
The tents, and compass'd the devoted ground.

Then with full force his deadly bow he bent,

And feather'd fates among the mules and sumpters sent.

Th' essay of rage; on faithful dogs the next;
And last, in human hearts his arrows fix'd.
The god nine days the Greeks at rovers kill'd,

Nine days the camp with fun'ral fires was
fill'd;

The tenth, Achilles, by the queen's command,

Who bears heav'n's awful scepter in her
hand,

A council summon'd; for the goddess griev'd
Her favor'd host should perish unreliev'd.

The kings, assembled, soon their chief
inclose;

Then from his seat the goddess-born arose,
And thus undaunted spoke: "What now remains,

But that once more we tempt the wat'ry
plains,

And, wand'ring homeward, seek our safety
hence,

In flight at least, if we can find defense?

Such woes at once encompass us about,
The plague within the camp, the sword
without.

Consult, O king, the prophets of th' event:
And whence these ills, and what the god's intent,

Let them by dreams explore; for dreams
from Jove are sent.

What want of offer'd victims, what offense
In fact committed could the Sun incense, To deal his deadly shafts? What may re-
move

His settled hate, and reconcile his love,
That he may look propitious on our toils,
And hungry graves no more be glutted with our spoils?"

Thus to the King of Men the hero spoke;
Then Calchas the desir'd occasion took:
Calchas the sacred seer, who had in view Things present and the past, and things to come foreknew;

Supreme of augurs, who, by Phœbus taught,
The Grecian pow'rs to Troy's destruction
brought.

Skill'd in the secret causes of their woes,
The reverend priest in graceful act arose,
And thus bespoke Pelides: "Care of Jove,
Favor'd of all th' immortal pow'rs above, Wouldst thou the seeds deep sown of mischiefs know,

And why, provok'd, Apollo bends his bow?
Plight first thy faith, inviolably true,
To save me from those ills that may ensue.
For I shall tell ungrateful truths to those Whose boundless pow'r of life and death
dispose;

And sov'reigns, ever jealous of their state,

Forgive not those whom once they mark for
hate:

Ev'n tho' th' offense they seemingly digest, Revenge, like embers, rak'd within their
breast,

Bursts forth in flames; whose unresisted
pow'r

Will seize th' unwary wretch, and soon devour.

Such and no less is he, on whom depends
The sum of things, and whom my tongue of force offends.

Secure me then from his foreseen intent,
That what his wrath may doom, thy valor may prevent."

To this the stern Achilles made reply:
"Be bold, and on my plighted faith rely,
To speak what Phœbus has inspir'd thy soul
For common good; and speak without control.

His godhead I invoke, by him I swear,
That while my nostrils draw this vital air, None shall presume to violate those
bands,

Or touch thy person with unhallow'd
hands;

Ev'n not the King of Men, that all commands."

At this, resuming heart, the prophet said:
"Nor hecatombs unslain, nor vows unpaid,
On Greeks, accurst, this dire contagion
bring,

Or call for vengeance from the bowyer king;
But he the tyrant, whom none dares resist,
Affronts the godhead in his injur'd priest:
He keeps the damsel captive in his chain,
And presents are refus'd, and pray'rs pre-ferr'd in vain.

For this th' avenging pow'r employs his
darts,

And empties all his quiver in our hearts;
Thus will persist, relentless in his ire,
Till the fair slave be render'd to her sire,
And ransom-free restor'd to his abode,
With sacrifice to reconcile the god:
Then he, perhaps, aton'd by pray'r, may
cease

His vengeance justly vow'd, and give the
peace."

Thus having said, he sate. Thus answer'd then,

Upstarting from his throne, the King of Men,

His breast with fury fill'd, his eyes with
fire;

Which rolling round, he shot in sparkles on the sire:

"Augur of ill, whose tongue was never
found

Without a priestly curse, or boding sound!
For not one blest event foretold to me
Pass'd thro' that mouth, or pass'd unwill-ingly.

And now thou dost with lies the throne
invade,

By practice harden'd in thy sland'ring trade;
Obtending heav'n for whate'er ills befall,
And sputt'ring under specious names thy gall.

Now Phœbus is provok'd, his rites and laws

Are in his priest profan'd, and I the cause;
Since I detain a slave, my sov'reign prize,
And sacred gold, your idol god, despise.
I love her well, and well her merits claim
To stand preferr'd before my Grecian dame:
Not Clytemnestra's self in beauty's bloom
More charm'd, or better plied the various loom:

Mine is the maid, and brought in happy
hour,

With every household grace adorn'd, to bless my nuptial bow'r.

Yet shall she be restor'd, since public
good

For private int'rest ought not be with-
stood,

To save th' effusion of my people's blood.
But right requires, if I resign my own,
I should not suffer for your sakes alone;
Alone excluded from the prize I gain'd,
And by your common suffrage have ob-
tain'd.

The slave without a ransom shall be sent: 180
It rests for you to make th' equivalent."

To this the fierce Thessalian prince replied:

"O first in pow'r, but passing all in pride,
Gripping, and still tenacious of thy hold,
Wouldst thou the Grecian chiefs, tho'
largely soul'd,

Should give the prizes they had gain'd be-
fore,

And with their loss thy sacrilege restore?
Whate'er by force of arms the soldier got,
Is each his own, by dividend of lot:

Which to resume, were both unjust and
base;

Not to be borne but by a servile race.

But this we can: if Saturn's son bestows

The sack of Troy, which he by promise owes,

Then shall the conqu'ring Greeks thy loss
restore,

And with large int'rest make th' advantage
more."

To this Atrides answer'd: "Tho' thy boast

Assumes the foremost name of all our host,
Pretend not, mighty man, that what is mine,
Controll'd by thee, I tamely should resign.
Shall I release the prize I gain'd by right, 200
In taken towns, and many a bloody fight,
While thou detain'st Briseis in thy bands,
By priestly glossing on the god's commands?

Resolve on this, (a short alternative,) Quit mine, or, in exchange, another give;
Else I, assure thy soul, by sov'reign right
Will seize thy captive in thy own despite;
Or from stout Ajax, or Ulysses, bear
What other prize my fancy shall prefer.
Then softly murmur, or aloud complain; 210
Rage as you please, you shall resist in vain.
But more of this, in proper time and place;
To things of greater moment let us pass.

A ship to sail the sacred seas prepare,
Proud in her trim, and put on board the
fair,

With sacrifice and gifts, and all the pomp of pray'r.

The crew well chosen, the command shall be

In Ajax; or, if other I decree,
In Creta's king, or Ithacus, or, if I please,
in thee:

Most fit thyself to see perform'd th' intent

For which my pris'ner from my sight is
sent,

(Thanks to thy pious care,) that Phœbus may relent."

At this, Achilles roll'd his furious eyes,
Fix'd on the king askant, and thus replies:

"O impudent, regardful of thy own,
Whose thoughts are center'd on thyself
alone,

Advanc'd to sovereign sway for better ends
Than thus like abject slaves to treat thy
friends;

What Greek is he, that, urg'd by thy command,

Against the Trojan troops will lift his
hand?

Not I: nor such inforc'd respect I owe;

Nor Pergamus I hate, nor Priam is my foe.
What wrong from Troy remote could I
sustain,

To leave my fruitful soil and happy reign,
And plow the surges of the stormy
main ?

Thee, frontless man, we follow'd from afar;
Thy instruments of death, and tools of war.
Thine is the triumph; ours the toil alone:
We bear thee on our backs, and mount thee
on the throne.

For thee we fall in fight; for thee redress

Thy baffled brother, not the wrongs of Greece.

And now thou threaten'st with unjust decree,

To punish thy affronting Heav'n, on me;
To seize the prize which I so dearly bought,
By common suffrage giv'n, confirm'd by
lot;

Mean match to thine: for still, above the
rest,

Thy hook'd rapacious hands usurp the best;
Tho' mine are first in fight, to force the
prey,

And last sustain the labors of the day.
Nor grudge I thee the much the Grecians
give,

Nor murmur'ing take the little I receive.
Yet ev'n this little, thou, who wouldst in-gross

The whole, insatiate, envy'st as thy loss.
Know, then, for Phthia fix'd is my return:

Better at home my ill-paid pains to
mourn,

Than from an equal here sustain the public scorn."

The king, whose brows with shining gold were bound,

Who saw his throne with scepter'd slaves
incompass'd round,

Thus answer'd stern: "Go, at thy pleasure,
go:

We need not such a friend, nor fear we such a foe.

There will not want to follow me in fight;
Jove will assist, and Jove assert my right.
But thou of all the kings (his care below)
Art least at my command, and most my
foe.

Debates, dissensions, uproars are thy joy;
Provok'd without offense, and practic'd to destroy.

Strength is of brutes, and not thy boast
alone;

At least 'tis lent from heav'n, and not thy
own.

Fly then, ill-manner'd, to thy native land,
And there thy ant-born Myrmidons command.

But mark this menace; since I must resign²⁷⁰
My black-ey'd maid, to please the pow'rs
divine —

A well-rigg'd vessel in the port attends, Mann'd at my charge, commanded by my
friends! —

The ship shall waft her to her wish'd abode, Full fraught with holy bribes to the far-
shooting god.

This thus dispatch'd, I owe myself the care,
My fame and injur'd honor to repair:
From thy own tent, proud man, in thy despite,

This hand shall ravish thy pretended right.²⁷⁹
Briseis shall be mine, and thou shalt see
What odds of awful pow'r I have on thee,
That others at thy cost may learn the difference of degree."

At this th' impatient hero sourly smil'd:
His heart, impetuous, in his bosom boil'd,
And, justled by two tides of equal sway,
Stood for a while suspended in his way,
Betwixt his reason and his rage untam'd;
One whisper'd soft, and one aloud re-claim'd:

That only counsel'd to the safer side;²⁹⁰
This to the sword his ready hand applied.
Unpunish'd to support th' affront was hard, Nor easy was th' attempt to force the
guard.

But soon the thirst of vengeance fir'd his
blood:

Half shone his falchion, and half sheath'd
it stood.

In that nice moment, Pallas, from above,
Commission'd by th' imperial wife of Jove, Descended swift: (the white-arm'd queen was loth

The fight should follow, for she favor'd
both:)

Just as in act he stood, in clouds inshrin'd,³⁰⁰
Her hand she fasten'd on his hair behind;
Then backward by his yellow curls she drew;
To him, and him alone, confess'd in view.
Tam'd by superior force, he turn'd his eyes
Aghast at first, and stupid with surprise;
But by her sparkling eyes, and ardent look,
The virgin warrior known, he thus bespoke:

"Com'st thou, celestial, to behold my wrongs?
Then view the vengeance which to crimes belongs."

Thus he. The Mue-ey'd goddess thus rejoind:³¹⁰

"I come to calm thy turbulence of mind,
If Reason will resume her sovereign sway,
And, sent by Juno, her commands obey.
Equal she loves you both, and I protect:
Then give thy guardian gods their due respect;

And cease contention; be thy words severe,
Sharp as he merits, but the sword forbear.
An hour unhop'd already wings her way,
When he his dire affront shall dearly pay;
When the proud king shall sue, with tieble gain,³²⁰

To quit thy loss, and conquer thy disdain.
But thou, secure of my unfailing word,
Compose thy swelling soul, and sheathe the sword."

The youth thus answer'd mild: "Auspicious maid,

Heav'n's will be mine, and your commands obey'd.

The gods are just, and when, subduing sense,

We serve their pow'rs, provide the recompense."

He said; with surly faith believ'd her word,
And in the sheath, reluctant, plung'd the sword.

Her message done, she mounts the blest abodes,³³⁰

And mix'd among the senate of the gods.

At her departure his disdain return'd:

The fire she fann'd, with greater fury burn'd;

Rumbling within, till thus it found a vent:
"Dastard, and drunkard, mean and insolent;

Tongue-valiant hero, vaunter of thy might,
In threats the foremost, but the lag in fight;
When didst thou thrust amid the mingled prease,

Content to hide the war aloof in peace?

Arms are the trade of each plebeian soul;³⁴⁰

'T is death to fight, but kingly to control;

Lord-like at ease, with arbitrary pow'r,

To peel the chiefs, the people to devour.

These, traitor, are thy talents; safer far

Than to contend in fields, and toils of war.

Nor couldst thou thus have dar'd the common hate,

Were not their souls as abject as their state.
But, by this scepter, solemnly I swear,
(Which never more green leaf or growing branch shall bear;

Torn from the tree, and giv'n by Jove to those³⁵⁰

Who laws dispense, and mighty wrongs oppose,)

That when the Grecians want my wonted aid,

No gift shall bribe it, and no pray'r persuade.

When Hector comes, the homicide, to wield
His conquering arms, with corps to strow the field;

Then shalt thou mourn thy pride, and late confess

My wrong repented, when 'tis past redress."

He said; and with disdain, in open view,
Against the ground his golden scepter threw;

Then sate: with boiling rage Atrides burn'd,
And foam betwix his gnashing grinders churn'd.³⁶¹

But from his seat the Pylian prince arose,
With reas'ning mild, their madness to compose:

Words, sweet as honey, from his mouth distill'd;

Two centuries already he fulfill'd,

And now began the third; unbroken yet:

Once fam'd for courage; still in council great.

"What worse," he said, "can Argos undergo;

What can more gratify the Phrygian foe,
Than these distemper'd heats? If both the lights³⁷⁰

Of Greece their private int'rest disunites!
Believe a friend, with thrice your years increas'd,

And let these youthful passions be repress'd:
I flourish'd long before your birth; and then

Liv'd equal with a race of braver men

Than these dim eyes shall e'er behold again.

Cæneus and Dryas, and, excelling them,
Great Theseus, and the force of greater

Polypheme.

With these I went, a brother of the war,
Their dangers to divide, their fame to share.

Nor idle stood with unassisting hands,³⁸¹

When salvage beasts, and men's more salvage bands,

Their virtuous toil subdued: yet those I
sway'd

With pow'rful speech; I spoke, and they obey'd.

If such as those my counsels could reclaim,
Think not, young warriors, your diminish'd
name

Shall lose of luster, by subjecting rage
To the cool dictates of experienc'd age.
Thou, King of Men, stretch not thy sovereign sway

Beyond the bounds free subjects can obey;
But let Pelides in his prize rejoice, ³⁹¹
Achiev'd in arms, allow'd by public voice.
Nor thou, brave champion, with his power contend,

Before whose throne ev'n kings their lower'd
scepters bend:

The head of action he, and thou the hand;
Matchless thy force, but mightier his command.

Thou first, O king, release the rights of
sway;

Pow'r, self-restrain'd, the people best obey.
Sanctions of law from thee derive their source;

Command thyself, whom no commands can force. ⁴⁰⁰

The son of Thetis, rampire of our host,
Is worth our care to keep; nor shall my pray'rs be lost."

Thus Nestor said, and ceas'd: Atrides
broke

His silence next; but ponder'd ere he spoke:
"Wise are thy words, and glad I would obey,
But this proud man affects imperial sway:
Controlling kings, and trampling on our
state,

His will is law; and what he wills is fate.
The gods have giv'n him strength; but whence the style

Of lawless pow'r assum'd, or license to re-vile?" ⁴¹⁰

Achilles cut him short, and thus replied:
"My worth allow'd, in words, is in effect denied.

For who but a poltron, possess'd with fear,
Such haughty insolence can tamely bear?
Command thy slaves: my freeborn soul dis-
dains

A tyrant's curb, and restiff breaks the reins.

Take this along, that no dispute shall rise (Tho' mine the woman) for my ravish'd
prize;

But, she excepted, as unworthy strife, Dare not, I charge thee dare not, on thy life, ⁴²⁰

Touch aught of mine beside, by lot my due,
But stand aloof, and think profane to view:
This fauchion, else, not hitherto withstood,
These hostile fields shall fatten with thy
blood."

He said, and rose the first; the council
broke,
And all their grave consults dissolv'd in smoke.

The royal youth retir'd, on vengeance
bent;

Patroclus follow'd silent to his tent.

Meantime, the king with gifts a vessel
stores;

Supplies the banks with twenty chosen oars;
And next, to reconcile the shooter god, ⁴³¹ Within her hollow sides the sacrifice he
stow'd.

Chryseis last was set on board; whose hand
Ulysses took, intrusted with command:
They plow the liquid seas, and leave the less'ning land. }

Atrides then, his outward zeal to boast,
Bade purify the sin-polluted host.

With perfect hecatombs the god they grac'd;
Whose offer'd entrails in the main were cast. ⁴³⁹

Black bulls and bearded goats on altars lie,
And clouds of sav'ry stench involve the
sky.

These pomps the royal hypocrite design'd
For shew, but harbor'd vengeance in his
mind;

Till holy malice, longing for a vent,
At length discover'd his conceal'd intent.
Talthybius, and Eurybates the just,
Heralds of arms, and ministers of trust,
He call'd, and thus bespoke: "Haste hence your way.

And from the goddess-born demand his prey.
If yielded, bring the captive; if denied, ⁴⁵⁰
The king (so tell him) shall chastise his
pride,

And with arm'd multitudes in person come To vindicate his pow'r, and justify his
doom."

This hard command unwilling they
obey,
And o'er the barren shore pursue their
way,
Where quarter'd in their camp the fierce Thessalians lay. }

Their sov'reign seated on his chair they
 find,
 His pensive cheek upon his hand reclin'd,
 And anxious thoughts revolving in his
 mind.
 With gloomy looks he saw them ent'r-
 ing in ⁴⁶⁰
 Without salute; nor durst they first begin,
 Fearful of rash offense and death foreseen.
 He soon, the cause divining, clear'd his brow,
 And thus did liberty of speech allow:
 "Interpreters of gods and men, be bold;
 Awful your character, and uncontroll'd:
 Howe'er displeasing be the news you bring,
 I blame not you, but your imperious king.
 You come, I know, my captive to demand;
 Patroclus, give her to the herald's hand. ⁴⁷⁰
 But you authentic witnesses I bring.
 Before the gods and your ungrateful king,
 Of this my manifest: that never more
 This hand shall combat on the crooked
 shore:
 No, let the Grecian pow'rs, oppress'd in
 fight,
 Unpitied perish in their tyrant's sight.
 Blind of the future, and by rage misled,
 He pulls his crimes upon his people's head;
 Forc'd from the field in trenches to contend,
 And his insulted camp from foes defend."
 He said, and soon, obeying his intent. ⁴⁸¹
 Patroclus brought Briseis from her tent;
 Then to th' intrusted messengers re-sign'd.
 She wept, and often cast her eyes behind;
 Forc'd from the man she lov'd: they led her
 thence
 Along the shore, a pris'n'r to their prince.
 Sole on the barren sands the suff'ring
 chief Roar'd out for anguish, and indulg'd his
 grief;
 Cast on his kindred seas a stormy look,
 And his unbraid'd mother thus bespoke: ⁴⁹⁰
 "Unhappy parent of a short-liv'd son,
 Since Jove in pity by thy pray'rs was won
 To grace my small remains of breath with
 fame,
 Why loads he this imbitter'd life with
 shame,
 Suff'ring his King of Men to force my slave, Whom, well deserv'd in war, the Grecians
 gave?"
 Set by old Ocean's side, the goddess heard;
 Then from the sacred deep her head she
 rear'd;

Rose like a morning mist, and thus begun
 To soothe the sorrows of her plaintive son:
 "Why cries my care, and why conceals his smart?" ⁵⁰¹
 Let thy afflicted parent share her part."
 Then, sighing from the bottom of his
 breast,
 To the sea goddess thus the goddess-born
 address'd:
 "Thou know'st my pain, which telling but recalls:
 By force of arms we raz'd the Theban
 walls;
 The ransack'd city, taken by our toils,
 We left, and hither brought the golden
 spoils:
 Equal we shar'd them; but, before the rest,
 The proud prerogative had seiz'd the best. ⁵¹⁰
 Chryseis was the greedy tyrant's prize,
 Chryseis, rosy-cheek'd, with charming eyes.
 Her sire, Apollo's priest, arriv'd to buy,
 With proffer'd gifts of price, his daughter's liberty.
 Suppliant before the Grecians' chiefs he
 stood,
 Awful, and arm'd with ensigns of his god:
 Bare was his hoary head, one holy hand Held forth his laurel crown, and one, his scepter of command.
 His suit was common, but above the rest ⁵¹⁹
 To both the brother princes was address'd.
 With shouts of loud acclaim the Greeks
 agree
 To take the gifts, to set the pris'n'r free.
 Not so the tyrant, who with scorn the priest
 Receiv'd, and with opprobrious words dismiss'd.
 The good old man, forlorn of human aid,
 For vengeance to his heav'nly patron
 pray'd:
 The godhead gave a favorable ear,
 And granted all to him he held so dear;
 In an ill hour his piercing shafts he sped;
 And heaps on heaps of slaughter'd Greeks lay dead, ⁵³⁰
 While round the camp he rang'd. At length arose
 A seer who well divin'd, and durst disclose
 The source of all our ills: I took the word,
 And urg'd the sacred slave to be restor'd,
 The god appeas'd; the swelling monarch
 storm'd,
 And then the vengeance vow'd, he since perform'd.
 The Greeks, 't is true, their ruin to prevent,

Have to the royal priest his daughter sent;
But from their haughty king his heralds
came,

And seiz'd, by his command, my captive dame, ⁵⁴⁰

By common suffrage given; but, thou, be
won,

If in thy pow'r, t' avenge thy injur'd son;
Ascend the skies, and supplicating move
Thy just complaint to cloud-compelling
Jove.

If thou by either word or deed hast wrought
A kind remembrance in his grateful thought,
Urge him by that; for often hast thou said
Thy pow'r was once not useless in his aid.
When he, who high above the highest
reigns,

Surpris'd by traitor gods, was bound in chains; ⁵⁵⁰

When Juno, Pallas, with ambition fir'd,
And his blue brother of the seas conspir'd,
Thou freed'st the sovereign from unworthy
hands;

Thou brought'st Briareus with his hundred
hands,

(So call'd in heav'n, but mortal men below
By his terrestrial name Ægeon know:

Twice stronger than his sire, who sate
above,

Assessor to the throne of thund'ring Jove.)
The gods, dismay'd at his approach, with-
drew,

Nor durst their unaccomplish'd crime pursue. ⁵⁶⁰

That action to his grateful mind recall:
Embrace his knees, and at his footstool fall;
That now, if ever, he will aid our foes;
Let Troy's triumphant troops the camp in-
close;

Ours, beaten to the shore, the siege forsake.
And what their king deserves with him par-
take;

That the proud tyrant, at his proper cost,
May learn the value of the man he lost."

To whom the mother goddess thus replied,

Sigh'd ere she spoke, and while she spoke
she cried: ⁵⁷⁰

"Ah wretched me! by fates averse decreed
To bring thee forth with pain, with care to breed!

Did envious Heav'n not otherwise ordain, Safe in thy hollow ships thou shouldst
remain,

Nor ever tempt the fatal field again.

But now thy planet sheds his pois'nous rays,
And short and full of sorrow are thy days.
For what remains, to heav'n I will ascend,
And at the Thund'rer's throne thy suit commend.

Till then, secure in ships, abstain from fight;
Indulge thy grief in tears, and vent thy spite; ⁵⁸¹

For yesterday the court of heav'n with
Jove

Remov'd: 't is dead vacation now above.
Twelve days the gods their solemn revels
keep,

And quaff with blameless Ethiops in the deep.

Return'd from thence, to heav'n my flight
I take,

Knock at the brazen gates, and Providence
awake;

Embrace his knees; and, suppliant to the
sire,

Doubt not I will obtain the grant of thy desire."

She said; and, parting, left him on the place, ⁵⁹⁰

Sworn with disdain, resenting his disgrace:
Revengeful thoughts revolving in his mind,
He wept for anger, and for love he pin'd.

Meantime with prosperous gales Ulysses
brought

The slave, and ship with sacrifices fraught,
To Chrysa's port: where, ent'ring with the
tide,

He dropp'd his anchors, and his oars he
plied;

Furl'd every sail, and, drawing down the
mast,

His vessel moor'd, and made with haulsers
fast. ⁵⁹⁹

Descending on the plain, ashore they bring
The hecatomb to please the shooter king.

The dame before an altar's holy fire
Ulysses led, and thus bespoke her sire:

"Reverenc'd be thou, and be thy god
ador'd:

The King of Men thy daughter has re-
stor'd,

And sent by me with presents and with
pray'r.

He recommends him to thy pious care;
That Phœbus at thy suit his wrath may
cease,

And give the penitent offenders peace."

He said, and gave her to her father's hands, ⁶¹⁰

Who glad receiv'd her, free from servile bands.

This done, in order they, with sober grace,
Their gifts around the well-built altar place;
Then wash'd, and took the cakes; while Chryses stood

With hands upheld, and thus invoc'd his god:

"God of the silver bow, whose eyes
survey

The sacred Cilla; thou, whose awful sway
Chrysa the blest and Tenedos obey:

Now hear, as thou before my pray'r hast
heard,

Against the Grecians and their prince pre-
ferr'd.

Once thou hast honor'd, honor once again
Thy priest, nor let his second vows be vain;
But from th' afflicted host and humbled
prince

Avert thy wrath, and cease thy pestilence."
Apollo heard, and, conquering his disdain,
Unbent his bow, and Greece respir'd again.

Now when the solemn rites of pray'r were
past,
Their salted cakes on crackling flames they
cast;

Then, turning back, the sacrifice they sped;
The fatted oxen slew, and flay'd the dead;
Chopp'd off their nervous thighs, and next prepar'd

T' involve the lean in cauls, and mend with lard.

Sweetbreads and collops were with skewers
prick'd

About the sides, inhibing what they deck'd.
The priest with holy hands was seen to tine
The cloven wood and pour the ruddy wine.
The youth approach'd the fire, and, as it
burn'd,

On five sharp broachers rank'd, the roast
they turn'd:

These morsels stay'd their stomachs; then the rest

They cut in legs and fillets for the feast;
Which drawn and serv'd, their hunger they
appease

With sav'ry meat, and set their minds at ease.

Now when the rage of eating was repell'd,
The boys with generous wine the goblets
fill'd.

The first libations to the gods they pour,
And then with songs indulge the genial hour.
Holy debauch! till day to night they bring,

With hymns and pæans to the bowyer king.
At sunset to their ship they make return,
And snore secure on decks till rosy morn.

The skies with dawning day were purpled
o'er;

Awak'd, with lab'ring oars they leave the
shore:

The pow'r, appeas'd, with winds suffic'd the
sail;

The bellying canvas strutted with the gale;
The waves indignant roar with surly pride,
And press against the sides, and beaten off
divide.

They cut the foamy way, with force impell'd
Superior, till the Trojan port they held;

Then, hauling on the strand, their galley
moor,

And pitch their tents along the crooked
shore.

Meantime the goddess-born in secret
pin'd:

Nor visited the camp, nor in the council
join'd;

But, keeping close, his gnawing heart he fed
With hopes of vengeance on the tyrant's
head;

And wish'd for bloody wars and mortal
wounds,

And of the Greeks oppress'd in fight to hear the dying sounds.

Now, when twelve days complete had run
their race,

The gods bethought them of the cares belonging to their place.

Jove at their head ascending from the sea,
A shoal of puny pow'rs attend his way

Then Thetis, not unmindful of her son,
Emerging from the deep, to beg her boon,

Pursued their track; and, waken'd from his
rest,

Before the sovereign stood a morning guest.
Him in the circle, but apart, she found;

The rest at awful distance stood around.
She bow'd, and ere she durst her suit begin,

One hand embrac'd his knees, one propp'd his chin.

Then thus: "If I, celestial sire, in aught Have serv'd thy will, or gratified thy
thought,

One glimpse of glory to my issue give,
Grac'd for the little time he has to live.

Dishonor'd by the King of Men he stands;
His rightful prize is ravish'd from his hands.

But thou, O father, in my son's defense,
Assume thy pow'r, assert thy providence.

Let Troy prevail, till Greece th' affront has
paid

With doubled honors, and redeem'd his aid."

She ceas'd, but the consid'ring god was
mute: 689

Till she, resolv'd to win, renew'd her suit;
Nor loos'd her hold, but forc'd him to reply:
"Or grant me my petition, or deny.

Jove cannot fear: then tell me to my face
That I, of all the gods, am least in grace.
This I can bear." The Cloud-Compeller
mourn'd,

And, sighing first, this answer he return'd:
"Know'st thou what clamors will disturb my reign,

What my stunn'd ears from Juno must sus-tain?

In council she gives license to her tongue,
Loquacious, brawling, ever in the wrong 700
And now she will my partial pow'r upbraid,
If, alienate from Greece, I give the Trojans
aid.

But thou depart, and shun her jealous sight;
The care be mine to do Pelides right.

Go then, and on the faith of Jove rely;
When, nodding to thy suit, he bows the sky.
This ratifies th' irrevocable doom:

The sign ordain'd, that what I will shall
come;

The stamp of heav'n, and seal of fate." He
said,

And shook the sacred honors of his head. 710
With terror trembled heav'n's subsiding
hill,

And from his shaken curls ambrosial dew
distil;

The goddess goes exulting from his sight,
And seeks the seas profound, and leaves the realms of light.

He moves into his hall: the pow'rs resort.
Each from his house, to fill the sovereign's
court.

Nor waiting summons, nor expecting stood;
But met with reverence, and receiv'd the
god.

He mounts the throne; and Juno took her
place;

But sullen discontent sate low'ring on her
face. 720

With jealous eyes, at distance she had seen, Whisp'ring with Jove, the silver-footed
queen;

Then, impotent of tongue, (her silence broke,)

Thus turbulent in rattling tone she spoke:

"Author of ills, and close contriver Jove,
Which of thy dames, what prostitute of love,
Has held thy ear so long, and begg'd so hard,
For some old service done, some new reward?

Apart you talk'd, for that's your special
care; 729

The consort never must the council share.
One gracious word is for a wife too much:
Such is a marriage vow, and Jove's own faith is such."

Then thus the sire of gods, and men
below:

"What I have hidden, hope not thou to
know.

Ev'n goddesses are women; and no wife
Has pow'r to regulate her husband's life:
Counsel she may; and I will give thy ear
The knowledge first, of what is fit to hear.
What I transact with others, or alone, Beware to learn; nor press too near the
throne." 740

To whom the goddess with the charming
eyes:

"What hast thou said, O tyrant of the
skies?

When did I search the secrets of thy reign, Tho' privileg'd to know, but privileg'd in
vain?

But well thou dost, to hide from common
sight

Thy close intrigues, too bad to bear the
light.

Nor doubt I but the silver-footed dame,
Tripping from sea, on such an errand came,
To grace her issue, at the Grecians' cost,
And for one peevish man destroy an host."

To whom the Thund'rer made this stern
reply: 751

"My household curse, my lawful plague,
the spy

Of Jove's designs, his other squinting
eye;

Why this vain prying, and for what avail?
Jove will be master still, and Juno fail.

Should thysuspicious thoughts divine aright,
Thou but becom'st more odious to my sight
For this attempt: uneasy life to me, Still watch'd and importun'd, but worse for thee.

Curb that impetuous tongue, before too
late 760

The gods behold, and tremble at thy fate;
Pitying, but daring not, in thy defense,
To lift a hand against omnipotence."

This heard, the imperious queen sate
mute with fear,
Nor further durst incense the gloomy Thunderer.

Silence was in the court at this rebuke,
Nor could the gods abash'd sustain their sov'reign's look.

The limping smith observ'd the sadden'd
feast,
And hopping here and there (himself a jest) ⁷⁶⁹

Put in his word, that neither might offend;
To Jove obsequious, yet his mother's friend:
"What end in heav'n will be of civil war,
If gods of pleasure will for mortals jar?
Such discord but disturbs our jovial feast;
One grain of bad embitters all the best.
Mother, tho' wise yourself, my counsel
weigh;

'Tis much unsafe my sire to disobey.
Not only you provoke him to your cost,
But mirth is marr'd, and the good cheer is
lost.

Tempt not his heavy hand, for he has pow'r ⁷⁷⁰
To throw you headlong from his heav'nly
tow'r.

But one submissive word, which you let
fall,
Will make him in good humor with us
all."

He said no more, but crown'd a bowl,
unbid;

The laughing nectar overlook'd the lid:
Then put it to her hand, and thus pursued:
"This cursed quarrel be no more renew'd.
Be, as becomes a wife, obedient still;
Tho' griev'd, yet subject to her husband's
will.

I would not see you beaten; yet afraid ⁷⁹⁰
Of Jove's superior force, I dare not aid.
Too well I know him, since that hapless
hour

When I and all the gods employ'd our
pow'r

To break your bonds: me by the heel he
drew,

And o'er heav'n's battlements with fury
threw:

All day I fell; my flight at morn begun,
And ended not but with the setting sun.
Pitch'd on my head, at length the Lemnian
ground

Receiv'd my batter'd skull, the Sinthians heal'd my wound."

At Vulcan's homely mirth his mother
smil'd, ⁸⁰⁰
And smiling took the cup the clown had
fill'd.

The reconciler bowl went round the board,
Which, emptied, the rude skinker still re-
stor'd.

Loud fits of laughter seiz'd the guests, to
see

The limping god so deft at his new ministry.
The feast continued till declining light;
They drank, they laugh'd, they lov'd, and then 't was night.

Nor wanted tuneful harp, nor vocal choir;
The Muses sung; Apollo touch'd the lyre.
Drunken at last, and drowsy they depart,
Each to his house, adorn'd with labor'd art ⁸¹¹

Of the lame architect: the thund'ring god —
Ev'n he withdrew to rest, and had his load;
His swimming head to needful sleep ap-
plied,

And Juno lay unheeded by his side.

THE COCK AND THE FOX

OR, THE TALE OF THE NUN'S PRIEST

FROM CHAUCER

THERE liv'd, as authors tell, in days of yore,
A widow somewhat old, and very poor:
Deep in a dell her cottage lonely stood,
Well thatched, and under covert of a wood.

This dowager, on whom my tale I found, Since last she laid her husband in the
ground,

A simple sober life in patience led,
And had but just enough to buy her bread:
But huswifery the little Heav'n had lent,
She duly paid a groat for quarter rent; ¹⁰
And pinch'd her belly, with her daughters
two,

To bring the year about with much ado.

The cattle in her homestead were three sows,

An ewe call'd Mally, and three brindled
cows;

Her parlor window stuck with herbs
around,

Of sav'ry smell; and rushes strew'd the
ground.

A maple dresser in her hall she had,
On which full many a slender meal she
made:

For no delicious morsel pass'd her throat;
 According to her cloth she cut her coat. 20
 No poynant sauce she knew, no costly treat;
 Her hunger gave a relish to her meat:
 A sparing diet did her health assure;
 Or sick, a pepper posset was her cure.
 Before the day was done, her work she sped,

And never went by candlelight to bed.
 With exercise she sweat ill humors out;
 Her dancing was not hinder'd by the gout.
 Her poverty was glad, her heart content,
 Nor knew she what the spleen or vapors
 meant. 30

Of wine she never tasted thro' the year,
 But white and black was all her homely
 cheer:

Brown bread, and milk, (but first she skimm'd her bowls,)

And rashers of sing'd bacon on the coals.
 On holidays an egg, or two at most;
 But her ambition never reach'd to roast.

A yard she had, with pales enclos'd about,
 Some high, some low, and a dry ditch without.

Within this homestead liv'd, without a peer
 For crowing loud, the noble Chanticleer; 40
 So hight her cock, whose singing did surpass

The merry notes of organs at the mass.
 More certain was the crowing of the cock
 To number hours, than is an abbey clock;
 And sooner than the matin bell was rung,
 He clapp'd his wings upon his roost, and sung:

For when degrees fifteen ascended right,
 By sure instinct he knew 't was one at night.
 High was his comb, and coral-red withal,
 In dents embattled like a castle wall; 50
 His bill was raven-black, and shone like jet;

Blue were his legs, and orient were his feet:
 White were his nails, like silver to behold,
 His body glitt'ring like the burnish'd gold.

This gentle cock, for solace of his life,
 Six misses had, beside his lawful wife;
 Scandal, that spares no king, tho' ne'er so
 good,
 Says they were all of his own flesh and
 blood,

His sisters both by sire and mother's side;
 And sure their likeness show'd them near allied. 60

But make the worst, the monarch did no
 more,

Than all the Ptolemies had done before:
 When incest is for int'rest of a nation,
 'Tis made no sin by holy dispensation.
 Some lines have been maintain'd by this
 alone,

Which by their common ugliness are known.

But passing this as from our tale apart, Dame Partlet was the sovereign of his
 heart;

Ardent in love, outrageous in his play,
 He feather'd her a hundred times a day: 70
 And she, that was not only passing fair,
 But was withal discreet and debonair,
 Resolv'd the passive doctrine to fulfil,
 Tho' loth; and let him work his wicked will:

At board and bed was affable and kind,
 According as their marriage vow did bind,
 And as the Church's precept had enjoind; Ev'n since she was a sennight old, they
 say,

Was chaste and humble to her dying day,
 Nor chick nor hen was known to disobey.

By this her husband's heart she did obtain — 81

What cannot beauty, join'd with virtue,
 gain!

She was his only joy, and he her pride;
 She, when he walk'd, went pecking by his
 side:

If, spurning up the ground, he sprung a
 corn,

The tribute in his bill to her was borne.
 But O! what joy it was to hear him sing
 In summer, when the day began to spring, Stretching his neck, and warbling in his
 throat;

Solus cum sola then was all his note. 90

For in the days of yore, the birds of parts
 Were bred to speak, and sing, and learn the lib'ral arts.

It happ'd that perching on the parlor beam,

Amidst his wives, he had a deadly dream,
 Just at the dawn; and sigh'd, and groan'd
 so fast,

As ev'ry breath he drew would be his last.
 Dame Partlet, ever nearest to his side, Heard all his piteous moan, and how he
 cried

For help from gods and men; and, sore
 aghast,

She peck'd and pull'd, and waken'd him at
 last. 100

"Dear heart," said she, "for love of heav'n
 declare

Your pain, and make me partner of your care.

You groan, sir, ever since the morning light,
As something had disturb'd your noble sprite."

"And, madam, well I might," said Chanticleer,

"Never was Shrovetide cock in such a fear.

Ev'n still I run all over in a sweat,

My princely senses not recover'd yet.

For such a dream I had of dire portent,

That much I fear my body will be shent: 110

It bodes I shall have wars and woful strife,
Or in a loathsome dungeon end my life.

Know, dame, I dreamt within my troubled breast,

That in our yard I saw a murd'rous beast,
That on my body would have made arrest. }

With waking eyes I ne'er beheld his fellow;
His color was betwixt a red and yellow:

Tipp'd was his tail, and both his pricking ears,

With black; and much unlike his other hairs;

The rest, in shape, a beagle's whelp throughout, 120

With broader forehead, and a sharper snout.
Deep in his front were sunk his glowing eyes,

That yet methinks I see him with surprise.
Reach out your hand, I drop with clammy sweat,

And lay it to my heart, and feel it beat."

"Now fie for shame," quoth she, "by heav'n above,

Thou hast for ever lost thy lady's love;

No woman can endure a recreant knight;

He must be bold by day, and free by night.

Our sex desires a husband or a friend, 130

Who can our honor and his own defend;

Wise, hardy, secret, lib'ral of his purse;

A fool is nauseous, but a coward worse:

No bragging coxcomb, yet no baffled knight.

How dar'st thou talk of love, and dar'st not fight?

How dar'st thou tell thy dame thou art afraid?

Hast thou no manly heart, and hast a beard?

"If aught from fearful dreams may be divin'd,

They signify a cock of dunghill kind.

All dreams, as in old Galen I have read, 140

Are from repletion and complexion bred;

From rising fumes of indigested food,

And noxious humors that infect the blood:

And sure, my lord, if I can read aright,
These foolish fancies you have had to-night
Are certain symptoms (in the canting style)
Of boiling choler, and abounding bile;

This yellow gall that in your stomach floats
Ingenders all these visionary thoughts.

When choler overflows, then dreams are bred 150

Of flames, and all the family of red;

Red dragons and red beasts in sleep we view,

For humors are distinguish'd by their hue.

From hence we dream of wars and warlike things,

And wasps and hornets with their double wings.

"Choler adust congeals our blood with fear;

Then black bulls toss us, and black devils tear.

In sanguine airy dreams aloft we bound,
With rheums oppress'd we sink in rivers drown'd.

"More I could say, but thus conclude my theme, 160

The dominating humor makes the dream.

Cato was in his time accounted wise,

And he condemns them all for empty lies.

Take my advice, and when we fly to ground,

With laxatives preserve your body sound,
And purge the peccant humors that abound. }

I should be loth to lay you on a bier;

And tho' there lives no 'pothecary near,

I dare for once prescribe for your disease,

And save long bills, and a damn'd doctor's fees. 170

"Two sovereign herbs, which I by practice know,

And both at hand, (for in our yard they grow.)

On peril of my soul shall rid you wholly

Of yellow choler, and of melancholy:

You must both purge and vomit; but obey,

And for the love of heav'n make no delay.

Since hot and dry in your complexion join,

Beware the sun when in a vernal sign;

For when he mounts exalted in the Ram,

If then he finds your body in a flame, 180

Replete with choler, I dare lay a groat,

A tertian ague is at least your lot.

Perhaps a fever (which the gods forefend !)

May bring your youth to some untimely end.

And therefore, sir, as you desire to live,

A day or two before your laxative,
 Take just three worms, nor under nor above,
 Because the gods unequal numbers love.
 These digestives prepare you for your purge,
 Of fumetery, centaury, and spurge; ¹⁹⁰
 And of ground-ivy add a leaf or two:
 All which within our yard or garden grow.
 Eat these, and be, my lord, of better cheer:
 Your father's son was never born to fear."

"Madam," quoth he, "gramercy for your care,

But Cato, whom you quoted, you may spare:
 'Tis true, a wise and worthy man he seems,
 And (as you say) gave no belief to dreams;
 But other men of more authority,
 And, by th' immortal pow'rs, as wise as he,
 Maintain, with sounder sense, that dreams
 forebode; ²⁰¹

For Homer plainly says they come from
 God.

Nor Cato said it; but some modern fool,
 Impos'd in Cato's name on boys at school.

"Believe me, madam, morning dreams
 foreshow

Th' events of things, and future weal or
 woe:

Some truths are not by reason to be tried,
 But we have sure experience for our guide.
 An ancient author, equal with the best,
 Relates this tale of dreams among the rest.

"Two friends, or brothers, with devout intent, ²¹¹

On some far pilgrimage together went.
 It happen'd so, that, when the sun was
 down,

They just arriv'd by twilight at a town.
 That day had been the baiting of a bull;
 'T was at a feast, and ev'ry inn so full,
 That no void room in chamber, or on
 ground,

And but one sorry bed was to be found;
 And that so little it would hold but one,
 Tho' till this hour they never lay alone. ²²⁰

"So were they forc'd to part; one stay'd
 behind,

His fellow sought what lodging he could
 find:

At last he found a stall where oxen stood,
 And that he rather chose than lie abroad.
 'T was in a farther yard without a door;
 But, for his ease, well litter'd was the floor.

"His fellow, who the narrow bed had kept,
 Was weary, and without a rocker slept:

Supine he snor'd; but in the dead of night
 He dreamt his friend appear'd before his sight, ²³⁰

Who, with a ghastly look and doleful cry,
 Said: 'Help me, brother, or this night I
 die:

Arise, and help, before all help be vain,
 Or in an ox's stall I shall be slain.'

"Rous'd from his rest, he waken'd in a start,

Shiv'ring with horror, and with aching
 heart;

At length to cure himself by reason tries;
 'T is but a dream, and what are dreams
 but lies ?

So thinking chang'd his side, and clos'd
 his eyes.

His dream returns; his friend appears again: ²⁴⁰

'The murd'ers come; now help, or I am
 slain:'

'T was but a vision still, and visions are but vain.

"He dreamt the third; but now his friend
 appear'd

Pale, naked, pierc'd with wounds, with blood besmear'd:

'Thrice warn'd, awake,' said he; 'relief is
 late,

The deed is done; but thou revenge my
 fate:

Tardy of aid, unseal thy heavy eyes,
 Awake, and with the dawning day arise;
 Take to the western gate thy ready way,
 For by that passage they my corpse convey. ²⁵⁰

My corpse is in a tumbril laid, among The filth and ordure, and enclos'd with dung.

That cart arrest, and raise a common cry;
 For sacred hunger of my gold I die.'

Then shew'd his grisly wounds; and last he
 drew

A piteous sigh, and took a long adieu.

"The frighted friend arose by break of
 day,

And found the stall where late his fellow
 lay;

Then of his impious host enquiring more,
 Was answer'd that his guest was gone before: ²⁶⁰

'Mutt'ring he went,' said he, 'by morning
 light,

And much complain'd of his ill rest by
 night.'

This rais'd suspicion in the pilgrim's
mind;
Because all hosts are of an evil kind,
And oft to share the spoil with robbers
join'd.

"His dream confirm'd his thought; with troubled look

Straight to the western gate his way he took;

There, as his dream foretold, a cart he
found,

That carried compass forth to dung the
ground.

This when the pilgrim saw, he stretch'd his throat, ²⁷⁰

And cried out murder, with a yelling note:
'My murder'd fellow in this cart lies dead;

Vengeance and justice on the villain's head!
You, magistrates, who sacred laws dis-

pen-

On you I call to punish this offense.'

"The word thus giv'n, within a little
space,

The mob came roaring out, and throng'd
the place.

All in a trice they cast the cart to ground,
And in the dung the murder'd body
found;

Tho' breathless, warm, and reeking from
the wound. ²⁸⁰

Good Heav'n, whose darling attribute we
find

Is boundless grace, and mercy to mankind,
Abhors the cruel, and the deeds of night

By wondrous ways reveals in open light;
Murder may pass unpunish'd for a time,

But tardy justice will o'ertake the crime.
And oft a speedier pain the guilty feels;

The hue and cry of Heav'n pursues him at the heels,

Fresh from the fact; as, in the present case, ²⁸⁹

The criminals are seiz'd upon the place;
Carter and host confronted face to face.

Stiff in denial, as the law appoints,
On engines they distend their tortur'd joints:

So was confession forc'd, th' offense was
known,

And public justice on th' offenders done

"Here may you see that visions are to dread;

And, in the page that follows this, I read
Of two young merchants, whom the hope of gain

Induc'd in partnership to cross the main:
Waiting till willing winds their sails supplied, ³⁰⁰

Within a trading town they long abide,
Full fairly situate on a haven's side.

"One evening it befell, that, looking out,
The wind they long had wish'd was come about:

Well pleas'd they went to rest; and if the gale

Till morn continued, both resolv'd to sail.
But as together in a bed they lay,

The younger had a dream at break of day.
A man, he thought, stood frowning at his side,

Who warn'd him for his safety to provide, ³¹⁰

Nor put to sea, but safe on shore abide:
'I come, thy genius, to command thy

stay;
Trust not the winds, for fatal is the day,
And death unhop'd attends the wat'ry

way.'

"The vision said; and vanish'd from his
sight:

The dreamer waken'd in a mortal fright;
Then pull'd his drowsy neighbor, and declar'd

What in his slumber he had seen and heard.
His friend smil'd scornful, and with proud contempt

Rejects as idle what his fellow dreamt: ³²⁰
'Stay, who will stay; for me no fears re-

strain,
Who follow Mercury the god of gain.

Let each man do as to his fancy seems;
I wait not, I, till you have better dreams.

Dreams are but interludes which fancy
makes;

When monarch Reason sleeps, this mimic
wakes;

Compounds a medley of disjointed things,
A mob of cobblers, and a court of kings.

Light fumes are merry, grosser fumes are sad;

Both are the reasonable soul run mad: ³³⁰
And many monstrous forms in sleep we see,

That neither were, nor are, nor e'er can be.
Sometimes forgotten things long cast behind

Rush forward in the brain, and come to
mind.

The nurse's legends are for truths receiv'd,
And the man dreams but what the boy be-

liev'd.

Sometimes we but rehearse a former
 play;
 The night restores our actions done by
 day,
 As hounds in sleep will open for their
 prey.

In short the farce of dreams is of a piece,
 Chimeras all; and more absurd, or less: 341
 You, who believe in tales, abide alone;
 Whate'er I get this voyage is my own.'

"Thus while he spoke, he heard the shouting crew

That call'd aboard, and took his last adieu.
 The vessel went before a merry gale,
 And for quick passage put on ev'ry sail;
 But when least fear'd, and ev'n in open day,
 The mischief overtook her in the way.
 Whether she sprung a leak, I cannot find,
 Or whether she was overset with wind, 351
 Or that some rock below her bottom rent;
 But down at once with all her crew she
 went:

Her fellow ships from far her loss descried;
 But only she was sunk, and all were safe
 beside.

"By this example you are taught again,
 That dreams and visions are not always
 vain;

But if, dear Partlet, you are yet in doubt,
 Another tale shall make the former out.

"Kenelm, the son of Kenulph, Mercia's
 king, 360

Whose holy life the legends loudly sing, Warn'd in a dream, his murder did fore-
 tell

From point to point as after it befell:
 All circumstances to his nurse he told,
 (A wonder from a child of sev'n years old.)
 The dream with horror heard, the good old
 wife

From treason counsel'd him to guard his
 life,

But close to keep the secret in his mind,
 For a boy's vision small belief would find.
 The pious child, by promise bound, obey'd,
 Nor was the fatal murder long delay'd: 371
 By Quenda slain, he fell before his time,
 Made a young martyr by his sister's crime.
 The tale is told by Venerable Bede,
 Which, at your better leisure, you may read.

"Macrobius too relates the vision sent
 To the great Scipio, with the fam'd event;
 Objections makes, but after makes replies,
 And adds that dreams are often prophecies.

"Of Daniel you may read in holy writ, 380
 Who, when the king his vision did forget,
 Could word for word the wondrous dream repeat.

Nor less of patriarch Joseph understand,
 Who by a dream inslav'd th' Egyptian land;
 The years of plenty and of dearth foretold,
 When, for their bread, their liberty they sold.

Nor must th' exalted butler be forgot, Nor he whose dream presag'd his hanging
 lot.

"And did not Cræsus the same death
 foresee,

Rais'd in his vision on a lofty tree? 390
 The wife of Hector, in his utmost pride, Dreamt of his death the night before he
 died;

Well was he warn'd from battle to refrain,

But men to death decreed are warn'd in
 vain:

He dar'd the dream, and by his fatal foe was slain.

"Much more I know, which I forbear to
 speak;

For, see, the ruddy day begins to break:
 Let this suffice, that plainly I foresee

My dream was bad, and bodes adversity.
 But neither pills nor laxatives I like; 400

They only serve to make a well man sick.
 Of these his gain the sharp physician
 makes,

And often gives a purge, but seldom takes:
 They not correct, but poison all the blood,
 And ne'er did any but the doctors good.
 Their tribe, trade, trinkets, I defy them
 all;

With ev'ry work of 'Pothecaries' Hall.

"These melancholy matters I forbear;
 But let me tell thee, Partlet mine, and
 swear, 409

That when I view the beauties of thy face,
 I fear not death, nor dangers, nor disgrace:
 So may my soul have bliss, as when I spy
 The scarlet red about thy partridge eye,
 While thou art constant to thy own true
 knight,

While thou art mine, and I am thy de-
 light,

All sorrows at thy presence take their
 flight.

For true it is, as in principio,
Mulier est hominis confusio.

Madam, the meaning of this Latin is, ⁴¹⁹
 That woman is to man his sovereign bliss.
 For when by night I feel your tender side,
 Tho' for the narrow perch I cannot ride,
 Yet I have such a solace in my mind,
 That all my boding cares are cast behind;
 And ev'n already I forget my dream."

He said, and downward flew from off the beam,

For daylight now began apace to spring,
 The thrush to whistle, and the lark to sing;
 Then crowing clapp'd his wings, th' appointed call,

To chuck his wives together in the hall. ⁴³⁰

By this the widow had unbarr'd the door,
 And Chanticleer went strutting out before,
 With royal courage, and with heart so light,
 As shew'd he scorn'd the visions of the night.

Now, roaming in the yard, he spurn'd the ground,

And gave to Partlet the first grain he found;
 Then often feather'd her with wanton play,
 And trod her twenty times ere prime of day;

And took by turns and gave so much delight,

Her sisters pin'd with envy at the sight. ⁴⁴⁰

He chuck'd again, when other corns he found,

And scarcely deign'd to set a foot to ground,
 But swagger'd like a lord about his hall,
 And his sev'n wives came running at his call.

'T was now the month in which the world began,

(If March beheld the first created man;)

And since the vernal equinox, the sun
 In Aries twelve degrees, or more, had run;
 When, casting up his eyes against the light,
 Both month, and day, and hour he measur'd right, ⁴⁵⁰

And told more truly than th' Ephemeris;
 For art may err, but nature cannot miss.

Thus numbring times and seasons in his breast,

His second crowing the third hour confess'd.
 Then turning, said to Partlet: "See, my dear,

How lavish nature has adorn'd the year;
 How the pale primrose and blue violet spring,

And birds essay their throats disus'd to sing:
 All these are ours; and I with pleasure see ⁴⁵⁹

Man strutting on two legs, and aping me:

An unfledg'd creature, of a lumpish frame,
 Indued with fewer particles of flame.

Our dame sits cowering o'er a kitchen fire;
 I draw fresh air, and nature's works admire;
 And ev'n this day in more delight abound,
 Than, since I was an egg, I ever found."

The time shall come when Chanticleer shall wish

His words unsaid, and hate his boasted bliss.

The crested bird shall by experience } know, ⁴⁶⁹

Jove made not him his masterpiece below;
 And learn the latter end of joy is woe. }

The vessel of his bliss to dregs is run,
 And Heav'n will have him taste his other tun.

Ye wise, draw near, and hearken to my tale,

Which proves that oft the proud by flatt'ry fall:

The legend is as true, I undertake,
 As Tristram is, and Launcelot of the Lake,
 Which all our ladies in such reverence hold,
 As if in Book of Martyrs it were told. ⁴⁷⁹

A fox full-fraught with seeming sanctity,
 That fear'd an oath, but, like the devil, would lie;

Who look'd like Lent, and had the holy leer,
 And durst not sin before he said his pray'r —

This pious cheat, that never suck'd the blood,

Nor chaw'd the flesh of lambs, but when he could,

Had pass'd three summers in the neighbour'ing wood;

And musing long, whom next to circumvent,

On Chanticleer his wicked fancy bent;

And in his high imagination cast,

By stratagem to gratify his taste. ⁴⁹⁰

The plot contriv'd, before the break of day,

Saint Reynard thro' the hedge had made his way;

The pale was next, but proudly, with a bound

He leapt the fence of the forbidden ground:

Yet fearing to be seen, within a bed

Of coleworts he conceal'd his wily head;

Then skulk'd till afternoon, and watch'd his time,

(As murder'ers use,) to perpetrate his crime.

O hypocrite, ingenious to destroy !

O traitor, worse than Sinon was to Troy! 500
 O vile subverter of the Gallic reign,
 More false than Gano was to Charlemagne!
 O Chanticleer, in an unhappy hour
 Didst thou forsake the safety of thy bow'r:
 Better for thee thou hadst believ'd thy dream,

 And not that day descended from the beam!

But here the doctors eagerly dispute:
 Some hold predestination absolute;
 Some clerks maintain, that Heav'n at first foresees,

And in the virtue of foresight decrees. 510
 If this be so, then prescience binds the
 will,

And mortals are not free to good or ill;
 For what he first foresaw, he must ordain,
 Or its eternal prescience may be vain:
 As bad for us as prescience had not bin;
 For first, or last, he 's author of the sin.
 And who says that, let the blaspheming
 man

Say worse ev'n of the devil, if he can.
 For how can that eternal pow'r be just, 519
 To punish man, who sins because he must?
 Or how can he reward a virtuous deed,
 Which is not done by us, but first decreed?

I cannot bolt this matter to the bran,
 As Bradwardin and holy Austin can;
 If prescience can determine actions so
 That we must do, because he did foreknow,
 Or that foreknowing, yet our choice is free,
 Not forc'd to sin by strict necessity.
 This strict necessity they simple call;
 Another sort there is, conditional. 530

The first so binds the will, that things fore-
 known

By spontaneity, not choice, are done.
 Thus galley slaves tug willing at their
 oar,

Content to work, in prospect of the shore,
 But would not work at all if not con-strain'd before.

That other does not liberty constrain,
 But man may either act or may refrain.
 Heav'n made us agents free to good or ill,
 And forc'd it not, tho' he foresaw the will.
 Freedom was first bestow'd on human
 race, 540

And prescience only held the second place.

If he could make such agents wholly free,
 I not dispute, the point 's too high for me;
 For Heav'n's unfathom'd pow'r what man can sound,

Or put to his omnipotence a bound?

He made us to his image all agree;
 That image is the soul, and that must be, }
 Or not the Maker's image, or be free.

But whether it were better man had been
 By nature bound to good, not free to sin, 550
 I waive, for fear of splitting on a rock.

The tale I tell is only of a cock,
 Who had not run the hazard of his life,
 Had he believ'd his dream, and not his wife:
 For women, with a mischief to their kind,
 Pervert with bad advice our better mind.
 A woman's counsel brought us first to woe,
 And made her man his Paradise forego,
 Where at heart's ease he liv'd, and might have bin

As free from sorrow as he was from sin. 560
 For what the devil had their sex to do,
 That, born to folly, they presum'd to know,
 And could not see the serpent in the grass?
 But I myself presume, and let it pass.

Silence in times of suff'ring is the best;
 'T is dang'rous to disturb a hornet's nest.

In other authors you may find enough,
 But all they say of dames is idle stuff,
 Legends of lying wits together bound —
 The Wife of Bath would throw 'em to the
 ground. 570

These are the words of Chanticleer, not
 mine;

I honor dames, and think their sex divine.

Now to continue what my tale begun.
 Lay Madam Partlet basking in the sun,
 Breast-high in sand; her sisters, in a row, Enjoy'd the beams above, the warmth
 below.

The cock, that of his flesh was ever free,
 Sung merrier than the mermaid in the sea.
 And so befell, that as he cast his eye

Among the coleworts on a butterfly, 580
 He saw false Reynard where he lay full low.

I need not swear he had no list to crow,
 But cried: "Cock, cock," and gave a sudden start,

As sore dismay'd and frighted at his heart.
 For birds and beasts, inform'd by nature,
 know

Kinds opposite to theirs, and fly their foe.
 So Chanticleer, who never saw a fox,

Yet shunn'd him as a sailor shuns the rocks.

But the false loon, who could not work his will 589

By open force, employ'd his flatt'ring skill.
 "I hope, my lord," said he, "I not offend;
 Are you afraid of me, that am your friend?
 I were a beast indeed to do you wrong,

I, who have lov'd and honor'd you so long:
 Stay, gentle sir, nor take a false alarm,
 For on my soul I never meant you harm.
 I come no spy, nor as a traitor press,
 To learn the secrets of your soft recess —
 Far be from Reynard so profane a thought — But by the sweetness of your voice was
 brought: 600

For, as I bid my beads, by chance I heard
 The song as of an angel in the yard;
 A song that would have charm'd th' infernal
 gods,
 And banish'd horror from the dark abodes:
 Had Orpheus sung it in the nether sphere,
 So much the hymn had pleas'd the tyrant's ear, }
 The wife had been detain'd, to keep the husband there. }

"My lord, your sire familiarly I knew,
 A peer deserving such a son as you:
 He, with your lady mother, (whom Heav'n
 rest,) 610
 Has often grac'd my house and been my guest.

To view his living features does me good,
 For I am your poor neighbor in the wood;
 And in my cottage should be proud to see
 The worthy heir of my friend's family.

"But since I speak of singing, let me say,
 As with an upright heart I safely may,
 That, save yourself, there breathes not on
 the ground

One like your father for a silver sound.
 So sweetly would he wake the winter day,
 That matrons to the church mistook their
 way, 621

And thought they heard the merry organ
 play.

And he to raise his voice with artful care, (What will not beaux attempt to please the
 fair?)

On tiptoes stood to sing with greater strength,
 And stretch'd his comely neck at all the
 length;

And while he pain'd his voice to pierce the
 skies,

As saints in raptures use, would shut his
 eyes,

That, the sound striving thro' the narrow
 throat,

His winking might avail to mend the note.

By this, in song, he never had his peer, 631
 From sweet Cecilia down to Chanticleer;
 Not Maro's Muse, who sung the mighty
 man,

Nor Pindar's heav'nly lyre, nor Horace when a swan.

Your ancestors proceed from race divine:
 From Brennus and Belinus is your line;
 Who gave to sov'reign Rome such loud
 alarms,

That ev'n the priests were not excus'd from
 arms.

"Besides, a famous monk of modern times
 Has left of cocks recorded in his rhymes, 640
 That of a parish priest the son and heir, (When sons of priests were from the proverb clear,)

Affronted once a cock of noble kind,
 And either lam'd his legs or struck him
 blind;

For which the clerk his father was disgrac'd,
 And in his benefice another plac'd.

Now sing, my lord, if not for love of me,
 Yet for the sake of sweet Saint Charity;
 Make hills, and dales, and earth, and heav'n
 rejoice,

And emulate your father's angel voice." 650
 The cock was pleas'd to hear him speak
 so fair,

And proud beside, as solar people are;
 Nor could the treason from the truth descry,
 So was he ravish'd with this flattery:

So much the more, as, from a little elf,
 He had a high opinion of himself;
 Tho' sickly, slender, and not large of limb,
 Concluding all the world was made for him.

Ye princes, rais'd by poets to the gods,
 And Alexander'd up in lying odes, 660
 Believe not ev'ry flatt'ring knave's report, There's many a Reynard lurking in the
 court;

And he shall be receiv'd with more regard,
 And listen'd to, than modest truth is heard.

This Chanticleer, of whom the story sings, Stood high upon his toes, and clapp'd his
 wings;

Then stretch'd his neck, and wink'd with both his eyes,

Ambitious as he sought th' Olympic prize.
 But while he pain'd himself to raise his
 note,

False Reynard rush'd, and caught him by the throat. 670

Then on his back he laid the precious load,
 And sought his wonted shelter of the wood;
 Swiftly he made his way, the mischief done,
 Of all unheeded, and pursued by none.

Alas, what stay is there in human state,
 Or who can shun inevitable fate?

The doom was written, the decree was past,
 Ere the foundations of the world were cast !
 In Aries tho' the sun exalted stood,
 His patron planet to procure his good; 680
 Yet Saturn was his mortal foe, and he,
 In Libra rais'd, oppos'd the same degree:
 The rays both good and bad, of equal pow'r,
 Each thwarting other, made a mingled hour.

On Friday morn he dreamt this direful
 dream,
 Cross to the worthy native, in his scheme !
 Ah blissful Venus, goddess of delight,
 How couldst thou suffer thy devoted
 knight

On thy own day to fall by foe oppress'd,
 The wight of all the world who serv'd thee
 best ? 690

Who, true to love, was all for recreation,
 And minded not the work of propagation.
 Gaufride, who couldst so well in rhyme
 complain

The death of Richard with an arrow slain,
 Why had not I thy Muse, or thou my heart.
 To sing this heavy dirge with equal art !
 That I like thee on Friday might complain;
 For on that day was Cœur de Lion slain.

Not louder cries, when Ilium was in flames,
 Were sent to heav'n by woful Trojan dames, 700

When Pyrrhus toss'd on high his bur-nish'd blade. }
 And offer'd Priam to his father's shade,
 Than for the cock the widow'd poultry
 made. }

Fair Partlet first, when he was borne from
 sight,

With sovereign shrieks bewail'd her captive
 knight;

Far louder than the Carthaginian wife,
 When Asdrubal her husband lost his life,
 When she beheld the smold'ring flames ascend,

And all the Punic glories at an end: 709
 Willing into the fires she plung'd her head,
 With greater ease than others seek their
 bed.

Not more agast the matrons of renown,
 When tyrant Nero burn'd th' imperial town,
 Shriek'd for the downfall in a doleful cry,
 For which their guiltless lords were doom'd
 to die.

Now to my story I return again:
 The trembling widow, and her daughters
 twain,

This woful cackling cry with horror heard,
 Of those distracted damsels in the yard;
 And starting up, beheld the heavy sight, 720
 How Reynard to the forest took his flight,
 And cross his back, as in triumphant scorn,
 The hope and pillar of the house was borne.

"The fox, the wicked fox," was all the
 cry;

Out from his house ran ev'ry neighbor nigh:
 The vicar first, and after him the crew,
 With forks and staves the felon to pursue.
 Ran Coll our dog, and Talbot with the
 band,

And Malkin, with her distaff in her hand;
 Ran cow and calf, and family of hogs, 730
 In panic horror of pursuing dogs;
 With many a deadly grunt and doleful
 squeak,

Poor swine, as if their pretty hearts would break.

The shouts of men, the women in dismay,
 With shrieks augment the terror of the day.
 The ducks, that heard the proclamation
 cried,

And fear'd a persecution might betide,
 Full twenty mile from town their voyage
 take,

Obscure in rushes of the liquid lake.

The geese fly o'er the barn; the bees in
 arms 740

Drive headlong from their waxen cells in swarms.

Jack Straw at London Stone, with all his
 rout,

Struck not the city with so loud a shout;
 Not when with English hate they did pursue

A Frenchman or an unbelieving Jew;

Not when the welkin rung with "one and
 all,"

And echoes bounded back from Fox's hall:
 Earth seem'd to sink beneath, and heav'n above to fall. }

With might and main they chas'd the murd'rous fox,

With brazen trumpets, and inflated box, 750
 To kindle Mars with military sounds, Nor wanted horns t' inspire sagacious hounds.

But see how Fortune can confound the
 wise,

And, when they least expect it, turn the dice.
 The captive cock, who scarce could draw his breath,

And lay within the very jaws of death —

Yet in this agony his fancy wrought,
And fear supplied him with this happy
thought:

"Yours is the prize, victorious prince," said
he,

"The vicar my defeat, and all the village
see. ⁷⁶⁰

Enjoy your friendly fortune while you may,
And bid the churls that envy you the prey
Call back their mungril curs, and cease their cry:

'See, fools, the shelter of the wood is nigh,
And Chanticleer in your despite shall die;
He shall be pluck'd and eaten to the bone.'

"'Tis well advis'd, in faith it shall be
done;"

This Reynard said; but, as the word he
spoke,

The pris'ner with a spring from prison
broke;

Then stretch'd his feather'd fans with all his might, ⁷⁷⁰

And to the neighb'ring maple wing'd his
flight.

Whom when the traitor safe on tree be-
held,

He curs'd the gods, with shame and sorrow
fill'd;

Shame for his folly, sorrow out of time,
For plotting an unprofitable crime:

Yet mast'ring both, th' artificer of lies

Renews th' assault, and his last batt'ry tries.

"Tho' I," said he, "did ne'er in thought offend,

How justly may my lord suspect his friend?

Th' appearance is against me, I confess, ⁷⁸⁰

Who seemingly have put you in distress:

You, if your goodness does not plead my
cause,

May think I broke all hospitable laws,

To bear you from your palace yard by
might,

And put your noble person in a fright.

This, since you take it ill, I must repent,

Tho', Heav'n can witness, with no bad intent

I practis'd it, to make you taste your cheer

With double pleasure, first prepar'd by fear. ⁷⁹⁰

So loyal subjects often seize their prince,

Forc'd (for his good) to seeming violence,

Yet mean his sacred person not the least offense.

Descend; so help me Jove, as you shall find That Reynard comes of no dissembling
kind."

"Nay," quoth the cock, "but I beshrew us both,

If I believe a saint upon his oath:

An honest man may take a knave's advice,
But idiots only will be cozen'd twice.

Once warn'd is well bewar'd; no flatt'ring
lies

Shall soothe me more to sing with winking eyes, ⁸⁰⁰

And open mouth, for fear of catching flies.

Who blindfold walks upon a river's brim,
When he should see, has he deserv'd to swim?"

"Better, sir cock, let all contention cease; Come down," said Reynard, "let us treat of peace."

"A peace with all my soul," said Chanti-cleer,

"But, with your favor, I will treat it here;
And, lest the truce with treason should be
mix'd,

'Tis my concern to have the tree betwixt."

THE MORAL

In this plain fable you th' effect may see ⁸¹⁰

Of negligence and fond credulity;

And learn besides of flatt'ers to beware,

Then most pernicious when they speak too
fair.

The cock and fox the fool and knave imply:

The truth is moral, tho' the tale a lie.

Who spoke in parables, I dare not say;

But sure he knew it was a pleasing way,

Sound sense, by plain example, to convey.

And in a heathen author we may find,

That pleasure with instruction should be join'd; ⁸²⁰

So take the corn, and leave the chaff behind.

THEODORE AND HONORIA

FROM BOCCACE

Of all the cities in Romanian lands,

The chief, and most renown'd, Ravenna
stands,

Adorn'd in ancient times with arms and arts,

And rich inhabitants, with generous hearts.

But Theodore the brave, above the rest,

With gifts of fortune and of nature blest.

The foremost place for wealth and honor
held,

And all in feats of chivalry excell'd.

This noble youth to madness lov'd a
dame,
Of high degree; Honoria was her name; 10
Fair as the fairest, but of haughty mind,
And fiercer than became so soft a kind; Proud of her birth, (for equal she had none,)

The rest she scorn'd, but hated him alone.
His gifts, his constant courtship, nothing
gain'd;

For she, the more he lov'd, the more dis-
dain'd.

He liv'd with all the pomp he could devise,

At tilts and tournaments obtain'd the
prize;

But found no favor in his lady's eyes:
Relentless as a rock, the lofty maid 20

Turn'd all to poison that he did or said:
Nor pray'rs, nor tears, nor offer'd vows
could move;

The work went backward; and, the more he strove

T' advance his suit, the farther from her
love.

Wearied at length, and wanting remedy,
He doubted oft, and oft resolv'd to die;
But pride stood ready to prevent the blow,
For who would die to gratify a foe?

His generous mind disdain'd so mean a
fate;

That pass'd, his next endeavor was to
hate. 30

But vainer that relief than all the rest;
The less he hop'd, with more desire pos-
sess'd;

Love stood the siege, and would not yield his breast.

Change was the next, but change deceiv'd
his care;

He sought a fairer, but found none so fair.
He would have worn her out by slow
degrees,

As men by fasting starve th' untam'd disease;

But present love requir'd a present ease.
Looking he feeds alone his famish'd eyes, Feeds ling'ring death, but, looking not, he dies. 40

Yet still he chose the longest way to fate.
Wasting at once his life and his estate.

His friends beheld, and pitied him in
vain,

For what advice can ease a lover's pain!
Absence, the best expedient they could find,

Might save the fortune, if not cure the
mind:

This means they long propos'd, but little
gain'd,

Yet after much pursuit at length obtain'd.

Hard you may think it was to give con-
sent,

But struggling with his own desires he
went,

With large expense, and with a pompous 50
train,

Provided as to visit France or Spain,
Or for some distant voyage o'er the main.

But Love had clipp'd his wings, and cut him
short,

Confin'd within the purlieu of his court.

Three miles he went, nor farther could
retreat;

His travels ended at his country seat:

To Chassi's pleasing plains he took his way,
There pitch'd his tents, and there resolv'd to stay.

The spring was in the prime; the neigh-b'ring grove 60

Supplied with birds, the choristers of love;
Music unbought, that minister'd delight

To morning walks, and lull'd his cares by
night:

There he discharg'd his friends, but not th'
expense

Of frequent treats, and proud magnificence.

He liv'd as kings retire, tho' more at large
From public business, yet with equal
charge;

With house and heart still open to receive;
As well content as love would give him
leave:

He would have liv'd more free; but many a guest. 70

Who could forsake the friend, pursued the feast.

It happ'd one morning, as his fancy led,
Before his usual hour he left his bed,

To walk within a lonely lawn, that stood
On ev'ry side surrounded by the wood.

Alone he walk'd, to please his pensive
mind.

And sought the deepest solitude to find:
'T was in a grove of spreading pines he
stray'd;

The winds within the quiv'ring branches
play'd,

And dancing trees a mournful music
made. 80

The place itself was suiting to his care,
 Uncouth and salvage as the cruel fair.
 He wander'd on, unknowing where he went,
 Lost in the wood, and all on love intent:
 The day already half his race had run,
 And summon'd him to due repast at noon,
 But Love could feel no hunger but his
 own.

Whilst list'ning to the murm'ring leaves
 he stood,
 More than a mile immers'd within the
 wood,
 At once the wind was laid; the whisp'ring
 sound
 Was dumb; a rising earthquake rock'd the
 ground;
 With deeper brown the grove was over-
 spread:
 A sudden horror seiz'd his giddy head,
 And his ears tinkled, and his color fled.
 Nature was in alarm; some danger nigh Seem'd threaten'd, tho' unseen to mortal eye.

Unus'd to fear, he summon'd all his soul,
 And stood collected in himself, and whole;
 Not long: for soon a whirlwind rose around,
 And from afar he heard a screaming sound.
 As of a dame distress'd, who cried for
 aid,

And fill'd with loud laments the secret
 shade.

A thicket close beside the grove there
 stood,
 With breers and brambles chok'd, and dwarfish wood;
 From thence the noise, which now, approaching near,
 With more distinguish'd notes invades his
 ear.

He rais'd his head, and saw a beauteous
 maid,
 With hair dishevel'd, issuing thro' the
 shade;

Stripp'd of her clothes, and e'en those parts
 reveal'd,
 Which modest Nature keeps from sight
 conceal'd.

Her face, her hands, her naked limbs were torn

With passing thro' the brakes and prickly thorn;

Two mastiffs gaunt and grim her flight pursued,

And oft their fasten'd fangs in blood
 embued:

Oft they came up, and pinch'd her tender
 side,

"Mercy, O mercy, Heav'n," she ran, and
 cried;

When Heav'n was nam'd, they loos'd their hold again;

Then sprung she forth, they follow'd her
 again.

Not far behind, a knight of swarthy
 face,

High on a coal-black steed pursued the
 chase;

With flashing flames his ardent eyes were
 fill'd,

And in his hands a naked sword he held:
 He cheer'd the dogs to follow her who fled,
 And vow'd revenge on her devoted head.

As Theodore was born of noble kind,
 The brutal action rous'd his manly mind;
 Mov'd with unworthy usage of the maid,
 He, tho' unarm'd, resolv'd to give her aid.
 A saplin pine he wrench'd from out the
 ground,

The readiest weapon that his fury found.
 Thus furnish'd for offense, he cross'd the
 way

Betwixt the graceless villain and his prey.

The knight came thund'ring on, but,
 from afar,

Thus in imperious tone forbade the war:
 "Cease, Theodore, to proffer vain relief,
 Nor stop the vengeance of so just a grief;
 But give me leave to seize my destin'd
 prey,

And let eternal justice take the way:
 I but revenge my fate, disdain'd, betray'd,
 And suff'ring death for this ungrateful
 maid."

He said, at once dismounting from the steed;

For now the hellhounds, with superior
 speed,

Had reach'd the dame, and, fast'ning on her
 side,

The ground with issuing streams of purple
 dyed.

Stood Theodore surpris'd in deadly fright,
 With chattering teeth, and bristling hair upright;

Yet arm'd with inborn worth: "Whate'er,"
 said he,

"Thou art, who know'st me better than I
 thee;

Or prove thy rightful cause, or be defied."
 The specter, fiercely staring, thus replied:

"Know, Theodore, thy ancestry I claim,
And Guido Cavalcanti was my name. ¹⁵²
One common sire our fathers did beget,
My name and story some remember yet:
Thee, then a boy, within my arms I laid,
When for my sins I lov'd this haughty
maid;

Not less ador'd in life, nor serv'd by me,
Than proud Honoria now is lov'd by thee.
What did I not her stubborn heart to
gain?

But all my vows were answer'd with disdain: ¹⁶⁰
She scorn'd my sorrows, and despis'd my
pain.

Long time I dragg'd my days in fruitless
care;

Then, loathing life, and plung'd in deep despair,

To finish my unhappy life, I fell
On this sharp sword, and now am damn'd in hell.

"Short was her joy; for soon th' insulting maid
By Heav'n's decree in the cold grave was
laid,

And, as in unrepenting sin she died,
Doom'd to the same bad place, is punish'd for her pride; ¹⁶⁹

Because she deem'd I well deserv'd to die,
And made a merit of her cruelty.

There, then, we met; both tried and both were cast,

And this irrevocable sentence pass'd;
That she, whom I so long pursued in vain,
Should suffer from my hands a ling'ring
pain:

Renew'd to life that she might daily die,
I daily doom'd to follow, she to fly.
No more a lover, but a mortal foe,
I seek her life (for love is none below)

As often as my dogs with better speed ¹⁸⁰
Arrest her flight, is she to death decreed.

Then with this fatal sword, on which I died,
I pierce her open'd back, or tender side,
And tear that harden'd heart from out her
breast,

Which, with her entrails, makes my hungry
hounds a feast.

Nor lies she long, but, as her fates ordain, } Springs up to life, and fresh to second
pain;

Is sav'd to-day, to-morrow to be slain." }
This, vers'd in death, th' infernal knight relates,

And then for proof fulfill'd their common fates; ¹⁹⁰

Her heart and bowels thro' her back he
drew,

And fed the hounds that help'd him to pursue.

Stern look'd the fiend, as frustrate of his
will,

Not half suffic'd, and greedy yet to kill.

And now the soul, expiring thro' the
wound,

Had left the body breathless on the
ground,

When thus the grisly specter spoke again:
"Behold the fruit of ill-rewarded pain:

As many months as I sustain'd her hate,
So many years is she condemn'd by fate ²⁰⁰

To daily death; and ev'ry several place
Conscious of her disdain, and my disgrace,

Must witness her just punishment, and be
A scene of triumph and revenge to me.

As in this grove I took my last farewell,
As on this very spot of earth I fell,

As Friday saw me die, so she my prey Becomes ev'n here, on this revolving day."

Thus while he spoke, the virgin from the ground ²⁰⁹

Upstart'd fresh, already clos'd the wound,
And, unconcern'd for all she felt before,

Precipitates her flight along the shore.
The hellhounds, as ungorg'd with flesh and
blood,

Pursue their prey, and seek their wonted
food;

The fiend remounts his courser, mends his
pace,

And all the vision vanish'd from the place.

Long stood the noble youth oppress'd } with awe.

And stupid at the wondrous things he
saw,

Surpassing common faith, transgressing
nature's law.

He would have been asleep, and wish'd to wake, ²²⁰

But dreams, he knew, no long impression
make,

Tho' strong at first; if vision, to what
end,

But such as must his future state portend, }
His love the damsel, and himself the fiend?

But yet reflecting that it could not be
From Heav'n, which cannot impious acts
decree,

Resolv'd within himself to shun the snare
 Which Hell for his destruction did prepare;
 And, as his better genius should direct,
 From an ill cause to draw a good effect. ²³⁰

Inspir'd from Heav'n, he homeward took
 his way,

Nor pall'd his new design with long delay;
 But of his train a trusty servant sent,
 To call his friends together at his tent.
 They came, and, usual salutations paid,
 With words premeditated thus he said:

"What you have often counsel'd, to remove
 My vain pursuit of unregarded love,
 By thrift my sinking fortune to repair,
 Tho' late, yet is at last become my care: ²⁴⁰
 My heart shall be my own; my vast
 expense

Reduc'd to bounds, by timely providence.

This only I require; invite for me
 Honoria, with her father's family,
 Her friends, and mine; the cause I shall
 display,

On Friday next, for that's th' appointed
 day."

Well pleas'd were all his friends, the task was light;

The father, mother, daughter, they invite;
 Hardly the dame was drawn to this repast;
 But yet resolv'd, because it was the last. ²⁵⁰
 The day was come, the guests invited
 came,

And, with the rest, th' inexorable dame:
 A feast prepar'd with riotous expense,
 Much cost, more care, and most magnificence.

The place ordain'd was in that haunted
 grove

Where the revenging ghost pursued his
 love;

The tables in a proud pavilion spread,
 With flow'rs below, and tissue overhead:

The rest in rank; Honoria, chief in place, }
 Was artfully contriv'd to set her face ²⁶⁰
 To front the thicket, and behold the chase.

The feast was serv'd, the time so well fore-
 cast,

That just when the dessert and fruits were
 plac'd,

The fiend's alarm began; the hollow
 sound

Sung in the leaves, the forest shook
 around,

Air blacken'd, roll'd the thunder, groan'd
 the ground.

Nor long before the loud laments arise
 Of one distress'd, and mastiffs' mingled cries;
 And first the dame came rushing thro'
 the wood,

And next the famish'd hounds that sought their food, ²⁷⁰

And grip'd her flanks, and oft essay'd their jaws in blood.

Last came the felon, on the sable steed, Arm'd with his naked sword, and urg'd his dogs to speed.

She ran, and cried; her flight directly bent }
 (A guest unbidden) to the fatal tent,
 The scene of death, and place ordain'd for punishment.

Loud was the noise, aghast was every guest;
 The women shriek'd, the men forsook the
 feast;

The hounds at nearer distance hoarsely
 bay'd;

The hunter close pursued the visionary
 maid; ²⁸⁰

She rent the heav'n with loud laments, imploring aid.

The gallants, to protect the lady's
 right,

Their fauchions brandish'd at the grisly
 sprite;

High on his stirrups he provok'd the
 fight.

Then on the crowd he cast a furious look,
 And wither'd all their strength before he
 strook:

"Back, on your lives! let be," said he, "my
 prey,

And let my vengeance take the destin'd way.
 Vain are your arms, and vainer your
 defense,

Against th' eternal doom of Providence: ²⁹⁰
 Mine is th' ungrateful maid by Heav'n
 design'd;

Mercy she would not give, nor mercy shall she find."

At this the former tale again he told
 With thund'ring tone, and dreadful to behold.

Sunk were their hearts with horror of the
 crime,

Nor needed to be warn'd a second time,
 But bore each other back: some knew the
 face,

And all had heard the much lamented case

Of him who fell for love, and this the fatal place. ²⁹⁹

And now th' infernal minister advanc'd,
Seiz'd the due victim, and with fury launch'd
Her back, and, piercing thro' her inmost
heart,
Drew backward as before th' offending
part.

The reeking entrails next he tore away,
And to his meager mastiffs made a prey.
The pale assistants on each other star'd,
With gaping mouths for issuing words pre-
par'd;

The stillborn sounds upon the palate hung,
And died imperfect on the falt'ring tongue.
The fright was general; but the female
band

(A helpless train) in more confusion stand:
With horror shudd'ring, on a heap they
run,

Sick at the sight of hateful justice done;
For conscience rung th' alarm, and made the case their own.

So spread upon a lake, with upward eye,
A plump of fowl behold their foe on high;
They close their trembling troop, and all
attend

On whom the sousing eagle will descend.

But most the proud Honoria fear'd th'
event,

And thought to her alone the vision sent.
Her guilt presents to her distracted mind Heav'n's justice, Theodore's revengeful
kind,

And the same fate to the same sin
assign'd —

Already sees herself the monster's prey,
And feels her heart and entrails torn away.
'T was a mute scene of sorrow, mix'd with
fear;

Still on the table lay th' unfinish'd cheer:
The knight and hungry mastiffs stood
around,

The mangled dame lay breathless on the
ground:

When on a sudden, reinspir'd with breath,
Again she rose, again to suffer death;
Nor stay'd the hellhounds, nor the hunter
stay'd,

But follow'd, as before, the flying maid;
Th' avenger took from earth th' avenging
sword,

And mounting light as air his sable steed
he spurr'd:

The clouds dispell'd, the sky resum'd her
light,

And Nature stood recover'd of her fright.

But fear, the last of ills, remain'd behind,
And horror heavy sat on ev'ry mind.
Nor Theodore encourag'd more his feast,
But sternly look'd, as hatching in his breast
Some deep design; which when Honoria
view'd,

The fresh impulse her former fright re-
new'd:

She thought herself the trembling dame
who fled,

And him the grisly ghost that spurr'd th'
infernal steed;

The more dismay'd, for when the guests
withdrew,

Their courteous host, saluting all the crew, Regardless pass'd her o'er, nor grac'd with kind adieu.

That sting infix'd within her haughty
mind,

The downfall of her empire she divin'd;
And her proud heart with secret sorrow
pin'd.

Home as they went, the sad discourse
renew'd,

Of the relentless dame to death pursued,
And of the sight obscene so lately view'd.

None durst arraign the righteous doom she
bore;

Ev'n they who pitied most, yet blam'd her
more:

The parallel they needed not to name,
But in the dead they damn'd the living
dame.

At ev'ry little noise she look'd behind,
For still the knight was present to her
mind;

And anxious oft she started on the way,
And thought the horseman ghost came thund'ring for his prey.

Return'd. she took her bed, with little rest,
But in short slumbers dreamt the funeral
feast:

Awak'd, she turn'd her side, and slept
again;

The same black vapors mounted in her brain,

And the same dreams return'd with double pain.

Now forc'd to wake, because afraid to
sleep,

Her blood all fever'd, with a furious leap
She sprung from bed, distracted in her
mind,

And fear'd, at ev'ry step, a twitching sprite
behind.

Darkling and desp'rate, with a stagg'ring
pace,

Of death afraid, and conscious of disgrace;
Fear, pride, remorse, at once her heart
assail'd;

Pride put remorse to flight, but fear prevail'd.

Friday, the fatal day, when next it came,
Her soul forethought the fiend would change his game,

And her pursue, or Theodore be slain,
And two ghosts join their packs to hunt her o'er the plain.

This dreadful image so possess'd her
mind, 380

That desp'rate any succor else to find,
She ceas'd all farther hope; and now began
To make reflection on th' unhappy man.

Rich, brave, and young, who past expression
lov'd,

Proof to disdain, and not to be remov'd:
Of all the men respected and admir'd;
Of all the dames, except herself, desir'd —

Why not of her, prefer'd above the rest
By him with knightly deeds, and open love profess'd ?

So had another been, where he his vows
address'd. 390

This quell'd her pride, yet other doubts
remain'd,

That, once disdaining, she might be dis-
dain'd.

The fear was just, but greater fear pre-
vail'd.

Fear of her life by hellish hounds assail'd:
He took a low'ring leave, but who can tell What outward hate might inward love conceal ?

Her sex's arts she knew, and why not, then,
Might deep dissembling have a place in
men ?

Here hope began to dawn; resolv'd to try, }
She fix'd on this her utmost remedy: 400

Death was behind, but hard it was to die. }

'T was time enough at last on death to call, }
The precipice in sight: a shrub was all }
That kindly stood betwixt to break the fatal fall.

One maid she had, belov'd above the rest;
Secure of her, the secret she confess'd;

And now the cheerful light her fears dis-
pell'd,

She with no winding turns the truth con-
ceal'd,

But put the woman off, and stood reveal'd:

With faults confess'd commission'd her to
go, 410

If pity yet had place, and reconcile her foe.
The welcome message made was soon re-
ceiv'd;

'T was what he wish'd, and hop'd, but scarce
believ'd:

Fate seem'd a fair occasion to present; }
He knew the sex, and fear'd she might }
repent,

Should he delay the moment of consent. }
There yet remain'd to gain her friends (a
care

The modesty of maidens well might spare);
But she with such a zeal the cause embrac'd, (As women, where they will, are all in haste.) 420

That father, mother, and the kin beside,
Were overborne by fury of the tide:

With full consent of all she chang'd her
state,

Resistless in her love, as in her hate.

By her example warn'd, the rest beware;
More easy, less imperious, were the fair;
And that one hunting, which the devil de-
sign'd

For one fair female, lost him half the kind.

CEYX AND ALCYONE

[OUT OF THE ELEVENTH BOOK OF OVID'S
METAMORPHOSES]

CONNECTION OF THIS FABLE WITH THE FORMER

Ceyx, the son of Lucifer (the morning star) and King of Trachin, in Thessaly, was married to Alcyone, daughter to Æolus, God of the Winds. Both the husband and the wife lov'd each other with an entire affection. Dædalion, the elder brother of Ceyx (whom he succeeded), having been turn'd into a falcon by Apollo, and Chione, Dædalion's daughter, slain by Diana, Ceyx prepares a ship to sail to Claros, there to consult the oracle of Apollo, and (as Ovid seems to intimate) to enquire how the anger of the gods might be aton'd.

THESE prodigies afflict the pious prince,
But, more perplex'd with those that hap-pen'd since,

He purposes to seek the Clarian god, }
Avoiding Delphos, his more fam'd abode, } Since Phlegyan robbers made unsafe the road.

Yet could he not from her he lov'd so well,
 The fatal voyage, he resolv'd, conceal:
 But when she saw her lord prepar'd to
 part,
 A deadly cold ran shiv'ring to her heart;
 Her faded cheeks are chang'd to boxen
 hue,
 And in her eyes the tears are ever new.
 She thrice assay'd to speak; her accents
 hung,
 And falt'ring died unfinish'd on her tongue,
 Or vanish'd into sighs: with long delay
 Her voice return'd, and found the wonted
 way.

"Tell me, my lord," she said, "what fault unknown
 Thy once belov'd Alcyone has done.
 Whether, ah whether is thy kindness
 gone!"
 Can Ceyx then sustain to leave his wife,
 And unconcern'd forsake the sweets of
 life?
 What can thy mind to this long journey
 move,
 Or need'st thou absence to renew thy love?
 Yet, if thou go'st by land, tho' grief possess
 My soul ev'n then, my fears will be the less.

But ah! be warn'd to shun the wat'ry way—
 The face is frightful of the stormy sea;
 For late I saw adrift disjointed planks,
 And empty tombs erected on the banks.
 Nor let false hopes to trust betray thy
 mind.

Because my sire in caves constrains the
 wind,
 Can with a breath their clam'rous rage
 appease;
 They fear his whistle, and forsake the seas.
 Not so, for, once indulg'd, they sweep the
 main,

Deaf to the call, or, hearing, hear in vain:
 But, bent on mischief, bear the waves be-
 fore,

And, not content with seas, insult the shore;
 When ocean, air, and earth, at once engage,
 And rooted forests fly before their rage:
 At once the clashing clouds to battle move,
 And lightnings run across the fields above.
 I know them well, and mark'd their rude
 comport,

While yet a child, within my father's court:
 In times of tempest they command alone,
 And he but sits precarious on the throne.

The more I know, the more my fears aug-
 ment;

And fears are oft prophetic of th' event.
 But if not fears or reasons will prevail,
 If fate has fix'd thee obstinate to sail,
 Go not without thy wife, but let me bear
 My part of danger with an equal share,
 And present, what I suffer, only fear:
 Then o'er the bounding billows shall we
 fly,

Secure to live together, or to die."

'These reasons mov'd her starlike husband's heart,

But still he held his purpose to depart:
 For, as he lov'd her equal to his life,
 He would not to the seas expose his wife;
 Nor could be wrought his voyage to refrain,
 But sought by arguments to soothe her
 pain.

Nor these avail'd; at length he lights on
 one,

With which so difficult a cause he won:
 "My love, so short an absence cease to fear,
 For, by my father's holy flame, I swear,
 Before two moons their orb with light
 adorn,

If Heav'n allow me life, I will return."

This promise of so short a stay prevails:
 He soon equips the ship, supplies the sails,
 And gives the word to launch; she trembling views

This pomp of death, and parting tears renews:

Last, with a kiss, she took a long farewell;
 Sigh'd, with a sad presage, and swooning
 fell.

While Ceyx seeks delays, the lusty crew, Rais'd on their banks, their oars in order
 drew
 To their broad breasts; the ship with fury
 flew.

The queen, recover'd, rears her humid
 eyes,

And first her husband on the poop espies,
 Shaking his hand at distance on the main;
 She took the sign, and shook her hand again.
 Still as the ground recedes, contracts her
 view

With sharpen'd sight, till she no longer
 knew

The much-lov'd face; that comfort lost supplies

With less, and with the galley feeds her
 eyes;

The galley borne from view by rising gales,

She follow'd with her sight the flying sails:
When ev'n the flying sails were seen no
more,

Forsaken of all sight, she left the shore.

Then on her bridal bed her body throws,
And sought in sleep her wearied eyes to
close;

Her husband's pillow, and the widow'd part Which once he press'd, renew'd the former smart.

And now a breeze from shore began to
blow,

The sailors ship their oars, and cease to
row;

Then hoist their yards atrip, and all their sails

Let fall, to court the wind, and catch the gales.

By this the vessel half her course had run,
And as much rested till the rising sun;
Both shores were lost to sight, when, at the
close

Of day, a stiffer gale at east arose:

The sea grew white, the rolling waves from
far,

Like heralds, first denounce the wat'ry war.

This seen, the master soon began to cry:
"Strike, strike the topsail; let the main-sheet fly,

And furl your sails." The winds repel the
sound,

And in the speaker's mouth the speech is
drown'd;

Yet of their own accord, as danger taught,
Each in his way, officiously they wrought:
Some stow their oars, or stop the leaky
sides;

Another bolder yet the yard bestrides,
And folds the sails; a fourth, with labor,
laves

Th' intruding seas, and waves ejects on waves.

In this confusion while their work they
ply,

The winds augment the winter of the sky,
And wage intestine wars; the suff'ring seas
Are toss'd and mingled as their tyrants
please.

The master would command, but, in despair
Of safety, stands amaz'd with stupid care;
Nor what to bid, or what forbid, he knows,
Th' ungovern'd tempest to such fury grows;
Vain is his force, and vainer is his skill,
With such a concourse comes the flood of ill.

The cries of men are mix'd with rattling
shrouds;

Seas dash on seas, and clouds encounter
clouds:

At once from east to west, from pole to pole,

The forky lightnings flash, the roaring thunders roll.

Now waves on waves ascending scale the
skies,

And, in the fires above, the water fries.

When yellow sands are sifted from below,
The glitt'ring billows give a golden show;
And when the fouler bottom spews the black,

The Stygian dye the tainted waters take:
Then frothy white appear the flatted seas,
And change their color, changing their disease.

Like various fits the Trachin vessel finds,
And now sublime she rides upon the winds;
As from a lofty summit looks from high,
And from the clouds beholds the nether
sky;

Now from the depth of hell they lift their
sight,

And at a distance see superior light.

The lashing billows make a loud report,
And beat her sides, as batt'ring rams a
fort:

Or as a lion, bounding in his way,
With force augmented bears against his
prey,

Sidelong to seize; or, unappall'd with fear, Springs on the toils and rushes on the
spear:

So seas impell'd by winds with added pow'r Assault the sides, and o'er the hatches
tow'r.

The planks (their pitchy cov'ring wash'd
away)

Now yield, and now a yawning breach dis-
play;

The roaring waters with a hostile tide
Rush thro' the ruins of her gaping side. 150
Meantime in sheets of rain the sky de-
scends,

And ocean, swell'd with waters, upwards
tends;

One rising, falling one, the heav'ns and sea
Meet at their confines, in the middle way:
The sails are drunk with show'rs, and drop with rain;

Sweet waters mingle with the briny main.
No star appears to lend his friendly light;

Darkness and tempest make a double night.
But flashing fires disclose the deep by turns;
And, while the lightnings blaze, the water
burns. 160

Now all the waves their scatter'd force unite,

And, as a soldier, foremost in the fight,
Makes way for others, and, an host alone,
Still presses on, and urging gains the town;
So, while th' invading billows come abreast,
The hero tenth, advanc'd before the rest,
Sweeps all before him with impetuous sway,
And from the walls descends upon the prey;
Part following enter, part remain without,
With envy hear their fellows' conqu'ring
shout, 170

And mount on others' backs, in hope to
share

The city, thus become the seat of war.

An universal cry resounds aloud,
The sailors run in heaps, a helpless crowd;
Art fails, and courage falls, no succor near;
As many waves, as many deaths appear.
One weeps, and yet despairs of late relief;
One cannot weep, (his fears congeal his
grief,)

But, stupid, with dry eyes expects his
fate;

One with loud shrieks laments his lost estate, 180

And calls those happy whom their funerals wait.

This wretch with pray'rs and vows the gods
implores,

And ev'n the skies he cannot see, adores.
That other on his friends his thoughts bestows,

His careful father, and his faithful spouse.
The covetous worldling in his anxious mind
Thinks only on the wealth he left behind.

All Ceyx his Alcyone employs;
For her he grieves, yet in her absence joys:
His wife he wishes, and would still be near, 190

Not her with him, but wishes him with her.
Now with last looks he seeks his native
shore,

Which fate has destin'd him to see no
more:

He sought, but in the dark tempestuous
night

He knew not whether to direct his sight.
So whirl the seas, such darkness blinds the
sky,

That the black night receives a deeper dye.

The giddy ship ran round; the tempest
tore

Her mast, and overboard the rudder bore.
One billow mounts, and with a scornful
brow, 200

Proud of her conquest gain'd, insults the waves below;

Nor lighter falls, than if some giant tore Pindus and Athos, with the freight they
bore,

And toss'd on seas: press'd with the pon-d'rous blow,

Down sinks the ship within th' abyss below;
Down with the vessel sink into the main
The many, never more to rise again.

Some few on scatter'd planks with fruitless
care

Lay hold, and swim, but, while they swim,
despair.

Ev'n he, who late a scepter did command, 210

Now grasps a floating fragment in his hand;
And, while he struggles on the stormy main,
Invokes his father, and his wife's, in vain.

But yet his consort is his greater care;
Alcyone he names amidst his pray'r, Names as a charm against the waves and
wind;

Most in his mouth, and ever in his mind:
Tir'd with his toil, all hopes of safety past,
From pray'rs to wishes he descends at last;
That his dead body, wafted to the sands, 220
Might have its burial from her friendly
hands.

As oft as he can catch a gulp of air,
And peep above the seas, he names the fair;
And ev'n when plung'd beneath, on her he
raves,

Murm'ring Alcyone below the waves:
At last a falling billow stops his breath,
Breaks o'er his head, and whelms him underneath.

Bright Lucifer unlike himself appears That night, his heav'nly form obscur'd with
tears; 220

And, since he was forbid to leave the skies,
He muffled with a cloud his mournful eyes.

Meantime Alcyone (his fate unknown) Computes how many nights he had been
gone;

Observes the waning moon with hourly
view,

Numbers her age, and wishes for a new;
Against the promis'd time provides with
care,

And hastens in the woof the robes he was to wear;
And for herself employs another loom,
New-dress'd to meet her lord returning
home,
Flatt'ring her heart with joys that never were to come. ²⁴⁰
She fum'd the temples with an od'rous
flame,
And oft before the sacred altars came,
To pray for him, who was an empty
name.
All pow'rs implor'd, but, far above the
rest,
To Juno she her pious vows address'd,
Her much-lov'd lord from perils to protect,
And safe o'er seas his voyage to direct;
Then pray'd that she might still possess
his heart,
And no pretending rival share a part:
This last petition heard of all her pray'r, ²⁵⁰
The rest, dispers'd by winds, were lost in air.
But she, the goddess of the nuptial bed,
Tir'd with her vain devotions for the dead,
Resolv'd the tainted hand should be re-
pell'd,
Which incense offer'd, and her altar held:
Then Iris thus bespoke: "Thou faithful
maid,
By whom the queen's commands are well
convey'd,
Haste to the house of Sleep, and bid the god,
Who rules the night by visions with a nod,
Prepare a dream, in figure and in form ²⁶⁰
Resembling him who perish'd in the storm:
This form before Aleyone present,
To make her certain of the sad event."
Indued with robes of various hue she flies,
And flying draws an arch a segment of the
skies);
Then leaves her bending bow, and from the steep
Descends to search the silent house of Sleep.
Near the Cimmerians, in his dark abode
Deep in a cavern, dwells the drowsy god;
Whose gloomy mansion nor the rising sun,
Nor setting, visits, nor the lightsome noon:
But lazy vapors round the region fly, ²⁷²
Perpetual twilight, and a doubtful sky.
No crowing cock does there his wings dis-
play,
Nor with his horny bill provoke the day;
Nor watchful dogs, nor the more wakeful
geese,
Disturb with nightly noise the sacred peace:

Nor beast of nature, nor the tame, are nigh,
Nor trees with tempests rock'd, nor human
cry;

But safe repose, without an air of breath, ²⁸⁰
Dwells here, and a dumb quiet next to death.

An arm of Lethe, with a gentle flow,
Arising upwards from the rock below,
The palace moats, and o'er the pebbles
creeps,

And with soft murmurs calls the coming sleeps;

Around its entry nodding poppies grow,
And all cool simples that sweet rest bestow;
Night from the plants their sleepy virtue drains,

And passing, sheds it on the silent plains:
No door there was th' unguarded house to keep, ²⁹⁰

On creaking hinges turn'd, to break his sleep.

But in the gloomy court was rais'd a bed,
Stuff'd with black plumes, and on an ebon
stead:

Black was the cov'ring too, where lay the
god,

And slept supine, his limbs display'd abroad.
About his head fantastic visions fly,
Which various images of things supply,
And mock their forms; the leaves on trees
not more,

Nor bearded ears in fields, nor sands upon
the shore.

The virgin ent'ring bright indulg'd the day ³⁰⁰

To the brown cave, and brush'd the dreams
away:

The god, disturb'd with this new glare of
light

Cast sudden on his face, unseal'd his sight,
And rais'd his tardy head, which sunk again,
And sinking on his bosom knock'd his chin:
At length shook off himself; and ask'd the
dame

(And asking yawn'd) for what intent she
came.

To whom the goddess thus: "O sacred
Rest,

Sweet pleasing Sleep, of all the pow'rs the
best!

O peace of mind, repairer of decay, ³¹⁰
Whose balms renew the limbs to labors of the day;

Care shuns thy soft approach, and sullen
flies away!

Adorn a dream, expressing human form,
The shape of him who suffer'd in the storm,

And send it flitting to the Trachin court,
The wreck of wretched Ceyx to report:
Before his queen bid the pale specter stand,
Who begs a vain relief at Juno's hand."

She said, and scarce awake her eyes could keep,

Unable to support the fumes of sleep; ³²⁰
But fled, returning by the way she went,
And swerv'd along her bow with swift ascent.

The god, uneasy till he slept again,
Resolv'd at once to rid himself of pain;
And, tho' against his custom, call'd aloud,
Exciting Morpheus from the sleepy crowd:
Morpheus of all his numerous train ex-
press'd

The shape of man, and imitated best;
The walk, the words, the gesture could supply,

The habit mimic, and the mien bely; ³³⁰
Plays well, but all his action is confin'd,
Extending not beyond our human kind.

Another birds, and beasts, and dragons apes,
And dreadful images, and monster shapes:
This demon Icelos in heav'n's high hall
The gods have nam'd, but men Phobetor
call.

A third is Phantasus, whose actions roll
On meaner thoughts, and things devoid of
soul;

Earth, fruits, and flow'rs he represents in dreams,
And solid rocks unmov'd, and running streams: ³⁴⁰

These three to kings and chiefs their scenes
display,

The rest before th' ignoble commons play.
Of these the chosen Morpheus is dispatch'd:
Which done, the lazy monarch, overwatch'd,

Down from his propping elbow drops his
head,

Dissolv'd in sleep, and shrinks within his bed.
Darkling the demon glides, for flight pre-
par'd,

So soft that scarce his fanning wings are heard.

To Trachin, swift as thought, the flitting
shade

Thro' air his momentary journey made: ³⁵⁰
Then lays aside the steerage of his wings, Forsakes his proper form, assumes the king's;
And pale as death, despoil'd of his array, }
Into the queen's apartment takes his way, }
And stands before the bed at dawn of day. }

Unmov'd his eyes, and wet his beard appears;

And shedding vain, but seeming real tears;
The briny water dropping from his hairs: }

Then staring on her, with a ghastly look
And hollow voice, he thus the queen bespoke: ³⁶⁰

"Know'st thou not me? Not yet, unhappy wife?

Or are my features perish'd with my life?
Look once again, and, for thy husband lost, Lo! all that's left of him, thy husband's ghost!

Thy vows for my return were all in vain; }
The stor'ry south o'ertook us in the main; }
And never shalt thou see thy living lord }
again.

Bear witness, Heav'n, I call'd on thee in
death,

And while I call'd, a billow stopp'd my
breath:

Think not that flying fame reports my fate; ³⁷⁰

I present, I appear, and my own wreck
relate.

Rise, wretched widow, rise, nor unde-
plor'd

Permit my ghost to pass the Stygian ford; }
But rise, prepar'd in black, to mourn thy } perish'd lord."

Thus said the player god; and, adding art
Of voice and gesture, so perform'd his part,
She thought (so like her love the shade
appears)

That Ceyx spake the words, and Ceyx shed
the tears.

She groan'd, her inward soul with grief
oppress'd;

She sigh'd, she wept, and sleeping beat her breast: ³⁸⁰

Then stretch'd her arms t' embrace his body bare —

Her clasping arms inclose but empty air.

At this, not yet awake, she cried: "O stay,
One is our fate, and common is our way!"
So dreadful was the dream, so loud she
spoke,

That, starting sudden up, the slumber broke;
Then cast her eyes around, in hope to view
Her vanish'd lord, and find the vision true:
For now the maids, who waited her commands,

Ran in with lighted tapers in their hands.
Tir'd with the search, not finding what she seeks, ³⁹¹

With cruel blows she pounds her blubber'd cheeks;

Then from her beaten breast the linen tare,
And cut the golden caul that bound her hair.
Her nurse demands the cause; with louder cries

She prosecutes her griefs, and thus replies:

"No more Alcyone; she suffer'd death
With her lov'd lord, when Ceyx lost his breath:

No flatt'ry, no false comfort, give me none,
My shipwreck'd Ceyx is for ever gone; ⁴⁰⁰
I saw, I saw him manifest in view:

His voice, his figure, and his gestures knew.
His luster lost, and ev'ry living grace,
Yet I retain'd the features of his face;
Tho' with pale cheeks, wet beard, and dropping hair,

None but my Ceyx could appear so fair:
I would have strain'd him with a strict embrace,

But thro' my arms he slipp'd, and vanish'd
from the place:

There, ev'n just there he stood;" and as she spoke,

Where last the specter was, she cast her look: ⁴¹⁰

Fain would she hope, and gaz'd upon the
ground,

If any printed footsteps might be found.

Then sigh'd and said: "This I too well
foreknew,

And my prophetic fear presag'd too true:
'T was what I begg'd, when with a bleeding
heart

I took my leave, and suffer'd thee to part;
Or I to go along, or thou to stay,

Never, ah never to divide our way!

Happier for me, that all our hours assign'd Together we had liv'd; e'en not in death
disjoin'd! ⁴²⁰

So had my Ceyx still been living here,
Or with my Ceyx I had perish'd there.

Now I die absent, in the vast profound,
And me without myself the seas have
drown'd:

The storms were not so cruel, should I strive
To lengthen life, and such a grief survive;
But neither will I strive, nor wretched thee
In death forsake, but keep thee company.

If not one common sepulcher contains
Our bodies, or one urn our last remains, ⁴³⁰
Yet Ceyx and Alcyone shall join,
Their names remember'd in one common
line."

No farther voice her mighty grief affords,
For sighs come rushing in betwixt her
words,

And stopp'd her tongue; but what her tongue denied,

Soft tears, and groans, and dumb complaints supplied.

'T was morning; to the port she takes her way,

And stands upon the margin of the sea:
That place, that very spot of ground she
sought,

Or thither by her destiny was brought, ⁴⁴⁰
Where last he stood; and while she sadly
said:

"'T was here he left me, ling'ring here
delay'd

His parting kiss; and there his anchors
weigh'd." —

Thus speaking, while her thoughts past actions trace,

And call to mind, admonish'd by the place,
Sharp at her utmost ken she cast her eyes,

And somewhat floating from afar descries;
It seem'd a corpse adrift, to distant sight,

But at a distance who could judge aright?
It wafted nearer yet, and then she knew

That what before she but surmis'd, was true: ⁴⁵⁰

A corpse it was, but whose it was, unknown;
Yet mov'd, howe'er, she made the case
her own;

Took the bad omen of a shipwreck'd man,
As for a stranger wept, and thus began:

"Poor wretch, on stormy seas to lose thy life,

Unhappy thou, but more thy widow'd
wife!"

At this she paus'd; for now the flowing
tide

Had brought the body nearer to the side:

The more she looks, the more her fears increase ⁴⁶⁰

At nearer sight, and she's herself the less.
Now driv'n ashore, and at her feet it lies:

She knows too much, in knowing whom she sees —

Her husband's corpse: at this she loudly shrieks:

"'T is he, 't is he," she cries, and tears her cheeks,

Her hair, her vest; and, stooping to the
sands,

About his neck she cast her trembling
hands.

"And is it thus, O dearer than my life,
Thus, thus return'st thou to thy longing
wife!"

She said, and to the neighb'ring mole she strode,⁴⁷⁰ (Rais'd there to break th' incursions of the
flood.)

Headlong from hence to plunge herself she
springs,

But shoots along supported on her wings;
A bird new-made about the banks she
plies,

Not far from shore, and short excursions
tries;

Nor seeks in air her humble flight to raise,
Content to skim the surface of the seas:

Her bill, tho' slender, sends a creaking noise,
And imitates a lamentable voice.⁴⁷⁹

Now lighting where the bloodless body lies,
She with a funeral note renews her cries.

At all her stretch her little wings she
spread,

And with her feather'd arms embrac'd the
dead;

Then flick'ring to his pallid lips, she strove
To print a kiss, the last essay of love.

Whether the vital touch reviv'd the dead,
Or that the moving waters rais'd his head

To meet the kiss, the vulgar doubt alone;
For sure a present miracle was shown.

The gods their shapes to winter birds translate,⁴⁹⁰

But both obnoxious to their former fate.
Their conjugal affection still is tied,

And still the mournful race is multiplied.
They bill, they tread; Aleyone, compress'd,

Sev'n days sits brooding on her floating nest,

A wintry queen: her sire at length is kind,
Calms ev'ry storm, and hushes ev'ry wind;

Prepares his empire for his daughter's ease,
And for his hatching nephews smooths the
seas.

THE FLOWER AND THE LEAF

OR, THE LADY IN THE ARBOR

A VISION [OUT OF CHAUCER]

Now turning from the wintry signs, the sun
His course exalted thro' the Ram had run,
And, whirling up the skies, his chariot drove Thro' Taurus and the lightsome realms of
love;

Where Venus from her orb descends in
show'rs,

To glad the ground, and paint the fields with flow'rs:

When first the tender blades of grass appear,

And buds, that yet the blast of Eurys fear, Stand at the door of life, and doubt to clothe the year;

Till gentle heat and soft repeated rains¹⁰
Make the green blood to dance within their
veins:

Then, at their call, embolden'd out they
come,

And swell the gems and burst the narrow room;

Broader and broader yet, their blooms dis-
play,

Salute the welcome sun, and entertain the
day.

Then from their breathing souls the sweets
repair

To scent the skies, and purge th' unwholesome air;

Joy spreads the heart, and, with a general
song,

Spring issues out and leads the jolly months
along.

In that sweet season, as in bed I lay²⁰
And sought in sleep to pass the night away,
I turn'd my weary side, but still in vain,

Tho' full of youthful health, and void of
pain:

Cares I had none, to keep me from my rest,
For love had never enter'd in my breast;

I wanted nothing Fortune could supply,
Nor did she slumber till that hour deny.

I wonder'd then, but after found it true,
Much joy had dried away the balmy dew:

Seas would be pools, without the brush-ing air³⁰

To curl the waves; and sure some little
care

Should weary Nature so, to make her want repair.

When Chanticleer the second watch had
sung,

Scorning the scorner sleep, from bed I
sprung;

And dressing, by the moon, in loose array,
Pass'd out in open air, preventing day,

And sought a goodly grove, as fancy led
my way.

Straight as a line in beauteous order stood
Of oaks unshorn a venerable wood:

Fresh was the grass beneath; and ev'ry tree,
At distance planted in a due degree, 41
Their branching arms in air with equal space
Stretch'd to their neighbors with a long embrace;

And the new leaves on ev'ry bough were
seen,

Some ruddy-color'd, some of lighter green.
The painted birds, companions of the spring,
Hopping from spray to spray, were heard
to sing;

Both eyes and ears receiv'd a like delight,
Enchanting music, and a charming sight.

On Philomel I fix'd my whole desire, 50
And listen'd for the queen of all the choir;
Fain would I hear her heav'nly voice to sing;

And wanted yet an omen to the spring.

Attending long in vain, I took the way,
Which thro' a path but scarcely printed
lay;

In narrow mazes oft it seem'd to meet,
And look'd as lightly press'd by fairy feet.
Wand'ring I walk'd alone, for still methought

To some strange end so strange a path was
wrought;

At last it led me where an arbor stood, 60
The sacred receptacle of the wood.

This place unmark'd, tho' oft I walk'd the
green,

In all my progress I had never seen;

And, seiz'd at once with wonder and delight,
Gaz'd all around me, new to the transporting
sight.

'Twas bench'd with turf, and goodly to be
seen,

The thick young grass arose in fresher
green:

The mound was newly made, no sight could pass

Betwixt the nice partitions of the grass;
The well-united sods so closely lay, 70

And all around the shades defended it from
day,

For sycamores with eglantine were spread,
A hedge about the sides, a covering over
head.

And so the fragrant brier was wove between,
The sycamore and flow'rs were mix'd with
green,

That nature seem'd to vary the delight,
And satisfied at once the smell and sight.

The master workman of the bow'r was
known

Thro' fairy lands, and built for Oberon;
Who twining leaves with such proportion
drew, 80

They rose by measure, and by rule they
grew:

No mortal tongue can half the beauty tell,
For none but hands divine could work so well.

Both roof and sides were like a parlor made,
A soft recess, and a cool summer shade:

The hedge was set so thick, no foreign eye
The persons plac'd within it could espy;

But all that pass'd without with ease was
seen.

As if nor fence nor tree was plac'd between.
'T was border'd with a field; and some was
plain 90

With grass, and some was sow'd with rising
grain,

That (now the dew with spangles deck'd
the ground)

A sweeter spot of earth was never found.

I look'd and look'd, and still with new de-
light;

Such joy my soul, such pleasures fill'd my
sight:

And the fresh eglantine exhal'd a breath, Whose odors were of pow'r to raise from
death.

Nor sullen discontent, nor anxious care,
Ev'n tho' brought thither, could inhabit
there;

But thence they fled as from their mortal
foe,

For this sweet place could only pleasure
know.

Thus, as I mus'd, I cast aside my eye,
And saw a medlar tree was planted nigh.

The spreading branches made a goodly show,
And full of opening blooms was ev'ry bough.

A goldfinch there I saw with gaudy pride
Of painted plumes, that hopp'd from side to side,

Still pecking as she pass'd; and still she
drew

The sweets from ev'ry flow'r, and suck'd the
dew:

Suffic'd at length, she warbled in her
throat, 110

And tun'd her voice to many a merry note,
But indistinct, and neither sweet nor clear,

Yet such as sooth'd my soul and pleas'd my ear.

Her short performance was no sooner
tried,

When she I sought, the nightingale, replied:

So sweet, so shrill, so variously she sung,
That the grove echo'd, and the valleys rung;
And I so ravish'd with her heav'nly note,
I stood intranc'd, and had no room for thought,

But all o'erpow'r'd with ecstasy of bliss, ¹²⁰
Was in a pleasing dream of Paradise.

At length I wak'd, and, looking round the bow'r,

Search'd ev'ry tree, and pried on ev'ry flow'r,

If anywhere by chance I might espy
The rural poet of the melody;
For still methought she sung not far away.

At last I found her on a laurel spray;
Close by my side she sate, and fair in sight,

Full in a line, against her opposite,
Where stood with eglantine the laurel twin'd, ¹³⁰

And both their native sweets were well conjoin'd.

On the green bank I sat, and listen'd long;

(Sitting was more convenient for the song!)
Nor till her lay was ended could I move,

But wish'd to dwell forever in the grove.
Only methought the time too swiftly pass'd,

And ev'ry note I fear'd would be the last.
My sight, and smell, and hearing were employ'd,

And all three senses in full gust enjoy'd.

And what alone did all the rest surpass, ¹⁴⁰
The sweet possession of the fairy place;

Single, and conscious to myself alone
Of pleasures to th' excluded world unknown:

Pleasures which nowhere else were to be found,

And all Elysium in a spot of ground.

Thus while I sat intent to see and hear,
And drew perfumes of more than vital air,

All suddenly I heard th' approaching sound
Of vocal music on th' enchanted ground:

An host of saints it seem'd, so full the choir; ¹⁵⁰

As if the blest above did all conspire
To join their voices and neglect the lyre.

At length there issued from the grove behind

A fair assembly of the female kind:
A train less fair, as ancient fathers tell,

Seduc'd the sons of heaven to rebel.

I pass their forms, and ev'ry charming grace;

Less than an angel would their worth debase;

But their attire, like liveries of a kind, ¹⁵⁹
All rich and rare, is fresh within my mind.

In velvet, white as snow, the troop was gown'd,

The seams with sparkling emeralds set around;

Their hoods and sleeves the same, and purfl'd o'er

With diamonds, pearls, and all the shining store

Of Eastern pomp; their long descending train,

With rubies edg'd, and sapphires, swept the plain;

High on their heads, with jewels richly set,
Each lady wore a radiant coronet.

Beneath the circles, all the choir was grac'd
With chaplets green on their fair foreheads plac'd. ¹⁷⁰

Of laurel some, of woodbine many more,
And wreaths of agnus castus others bore:

These last, who with those virgin crowns were dress'd,

Appear'd in higher honor than the rest.

They danc'd around; but in the midst was seen

A lady of a more majestic mien,
By stature and by beauty mark'd their sovereign queen.

She in the midst began with sober grace;

Her servants' eyes were fix'd upon her face,

And, as she mov'd or turn'd, her motions view'd, ¹⁸⁰

Her measures kept, and step by step pursued.

Methought she trod the ground with greater grace,

With more of godhead shining in her face;

And as in beauty she surpass'd the choir,
So, nobler than the rest, was her attire.

A crown of ruddy gold inclos'd her brow,
Plain without pomp, and rich without a show:

A branch of agnus castus in her hand
She bore aloft (her scepter of command);

Admir'd, ador'd by all the circling crowd,
For wheresoe'er she turn'd her face, they bow'd. ¹⁹¹

And as she danc'd, a roundelay she sung,
In honor of the laurel, ever young:

She rais'd her voice on high, and sung
 so clear,
 The fawns came scudding from the groves to hear,
 And all the bending forest lent an ear.
 At ev'ry close she made, th' attending
 throng

Replied, and bore the burden of the song:
 So just, so small, yet in so sweet a note,
 It seem'd the music melted in the throat. ²⁰⁰
 Thus dancing on, and singing as they danc'd,

They to the middle of the mead advanc'd,
 Till round my arbor a new ring they made,
 And footed it about the secret shade.
 O'erjoy'd to see the jolly troop so near,
 But somewhat aw'd, I shook with holy fear;
 Yet not so much, but that I noted well
 Who did the most in song or dance excel.

Not long I had observ'd, when from afar
 I heard a sudden symphony of war; ²¹⁰
 The neighing coursers, and the soldiers' cry,
 And sounding trumps that seem'd to tear
 the sky.

I saw soon after this, behind the grove
 From whence the ladies did in order move,
 Come issuing out in arms a warrior train,
 That like a deluge pour'd upon the plain:
 On barbed steeds they rode in proud array,
 Thick as the college of the bees in May,
 When swarming o'er the dusky fields they
 fly,

New to the flow'rs, and intercept the sky.
 So fierce they drove, their coursers were so fleet, ²²¹
 That the turf trembled underneath their feet.

To tell their costly furniture were long,
 The summer's day would end before the
 song;

To purchase but the tenth of all their store
 Would make the mighty Persian monarch poor.

Yet what I can, I will; before the rest
 The trumpets issued in white mantles
 dress'd:

A numerous troop, and all their heads
 around
 With chaplets green of cerrial oak were crown'd; ²³⁰

And at each trumpet was a banner bound,
 Which, waving in the wind, display'd at large
 Their master's coat of arms and knightly
 charge.

Broad were the banners, and of snowy hue,
 A purer web the silkworm never drew.
 The chief about their necks the scutcheons
 wore,

With orient pearls and jewels powder'd
 o'er;

Broad were their collars too, and ev'ry one
 Was set about with many a costly stone.
 Next these, of kings at arms a goodly train ²⁴⁰

In proud array came prancing o'er the plain;
 Their cloaks were cloth of silver mix'd with gold,

And garlands green around their temples
 roll'd;

Rich crowns were on their royal scutcheons
 plac'd,

With sapphires, diamonds, and with rubies
 grac'd.

And as the trumpets their appearance
 made,

So these in habits were alike array'd;
 But with a pace more sober and more slow,
 And twenty, rank in rank, they rode arow.
 The pursevants came next, in number more; ²⁵⁰

And like the heralds each his scutcheon
 bore:

Clad in white velvet all their troop they
 led,

With each an oaken chaplet on his head.

Nine royal knights in equal rank succeed,

Each warrior mounted on a fiery steed;
 In golden armor glorious to behold;
 The rivets of their arms were nail'd with
 gold.

Their surcoats of white ermine fur were
 made,

With cloth of gold between that cast a glitt'ring shade.

The trappings of their steeds were of the same; ²⁶⁰

The golden fringe ev'n set the ground on
 flame,

And drew a precious trail: a crown divine
 Of laurel did about their temples twine.

Three henchmen were for ev'ry knight
 assign'd,

All in rich livery clad, and of a kind;
 White velvet, but unshorn, for cloaks they
 wore,

And each within his hand a truncheon bore:
 The foremost held a helm of rare device;
 A prince's ransom would not pay the price.

The second bore the buckler of his knight,
The third of cornel wood a spear upright,
Headed with piercing steel, and polish'd bright.

Like to their lords their equipage was seen,
And all their foreheads crown'd with garlands green.

And after these came arm'd with spear and shield

An host so great, as cover'd all the field;
And all their foreheads, like the knights before,

With laurels ever green were shaded o'er,
Or oak, or other leaves of lasting kind,
Tenacious of the stem, and firm against the wind.

Some in their hands, besides the lance and shield,

The boughs of woodbind or of hawthorn held,

Or branches for their mystic emblems took,
Of palm, of laurel, or of cerial oak.

Thus marching to the trumpets' lofty sound,

Drawn in two lines adverse they wheel'd around,

And in the middle meadow took their ground.

Among themselves the turney they divide,
In equal squadrons rang'd on either side;
Then turn'd their horses' heads, and man to man,

And steed to steed oppos'd, the justs began.
They lightly set their lances in the rest,
And, at the sign, against each other press'd:

They met; I sitting at my ease beheld
The mix'd events, and fortunes of the field.
Some broke their spears, some tumbled horse and man,

And round the field the lighten'd coursers ran.

An hour and more, like tides, in equal sway
They rush'd, and won by turns and lost the day:

At length the nine (who still together held)

Their fainting foes to shameful flight compell'd,

And with resistless force o'erran the field.
Thus, to their fame, when finish'd was the fight,

The victors from their lofty steeds alight:
Like them dismounted all the warlike train,
And two by two proceeded o'er the plain;

Till to the fair assembly they advanc'd,
Who near the secret arbor sung and danc'd.

The ladies left their measures at the sight,

To meet the chiefs returning from the fight,

And each with open arms embrac'd her chosen knight.

Amid the plain a spreading laurel stood,
The grace and ornament of all the wood:
That pleasing shade they sought, a soft retreat

From sudden April show'rs, a shelter from the heat.

Her leavy arms with such extent were spread,

So near the clouds was her aspiring head,
That hosts of birds, that wing the liquid air,

Perch'd in the boughs, had nightly lodging there;

And flocks of sheep beneath the shade from far

Might hear the rattling hail and wintry war;

From heav'n's inclemency here found retreat,

Enjoy'd the cool, and shunn'd the scorching heat:

A hundred knights might there at ease abide,

And ev'ry knight a lady by his side;
The trunk itself such odors did bequeath,
That a Moluccan breeze to these was common breath.

The lords and ladies here, approaching, paid

Their homage, with a low obeisance made,

And seem'd to venerate the sacred shade.
These rites perform'd, their pleasures they pursue,

With songs of love, and mix with measures new;

Around the holy tree their dance they frame.

And ev'ry champion leads his chosen dame.

I cast my sight upon the farther field,
And a fresh object of delight beheld:

For from the region of the West I heard
New music sound, and a new troop appear'd,

Of knights and ladies mix'd, a jolly band;
But all on foot they march'd, and hand in hand.

The ladies dress'd in rich simars were
 seen
 Of Florence satin, flow'r'd with white and
 green,
 And for a shade betwixt the bloomy
 girdelin.
 The borders of their petticoats below
 Were guarded thick with rubies on arow;
 And ev'ry damsel wore upon her head
 Of flow'rs a garland blended white and red.
 Attir'd in mantles all the knights were seen,
 That gratified the view with cheerful green:
 Their chaplets of their ladies' colors were,
 Compos'd of white and red, to shade their shining hair.
 Before the merry troop the minstrels play'd:
 All in their masters' liveries were array'd,
 And clad in green, and on their temples wore
 The chaplets white and red their ladies bore.
 Their instruments were various in their kind,
 Some for the bow, and some for breathing
 wind:
 The sawtry, pipe, and hautboys' noisy band,
 And the soft lute trembling beneath the touching hand.
 A tuft of daisies on a flow'ry lea
 They saw, and thitherward they bent their
 way;
 To this both knights and dames their homage made,
 And due obeisance to the daisy paid.
 And then the band of flutes began to play,
 To which a lady sung a virelay;
 And still at ev'ry close she would repeat
 The burden of the song, "The daisy is so sweet."
 "The daisy is so sweet," when she begun,
 The troop of knights and dames continued on.
 The concert and the voice so charm'd my
 ear,
 And sooth'd my soul, that it was heav'n to
 hear.
 But soon their pleasure pass'd; at noon
 of day,
 The sun with sultry beams began to play:
 Not Sirius shoots a fiercer flame from high,
 When with his pois'nous breath he blasts
 the sky.
 Then droop'd the fading flow'rs (their beauty fled)
 And clos'd their sickly eyes, and hung
 the head;
 And, rivell'd up with heat, lay dying in their bed.

The ladies gasp'd, and scarcely could re-
 spire;
 The breath they drew, no longer air, but fire:
 The fainty knights were scorch'd, and knew not where
 To run for shelter, for no shade was near.
 And after this the gath'ring clouds amain Pour'd down a storm of rattling hail and
 rain,
 And lightning flash'd betwixt; the field and flow'rs,
 Burnt up before, were buried in the show'rs.
 The ladies and the knights, no shelter nigh,
 Bare to the weather and the wintry sky,
 Were dropping wet, disconsolate and wan,
 And thro' their thin array receiv'd the rain.
 While those in white, protected by the
 tree,
 Saw pass the vain assault, and stood from danger free.
 But as compassion mov'd their gentle minds,
 When ceas'd the storm, and silent were the
 winds,
 Displeas'd at what, not suff'ring, they had
 seen,
 They went to cheer the faction of the green.
 The queen in white array, before her band,
 Saluting, took her rival by the hand;
 So did the knights and dames, with courtly
 grace,
 And with behavior sweet their foes embrace.
 Then thus the queen with laurel on her
 brow:
 "Fair sister, I have suffer'd in your woe;
 Nor shall be wanting aught within my pow'r
 For your relief in my refreshing bow'r."
 That other answer'd with a lowly look,
 And soon the gracious invitation took;
 For ill at ease both she and all her train
 The scorching sun had borne, and beating
 rain.
 Like courtesy was us'd by all in white;
 Each dame a dame receiv'd, and ev'ry knight a knight.
 The laurel champions with their swords invade
 The neighb'ring forests, where the justs were made,
 And sear wood from the rotten hedges took,
 And seeds of latent fire from flints provoke:
 A cheerful blaze arose, and by the fire
 They warm'd their frozen feet and dried their wet attire.
 Refresh'd with heat, the ladies sought
 around

For virtuous herbs, which gather'd from
the ground,
They squeez'd the juice, and cooling ointment made,
Which on their sunburnt cheeks and their chapp'd skins they laid; ⁴²⁰
Then sought green salads, which they bade
'em eat,
A sovereign remedy for inward heat.

The Lady of the Leaf ordain'd a feast,
And made the Lady of the Flow'r her guest:
When lo! a bow'r ascended on the plain,
With sudden seats adorn'd, and large for either train.

This bow'r was near my pleasant arbor
plac'd,
That I could hear and see whatever pass'd:
The ladies sat with each a knight between,
Distinguish'd by their colors, white and green; ⁴³⁰

The vanquish'd party with the victors join'd, Nor wanted sweet discourse, the banquet of the mind.

Meantime the minstrels play'd on either
side,
Vain of their art, and for the mast'ry vied;
The sweet contention lasted for an hour,
And reach'd my secret arbor from the
bow'r.

The sun was set; and Vesper, to supply
His absent beams, had lighted up the sky:
When Philomel, officious all the day
To sing the service of th' ensuing May, ⁴⁴⁰ Fled from her laurel shade, and wing'd her
flight

Directly to the queen array'd in white;
And hopping sate familiar on her hand,
A new musician, and increas'd the band.

The goldfinch, who, to shun the scalding
heat,

Had chang'd the medlar for a safer seat,
And hid in bushes seap'd the bitter show'r,
Now perch'd upon the Lady of the Flow'r;
And either songster, holding out their
throats,

And folding up their wings, renew'd their notes; ⁴⁵⁰

As if all day, preluding to the fight,
They only had rehears'd, to sing by night.
The banquet ended, and the battle done,
They danc'd by starlight and the friendly
moon;

And when they were to part, the laureat
queen

Supplied with steeds the Lady of the green,

Her and her train conducting on the way,
The moon to follow, and avoid the day.

This when I saw, inquisitive to know
The secret moral of the mystic show, ⁴⁶⁰
I started from my shade, in hopes to find
Some nymph to satisfy my longing mind;
And, as my fair adventure fell, I found
A lady all in white, with laurel crown'd,
Who clos'd the rear, and softly pac'd along,
Repeating to herself the former song:

With due respect my body I inclin'd,
As to some being of superior kind,
And made my court according to the day,
Wishing her queen and her a happy May.
"Great thanks, my daughter," with a gracious bow ⁴⁷¹

She said; and I, who much desir'd to know
Of whence she was, yet fearful how to break

My mind, adventur'd humbly thus to speak:
"Madam, might I presume and not offend,
So may the stars and shining moon attend
Your nightly sports, as you vouchsafe to tell

What nymphs they were who mortal forms excel,
And what the knights who fought in listed fields so well."

To this the dame replied: "Fair daughter, know, ⁴⁸⁰

That what you saw was all a fairy show;
And all those airy shapes you now behold
Were human bodies once, and cloth'd with earthly mold.

Our souls, not yet prepar'd for upper light, Till doomsday wander in the shades of
night;

This only holiday of all the year,
We privileg'd in sunshine may appear:
With songs and dance we celebrate the
day,

And with due honors usher in the May.
At other times we reign by night alone, ⁴⁹⁰
And posting thro' the skies pursue the moon;

But when the moon arises, none are found;
For cruel Demogorgon walks the round,
And if he finds a fairy lag in light,
He drives the wretch before, and lashes into night.

"All courteous are by kind, and ever
proud

With friendly offices to help the good.
In every land we have a larger space
Than what is known to you of mortal race,

Where we with green adorn our fairy bow'rs, 500

And ev'n this grove, unseen before, is ours.
Know farther: ev'ry lady cloth'd in white,
And, crown'd with oak and laurel ev'ry
knight,

Are servants to the Leaf, by liveries known
Of innocence; and I myself am one.

Saw you not her so graceful to behold
In white attire, and crown'd with radiant
gold?

The sovereign lady of our land is she,
Diana call'd, the queen of chastity;
And, for the spotless name of maid she
bears, 510

That agnus castus in her hand appears;
And all her train, with leavy chaplets
crown'd,

Were for unblam'd virginity renown'd;
But those the chief and highest in command
Who bear those holy branches in their hand:
The knights adorn'd with laurel crowns } are they

Whom death nor danger ever could dismay, } Victorious names, who made the world
obey;

Who, while they liv'd, in deeds of arms ex-cell'd,

And after death for deities were held. 520
But those who wear the woodbine on their
brow

Were knights of love, who never broke their vow;

Firm to their plighted faith, and ever free
From fears, and fickle chance, and jealousy.
The lords and ladies who the woodbine
bear

As true as Tristram and Isotta were."

"But what are those," said I, "th' un-conquer'd nine,

Who crown'd with laurel wreaths in golden armor shine?

And who the knights in green, and what the train 529

Of ladies dress'd with daisies on the plain?
Why both the bands in worship disagree,
And some adore the Flow'r, and some the Tree?"

"Just is your suit, fair daughter," said
the dame;

"Those laurel'd chiefs were men of mighty
fame;

Nine worthies were they call'd of diff'rent
rites,

Three Jews, three Pagans, and three Christian knights.

These, as you see, ride foremost in the
field,

As they the foremost rank of honor held, }
And all in deeds of chivalry excell'd:

Their temples wreath'd with leaves, that still renew; 540

For deathless laurel is the victor's due.
Who bear the bows were knights in Arthur's reign,

Twelve they, and twelve the peers of Charlemagne;

For bows the strength of brawny arms im-
ply,

Emblems of valor and of victory.
Behold an order yet of newer date,

Doubling their number, equal in their state;
Our England's ornament, the crown's defense,

In battle brave, protectors of their prince;
Unchang'd by fortune, to their sovereign true, 550

For which their manly legs are bound with blue.

These, of the Garter call'd, of faith unstain'd,

In fighting fields the laurel have obtain'd. }
And well repaid those honors which they gain'd.

The laurel wreaths were first by Caesar
worn,

And still they Caesar's successors adorn;
One leaf of this is immortality,

And more of worth than all the world can buy."

"One doubt remains," said I, "the dames
in green.

What were their qualities, and who their
queen?" 560

"Flora commands," said she, "those nymphs
and knights,

Who liv'd in slothful ease and loose delights;

Who never acts of honor durst pursue,
The men inglorious knights, the ladies all untrue:

Who, nurs'd in idleness and train'd in courts,

Pass'd all their precious hours in plays and sports,

Till Death behind came stalking on, un-
seen,

And wither'd (like the storm) the freshness
of their green.

These, and their mates, enjoy the present
hour,
And therefore pay their homage to the Flow'r.

But knights in knightly deeds should per-⁵⁷⁰
severe,
And still continue what at first they were;
Continue, and proceed in honor's fair career.

No room for cowardice or dull delay;
From good to better they should urge their
way.

For this with golden spurs the chiefs are
grac'd,
With pointed rowels arm'd to mend their
haste;

For this with lasting leaves their brows are bound,
For laurel is the sign of labor crown'd,
Which bears the bitter blast, nor shaken falls to ground:

From winter winds it suffers no decay,
For ever fresh and fair, and ev'ry month is
May.

Ev'n when the vital sap retreats below,
Ev'n when the hoary head is hid in snow,
The life is in the leaf, and still between The fits of falling snows appears the streaky
green.

Not so the flow'r, which lasts for little space,
A short-liv'd good, and an uncertain grace;
This way and that the feeble stem is driv'n, Weak to sustain the storms and injuries of
heav'n.

Propp'd by the spring, it lifts aloft the
head,

But of a sickly beauty, soon to shed;
In summer living, and in winter dead.
For things of tender kind, for pleasure made,
Shoot up with swift increase, and sudden are decay'd."

With humble words, the wisest I could
frame,
And proffer'd service, I repaid the dame;
That, of her grace, she gave her maid to
know

The secret meaning of this moral show.
And she, to prove what profit I had made
Of mystic truth, in fables first convey'd,
Demanded, till the next returning May,
Whether the Leaf or Flow'r I would obey?
I chose the Leaf; she smil'd with sober
cheer,

And wish'd me fair adventure for the year,
And gave me charms and sigils, for defense

Against ill tongues that scandal innocence.
"But I," said she, "my fellows must pursue, Already past the plain and out of view."

We parted thus; I homeward sped my
way,
Bewilder'd in the wood till dawn of day,
And met the merry crew who danc'd about the May.

Then late, refresh'd with sleep, I rose to write

The visionary vigils of the night:
Blush, as thou may'st, my little book, for
shame,

Nor hope with homely verse to purchase
fame;

For such thy maker chose, and so design'd
Thy simple style to suit thy lowly kind.

THE TWELFTH BOOK OF OVID HIS METAMORPHOSES

WHOLLY TRANSLATED

CONNECTION TO THE END OF THE ELEVENTH BOOK

Æsacus, the son of Priam, loving a country life, forsakes the court: living obscurely, he falls in love with a nymph, who flying from him was kill'd by a serpent; for grief of this, he would have drown'd himself, but by the pity of the gods is turn'd into a cormorant. Priam, not hearing of Æsacus, believes him to be dead, and raises a tomb to preserve his memory. By this transition, which is one of the finest in all Ovid, the poet naturally falls into the story of the Trojan war, which is summ'd up in the present book, but so very briefly, in many places, that Ovid seems more short than Virgil, contrary to his usual style. Yet the House of Fame, which is here describ'd, is one of the most beautiful pieces in the whole Metamorphoses.
The fight of Achilles and Cygnus, and the fray betwixt the Lapithæ and Centaurs, yield to no other part of this poet; and particularly the loves and death of Cyllarus and Hylonome, the male and female Centaur, are wonderfully moving.

PRIAM, to whom the story was unknown,
As dead, deplor'd his metamorphos'd son;
A cenotaph his name and title kept,
And Hector round the tomb, with all his brothers, wept.

This pious office Paris did not share;
Absent alone, and author of the war,

Which, for the Spartan queen, the Grecians drew

T' avenge the rape, and Asia to subdue.

A thousand ships were mann'd, to sail
the sea;
Nor had their just resentments found
delay,
Had not the winds and waves oppos'd
their way.

At Aulis, with united pow'rs, they meet;
But there, cross winds or calms detain'd
the fleet.

Now, while they raise an altar on the shore

And Jove with solemn sacrifice adore,
A boding sign the priests and people see:
A snake of size immense ascends a tree,
And in the leavy summit spied a nest,
Which, o'er her callow young, a sparrow
press'd.

Eight were the birds unfledg'd; their mother flew
And hover'd round her care, but still in
view;

Till the fierce reptile first devour'd the
brood,
Then seiz'd the flutt'ring dam and drunk her blood.

This dire osten the fearful people view;
Calchas alone, by Phœbus taught, foreknew
What Heav'n decreed; and, with a smiling
glance,
Thus gratulates to Greece her happy
chance:

"O Argives, we shall conquer; Troy is ours,
But long delays shall first afflict our pow'rs:
Nine years of labor the nine birds portend;
The tenth shall in the town's destruction
end."

The serpent, who his maw obscene had
fill'd,

The branches in his curl'd embraces held;
But, as in spires he stood, he turn'd to stone:
The stony snake retain'd the figure still his
own.

Yet not for this the wind-bound navy
weigh'd;
Slack were their sails, and Neptune dis-
obey'd.

Some thought him loth the town should be destroy'd,
Whose building had his hands divine em-
ploy'd:

Not so the seer; who knew, and known
foreshow'd,

The virgin Phœbe with a virgin's blood
Must first be reconcil'd. The common cause
Prevail'd; and, pity yielding to the laws,
Fair Iphigenia, the devoted maid,
Was, by the weeping priests, in linen robes array'd.

All mourn her fate, but no relief appear'd;
The royal victim bound, the knife already
rear'd:

When that offended pow'r, who caus'd their
woe,

Relenting ceas'd her wrath, and stopp'd
the coming blow.

A mist before the ministers she cast,
And in the virgin's room a hind she plac'd.
Th' oblation slain, and Phœbe reconcil'd,
The storm was hush'd, and dimpled ocean
smil'd;

A favorable gale arose from shore,
Which to the port desir'd the Grecian galleys bore.

Full in the midst of this created space,
Betwixt heav'n, earth, and skies, there stands a place

Confining on all three, with triple bound;
Whence all things, tho' remote, are view'd
around,

And thither bring their undulating sound:
The palace of loud Fame, her seat of
pow'r,

Plac'd on the summit of a lofty tow'r.
A thousand winding entries, long and wide,
Receive of fresh reports a flowing tide.
A thousand crannies in the walls are made;
Nor gate nor bars exclude the busy trade.
'Tis built of brass, the better to diffuse
The spreading sounds, and multiply the
news;

Where echoes in repeated echoes play:
A mart forever full, and open night and day.
Nor silence is within, nor voice express,
But a deaf noise of sounds that never cease;
Confus'd and chiding, like the hollow roar
Of tides receding from th' insulted shore;
Or like the broken thunder, heard from far,
When Jove to distance drives the rolling
war.

The courts are fill'd with a tumultuous din
Of crowds, or issuing forth, or ent'ring in:
A thoroughfare of news, where some devise Things never heard; some mingle truth with lies:

The troubled air with empty sounds they
beat;

Intent to hear, and eager to repeat.

Error sits brooding there, with added train
Of vain Credulity, and Joys as vain:
Suspicion, with Sedition join'd, are near;
And Rumors rais'd, and Murmurs mix'd, and Panic Fear.

Fame sits aloft, and sees the subject ground,
And seas about, and skies above; enquiring
all around.

The goddess gives th' alarm, and soon is
known

The Grecian fleet, descending on the town.
Fix'd on defense, the Trojans are not slow
To guard their shore from an expected foe.
They meet in fight; by Hector's fatal hand
Protesilaus falls, and bites the strand,
Which with expense of blood the Grecians
won,

And prov'd the strength unknown of Priam's
son;

And to their cost the Trojan leaders felt The Grecian heroes, and what deaths they dealt.

From these first onsets, the Sigeian shore
Was strew'd with carcasses and stain'd with
gore:

Neptunian Cygnus troops of Greeks had
slain;

Achilles in his car had scour'd the plain,
And clear'd the Trojan ranks: where'er he fought,

Cygnus, or Hector, thro' the fields he sought.
Cygnus he found; on him his force essay'd,
For Hector was to the tenth year delay'd.
His white-man'd steeds, that bow'd beneath the yoke,

He cheer'd to courage, with a gentle stroke;
Then urg'd his fiery chariot on the foe,
And rising shook his lance, in act to throw.
But first he cried: "O youth, be proud to
bear

Thy death, ennobled by Pelides' spear."
The lance pursued the voice without delay;
Nor did the whizzing weapon miss the way,
But pierc'd his cuirass, with such fury sent.
And sign'd his bosom with a purple dint.
At this the seed of Neptune: "Goddess-
born,

For ornament, not use, these arms are worn;
This helm and heavy buckler I can spare,
As only decorations of the war:

So Mars is arm'd for glory, not for need.
'T is somewhat more from Neptune to proceed,

Than from a daughter of the sea to spring:
Thy sire is mortal; mine is ocean's king

Secure of death, I should condemn thy dart,
Tho' naked, and impassible depart."

He said, and threw; the trembling weapon pass'd
Thro' nine bull hides, each under other
plac'd
On his broad shield, and stuck within the last.

Achilles wrench'd it out, and sent again
The hostile gift: the hostile gift was vain.
He tried a third, a tough well-chosen spear;
Th' inviolable body stood sincere,
Tho' Cygnus then did no defense provide,
But scornful offer'd his unshielded side.

Not otherwise th' impatient hero far'd,
Than as a bull, incompass'd with a guard,
Amid the circus roars, provok'd from far
By sight of scarlet and a sanguine war:
They quit their ground, his bended horns
elude,

In vain pursuing and in vain pursued.

Before to farther fight he would advance,
He stood considering and survey'd his lance;
Doubts if he wielded not a wooden spear Without a point: he look'd, the point was
there.

"This is my hand, and this my lance,"
he said,
"By which so many thousand foes are
dead."

O whither is their usual virtue fled!
I had it once; and the Lyrnessian wall
And Tenedos confess'd it in their fall.
Thy streams, Caeus, roll'd a crimson flood;
And Thebes ran red with her own natives'
blood.

Twice Telephus employ'd this piercing steel,
To wound him first, and afterward to heal.
The vigor of this arm was never vain;
And that my wonted prowess I retain,
Witness these heaps of slaughter on the
plain."

He said, and, doubtful of his former deeds,
To some new trial of his force proceeds.
He chose Menœtes from among the rest;
At him he launch'd his spear, and pierc'd his
breast:

On the hard earth the Lycian knock'd his
head,

And lay supine; and forth the spirit fled.

Then thus the hero: "Neither can I blame
The hand, or javelin; both are still the same.
The same I will employ against this foe;
And wish but with the same success to
throw."

So spoke the chief; and while he spoke he threw.

The weapon with unerring fury flew,
At his left shoulder aim'd; nor entrance found; 170

But back, as from a rock, with swift rebound

Harmless return'd: a bloody mark appear'd,
Which with false joy the flatter'd hero cheer'd.

Wound there was none; the blood that was in view,

The lance before from slain Menœtes drew.

Headlong he leaps from off his lofty car,
And in close fight on foot renews the war;
Raging with high disdain, repeats his blows;
Nor shield nor armor can their force oppose.
Huge cantlets of his buckler strew the ground, 180

And no defense in his bor'd arms is found.
But on his flesh no wound or blood is seen;
The sword itself is blunted on the skin.

This vain attempt the chief no longer bears,

But round his hollow temples and his ears
His buckler beats: the son of Neptune, stunn'd

With these repeated buffets, quits his ground;

A sickly sweat succeeds, and shades of night;

Inverted nature swims before his sight:

Th' insulting victor presses on the more, 190
And treads the steps the vanquish'd trod before,

Nor rest, nor respite gives. A stone there lay

Behind his trembling foe, and stopp'd his way:

Achilles took th' advantage which he found,
O'erturn'd, and push'd him backward on the ground.

His buckler held him under, while he press'd,

With both his knees above, his panting breast;

Unlac'd his helm: about his chin the twist
He tied, and soon the strangled soul dismiss'd.

With eager haste he went to strip the dead; 200

The vanish'd body from his arms was fled.
His sea god sire, t' immortalize his fame,
Had turn'd it to the bird that bears his name.

A truce succeeds the labors of this day,
And arms suspended with a long delay.
While Trojan walls are kept with watch and ward,

The Greeks before their trenches mount the guard.

The feast approach'd; when to the blue-ey'd maid

His vows for Cygnus slain the victor paid,
And a white heifer on her altar laid. 210

The reeking entrails on the fire they threw,
And to the gods the grateful odor flew:
Heav'n had its part in sacrifice; the rest
Was broil'd and roasted for the future feast.

The chief invited guests were set around;
And, hunger first assuag'd, the bowls were crown'd,

Which in deep draughts their cares and labors drown'd.

The mellow harp did not their ears employ,

And mute was all the warlike symphony.
Discourse, the food of souls, was their delight, 220

And pleasing chat prolong'd the summer's night:

The subject, deeds of arms, and valor shown,

Or on the Trojan side, or on their own.
Of dangers undertaken, fame achiev'd,
They talk'd by turns; the talk by turns reliev'd.

What things but these could fierce Achilles tell,

Or what could fierce Achilles hear so well?
The last great act perform'd, of Cygnus slain,

Did most the martial audience entertain:
Wond'ring to find a body free by fate 230
From steel, and which could ev'n that steel rebate,

Amaz'd, their admiration they renew;
And scarce Pelides could believe it true.

Then Nestor thus: "What once this age has known,

In fated Cygnus, and in him alone,
These eyes have seen in Cæneus long before,
Whose body not a thousand swords could bore.

Cæneus in courage and in strength excell'd,

And still his Othrys with his fame is fill'd;
But what did most his martial deeds adorn,
(Tho' since he chang'd his sex,) a woman born."

A novelty so strange and full of fate,
His list'ning audience ask'd him to relate.
Achilles thus commends their common suit:
"O father, first for prudence in repute,
Tell, with that eloquence so much thy own,
What thou hast heard, or what of Cæneus
known:

What was he, whence his change of sex
begun,

What trophies, join'd in wars with thee, he
won?

Who conquer'd him, and in what fatal
strife

The youth, without a wound, could lose his
life?"

Neleides then: "Tho' tardy age and time Have shrunk my sinews and decay'd my prime;

Tho' much I have forgotten of my store,
Yet, not exhausted, I remember more.

Of all that arms achiev'd, or peace design'd,
That action still is fresher in my mind Than aught beside. If reverend age can give

To faith a sanction, in my third I live. 259
"Twas in my second cent'ry I survey'd
Young Cænis, then a fair Thessalian maid:
Cænis the bright was born to high command;

A princess, and a native of thy land,
Divine Achilles: every tongue proclaim'd
Her beauty, and her eyes all hearts inflam'd.
Peleus, thy sire, perhaps had sought her
bed,

Among the rest; but he had either led Thy mother then, or was by promise tied;
But she to him, and all alike, her love
denied.

"It was her fortune once to take her
way 270
Along the sandy margin of the sea:
The Pow'r of Ocean view'd her as she pass'd,
And, lov'd as soon as seen, by force em-
brace'd.

So fame reports. Her virgin treasure seiz'd,
And his new joys, the ravisher so pleas'd,
That thus, transported, to the nymph he
cried:

'Ask what thou wilt, no pray'r shall be denied.'

This also fame relates: the haughty fair,
Who not the rape ev'n of a god could bear,
This answer, proud, return'd: 'To mighty
wrongs 280

A mighty recompense, of right, belongs.

Give me no more to suffer such a shame;
But change the woman for a better name;
One gift for all.' She said; and while she spoke,

A stern, majestic, manly tone she took.
A man she was; and, as the godhead swore,
To Cæneus turn'd, who Cænis was before.

"To this the lover adds, without request,
No force of steel should violate his breast.
Glad of the gift, the new-made warrior
goes; 290

And arms among the Greeks, and longs for equal foes.

"Now brave Perithous, bold Ixion's son,
The love of fair Hippodame had won.

The cloud-begotten race, half men, half beast,

Invited, came to grace the nuptial feast:
In a cool cave's recess the treat was made,
Whose entrance trees with spreading boughs
o'ershad.

They sate; and summon'd by the bridegroom came,

To mix with those, the Lapithæan name;
Nor wanted I: the roofs with joy resound,
And 'Hymen, Io Hymen,' rung around. 301

Rais'd altars shone with holy fires; the
bride,

Lovely herself, (and lovely by her side
A bevy of bright nymphs,) with sober grace, Came glitt'ring like a star, and took her
place.

Her heav'nly form beheld, all wish'd her
joy;

And little wanted but in vain their wishes all employ.

"For one, most brutal of the brutal
brood,

Or whether wine or beauty fir'd his blood,
Or both at once, beheld with lustful eyes 310

The bride; at once resolv'd to make his
prize.

Down went the board; and, fast'ning on her
hair,

He seiz'd with sudden force the frightened
fair.

'Twas Eurytus began: his bestial kind His crime pursued; and each as pleas'd his
mind,

Or her whom chance presented, took: the
feast

An image of a taken town express'd.

"The cave resounds with female shrieks;
we rise,

Mad with revenge, to make a swift reprise;

And Theseus first: 'What frenzy has possess'd,

O Eurytus,' he cried, 'thy brutal breast,
To wrong Perithous, and not him alone,
But, while I live, two friends conjoin'd in one?'

"To justify his threat, he thrusts aside
The crowd of Centaurs, and redeems the bride.

The monster naught replied; for words were vain,
And deeds could only deeds unjust maintain:

But answers with his hand, and forward press'd,
With blows redoubled, on his face and breast.

An ample goblet stood, of antic mold, 330
And rough with figures of the rising gold;
The hero snatch'd it up, and toss'd in air,
Full at the front of the foul ravisher.
He falls; and falling vomits forth a flood
Of wine, and foam, and brains, and mingled blood.

Half roaring, and half neighing thro' the hall,

'Arms, arms,' the double-form'd with fury call,

To wreak their brother's death: a medley flight

Of bowls and jars, at first, supply the fight,
Once instruments of feasts, but now of fate;

Wine animates their rage and arms their hate. 340

"Bold Amycus from the robb'd vestry brings

The chalices of heav'n, and holy things
Of precious weight: a scone, that hung on high,

With tapers fill'd, to light the sacristy,
Torn from the cord, with his unhallow'd hand

He threw amid the Lapithæan band.

On Celadon the ruin fell, and left

His face of feature and of form bereft;

So, when some brawny sacrificer knocks, 350

Before an altar led, an offer'd ox,

His eyeballs rooted out are thrown to ground:

His nose dismantled in his mouth is found,

His jaws, cheeks, front, one undistinguish'd wound.

"This, Belates, th' avenger, could not brook;

But by the foot a maple board he took,
And hurl'd at Amycus; his chin it bent
Against his chest, and down the Centaur sent;

Whom sputt'ring bloody teeth, the second blow

Of his drawn sword dispatch'd to shades below. 360

"Grineus was near; and cast a furious look

On the side altar, cens'd with sacred smoke,
And bright with flaming fires. 'The gods,' he cried,

'Have with their holy trade our hands supplied:

Why use we not their gifts?' Then from the floor

An altar stone he heav'd, with all the load it bore:

Altar and altar's freight together flew
Where thickest throng'd the Lapithæan crew;

And Broteas and, at once, Oryus slew:

Oryus' mother, Mycale, was known 370
Down from her sphere to draw the lab'ring moon.

"Exadius cried: 'Unpunish'd shall not go
This fact, if arms are found against the foe.'
He look'd about, where on a pine were spread

The votive horns of a stag's branching head:
At Grineus these he throws; so just they fly

That the sharp antlers stuck in either eye.
Breathless and blind he fell; with blood besmear'd,

His eyeballs beaten out hung dangling on his beard.

Fierce Rhætus from the hearth a burning brand 380

Selects, and whirling waves, till from his hand

The fire took flame; then dash'd it from the right,

On fair Charaxus' temples, near the sight:
The whistling pest came on and pierc'd the bone,

And caught the yellow hair, that shrivel'd while it shone;

Caught, like dry stubble fir'd, or like sear wood;

Yet from the wound ensued no purple flood;

But look'd a bubbling mass of frying blood.

His blazing locks sent forth a crackling
 sound,
 And hiss'd like red-hot iron within the smithy drown'd. ³⁹⁰
 The wounded warrior shook his flaming hair, Then (what a team of horse could hardly rear)
 He heaves the threshold stone; but could not throw:
 The weight itself forbade the threaten'd
 blow;
 Which, dropping from his lifted arms, came
 down
 Full on Cometes' head, and crush'd his crown.
 Nor Rhætus then retain'd his joy, but
 said:
 'So by their fellows may our foes be sped;'
 Then with redoubled strokes he plies his
 head:
 The burning lever not deludes his pains, ⁴⁰⁰
 But drives the batter'd skull within the brains.
 "Thus flush'd, the conqueror, with force
 renew'd,
 Evagrus, Dryas, Corythus, pursued:
 First Corythus, with downy cheeks, he slew; Whose fall when fierce Evagrus had in
 view,
 He cried: 'What palm is from a beardless
 prey?'
 Rhætus prevents what more he had to say;
 And drove within his mouth the fiery death,
 Which enter'd his hissing in, and chok'd his breath. ⁴⁰⁹
 At Dryas next he flew, but weary chance
 No longer would the same success advance;
 For, while he whirl'd in fiery circles round
 The brand, a sharpen'd stake strong Dryas found,
 And in the shoulder's joint inflicts the
 wound.
 The weapon stuck: which roaring out
 with pain
 He drew; nor longer durst the fight
 maintain,
 But turn'd his back, for fear; and fled
 amain.
 With him fled Orneus, with like dread
 possess'd;
 Thaumás, and Medon, wounded in the
 breast;
 And Mermeros, in the late race renown'd, ⁴²⁰
 Now limping ran, and tardy with his
 wound.

Pholus and Melaneus from fight withdrew,
 And Abas maim'd, who boars encount'ring
 slew;
 And augur Astylos, whose art in vain
 From fight dissuaded the four-footed
 train,
 Now beat the hoof with Nessus on the
 plain;
 But to his fellow cried: 'Be safely slow,
 Thy death deferr'd is due to great Alcides'
 bow.'
 "Meantime strong Dryas urg'd his chance so well,
 That Lycidas, Areos, Imbreus fell; ⁴³⁰
 All one by one, and fighting face to face.
 Crenæus fled, to fall with more disgrace:
 For, fearful, while he look'd behind, he
 bore,
 Betwixt his nose and front, the blow be-
 fore.
 Amid the noise and tumult of the fray,
 Snoring, and drunk with wine, Aphidas lay.
 Ev'n then the bowl within his hand he kept,
 And on a bear's rough hide securely slept.
 Him Phorbas with his flying dart transfix'd.
 'Take thy next draught with Stygian waters
 mix'd, ⁴⁴⁰
 And sleep thy fill,' th' insulting victor
 cried;
 Surpris'd with death unfelt, the Centaur
 died:
 The ruddy vomit, as he breath'd his soul,
 Repass'd his throat, and fill'd his empty
 bowl.
 "I saw Petreus' arms employ'd around A well-grown oak, to root it from the
 ground.
 This way and that he wrench'd the fibrous
 bands;
 The trunk was like a sapling in his hands,
 And still obey'd the bent: while thus he
 stood,
 Perithous' dart drove on, and nail'd him to the wood. ⁴⁵⁰
 Lyeus and Chromis fell, by him oppress'd;
 Helops and Dietys added to the rest
 A nobler palm: Helops, thro' either ear
 Transfix'd, receiv'd the penetrating spear.
 This Dietys saw; and, seiz'd with sudden
 fright,
 Leapt headlong from the hill of steepy
 height;
 And crush'd an ash beneath, that could not bear his weight.

The shatter'd tree receives his fall, and strikes,
Within his full-blown paunch, the sharpen'd spikes.

Strong Aphareus had heav'd a mighty stone, ⁴⁶⁰

The fragment of a rock, and would have thrown;

But Theseus, with a club of harden'd oak,
The cubit-bone of the bold Centaur broke,

And left him maim'd, nor seconded the stroke;

Then leapt on tall Bianor's back, (who bore
No mortal burden but his own before,)

Press'd with his knees his sides; the double man,

His speed with spurs increas'd, unwilling ran.

One hand the hero fasten'd on his locks;
His other plied him with repeated strokes:
The club rung round his ears and batter'd brows; ⁴⁷¹

He falls, and, lashing up his heels, his rider throws.

"The same Herculean arms Nedyminus wound,

And lay by him Lycotas on the ground;
And Hippasus, whose beard his breast invades;

And Ripheus, haunter of the woodland shades:

And Tereus, us'd with mountain bears to strive,

And from their dens to draw th' indignant beasts alive.

"Demoleon could not bear this hateful sight, ⁴⁷⁹

Or the long fortune of th' Athenian knight;
But pull'd with all his force, to disengage
From earth a pine, the product of an age.
The root stuck fast; the broken trunk he sent

At Theseus: Theseus frustrates his intent,
And leaps aside, by Pallas warn'd, the blow

To shun: (for so he said; and we believ'd it so.)

Yet not in vain th' enormous weight was cast;

Which Crantor's body sunder'd at the waist:
Thy father's squire, Achilles, and his care;
Whom, conquer'd in the Dolopeian war, ⁴⁹⁰
Their king, his present ruin to prevent,
A pledge of peace implor'd, to Peleus sent.

"Thy sire, with grieving eyes, beheld his fate;

And cried: 'Not long, lov'd Crantor, shalt thou wait

Thy vow'd revenge.' At once he said, and threw

His ashen spear, which quiver'd as it flew,
With all his force and all his soul applied:
The sharp point enter'd in the Centaur's side.

Both hands, to wrench it out, the monster join'd;

And wrench'd it out, but left the steel behind. ⁵⁰⁰

Stuck in his lungs it stood; inrag'd he rears
His hoofs, and down to ground thy father bears.

Thus trampled under foot, his shield defends

His head; his other hand the lance pretends.

Ev'n while he lay extended on the dust,
He sped the Centaur with one single thrust.
Two more his lance before transfix'd from far,

And two his sword had slain in closer war.
To these was added Dorylas, who spread
A bull's two goring horns around his head.
With these he push'd, in blood already dyed: ⁵¹¹

Him, fearless, I approach'd, and thus defied:
'Now, monster, now, by proof it shall appear,

Whether thy horns are sharper, or my spear.'

At this, I threw; for want of other ward,
He lift'd up his hand, his front to guard.
His hand it pass'd, and fix'd it to his brow;
Loud shouts of ours attend the lucky blow.

Him Peleus finish'd, with a second wound,
Which thro' the navel pierc'd: he reel'd around, ⁵²⁰

And dragg'd his dangling bowels on the ground;

Trod what he dragg'd, and what he trod he crush'd;

And to his mother earth with empty belly rush'd.

"Nor could thy form, O Cyllarus, fore-slow

Thy fate (if form to monsters men allow):
Just bloom'd thy beard, thy beard of golden hue;

Thy locks, in golden waves, about thy shoulders flew.

Sprightly thy look; thy shapes in ev'ry part
So clean, as might instruct the sculptor's
art,

As far as man extended: where began ⁵³⁰
The beast, the beast was equal to the man.
Add but a horse's head and neck, and he,
O Castor, was a courser worthy thee.
So was his back proportion'd for the seat;
So rose his brawny chest; so swiftly mov'd his feet.

Coal-black his color, but like jet it shone;
His legs and flowing tail were white alone.
Belov'd by many maidens of his kind,
But fair Hylonome possess'd his mind;
Hylonome, for features and for face ⁵⁴⁰
Excelling all the nymphs of double race:
Nor less her blandishments than beauty
move,

At once both loving and confessing love.
For him she dress'd; for him with female
care

She comb'd and set in curls her auburn
hair.

Of roses, violets, and lilies mix'd,
And sprigs of flowing rosemary betwixt,
She form'd the chaplet that adorn'd her front.

In waters of the Pagasean fount.
And in the streams that from the fountain play. ⁵⁵⁰

She wash'd her face, and bath'd her twice a day.

The scarf of furs that hung below her side
Was ermine, or the panther's spotted pride;
Spoils of no common beast: with equal flame
They lov'd; their sylvan pleasures were the same:

All day they hunted; and, when day expir'd,
Together to some shady cave retir'd.

Invited to the nuptials, both repair;
And, side by side, they both ingage in war.

"Uncertain from what hand, a flying dart ⁵⁶⁰

At Cyllarus was sent, which pierc'd his
heart.

The javelin drawn from out the mortal
wound,

He faints with stagg'ring steps, and seeks
the ground:

The fair within her arms receiv'd his fall,
And strove his wand'ring spirits to recall;
And, while her hand the streaming blood
oppos'd,

Join'd face to face, his lips with hers she
clos'd.

Stifed with kisses, a sweet death he dies;
She fills the fields with undistinguish'd cries:
At least her words were in her clamor
drown'd, ⁵⁷⁰

For my stunn'd ears receiv'd no vocal sound.
In madness of her grief, she seiz'd the dart,
New-drawn, and reeking from her lover's
heart;

To her bare bosom the sharp point ap-
plied,

And wounded fell; and, falling by his side,
Embrac'd him in her arms, and thus embracing died.

"Ev'n still, methinks, I see Phæocomes;
Strange was his habit, and as odd his dress.
Six lion's hides, with thongs together fast,
His upper part defended to his waist; ⁵⁸⁰
And where man ended, the continued vest, Spread on his back, the hous and trappings of a beast.

A stump too heavy for a team to draw,
(It seems a fable, tho' the fact I saw,)
He threw at Pholon; the descending blow Divides the skull, and cleaves his head in two.

The brains from nose and mouth and either
ear

Came issuing out, as thro' a colander
The curdled milk, or from the press the whey,

Driv'n down by weights above, is drain'd away. ⁵⁹⁰

"But him, while stooping down to spoil
the slain,

Pierc'd thro' the paunch, I tumbled on the
plain.

Then Chthonius and Teleboas I slew;
A fork the former arm'd, a dart his fellow
threw.

The javelin wounded me; (behold the scar.)
Then was my time to seek the Trojan war;

Then I was Hector's match in open field;
But he was then unborn, at least a child;

Now, I am nothing. I forbear to tell
By Periphtantas how Pyretus fell, ⁶⁰⁰

The Centaur by the knight; nor will I
stay

On Amphyx, or what deaths he dealt that
day;

What honor with a pointless lance he won,
Stuck in the front of a four-footed man;

What fame young Macareus obtain'd in
fight;

Or dwell on Nessus, now return'd from
flight;

How prophet Mopsus not alone divin'd,
Whose valor equal'd his foreseeing mind.

"Already Cæneus, with his conquering
hand,
Had slaughter'd five, the boldest of their
band: 610

Pyrachmus, Helymus, Antimachus,
Bromus the brave, and stronger Styphelus.
Their names I number'd, and remember
well,
No trace remaining, by what wounds they fell.

"Latreus, the bulkiest of the double race,
Whom the spoil'd arms of slain Halesus
grace,

In years retaining still his youthful might,
Tho' his black hairs were interspers'd with
white, 618

Betwixt th' imbattled ranks began to prance,
Proud of his helm and Macedonian lance,
And rode the ring around; that either host Might hear him, while he made this empty
boast:

'And from a strumpet shall we suffer
shame?

For Cænis still, not Cæneus is thy name;
And still the native softness of thy kind
Prevails, and leaves the woman in thy mind.
Remember what thou wert; what price was
paid

To change thy sex, to make thee not a maid,
And but a man in shew: go, card and spin,
And leave the business of the war to men.'

"While thus the boaster exercis'd his
pride, 631

The fatal spear of Cæneus reach'd his side;
Just in the mixture of the kinds it ran,
Betwixt the nether beast and upper man.

The monster, mad with rage, and stung with
smart,

His lance directed at the hero's heart:

It strook, but bounded from his harden'd
breast,

Like hail from tiles, which the safe house
invest;

Nor seem'd the stroke with more effect to
come,

Than a small pebble falling on a drum. 640

He next his fauchion tried, in closer fight;
But the keen fauchion had no pow'r to bite.
He thrust; the blunted point return'd again.

'Since downright blows,' he cried, 'and thrusts are vain,

I'll prove his side.' In strong embraces
held,

He prov'd his side; his side the sword re-
pell'd:

His hollow belly echo'd to the stroke;
Untouch'd his body, as a solid rock;
Aim'd at his neck at last, the blade in shivers broke. }

"Th' impassive knight stood idle, to deride 650

His rage, and offer'd oft his naked side:
At length: 'Now, monster, in thy turn,'
he cried,

'Try thou the strength of Cæneus.' At the word

He thrust, and in his shoulder plung'd the
sword;

Then writh'd his hand; and, as he drove it
down,

Deep in his breast, made many wounds in
one.

"The Centaurs saw, inrag'd, th' unhop'd
success;

And, rushing on, in crowds, together press;
At him, and him alone, their darts they
threw:

Repuls'd they from his fated body flew. 660

Amaz'd they stood; till Monychus began:
'O shame, a nation conquer'd by a man!

A woman-man; yet more a man is he Than all our race; and what he was, are we.
Now, what avail our nerves, the united
force

Of two the strongest creatures, man and
horse?

Nor goddess-born, nor of Ixion's seed

We seem; (a lover built for Juno's bed;)

Master'd by this half man. Whole mountains throw 669

With woods at once, and bury him below.

This only way remains. Nor need we doubt
To choke the soul within, tho' not to force it out.

Heap weights, instead of wounds.' He chanc'd to see

Where southern storms had rooted up a
tree;

This, rais'd from earth, against the foe he
threw;

Th' example shewn, his fellow brutes pursue.

With forest loads the warrior they invade;

Othrys and Pelion soon were void of
shade,

And spreading groves were naked mountains made. }

Press'd with the burden, Cæneus pants for
breath, 680
And on his shoulders bears the wooden
death.

To heave th' intolerable weight he tries;
At length it rose above his mouth and eyes.
Yet still he heaves; and, struggling with
despair,

Shakes all aside, and gains a gulp of air;
A short relief, which but prolongs his pain;
He faints by fits, and then resumes again:
At last, the burden only nods above,
As when an earthquake stirs th' Idæan
grove. 689

Doubtful his death; he suffocated seem'd
To most; but otherwise our Mopsus deem'd,
Who said he saw a yellow bird arise
From out the pile, and cleave the liquid
skies:

I saw it too, with golden feathers bright,
Nor e'er before beheld so strange a sight.
Whom Mopsus viewing, as it soar'd around Our troop, and heard the pinions' rattling
sound,

'All hail,' he cried, 'thy country's grace and love;
Once first of men below, now first of birds
above.'

Its author to the story gave belief; 700
For us, our courage was increas'd by grief:
Asham'd to see a single man, pursued
With odds, to sink beneath a multitude,
We push'd the foe and forc'd to shameful
flight;

Part fell, and part escap'd by favor of the
night."

This tale, by Nestor told, did much dis-
please

Tlepolemus, the seed of Hercules,
For often he had heard his father say
That he himself was present at the fray,
And more than shar'd the glories of the
day. 710

"Old Chroniele," he said, "among the
rest,

You might have nam'd Alcides at the least:
Is he not worth your praise?" The Pylian
prince

Sigh'd ere he spoke; then made this proud
defense:

"My former woes, in long oblivion drown'd,
I would have lost; but you renew the
wound:

Better to pass him o'er, than to relate
The cause I have your mighty sire to hate.

His fame has fill'd the world, and reach'd
the sky
(Which, O, I wish with truth I could deny!) 720

We praise not Hector; tho' his name, we
know,
Is great in arms: 'tis hard to praise a
foe.

"He, your great father, level'd to the
ground
Messenia's tow'rs: nor better fortune found
Elis and Pylus; that, a neighb'ring state,
And this, my own, both guiltless of their
fate.

"To pass the rest, twelve, wanting one,
he slew,
My brethren, who their birth from Neleus
drew.

All youths of early promise, had they liv'd;
By him they perish'd: I alone surviv'd. 730
The rest were easy conquest, but the fate
Of Periclymenos is wondrous to relate.
To him our common grandsire of the main
Had giv'n to change his form, and chang'd, resume again.

Varied at pleasure, every shape he tried,
And in all beasts Alcides still defied; Vanquish'd on earth, at length he soar'd
above,

Chang'd to the bird that bears the bolt of Jove.

The new dissembled eagle, now endued 739
With beak and pounces, Hercules pursued,
And cuff'd his manly cheeks, and tore his
face;

Then safe retir'd, and tow'r'd in empty
space.

Alcides bore not long his flying foe;
But, bending his inevitable bow,
Reach'd him in air, suspended as he stood,
And in his pinion fix'd the feather'd wood.
Light was the wound; but in the sinew
hung

The point, and his disabled wing unstrung.
He wheel'd in air, and stretch'd his vans in
vain; 749

His vans no longer could his flight sustain:
For, while one gather'd wind, one unsup-
plied

Hung drooping down, nor pois'd his other
side.

He fell: the shaft that slightly was im-
press'd,

Now from his heavy fall with weight increas'd,

Drove thro' his neck, aslant; he spurns the ground,
And the soul issues thro' the weazon's wound.

"Now, brave commander of the Rhodian seas,

What praise is due from me to Hercules?
Silence is all the vengeance I decree
For my slain brothers; but 't is peace with thee."

Thus with a flowing tongue old Nestor spoke;

Then, to full bowls each other they provoke:
At length, with weariness and wine oppress'd,

They rise from table, and withdraw to rest.

The sire of Cygnus, monarch of the main,

Meantime laments his son in battle slain,
And vows the victor's death, nor vows in vain.

For nine long years the smother'd pain he bore;

(Achilles was not ripe for fate before;)

Then, when he saw the promis'd hour was near,

He thus bespoke the god that guides the year:

"Immortal offspring of my brother Jove;
My brightest nephew, and whom best I love,
Whose hands were join'd with mine, to raise the wall

Of tott'ring Troy, now nodding to her fall;
Dost thou not mourn our pow'r employ'd in vain,

And the defenders of our city slain?

To pass the rest, could noble Hector lie
Unpitied, dragg'd around his native Troy?

And yet the murd'rer lives, himself by far

A greater plague than all the wasteful war:
He lives; the proud Pelides lives, to boast

Our town destroy'd, our common labor lost!
O, could I meet him! But I wish too late;

To prove my trident is not in his fate.
But let him try (for that's allow'd) thy

dart,
And pierce his only penetrable part."

Apollo bows to the superior throne,
And to his uncle's anger adds his own.

Then, in a cloud involv'd, he takes his flight,
Where Greeks and Trojans mix'd in mortal fight,

And found out Paris, lurking where he stood,

And stain'd his arrows with plebeian blood.
Phœbus to him alone the god confess'd,
Then to the recreant knight he thus address'd:

"Dost thou not blush to spend thy shafts in vain

On a degenerate and ignoble train?
If fame or better vengeance be thy care,
There aim, and with one arrow end the war."

He said; and shew'd from far the blazing shield

And sword, which but Achilles none could wield;

And how he mov'd a god, and mow'd the standing field.

The deity himself directs aright
Th' invenom'd shaft, and wings the fatal flight.

Thus fell the foremost of the Grecian name;

And he, the base adult'rer, boasts the fame:

A spectacle to glad the Trojan train,
And please old Priam, after Hector slain.

If by a female hand he had foreseen

He was to die, his wish had rather been

The lance and double ax of the fair warrior queen.

And now, the terror of the Trojan field,
The Grecian honor, ornament, and shield,
High on a pile th' unconquer'd chief is plac'd;
The god that arm'd him first consum'd at last.

Of all the mighty man, the small remains
A little urn, and scarcely fill'd, contains.

Yet, great in Homer, still Achilles lives;
And, equal to himself, himself survives.

His buckler owns its former lord, and brings

New cause of strife betwixt contending kings;

Who worthiest, after him, his sword to wield,
Or wear his armor, or sustain his shield.

Ev'n Diomedé sate mute, with downcast eyes,

Conscious of wanted worth to win the prize;
Nor Menelas presum'd these arms to claim,

Nor he, the King of Men, a greater name.
Two rivals only rose: Laertes' son,

And the vast bulk of Ajax Telamon.
The king, who cherish'd each with equal

love,

And from himself all envy would remove,
Left both to be determin'd by the laws,

And to the Grecian chiefs transferr'd the cause.

THE SPEECHES OF AJAX AND ULYSSES

FROM OVID'S METAMORPHOSES, BOOK XIII

THE chiefs were set, the soldiers crown'd
the field:

To these the master of the sevenfold shield
Upstart'd fierce; and, kindled with disdain,
Eager to speak, unable to contain
His boiling rage, he roll'd his eyes around
The shore, and Grecian galleys haul'd aground;

Then, stretching out his hands: "O Jove,"
he cried,

"Must then our cause before the fleet be
tried?

And dares Ulysses for the prize contend,
In sight of what he durst not once defend?
But basely fled, that memorable day,
When I from Hector's hands redeem'd the flaming prey.

So much 't is safer at the noisy bar
With words to flourish, than ingage in war.
By different methods we maintain our right,
Nor am I made to talk, nor he to fight.
In bloody fields I labor to be great;
His arms are a smooth tongue, and soft deceit:

Nor need I speak my deeds, for those you
see;

The sun and day are witnesses for me. 20
Let him who fights unseen relate his own,
And vouch the silent stars and conscious
moon.

Great is the prize demanded, I confess,
But such an abject rival makes it less.
That gift, those honors, he but hop'd to gain,
Can leave no room for Ajax to be vain:
Losing he wins, because his name will be Ennobled by defeat, who durst contend with
me.

Were my known valor question'd, yet my
blood

Without that plea would make my title
good. 30

My sire was Telamon, whose arms, employ'd
With Hercules, these Trojan walls de-
stroy'd;

And who before, with Jason, sent from Greece,

In the first ship brought home the Golden Fleece:

Great Telamon from Æacus derives
His birth (th' inquisitor of guilty lives

In shades below, where Sisyphus, whose son
This thief is thought, rolls up the restless heavy stone):

Just Æacus the King of Gods above
Begot: thus Ajax is the third from Jove. 40
Nor should I seek advantage from my line,
Unless, Achilles, it were mix'd with thine:
As next of kin Achilles' arms I claim;
This fellow would ingraft a foreign name
Upon our stock, and the Sisyphian seed
By fraud and theft asserts his father's breed.

Then must I lose these arms, because I
came

To fight uncall'd, a voluntary name, Nor shunn'd the cause, but offer'd you my
aid,

While he long lurking was to war be-
tray'd? 50

Forc'd to the field he came, but in the rear,
And feign'd distraction to conceal his fear:
Till one more cunning caught him in the
snare

(Ill for himself) and dragg'd him into war.
Now let a hero's arms a coward vest,
And he, who shunn'd all honors, gain the
best;

And let me stand excluded from my right, Robb'd of my kinsman's arms, who first appear'd in fight.

Better for us, at home had he remain'd,
Had it been true, the madness which he feign'd, 60

Or so believ'd; the less had been our shame,
The less his counsel'd crime which brands
the Grecian name;

Nor Philoctetes had been left inclos'd
In a bare isle, to wants and pains expos'd,
Where to the rocks, with solitary groans,
His suff'rings and our baseness he bemoans;
And wishes (so may Heav'n his wish fulfil!)
The due reward to him who caus'd his ill.
Now he, with us to Troy's destruction
sworn,

Our brother of the war, by whom are
borne 70

Alcides' arrows, pent in narrow bounds,
With cold and hunger pinch'd, and pain'd with wounds,

To find him food and clothing, must employ Against the birds the shafts due to the fate of Troy.

Yet still he lives, and lives from treason
free,

Because he left Ulysses' company:

Poor Palamede might wish, so void of aid, Rather to have been left, than so to death
betray'd.

The coward bore the man immortal spite,
Who sham'd him out of madness into
fight; 80

Nor daring otherwise to vent his hate,
Accus'd him first of treason to the state;
And then, for proof, produc'd the golden
store

Himself had hidden in his tent before:
Thus of two champions he depriv'd our
host,

By exile one, and one by treason lost.
Thus fights Ulysses, thus his fame extends,
A formidable man, but to his friends:
Great, for what greatness is in words and
sound;

Ev'n faithful Nestor less in both is found. 90
But, that he might without a rival reign,
He left this faithful Nestor on the plain;
Forsook his friend ev'n at his utmost need,
Who, tir'd and tardy, with his wounded
steed,

Cried out for aid, and call'd him by his
name;

But cowardice has neither ears nor shame.
Thus fled the good old man, bereft of aid,
And, for as much as lay in him, betray'd.
That this is not a fable forg'd by me,
Like one of his, an Ulyssean lie, 100

I vouch ev'n Diomedes, who, tho' his friend, Cannot that act excuse, much less defend:
He call'd him back aloud, and tax'd his
fear;

And sure enough he heard, but durst not
hear.

"The gods with equal eyes on mortals
look;

He justly was forsaken, who forsook;
Wanted that succor he refus'd to lend,
Found ev'ry fellow such another friend:
No wonder, if he roar'd that all might
hear;

His elocution was increas'd by fear. 110
I heard, I ran, I found him out of breath, Pale, trembling, and half dead with fear of
death.

Tho' he had judg'd himself by his own laws,
And stood condemn'd, I help'd the common cause;

With my broad buckler hid him from the
foe —

Ev'n the shield trembled as he lay below —

And from impending fate the coward
freed:

Good Heav'n forgive me for so bad a deed !
If still he will persist, and urge the strife,
First let him give me back his forfeit
life: 120

Let him return to that opprobrious field;
Again creep under my protecting shield:
Let him lie wounded, let the foe be near,
And let his quiv'ring heart confess his
fear;

There put him in the very jaws of fate,
And let him plead his cause in that estate.
And yet, when snatch'd from death, when from below

My lifted shield I loos'd and let him go, Good heav'n's, how light he rose, with what
a bound

He sprung from earth, forgetful of his
wound ! 130

How fresh, how eager then his feet to ply;
Who had not strength to stand, had speed
to fly !

"Hector came on, and brought the gods
along;

Fear seiz'd alike the feeble and the strong:
Each Greek was an Ulysses; such a dread
Th' approach, and ev'n the sound of Hector
bred;

Him, flesh'd with slaughter, and with conquest crown'd,

I met, and overturn'd him to the ground.
When after, matchless as he deem'd in
might,

He challeng'd all our host to single fight, 140
All eyes were fix'd on me; the lots were
thrown,

But for your champion I was wish'd alone:
Your vows were heard, we fought, and neither yield;

Yet I return'd unvanquish'd from the field.
With Jove to friend th' insulting Trojan
came,

And menac'd us with force, our fleet with
flame:

Was it the strength of this tongue-valiant
lord,

In that black hour, that sav'd you from the
sword ?

Or was my breast expos'd alone, to brave
A thousand swords, a thousand ships to save — 150

The hopes of your return ? And can you
yield,

For a sav'd fleet, less than a single shield ?

Think it no boast, O Grecians, if I deem These arms want Ajax, more than Ajax them;

Or I with them an equal honor share,
They honor'd to be worn, and I to wear.
Will he compare my courage with his slight?
As well he may compare the day with night.
Night is indeed the province of his reign;
Yet all his dark exploits no more contain
Than a spy taken, and a sleeper slain; ¹⁶¹
A priest made pris'ner, Pallas made a
prey;

But none of all these actions done by day;
Nor aught of these was done, and Diomed away.

If on such petty merits you confer
So vast a prize, let each his portion share;
Make a just dividend: and, if not all,
The greater part to Diomed will fall.
But why for Ithacus such arms as those,
Who naked and by night invades his foes?
The glitt'ring helm by moonlight will proclaim ¹⁷¹

The latent robber, and prevent his game;
Nor could he hold his tott'ring head upright

Beneath that motion, or sustain the weight;
Nor that right arm could toss the beamy lance,

Much less the left that ampler shield advance,

Pond'rous with precious weight, and rough with cost

Of the round world in rising gold emboss'd.
That orb would ill become his hand to wield,
And look as for the gold he stole the shield;
Which should your error on the wretch bestow, ¹⁸¹

It would not frighten, but allure the foe.
Why asks he what avails him not in fight,
And would but cumber and retard his flight,
In which his only excellence is plac'd?
You give him death, that intercept his haste.
Add, that his own is yet a maiden shield,
Nor the least dint has suffer'd in the field,
Guiltless of fight; mine, batter'd, hew'd,
and bor'd,

Worn out of service, must forsake his lord.
What farther need of words our right to scan? ¹⁹¹

My arguments are deeds, let action speak the man.

Since from a champion's arms the strife arose,

So cast the glorious prize amid the foes;

Then send us to redeem both arms and shield,

And let him wear who wins 'em in the field."

He said; a murmur from the multitude,
Or somewhat like a stifled shout ensued!
Till from his seat arose Laertes' son, Look'd down a while, and paus'd ere he began; ²⁰⁰

Then to th' expecting audience rais'd his look,

And not without prepar'd attention spoke:
Soft was his tone, and sober was his face;
Action his words, and words his action grace:

"If Heav'n, my lords, had heard our common pray'r,

These arms had caus'd no quarrel for an heir;

Still great Achilles had his own possess'd,
And we with great Achilles had been blest.

But since hard fate, and Heav'n's severe decree ²⁰⁹

Have ravish'd him away from you and me,
(At this he sigh'd, and wip'd his eyes, and drew,

Or seem'd to draw, some drops of kindly dew,)

Who better can succeed Achilles lost,
Than he who gave Achilles to your host?

This only I request, that neither he May gain, by being what he seems to be,
A stupid thing, nor I may lose the prize,
By having sense, which Heav'n to him denies;
Since, great or small, the talent I enjoy'd
Was ever in the common cause employ'd.

Nor let my wit, and wonted eloquence, ²²¹
Which often has been us'd in your defense
And in my own, this only time be brought To bear against myself, and deem'd a fault.
Make not a crime, where nature made it none;

For ev'ry man may freely use his own.
The deeds of long descended ancestors
Are but by grace of imputation ours,
Theirs in effect; but, since he draws his line
From Jove, and seems to plead a right divine, ²³⁰

From Jove, like him, I claim my pedigree,
And am descended in the same degree:

My sire Laertes was Arcesius' heir,
Arcesius was the son of Jupiter;
No parricide, no banish'd man, is known
In all my line; let him excuse his own.
Hermes ennobles too my mother's side —
By both my parents to the gods allied;

But not because that on the female part
My blood is better, dare I claim desert, ²⁴⁰
Or that my sire from parricide is free;
But judge by merit betwixt him and me.
The prize be to the best; provided yet,
That Ajax for a while his kin forget,
And his great sire, and greater uncle's name,
To fortify by them his feeble claim:
Be kindred and relation laid aside,
And honor's cause by laws of honor tried;
For, if he plead proximity of blood,
That empty title is with ease withstood. ²⁵⁰
Peleus, the hero's sire, more nigh than he,
And Pyrrhus his undoubted progeny,
Inherit first these trophies of the field:
To Seyros, or to Phthia, send the shield:
And Teucer has an uncle's right; yet he Waives his pretensions, nor contends with
me.

"Then, since the cause on pure desert is
plac'd,
Whence shall I take my rise, what reckon
last?

I not presume on ev'ry act to dwell,
But take these few, in order as they fell.

"Thetis, who knew the fates, applied her care ²⁶¹

To keep Achilles in disguise from war;
And till the threat'ning influence were past,
A woman's habit on the hero cast:
All eyes were cozen'd by the borrow'd vest,
And Ajax (never wiser than the rest)
Found no Pelides there. At length I came With proffer'd wares to this pretended
dame;

She, not discover'd by her mien or voice, ²⁶⁹
Betray'd her manhood by her manly choice;
And, while on female toys her fellows
look,

Grasp'd in her warlike hand, a javelin
shook;

Whom, by this act reveal'd, I thus be-
spoke:

'O goddess-born! resist not Heav'n's decree,
The fall of Ilium is reserv'd for thee;
Then seiz'd him, and, produc'd in open light,
Sent blushing to the field the fatal knight.
Mine then are all his actions of the war;
Great Telephus was conquer'd by my spear,
And after cur'd: to me the Thebans owe Lesbos and Tenedos their overthrow, ²⁸¹
Seyros and Cilla: not on all to dwell,
By me Lynesus and strong Chrysa fell;
And, since I sent the man who He' r slew,
To me the noble Hector's death due:

Those arms I put into his living hand,
Those arms, Pelides dead, I now demand.

"When Greece was injur'd in the Spartan
prince,
And met at Aulis to revenge th' offense,
'T was a dead calm, or adverse blasts, that reign'd, ²⁹⁰
And in the port the windbound fleet de-
tain'd:

Bad signs were seen, and oracles severe
Were daily thunder'd in our general's ear,
That by his daughter's blood we must appease

Diana's kindled wrath, and free the seas.
Affection, int'rest, fame, his heart assail'd;
But soon the father o'er the king prevail'd:
Bold, on himself he took the pious crime,
As angry with the gods as they with him.
No subject could sustain their sov'reign's look, ³⁰⁰

Till this hard enterprise I undertook:
I only durst th' imperial pow'r control,
And undermin'd the parent in his soul;
Forc'd him t' exert the king for common
good,

And pay our ransom with his daughter's
blood.

Never was cause more difficult to plead,
Than where the judge against himself de-
creed:

Yet this I won by dint of argument;
The wrongs his injur'd brother underwent, }
And his own office, sham'd him to consent. }

"'T was harder yet to move the mother's mind, ³¹¹

And to this heavy task was I design'd.
Reasons against her love I knew were vain;
I circumvented whom I could not gain:
Had Ajax been employ'd, our slacken'd sails
Had still at Aulis waited happy gales.

"Arriv'd at Troy, your choice was fix'd on me,

A fearless envoy, fit for a bold embassy.
Secure, I enter'd thro' the hostile court, Glitt'ring with steel, and crowded with resort: ³²⁰

There, in the midst of arms, I plead our
cause,

Urge the foul rape, and violated laws;
Accuse the foes, as authors of the strife,
Reproach the ravisher, demand the wife.
Priam, Antenor, and the wiser few,
I mov'd; but Paris and his lawless crew Scarce held their hands, and lifted swords;
but stood

In act to quench their impious thirst of blood.
This Menelaus knows, expos'd to share
With me the rough prelude of the war.

"Endless it were to tell what I have
done,

In arms, or council, since the siege begun:
The first encounters pass'd, the foe repell'd,
They skulk'd within the town, we kept the
field.

War seem'd asleep for nine long years; at length,

Both sides resolv'd to push, we tried our strength.

Now what did Ajax while our arms took
breath,

Vers'd only in the gross mechanic trade of
death?

If you require my deeds, with ambush'd
arms

I trapp'd the foe, or tir'd with false alarms;
Secur'd the ships, drew lines along the plain,
The fainting cheer'd, chastis'd the rebel
train,

Provided forage, our spent arms renew'd;
Employ'd at home, or sent abroad, the common cause pursued.

"The king, deluded in a dream by Jove, Despair'd to take the town, and order'd to remove.

What subject durst arraign the pow'r supreme,

Producing Jove to justify his dream?
Ajax might wish the soldiers to retain From shameful flight, but wishes were in
vain:

As wanting of effect had been his words,
Such as of course his thund'ring tongue affords.

But did this boaster threaten, did he pray,
Or by his own example urge their stay?
None, none of these, but ran himself
away.

I saw him run, and was asham'd to see—
Who plied his feet so fast to get aboard as he?

Then speeding thro' the place, I made a
stand,
And loudly cried: "O base degenerate
band,

To leave a town already in your hand!
After so long expense of blood, for fame.
To bring home nothing but perpetual
shame!"

These words, or what I have forgotten since.
(For grief inspir'd me then with eloquence.)

Reduc'd their minds; they leave the crowded
port,

And to their late forsaken camp resort:
Dismay'd the council met; this man was
there,

But mute, and not recover'd of his fear:
Thersites tax'd the king, and loudly rail'd,
But his wide opening mouth with blows
I seal'd.

Then, rising, I excite their souls to fame,
And kindle sleeping virtue into flame.
From thence, whatever he perform'd in fight
Is justly mine, who drew him back from
flight.

"Which of the Grecian chiefs consorts with thee?

But Diomede desires my company,
And still communicates his praise with me.
As guided by a god, secure he goes,
Arm'd with my fellowship, amid the foes;
And sure no little merit I may boast, Whom such a man selects from such an host.

Unforc'd by lots, I went without affright,
To dare with him the dangers of the night;
On the same errand sent, we met the spy
Of Hector, double-tongued, and us'd to
lie:

Him I dispatch'd, but not till, undermin'd,
I drew him first to tell what treacherous Troy design'd.

My task perform'd, with praise I had re-
tir'd,
But not content with this, to greater praise
aspir'd;

Invad'd Rhœsus and his Thracian crew,
And him, and his, in their own strength, I
slew;

Return'd a victor, all my vows complete,
With the king's chariot, in his royal seat.
Refuse me now his arms, whose fiery steeds
Were promis'd to the spy for his nocturnal
deeds,

And let dull Ajax bear away my right,
When all his days outbalance this one night.

"Nor fought I darkling still; the sun beheld

With slaughter'd Lycians when I strew'd
the field.

You saw, and counted as I pass'd along,
Alastor, Chromius, Ceranos the strong,
Aleander, Prytanis, and Halius,
Noemon, Charopes, and Ennomus, Choön, Chersidamas; and five beside,
Men of obscure descent, but courage tried:

All these this hand laid breathless on the ground;

Nor want I proofs of many a manly wound,
All honest, all before: believe not me;
Words may deceive, but credit what you see."

At this he bar'd his breast and show'd his scars,

As of a furrow'd field, well plow'd with wars;

"Nor is this part unexercis'd," said he;
"That giant bulk of his from wounds is free:

Safe in his shield he fears no foe to try,
And better manages his blood than I.
But this avails me not; our boaster strove
Not with our foes alone, but partial Jove,
To save the fleet: this I confess is true,
(Nor will I take from any man his due,)
But thus assuming all, he robs from you. 420
Some part of honor to your share will fall;
He did the best indeed, but did not all.

Patroclus in Achilles' arms, and thought
The chief he seem'd, with equal ardor fought;

Preserv'd the fleet, repell'd the raging fire,
And forc'd the fearful Trojans to retire.

"But Ajax boasts that he was only thought

A match for Hector, who the combat sought:
Sure he forgets the king, the chiefs, and me;
All were as eager for the fight as he; 430
He but the ninth, and, not by public voice
Or ours preferr'd, was only fortune's choice.
They fought, nor can our hero boast the event,

For Hector from the field unwounded went.

"Why am I forc'd to name that fatal day
That snatch'd the prop and pride of Greece away?

I saw Pelides sink, with pious grief,
And ran in vain, alas! to his relief;
For the brave soul was fled: full of my friend,

I rush'd amid the war, his relics to defend;
Nor ceas'd my toil till I redeem'd the prey,
And, loaded with Achilles, march'd away:
Those arms, which on these shoulders then I bore,

'Tis just you to these shoulders should restore.

You see I want not nerves, who could sustain
The pond'rous ruins of so great a man;
Or, if in others equal force you find,
None is endued with a more grateful mind.

"Did Thetis then, ambitious in her care,
These arms thus labor'd for her son pre-
pare,

That Ajax after him the heav'nly gift should wear!

For that dull soul to stare, with stupid eyes,
On the learn'd unintelligible prize!

What are to him the sculptures of the shield,
Heav'n's planets, earth, and ocean's wat'ry field?

The Pleiads, Hyads; less and greater Bear,
Undipp'd in seas; Orion's angry star;
Two diff'ring cities, grav'd on either hand?
Would he wear arms he cannot understand?

"Beside, what wise objections he prepares

Against my late accession to the wars?
Does not the fool perceive his argument
Is with more force against Achilles bent?
For, if dissembling be so great a crime,
The fault is common, and the same in him;
And if he taxes both of long delay,
My guilt is less, who sooner came away.
His pious mother, anxious for his life,
Detain'd her son; and me, my pious wife.

To them the blossoms of our youth were due,

Our riper manhood we reserv'd for you. 470
But grant me guilty, 't is not much my care,
When with so great a man my guilt I share:
My wit to war the matchless hero brought,
But by this fool I never had been caught.

"Nor need I wonder that on me he threw
Such foul aspersions, when he spares not you.

If Palamede unjustly fell by me,
Your honor suffer'd in th' unjust decree: 479
I but accus'd, you doom'd; and yet he died,
Convinc'd of treason, and was fairly tried.
You heard not he was false; your eyes be-
held

The traitor manifest, the bribe reveal'd.

"That Philoctetes is on Lemnos left,
Wounded, forlorn, of human aid bereft,
Is not my crime, or not my crime alone;
Defend your justice, for the fact's your own:

'Tis true, th' advice was mine; that staying there

He might his weary limbs with rest repair,

From a long voyage free, and from a longer war.

He took the counsel, and he lives at least;
Th' event declares I counsel'd for the best:

Tho' faith is all, in ministers of state;
 For who can promise to be fortunate?
 Now since his arrows are the fate of Troy,
 Do not my wit, or weak address, employ;
 Send Ajax there, with his persuasive sense,
 To mollify the man and draw him thence:
 But Xanthus shall run backward, Ida stand
 A leafless mountain, and the Grecian band Shall fight for Troy, if, when my counsels fail,

501

The wit of heavy Ajax can prevail.

"Hard Philoctetes, exercise thy spleen Against thy fellows, and the King of Men;
 Curse my devoted head, above the rest,
 And wish in arms to meet me breast to
 breast:

Yet I the dang'rous task will undertake,
 And either die myself, or bring thee back.

"Nor doubt the same success, as when
 before

The Phrygian prophet to these tents I bore, Surpris'd by night, and forc'd him to declare

511

In what was plac'd the fortune of the war;
 Heav'n's dark decrees and answers to dis-
 play,

And how to take the town, and where the secret lay:

Yet this I compass'd, and from Troy con-
 vey'd

The fatal image of their guardian maid — That work was mine; for Pallas, tho' our
 friend,

Yet while she was in Troy, did Troy defend.
 Now what has Ajax done, or what design'd,
 A noisy nothing, and an empty wind?

520

If he be what he promises in show,
 Why was I sent, and why fear'd he to go?
 Our boasting champion thought the task not light

To pass the guards, commit himself to
 night;

Not only thro' a hostile town to pass,
 But scale, with steep ascent, the sacred place;
 With wand'ring steps to search the citadel,
 And from the priests their patroness to steal:

Then thro' surrounding foes to force my
 way,

529

And bear in triumph home the heav'nly prey;
 Which had I not, Ajax in vain had held,
 Before that monstrous bulk, his sev'nfold
 shield.

That night to conquer Troy I might be said,
 When Troy was liable to conquest made.

"Why point'st thou to my partner of the
 war?

Tydides had indeed a worthy share

In all my toil and praise; but when thy might

Our ships protected, didst thou singly fight?
 All join'd, and thou of many wert but one;
 I ask'd no friend, nor had, but him alone; 540
 Who, had he not been well assur'd that art
 And conduct were of war the better part,
 And more avail'd than strength, my valiant
 friend

Had urg'd a better right than Ajax can pretend:

As good at least Eurypylus may claim,
 And the more moderate Ajax of the name;
 The Cretan king, and his brave charioteer,
 And Menelaus bold with sword and spear —
 All these had been my rivals in the shield,
 And yet all these to my pretensions yield.

550

Thy boist'rous hands are then of use, when I
 With this directing head those hands apply.
 Brawn without brain is thine; my prudent
 care

Foresees, provides, administers the war.

Thy province is to fight; but when shall be
 The time to fight, the king consults with
 me.

No drum of judgment with thy force is
 join'd;

Thy body is of profit, and my mind.

By how much more the ship her safety owes
 To him who steers, than him that only rows;

560

By how much more the captain merits
 praise

Than he who fights, and fighting but obeys;
 By so much greater is my worth than thine,
 Who canst but execute what I design.

What gain'st thou, brutal man, if I confess Thy strength superior, when thy wit is less?

Mind is the man: I claim my whole desert
 From the mind's vigor, and th' immortal
 part.

"But you, O Grecian chiefs, reward my
 care,

Be grateful to your watchman of the war.
 For all my labors in so long a space, 571
 Sure I may plead a title to your grace:
 Enter the town; I then unbarr'd the gates,
 When I remov'd their tutelary fates.

By all our common hopes, if hopes they be
 Which I have now reduc'd to certainty;

By falling Troy, by yonder tott'ring tow'rs,
And by their taken gods, which now are ours;

Or if there yet a farther task remains, 579
To be perform'd by prudence or by pains;
If yet some desperate action rests behind,
That asks high conduct and a dauntless
mind;

If aught be wanting to the Trojan doom,
Which none but I can manage and o'er-
come;

Award those arms I ask, by your decree;
Or give to this what you refuse to me."

He ceas'd; and, ceasing, with respect he
bow'd,

And with his hand at once the fatal statue
show'd.

Heav'n, air, and ocean rung with loud applause,

And by the general vote he gain'd his
cause. 590

Thus conduct won the prize, when courage
fail'd,

And eloquence o'er brutal force prevail'd.

THE DEATH OF AJAX

He who could often, and alone, withstand
The foe, the fire, and Jove's own partial
hand,

Now cannot his unmaster'd grief sustain,
But yields to rage, to madness, and dis-
dain;

Then, snatching out his fauchion: "Thou,"
said he,

"Art mine; Ulysses lays no claim to thee.
O often tried and ever trusty sword,

Now do thy last kind office to thy lord: 600

'Tis Ajax who requests thy aid, to show
None but himself himself could overthrow."

He said, and with so good a will to die
Did to his breast the fatal point apply:

It found his heart, a way till then un-
known,

Where never weapon enter'd but his own;
No hands could force it thence, so fix'd it
stood,

Till out it rush'd, expell'd by streams of spouting blood.

The fruitful blood produc'd a flow'r, which grew

On a green stem, and of a purple hue: 610
Like his, whom unaware Apollo slew.

Inscrib'd in both, the letters are the same,
But those express the grief, and these the
name.

THE WIFE OF BATH, HER TALE

[FROM CHAUCER]

IN days of old, when Arthur fill'd the
throne,

Whose acts and fame to foreign lands were
blown,

The king of elfs and little fairy queen
Gambol'd on heaths, and danc'd on ev'ry
green;

And where the jolly troop had led the
round,

The grass unbidden rose, and mark'd the
ground:

Nor darkling did they dance; the silver
light

Of Phœbe serv'd to guide their steps
aright,

And, with their tripping pleas'd, pro-long'd the night.

Her beams they follow'd, where at full
she play'd, 10

Nor longer than she shed her horns they
stay'd,

From thence with airy flight to foreign lands convey'd.

Above the rest our Britain held they dear;
More solemnly they kept their sabbaths
here,

And made more spacious rings, and revel'd half the year.

I speak of ancient times, for now the swain

Returning late may pass the woods in
vain,

And never hope to see the nightly train;
In vain the dairy now with mints is
dress'd,

The dairymaid expects no fairy guest, 20
To skim the bowls, and after pay the feast.

She sighs, and shakes her empty shoes in
vain,

No silver penny to reward her pain:
For priests with pray'rs, and other godly gear,

Have made the merry goblins disappear;
And where they play'd their merry pranks
before,

Have sprinkled holy water on the floor;
And friars that thro' the wealthy regions
run,

Thick as the motes that twinkle in the sun, Resort to farmers rich, and bless their
halls, 30

And exorcise the beds, and cross the walls:
This makes the fairy choirs forsake the
place,

When once 't is hallow'd with the rites of
grace.

But in the walks where wicked elves have
been,

The learning of the parish now is seen,
The midnight parson, posting o'er the
green,

With gown tuck'd up, to wakes, for Sunday next

With humming ale encouraging his text;
Nor wants the holy leer to country girl betwixt.

From fiends and imps he sets the village
free,

There haunts not any incubus but he.

The maids and women need no danger fear
To walk by night, and sanctity so near:

For by some haycock, or some shady thorn,
He bids his beads both evensong and morn.

It so befell in this King Arthur's reign,
A lusty knight was pricking o'er the plain;
A bachelor he was, and of the courtly
train.

It happen'd, as he rode, a damsel gay
In russet robes to market took her way; 50
Soon on the girl he cast an amorous eye,
So straight she walk'd, and on her pasterns
high:

If seeing her behind he lik'd her pace,
Now turning short, he better lik'd her face.
He lights in haste, and, full of youthful
fire,

By force accomplish'd his obscene desire:
This done, away he rode, not unespied,
For swarming at his back the country cried;
And once in view they never lost the sight,
But seiz'd, and pinion'd brought to court
the knight.

Then courts of kings were held in high
renew,

Ere made the common brothels of the town:
There, virgins honorable vows receiv'd,
But chaste as maids in monasteries liv'd;
The king himself, to nuptial ties a slave,
No bad example to his poets gave;
And they, not bad, but in a vicious age,
Had not, to please the prince, debauch'd
the stage.

Now what should Arthur do? He lov'd
the knight,

But sovereign monarchs are the source of
right:

70

Mov'd by the damsel's tears and common
cry,

He doom'd the brutal ravisher to die.

But fair Geneura rose in his defense,

And pray'd so hard for mercy from the
prince,

That to his queen the king th' offender gave,
And left it in her pow'r to kill or save:

This gracious act the ladies all approve,
Who thought it much a man should die for
love,

And with their mistress join'd in close debate,

(Covering their kindness with dissembled
hate,) 80

If not to free him, to prolong his fate.

At last agreed, they call'd him by consent
Before the queen and female parliament;

And the fair speaker, rising from her chair,
Did thus the judgment of the house declare:

"Sir knight, tho' I have ask'd thy life,
yet still

Thy destiny depends upon my will;
Nor hast thou other surety than the grace
Not due to thee from our offended race.

But as our kind is of a softer mold, 90
And cannot blood without a sigh behold,

I grant thee life; reserving still the pow'r
To take the forfeit when I see my hour,

Unless thy answer to my next demand
Shall set thee free from our avenging hand.

The question, whose solution I require,
Is, what the sex of women most desire.

In this dispute thy judges are at strife;
Beware, for on thy wit depends thy life. 99

Yet (lest, surpris'd, unknowing what to say, Thou damn thyself) we give thee farther
day:

A year is thine to wander at thy will,
And learn from others, if thou want'st the skill.

But, not to hold our proffer['d boon] in scorn,
Good sureties will we have for thy return;
That at the time prefix'd thou shalt obey,
And at thy pledge's peril keep thy day."

Woe was the knight at this severe command;

But well he knew 't was bootless to with-
stand:

The terms accepted, as the fair ordain, 110
He put in bail for his return again,

And promis'd answer at the day assign'd,
The best, with Heav'n's assistance, he could
find.

His leave thus taken, on his way he went
 With heavy heart, and full of discontent, Misdoubting much, and fearful of th'
 event.

'T was hard the truth of such a point to find,
 As was not yet agreed among the kind.
 Thus on he went; still anxious more and
 more,

Ask'd all he met, and knock'd at ev'ry door; ¹²⁰

Enquir'd of men, but made his chief request

To learn from women what they lov'd the
 best.

They answer'd each according to her mind,
 To please herself, not all the female kind.
 One was for wealth, another was for place;
 Crones, old and ugly, wish'd a better face.
 The widow's wish was oftentimes to wed;
 The wanton maids were all for sport abed.
 Some said the sex were pleas'd with handsome lies,

And some gross flatt'ry lov'd without disguise; ¹³⁰

"Truth is," says one, "he seldom fails to win,

Who flatters well, for that 's our darling sin;
 But long attendance, and a duteous mind,
 Will work ev'n with the wisest of the kind."

One thought the sex's prime felicity
 Was from the bonds of wedlock to be free;
 Their pleasures, hours, and actions all their
 own,

And uncontroll'd to give account to none.

Some wish a husband-fool; but such are
 curst,

For fools perverse of husbands are the worst: ¹⁴⁰

All women would be counted chaste and
 wise,

Nor should our spouses see, but with our
 eyes;

For fools will prate, and, tho' they want the wit

To find close faults, yet open blots will hit;
 Tho' better for their ease to hold their
 tongue,

For womankind was never in the wrong.

So noise ensues, and quarrels last for life;
 The wife abhors the fool, the fool the wife.

And some men say, that great delight have
 we,

To be for truth extoll'd, and secrecy; ¹⁵⁰
 And constant in one purpose still to dwell,
 And not our husbands' counsels to reveal.

But that 's a fable, for our sex is frail,
 Inventing rather than not tell a tale.

Like leaky sieves no secrets we can hold:
 Witness the famous tale that Ovid told.

Midas the king, as in his book appears,
 By Phœbus was endow'd with ass's ears,
 Which under his long locks he well con-
 ceal'd,

(As monarchs' vices must not be reveal'd,) ¹⁵⁹
 For fear the people have 'em in the wind,
 Who long ago were neither dumb nor blind,
 Nor apt to think from heav'n their title
 springs,

Since Jove and Mars left off begetting
 kings.

This Midas knew; and durst communicate
 To none but to his wife his ears of state:

One must be trusted, and he thought her fit,
 As passing prudent, and a parlous wit.

To this sagacious confessor he went, ¹⁶⁹
 And told her what a gift the gods had sent;
 But told it under matrimonial seal,

With strict injunction never to reveal.

The secret heard, she plighted him her troth,
 (And sacred sure is every woman's oath,)

The royal malady should rest unknown,
 Both for her husband's honor and her own;
 But ne'ertheless she pin'd with discontent;
 The counsel rumbled till it found a vent.

The thing she knew she was oblig'd to
 hide;

By int'rest and by oath the wife was tied; ¹⁸⁰

But, if she told it not, the woman died.

Loth to betray a husband and a prince,
 But she must burst, or blab, and no pretense

Of honor tied her tongue from self-defense.

A marshy ground commodiously was near;
 Thither she ran, and held her breath for
 fear,

Lest if a word she spoke of anything,
 That word might be the secret of the king.

Thus full of counsel to the fen she went,
 Grip'd all the way, and longing for a vent;

Arriv'd, by pure necessity compell'd, ¹⁹¹
 On her majestic mary-bones she kneel'd;

Then to the water's brink she laid her head,
 And, as a bitter bumps within a reed,

"To thee alone, O lake," she said, "I tell,
 (And, as thy queen, command thee to conceal,)"

Beneath his locks the king my husband wears

A goodly royal pair of ass's ears:
Now I have eas'd my bosom of the pain,
Till the next longing fit return again!" ²⁰⁰

Thus thro' a woman was the secret known;
Tell us, and in effect you tell the town.
But to my tale: the knight, with heavy
cheer,
Wand'ring in vain, had now consum'd the
year —

One day was only left to solve the doubt —
Yet knew no more than when he first set out.

But home he must, and, as th' award had
been,
Yield up his body captive to the queen.

In this despairing state he happ'd to ride,
As fortune led him, by a forest side: ²¹⁰
Lonely the vale, and full of horror stood,
Brown with the shade of a religious wood:
When full before him at the noon of
night,

(The moon was up, and shot a gleamy
light,)

He saw a choir of ladies in a round,
That featly footing seem'd to skim the
ground:

Thus dancing hand in hand, so light they
were,

He knew not where they trod, on earth or
air.

At speed he drove, and came a sudden
guest,

In hope where many women were, at least, ²²⁰

Some one by chance might answer his request.

But faster than his horse the ladies flew,
And in a trice were vanish'd out of view

One only hag remain'd; but fouler far
Than grandame apes in Indian forests are;
Against a wither'd oak she lean'd her
weight,

Propp'd on her trusty staff, not half up-
right,

And dropp'd an awkward court'sy to the
knight.

Then said: "What make you, sir, so late abroad ²²⁹

Without a guide, and this no beaten road?
Or want you aught that here you hope to
find,

Or travel for some trouble in your mind?
The last I guess; and, if I read aright,
Those of our sex are bound to serve a
knight;

Perhaps good counsel may your grief assuage:

Then tell your pain, for wisdom is in age." To this the knight: "Good mother, would you know

The secret cause and spring of all my woe?
My life must with to-morrow's light expire,
Unless I tell what women most desire. ²⁴⁰
Now could you help me at this hard essay,
Or for your inborn goodness, or for pay,
Yours is my life, redeem'd by your advice;
Ask what you please, and I will pay the price:

The proudest kerchief of the court shall
rest

Well satisfied of what they love the best."
"Plight me thy faith," quoth she, "that what I ask,

Thy danger over, and perform'd the task,
That shalt thou give for hire of thy de-
mand;

Here take thy oath, and seal it on my hand; ²⁵⁰

I warrant thee, on peril of my life,
Thy words shall please both widow, maid,
and wife."

More words there needed not to move
the knight

To take her offer, and his truth to plight.
With that she spread her mantle on the
ground,

And, first enquiring whether he was bound,
Bade him not fear, tho' long and rough the
way,

At court he should arrive ere break of day;
His horse should find the way without a guide, ²⁵⁹

She said: with fury they began to ride,
He on the midst, the beldam at his side.

The horse, what devil drove, I cannot tell,
But only this, they sped their journey well;
And all the way the crone inform'd the
knight,

How he should answer the demand aright.
To court they came; the news was quickly
spread

Of his returning to redeem his head.
The female senate was assembled soon,
With all the mob of women in the town;
The queen sate lord chief justice of the hall, ²⁷⁰

And bade the crier cite the criminal.
The knight appear'd, and silence they pro-
claim:

Then first the culprit answer'd to his name;

And, after forms of laws, was last requir'd
To name the thing that women most desir'd.

Th' offender, taught his lesson by the
way,

And by his counsel order'd what to say,
Thus bold began : " My lady liege," said he,
" What all your sex desire is, Sovereignty.

The wife affects her husband to command; 280

All must be hers, both money, house, and
land.

The maids are mistresses ev'n in their
name,

And of their servants full dominion claim.

This, at the peril of my head, I say,
A blunt plain truth, the sex aspires to
sway,

You to rule all, while we, like slaves,
obey."

There was not one, or widow, maid, or
wife,

But said the knight had well deserv'd his
life.

Ev'n fair Geneura, with a blush, confess'd
The man had found what women love the
best. 290

Upstarts the beldam, who was there un-
seen,

And, reverence made, accosted thus the
queen:

" My liege," said she, " before the court
arise,

May I, poor wretch, find favor in your eyes,
To grant my just request: 't was I who taught

The knight this answer, and inspir'd his
thought;

None but a woman could a man direct
To tell us women what we most affect.

But first I swore him on his knightly troth, (And here demand performance of his oath,) 300

To grant the boon that next I should desire;
He gave his faith, and I expect my hire:

My promise is fulfill'd; I sav'd his life,
And claim his debt, to take me for his
wife."

The knight was ask'd, nor could his oath
deny,

But hop'd they would not force him to comply.

The women, who would rather wrest the laws

Than let a sister plaintiff lose the cause,
(As judges on the bench more gracious are,

And more attent to brothers of the bar,) 310 Cried, one and all, the suppliant should have right,

And to the grandame hag adjudg'd the
knight.

In vain he sigh'd, and oft with tears
desir'd,

Some reasonable suit might be requir'd.

But still the crone was constant to her note;
The more he spoke, the more she stretch'd her throat.

In vain he proffer'd all his goods, to save
His body destin'd to that living grave.

The liquorish hag rejects the pelf with scorn;

And nothing but the man would serve her
turn. 320

" Not all the wealth of eastern kings," said
she,

" Has pow'r to part my plighted love and
me;

And, old and ugly as I am, and poor,
Yet never will I break the faith I swore;
For mine thou art by promise, during life,
And I thy loving and obedient wife."

" My love! nay, rather my damnation
thou,"

Said he, " nor am I bound to keep my vow;
The fiend thy sire hath sent thee from
below,

Else how couldst thou my secret sorrows
know? 330

Avaunt, old witch, for I renounce thy
bed;

The queen may take the forfeit of my
head,

Ere any of my race so foul a crone shall
wed."

Both heard, the judge pronounc'd against
the knight:

So was he married in his own despite;
And all day after hid him as an owl,

Not able to sustain a sight so foul.
Perhaps the reader thinks I do him wrong,

To pass the marriage feast and nuptial
song;

Mirth there was none, the man was à la mort, 340

And little courage had to make his court.
To bed they went, the bridegroom and the
bride;

Was never such an ill-pair'd couple tied:
Restless he toss'd and tumbled to and fro,
And roll'd, and wriggled further off, for
woe.

The good old wife lay smiling by his side,
And caught him in her quiv'ring arms, and
cried:

"When you my ravish'd predecessor saw,
You were not then become this man of straw;
Had you been such, you might have scap'd
the law. ³⁵⁰

Is this the custom of King Arthur's court?
Are all Round Table Knights of such a sort?
Remember I am she who sav'd your life,
Your loving, lawful, and complying wife;
Not thus you swore in your unhappy hour,
Nor I for this return employ'd my pow'r.
In time of need I was your faithful friend;
Nor did I since, nor ever will offend.
Believe me, my lov'd lord, 'tis much unkind; ³⁵⁹

What fury has possess'd your alter'd mind?
Thus on my wedding night — without pretense —

Come, turn this way, or tell me my offense.
If not your wife, let reason's rule persuade;
Name but my fault, amends shall soon be
made."

"Amends! nay, that 's impossible," said
he,

"What change of age or ugliness can be!
Or, could Medea's magic mend thy face,
Thou art descended from so mean a race,
That never knight was match'd with such disgrace. ³⁶⁹

What wonder, madam, if I move my side,
When, if I turn, I turn to such a bride?"

"And is this all that troubles you so sore!"

"And what the devil couldst thou wish
me more?"

"Ah benedicite," replied the crone,

"Then cause of just complaining have you
none.

The remedy to this were soon applied,
Would you be like the bridegroom to the
bride.

But, for you say a long descended race,
And wealth, and dignity, and pow'r, and place, ³⁷⁰

Make gentlemen, and that your high degree
Is much disparag'd to be match'd with me;
Know this, my lord; nobility of blood
Is but a glitt'ring and fallacious good:
The nobleman is he whose noble mind
Is fill'd with inborn worth, unborrow'd from his kind.

The King of Heav'n was in a manger laid,

And took his earth but from an humble
maid;

Then what can birth, or mortal men, bestow,
Since floods no higher than their fountains flow? ³⁸⁹

We, who for name and empty honor strive,
Our true nobility from him derive.

Your ancestors, who puff your mind with
pride,

And vast estates to mighty titles tied,
Did not your honor, but their own advance;
For virtue comes not by inheritance.
If you tralineate from your father's mind,
What are you else but of a bastard kind?
Do as your great progenitors have done,
And, by their virtues, prove yourself their
son.

No father can infuse or wit or grace; ⁴⁰⁰
A mother comes across, and mars the race.
A grandsire or a grandame taints the blood,
And seldom three descents continue good.
Were virtue by descent, a noble name
Could never villanize his father's fame;
But, as the first, the last of all the line
Would, like the sun, ev'n in descending
shine.

Take fire, and bear it to the darkest house,
Betwixt King Arthur's court and Caucasus;
If you depart, the flames shall still remain, ⁴¹⁰
And the bright blaze enlighten all the plain;
Nor, till the fuel perish, can decay,
By nature form'd on things combustible to
prey.

Such is not man, who, mixing better seed
With worse, begets a base degenerate breed:
The bad corrupts the good, and leaves behind

No trace of all the great begetter's mind.
The father sinks within his son, we see,
And often rises in the third degree,
If better luck a better mother give: ⁴²⁰ Chance gave us being, and by chance we live.

Such as our atoms were, ev'n such are we,
Or call it chance, or strong necessity:
Thus, loaded with dead weight, the will is free. ⁴³⁰

And thus it needs must be: for seed con-
join'd

Lets into nature's work th' imperfect kind;
But fire, th' enliv'n'ner of the general frame,
Is one, its operation still the same.
Its principle is in itself, while ours Works, as confederates war, with mingled pow'rs; ⁴³⁹

Sleep, and the same forewarning dream,
begun;

Once more the god stood threat'ning o'er
his head,

With added curses if he disobey'd. ⁴⁰

Twice warn'd, he studied flight; but would convey

At once his person and his wealth away.
Thus while he linger'd, his design was heard,
A speedy process form'd, and death declar'd.
Witness there needed none of his offense,
Against himself the wretch was evidence:
Condemn'd, and destitute of human aid,
To him for whom he suffer'd, thus he
pray'd:

" 'O Pow'r, who hast deserv'd in heav'n
a throne,

Not giv'n, but by thy labors made thy own, so
Pity thy suppliant, and protect his cause, Whom thou hast made obnoxious to the laws.'

" A custom was of old, and still remains,

Which life or death by suffrages ordains;
White stones and black within an urn are
cast,

The first absolve, but fate is in the last.
The judges to the common urn bequeath Their votes, and drop the sable signs of
death;

The box receives all black, but, pour'd from thence,

The stones came candid forth, the hue of innocence. ⁶⁰

Thus Alemonides his safety won,
Preserv'd from death by Alcumena's son.
Then to his kinsman god his vows he pays,
And cuts with prosp'rous gales th' Ionian
seas:

He leaves Tarentum, favor'd by the wind,
And Thurine bays, and Temises, behind;
Soft Sybaris, and all the capes that stand
Along the shore, he makes in sight of land; Still doubling, and still coasting, till he found ⁶⁵

The mouth of Æsaris, and promis'd ground:
Then saw where, on the margin of the flood,
The tomb that held the bones of Croton
stood.

Here, by the god's command, he built and wall'd

The place predicted, and Crotona call'd:
Thus fame, from time to time, delivers
down

The sure tradition of th' Italian town."

Here dwelt the man divine whom Samos
bore,

But now self-banish'd from his native shore,
Because he hated tyrants, nor could bear
The chains which none but servile souls will wear: ⁸⁰

He, tho' from heav'n remote, to heav'n
could move,

With strength of mind, and tread th' abyss
above;

And penetrate, with his interior light,
Those upper depths which Nature hid from
sight;

And what he had observ'd, and learnt from thence,

Lov'd in familiar language to dispense.

The crowd with silent admiration stand,
And heard him, as they heard their god's
command;

While he discours'd of heav'n's mysterious
laws,

The world's original, and nature's cause; ⁹⁰
And what was God, and why the fleecy
snows

In silence fell, and rattling winds arose;
What shook the steadfast earth, and whence
began

The dance of planets round the radiant sun;
If thunder was the voice of angry Jove,
Or clouds, with niter pregnant, burst above:
Of these, and things beyond the common reach,

He spoke, and charm'd his audience with his speech.

He first the taste of flesh from tables
drove,

And argued well, if arguments could move:
"(O mortals! from your fellows' blood abstain, ¹⁰¹

Nor taint your bodies with a food profane:
While corn and pulse by nature are be-
stow'd,

And planted orchards bend their willing
load;

While labor'd gardens wholesome herbs
produce,

And teeming vines afford their generous juice;

Nor tardier fruits of cruder kind are lost,
But tam'd with fire, or mellow'd by the frost;

While kine to pails distended udders bring,
And bees their honey redolent of spring; ¹¹⁰
While earth not only can your needs supply,
But, lavish of her store, provides for luxury;

A guiltless feast administers with ease,
And without blood is prodigal to please.
Wild beasts their maws with their slain brethren fill,

And yet not all, for some refuse to kill:
Sheep, goats, and oxen, and the nobler steed,
On browse and corn the flow'ry meadows
feed.

Bears, tigers, wolves, the lion's angry brood, Whom Heav'n endued with principles of blood, ¹²⁰

He wisely sunder'd from the rest, to yell
In forests, and in lonely caves to dwell,
Where stronger beasts oppress the weak by
might,

And all in prey and purple feasts delight.

"O impious use! to Nature's laws oppos'd,
Where bowels are in other bowels clos'd;
Where, fatten'd by their fellows' fat, they thrive,

Maintain'd by murder, and by death they live.

'Tis then for naught that Mother Earth provides

The stores of all she shows, and all she hides, ¹³⁰

If men with fleshy morsels must be fed,
And chaw with bloody teeth the breathing
bread:

What else is this but to devour our guests,
And barb'rously renew Cyclopean feasts!
We, by destroying life, our life sustain,
And gorge th' ungodly maw with meats obscene.

"Not so the Golden Age, who fed on fruit, Nor durst with bloody meals their mouths
pollute:

Then birds in airy space might safely move,
And timorous hares on heaths securely rove; ¹⁴⁰

Nor needed fish the guileful hooks to fear,
For all was peaceful, and that peace sincere.
Whoever was the wretch (and curst be he)
That envied first our food's simplicity,
Th' essay of bloody feasts on brutes began,
And after forg'd the sword to murder man.
Had he the sharpen'd steel alone employ'd
On beasts of prey that other beasts de-
stroy'd,

Or man invaded with their fangs and paws,
This had been justified by Nature's laws, ¹⁵⁰
And self-defense; but who did feasts begin
Of flesh, he stretch'd necessity to sin.
To kill man-killers, man has lawful pow'r,
But not th' extended license to devour.

"Ill habits gather by unseen degrees,
As brooks make rivers, rivers run to seas.
The sow, with her broad snout for rooting up

Th' intrusted seed, was judg'd to spoil the crop

And intercept the sweating farmer's hope;
The cov'tous churl, of unforgiving kind, ¹⁶⁰

Th' offender to the bloody priest resign'd:
Her hunger was no plea; for that she died.

The goat came next in order to be tried;
The goat had cropp'd the tendrils of the vine:

In vengeance laity and clergy join,
Where one had lost his profit, one his
wine.

Here was, at least, some shadow of offense;

The sheep was sacrific'd on no pretense,
But meek and unresisting innocence:

A patient, useful creature, born to bear ¹⁷⁰
The warm and woolly fleece, that cloth'd her murderer,

And daily to give down the milk she bred,
A tribute for the grass on which she fed.

Living, both food and raiment she supplies,
And is of least advantage when she dies.

"How did the toiling ox his death deserve,
A downright simple drudge, and born to serve?

O tyrant! with what justice canst thou hope
The promise of the year, a plenteous crop,
When thou destroy'st thy lab'ring steer,
who till'd ¹⁸⁰

And plow'd with pains thy else ungrateful
field?

From his yet reeking neck to draw the yoke, (That neck with which the surly clods he broke,)

And to the hatchet yield thy husbandman,
Who finish'd autumn, and the spring began!

"Nor this alone! but, Heav'n itself to bribe,

We to the gods our impious acts ascribe;
First recompense with death their creatures'
toil,

Then call the blest above to share the spoil. ¹⁸⁹

The fairest victim must the pow'rs appease;
(So fatal 't is sometimes too much to please!)

A purple fillet his broad brows adorns,
With flow'ry garlands crown'd, and gilded horns.

He hears the murd'rous pray'r the priest prefers,

But understands not, 't is his doom he hears;
Beholds the meal betwixt his temples cast,
(The fruit and product of his labors past;) And in the water views, perhaps, the knife
Uplifted, to deprive him of his life;
Then, broken up alive, his entrails sees, ²⁰⁰
Torn out for priests t' inspect the god's decrees.

"From whence, O mortal men, this gust
of blood

Have you deriv'd, and interdicted food?
Be taught by me this dire delight to shun,
Warn'd by my precepts, by my practice won;

And when you eat the well-deserving beast,
Think, on the lab'rer of your field you feast!

"Now since the god inspires me to proceed,

Be that, whate'er inspiring pow'r, obey'd;
For I will sing of mighty mysteries, ²¹⁰
Of truths conceal'd before from human eyes,

Dark oracles unveil, and open all the
skies;

Pleas'd as I am to walk along the sphere
Of shining stars, and travel with the year,
To leave the heavy earth, and scale the
height

Of Atlas, who supports the heav'nly weight;
To look from upper light, and thence survey
Mistaken mortals wand'ring from the way,
And, wanting wisdom, fearful for the state Of future things, and trembling at their fate! ²²⁰

"Those I would teach, and by right reason bring

To think of death, as but an idle thing.
Why thus affrighted at an empty name,
A dream of darkness, and fictitious flame?
Vain themes of wit, which but in poems pass,
And fables of a world that never was!
What feels the body when the soul expires,
By time corrupted, or consum'd by fires?
Nor dies the spirit, but new life repeats
In other forms, and only changes seats. ²³⁰

"Ev'n I, who these mysterious truths
declare,

Was once Euphorbus in the Trojan war;
My name and lineage I remember well,
And how in fight by Sparta's king I fell.
In Argive Juno's fane I late beheld My buckler hung on high, and own'd my former shield.

"Then death, so call'd, is but old matter
dress'd

In some new figure, and a varied vest:
Thus all things are but alter'd, nothing dies;
And here and there th' unbodied spirit
flies, ²⁴⁰

By time, or force, or sickness dispossess'd,
And lodges, where it lights, in man or beast;
Or hunts without, till ready limbs it find,
And actuates those according to their kind;
From tenement to tenement is toss'd;
The soul is still the same, the figure only
lost.

And, as the soften'd wax new seals receives,
This face assumes, and that impression
leaves;

Now call'd by one, now by another name;
The form is only chang'd, the wax is still the same: ²⁵⁰

So death, so call'd, can but the form de-
face,

Th' immortal soul flies out in empty space,
To seek her fortune in some other place.

"Then let not piety be put to flight,
To please the taste of glutton appetite;
But suffer inmate souls secure to dwell,
Lest from their seats your parents you expel;

With rabid hunger feed upon your kind,
Or from a beast dislodge a brother's mind.

"And since, like Tiphys, parting from the shore, ²⁶⁰

In ample seas I sail, and depths untried
before,

This let me further add, that Nature knows
No steadfast station, but or ebbs or flows:
Ever in motion; she destroys her old,
And casts new figures in another mold.
Ev'n times are in perpetual flux, and run,
Like rivers from their fountain, rolling on;
For time, no more than streams, is at a stay:
The flying hour is ever on her way; ²⁷⁰
And, as the fountain still supplies her store,
(The wave behind impels the wave before,) Thus in successive course the minutes run,
And urge their predecessor minutes on,
Still moving, ever new: for former things
Are set aside, like abdicated kings;
And every moment alters what is done,
And innovates some act till then unknown.

"Darkness we see emerges into light,
And shining suns descend to sable night;
Ev'n heav'n itself receives another dye, ²⁸⁰
When wearied animals in slumbers lie
Of midnight ease; another, when the gray
Of morn preludes the splendor of the day.
The disk of Phœbus, when he climbs on high,

Appears at first but as a bloodshot eye;
And, when his chariot downward drives to
bed,

His ball is with the same suffusion red;
But, mounted high in his meridian race,
All bright he shines, and with a better face;
For there pure particles of ether flow, ²⁹⁰
Far from th' infection of the world below.

"Nor equal light th' unequal moon
adorns,

Or in her waxing, or her waning horns.
For ev'ry day she wanes, her face is less,
But gath'ring into globe, she fattens at increase.

"Perceiv'st thou not the process of the
year,
How the four seasons in four forms ap-
pear,
Resembling human life in ev'ry shape
they wear?

Spring first, like infancy, shoots out her head, ²⁹⁹

With milky juice requiring to be fed:
Helpless, tho' fresh, and wanting to be
led.

The green stem grows in stature and in size,
But only feeds with hope the farmer's eyes;
Then laughs the childish year with flow'rets
crown'd,

And lavishly perfumes the fields around,
But no substantial nourishment receives;
Infirm the stalks, unsolid are the leaves.

"Proceeding onward whence the year
began,

The Summer grows adult and ripens into
man.

This season, as in men, is most replete ³¹⁰
With kindly moisture and prolific heat.

"Autumn succeeds, a sober tepid age,
Not froze with fear, nor boiling into rage;
More than mature, and tending to decay,
When our brown locks repine to mix with odious gray.

"Last, Winter creeps along with tardy
pace;

Sour is his front, and furrow'd is his face.
His scalp if not dishonor'd quite of hair,
The ragged fleece is thin, and thin is worse than bare.

"Ev'n our own bodies daily change receive; ³²⁰

Some part of what was theirs before, they
leave;

Nor are to-day what yesterday they were,
Nor the whole same to-morrow will appear.

"Time was, when we were sow'd, and just
began,

From some few fruitful drops, the promise of a man.

Then Nature's hand (fermented as it was)
Molded to shape the soft, coagulated mass;
And when the little man was fully form'd,
The breathless embryo with a spirit warm'd;
But when the mother's throes begin to come, ³³⁰

The creature, pent within the narrow room,
Breaks his blind prison, pushing to repair
His stifled breath and draw the living air;
Cast on the margin of the world he lies,
A helpless babe, but by instinct he cries.
He next essays to walk, but, downward
press'd,

On four feet imitates his brother beast:
By slow degrees he gathers from the ground
His legs, and to the rolling chair is bound;
Then walks alone; a horseman now become, ³⁴⁰

He rides a stick, and travels round the room.
In time he vaunts among his youthful peers, Strong-bon'd, and strung with nerves, in pride of years.

He runs with mettle his first merry stage;

Maintains the next, abated of his rage,
But manages his strength, and spares his age.

Heavy the third and stiff, he sinks apace,
And, tho' 't is downhill all, but creeps along the race.

Now sapless on the verge of death he stands,
Contemplating his former feet and hands;
And, Milo-like, his slacken'd sinews sees, ³⁵¹

And wither'd arms, once fit to cope with Hercules,
Unable now to shake, much less to tear,
the trees.

"So Helen wept, when her too faithful
glass

Reflected to her eyes the ruins of her face, Wond'ring what charms her ravishers could spy,

To force her twice, or ev'n but once enjoy!
"Thy teeth, devouring Time, thine, envious Age.

On things below still exercise your rage:
With venom'd grinders you corrupt your meat, ³⁶⁰

And then, at ling'ring meals, the morsels
eat.

"Nor those, which elements we call,
 abide,
 Nor to this figure, nor to that, are tied;
 For this eternal world is said of old
 But four prolific principles to hold,
 Four different bodies; two to heaven ascend,
 And other two down to the center tend.
 Fire, first, with wings expanded mounts on high,
 Pure, void of weight, and dwells in upper sky;
 Then Air, because unclogg'd in empty space,
 Flies after Fire, and claims the second place;
 But weighty Water, as her nature guides,
 Lies on the lap of Earth, and Mother Earth subsides.

"All things are mix'd of these, which all contain,
 And into these are all resolv'd again:
 Earth rarefies to Dew; expanded more,
 The subtle Dew in Air begins to soar;
 Spreads as she flies, and weary of her name

Extenuates still, and changes into Flame.
 Thus having by degrees perfection won,
 Restless they soon untwist the web they spun,

And Fire begins to lose her radiant hue,
 Mix'd with gross Air, and Air descends to Dew;

And Dew, condensing, does her form forego,
 And sinks, a heavy lump of Earth, below.

"Thus are their figures never at a stand,
 But chang'd by Nature's innovating hand;
 All things are alter'd, nothing is destroy'd,
 The shifted scene for some new show employ'd.

"Then, to be born, is to begin to be
 Some other thing we were not formerly;
 And what we call to die, is not t' appear
 Or be the thing that formerly we were.
 Those very elements which we partake,
 Alive, when dead, some other bodies make;
 Translated grow, have sense, or can discourse;

But death on deathless substance has no force.

"That forms are chang'd I grant, that nothing can Continue in the figure it began;
 The Golden Age to Silver was debas'd;
 To Copper that; our metal came at last.

"The face of places, and their forms, decay;

And that is solid earth, that once was sea:
 Seas, in their turn, retreating from the shore,

Make solid land what ocean was before;
 And far from strands are shells of fishes found,

And rusty anchors fix'd on mountain ground;

And what were fields before, now wash'd and worn

By falling floods from high, to valleys turn,
 And, crumbling still, descend to level lands,
 And lakes and trembling bogs are barren sands;

And the parch'd desert floats in streams unknown,

Wond'ring to drink of waters not her own.

"Here nature living fountains opes, and there

Seals up the wombs where living fountains were;

Or earthquakes stop their ancient course, and bring

Diverted streams to feed a distant spring.
 So Lycus, swallow'd up, is seen no more,
 But far from thence knocks out another door.

Thus Erasinus dives, and blind in earth
 Runs on, and gropes his way to second birth;
 Starts up in Argos' meads, and shakes his locks

Around the fields, and fattens all the flocks.
 So Mysus by another way is led,

And, grown a river, now disdains his head;
 Forgets his humble birth, his name forsakes,

And the proud title of Caicus takes.
 Large Amenane, impure with yellow sands,
 Runs rapid often, and as often stands;

And here he threatens the drunken fields to drown,

And there his dugs deny to give their liquor down.

"Anigros once did wholesome draughts afford,

But now his deadly waters are abhorr'd;
 Since, hurt by Hercules, as fame resounds,
 The Centaurs in his current wash'd their wounds.

The streams of Hypanis are sweet no more,
 But, brackish, lose the taste they had before.
 Antissa, Pharos, Tyre, in seas were pent,
 Once isles, but now increase the continent;

While the Leucadian coast, mainland before, 440

By rushing seas is sever'd from the shore.
So Zancle to th' Italian earth was tied,
And men once walk'd where ships at anchor
ride;

Till Neptune overlook'd the narrow way,
And in disdain pour'd in the conqu'ring
sea.

"Two cities that adorn'd th' Achaian
ground,

Buris and Helice, no more are found,
But, whelm'd beneath a lake, are sunk
and drown'd;

And boatsmen thro' the crystal water show
To wond'ring passengers the walls below.

"Near Trœzen stands a hill, expos'd in
air 451

To winter winds, of leafy shadows bare:
This once was level ground; but (strange to tell)

Th' included vapors, that in caverns dwell,
Lab'ring with colic pangs, and close confin'd,
In vain sought issue for the rumbling wind:
Yet still they heav'd for vent, and heaving
still

Inlarg'd the concave, and shot up the hill;
As breath extends a bladder, or the skins
Of goats are blown t' inclose the hoarded
wines. 460

The mountain yet retains a mountain's face,
And gather'd rubbish heals the hollow
space.

"Of many wonders which I heard or
knew,

Retrenching most, I will relate but few:
What, are not springs with qualities oppos'd
Endued at seasons, and at seasons lost?

Thrice in a day thine, Ammon, change their form,

Cold at high noon, at morn and evening
warm;

Thine, Athaman, will kindle wood, if thrown
On the pil'd earth, and in the waning moon.
The Thracians have a stream, if any try 471
The taste, his harden'd bowels petrify;

Whate'er it touches it converts to stones,
And makes a marble pavement where it runs.

"Crathis, and Sybaris her sister flood,
That slide thro' our Calabrian neighbor
wood,

With gold and amber dye the shining hair,
And thither youth resort; (for who would not be fair?)

"But stranger virtues yet in streams we
find;

Some change not only bodies, but the mind:
Who has not heard of Salmacis obscene, 481
Whose waters into women soften men?

Of Ethiopian lakes, which turn the brain
To madness, or in heavy sleep constrain?
Clitorian streams the love of wine expel,
(Such is the virtue of th' abstemious well,) 490
Whether the colder nymph that rules the
flood

Extinguishes and balks the drunken god;
Or that Melampus, (so have some assur'd,) When the mad Prœtides with charms he cur'd,

And pow'rful herbs, both charms and simples cast

Into the sober spring, where still their virtues last.

"Unlike effects Lyncestis will produce;
Who drinks his waters, tho' with moderate
use,

Reels as with wine, and sees with double
sight;

His heels too heavy, and his head too light.
Ladon, once Pheneos, an Arcadian stream,
(Ambiguous in th' effects, as in the name,)
By day is wholesome bev'rage, but is thought
By night infected, and a deadly draught. 500

"Thus running rivers, and the standing lake,

Now of these virtues, now of those partake:
Time was (and all things time and fate
obey)

When fast Ortygia floated on the sea;
Such were Cyanean isles, when Tiphys
steer'd

Betwixt their straits, and their collision
fear'd;

They swam where now they sit; and, firmly
join'd,

Secure of rooting up, resist the wind.

Nor Ætna vomiting sulphureous fire
Will ever belch, for sulphur will expire 510
(The veins exhausted of the liquid store):
Time was she cast no flames; in time will cast no more.

"For whether earth's an animal, and air
Imbibes, her lungs with coolness to repair,
And what she sucks remits, she still requires Inlets for air, and outlets for her fires;
When tortur'd with convulsive fits she
shakes,

That motion chokes the vent, till other vent
she makes;

Or when the winds in hollow caves are clos'd,
And subtile spirits find that way oppos'd, ⁵²⁰
They toss up flints in air; the flints that hide
The seeds of fire, thus toss'd in air, collide,
Kindling the sulphur, till, the fuel spent,
The cave is cool'd, and the fierce winds relent.

Or whether sulphur, catching fire, feeds on
Its unctuous parts, till, all the matter gone,
The flames no more ascend; for earth supplies

The fat that feeds them, and, when earth denies

That food, by length of time consum'd, the fire

Famish'd for want of fuel must expire. ⁵³⁰

"A race of men there are, as fame has told,

Who shiv'ring suffer Hyperborean cold,
Till, nine times bathing in Minerva's lake,
Soft feathers to defend their naked sides they take.

'Tis said, the Scythian wives (believe who will)

Transform themselves to birds by magic skill;

Smear'd over with an oil of wondrous might,

That adds new pinions to their airy flight.

"But this by sure experiment we know,
That living creatures from corruption grow: ⁵⁴⁰

Hide in a hollow pit a slaughter'd steer,
Bees from his putrid bowels will appear;
Who like their parents haunt the fields, and bring

Their honey harvest home, and hope another spring.

The warlike steed is multiplied, we find,
To wasps and hornets of the warrior kind.
Cut from a crab his crooked claws, and hide
The rest in earth, a scorpion thence will glide,

And shoot his sting; his tail, in circles toss'd,
Refers the limbs his backward father lost.
And worms, that stretch on leaves their filmy loom, ⁵⁵¹

Crawl from their bags, and butterflies become.

Ev'n slime begets the frog's loquacious race;
Short of their feet at first, in little space
With arms and legs endued, long leaps they take,

Rais'd on their hinder part, and swim the lake,

And waves repel: for Nature gives their kind,

To that intent, a length of legs behind.

"The cubs of bears a living lump appear.
When whelp'd, and no determin'd figure wear. ⁵⁶⁰

Their mother licks 'em into shape, and gives
As much of form as she herself receives.

"The grubs from their sexangular abode
Crawl out unfinish'd, like the maggot's brood,

Trunks without limbs; till time at leisure brings

The thighs they wanted, and their tardy wings.

"The bird who draws the ear of Juno, vain

Of her crown'd head, and of her starry train;

And he that bears th' artillery of Jove,
The strong-pounc'd eagle and the billing dove;

And all the feather'd kind, who could suppose ⁵⁷⁰

(But that from sight, the surest sense, he knows)

They from th' included yolk, not ambient white, arose.

"There are who think the marrow of a man,

Which in the spine, while he was living, ran;
When dead, the pith corrupted, will become A snake, and hiss within the hollow tomb.

"All these receive their birth from other things,

But from himself the Phœnix only springs;
Self-born, begotten by the parent flame ⁵⁸⁰

In which he burn'd, another and the same:
Who not by corn or herbs his life sustains,
But the sweet essence of anomum drains,
And watches the rich gums Arabia bears,
While yet in tender dew they drop their tears.

He (his five centuries of life fulfill'd)
His nest on oaken boughs begins to build,
Or trembling tops of palm; and first he draws

The plan with his broad bill and crooked claws,

Nature's artificers; on this the pile ⁵⁹⁰
Is form'd, and rises round; then with the spoil

Of cassia, cinnamon, and stems of nard
(For softness strew'd beneath) his fun'ral bed is rear'd:

Fun'ral and bridal both; and all around The borders with corruptless myrrh are
crown'd,

On this incumbent; till ethereal flame
First catches, then consumes the costly
frame;

Consumes him too, as on the pile he lies:
He liv'd on odors, and in odors dies.

"An infant Phoenix from the former
springs, 600

His father's heir, and from his tender wings Shakes off his parent dust; his method he pursues,

And the same lease of life on the same terms
renews.

When grown to manhood he begins his
reign,

And with stiff pinions can his flight sus-tain,

He lightens of its load the tree that bore
His father's royal sepulcher before,
And his own cradle: this with pious care
Plac'd on his back, he cuts the buxom air,
Seeks the Sun's city, and his sacred church,
And decently lays down his burden in the poreh. 611

"A wonder more amazing would we find?
Th' hyæna shows it, of a double kind,
Varying the sexes in alternate years;
In one begets, and in another bears.
The thin chameleon, fed with air, receives
The color of the thing to which he cleaves.

"India, when conquer'd, on the con-qu'ring god
For planted vines the sharp-ey'd lynx be-
stow'd,

Whose urine shed, before it touches earth, Congeals in air, and gives to gems their
birth. 621

So coral, soft and white in ocean's bed, Comes harden'd up in air, and glows with red.

"All changing species should my song recite,

Before I ceas'd, would change the day to
night.

Nations and empires flourish and decay,
By turns command, and in their turns
obey;

Time softens hardy people, time again
Hardens to war a soft, unwarlike train.

Thus Troy, for ten long years, her foes
withstood, 630

And, daily bleeding, bore th' expense of
blood:

Now for thick streets it shows an empty
space,
Or, only fill'd with tombs of her own per-ish'd race,
Herself becomes the sepulcher of what she was.

"Mycenæ, Sparta, Thebes of mighty
fame,

Are vanish'd out of substance into name,
And Dardan Rome, that just begins to
rise,

On Tiber's banks, in time shall mate the
skies;

Widening her bounds, and working on her
way,

Ev'n now she meditates imperial sway: 640
Yet this is change, but she by changing thrives,

Like moons new-born, and in her cradle strives

To fill her infant horns; an hour shall come
When the round world shall be contain'd in Rome.

"For thus old saws foretell, and Helenus Anchises' drooping son enliven'd thus,
When Ilium now was in a sinking state,
And he was doubtful of his future fate:
'O goddess-born, with thy hard fortune
strive;

Troy never can be lost, and thou alive. 650
Thy passage thou shalt free thro' fire and
sword,

And Troy in foreign lands shall be restor'd.
In happier fields a rising town I see,
Greater than what e'er was, or is, or e'er
shall be;

And Heav'n yet owes the world a race
deriv'd from thee.

Sages and chiefs, of other lineage born,
The city shall extend, extended shall adorn;
But from Iulus he must draw his birth,
By whom thy Rome shall rule the conquer'd
earth;

Whom Heav'n will lend mankind on earth
to reign, 660

And late require the precious pledge again.'
This Helenus to great Æneas told,
Which I retain, e'er since in other mold
My soul was cloth'd; and now rejoice to
view

My country walls rebuilt, and Troy reviv'd
anew,

Rais'd by the fall; decreed by loss to gain;
Enslav'd but to be free, and conquer'd but
to reign.

"T is time my hard-mouth'd coursers to control,

Apt to run riot and transgress the goal,
And therefore I conclude: whatever lies ⁶⁷⁰
In earth, or flits in air, or fills the skies,
All suffer change; and we, that are of soul
And body mix'd, are members of the whole.
Then, when our sires, or grandsires, shall forsake

The forms of men, and brutal figures take,
Thus hous'd, securely let their spirits rest,
Nor violate thy father in the beast —
Thy friend, thy brother, any of thy kin;
If none of these, yet there's a man within:
O spare to make a Thyestean meal, ⁶⁸⁰
T' inclose his body, and his soul expel.

"Ill customs by degrees to habits rise,
Ill habits soon become exalted vice:

What more advance can mortals make in sin,

So near perfection, who with blood begin?
Deaf to the calf that lies beneath the knife,
Looks up, and from her butcher begs her life;

Deaf to the harmless kid, that, ere he dies, }
All methods to procure thy mercy tries, }
And imitates in vain thy children's cries. }
Where will he stop, who feeds with household bread, ⁶⁹¹

Then eats the poultry which before he fed?
Let plow thy steers; that, when they lose their breath,

To nature, not to thee, they may impute their death.

Let goats for food their loaded udders lend,
And sheep from winter cold thy sides defend;

But neither springes, nets, nor snares employ,

And be no more ingenious to destroy.
Free, as in air, let birds on earth remain,
Nor let insidious glue their wings constrain;
Nor opening hounds the trembling stag affright, ⁷⁰¹

Nor purple feathers intercept his flight;
Nor hooks conceal'd in baits for fish prepare,
Nor lines to heave 'em twinkling up in air.

"Take not away the life you cannot give;
For all things have an equal right to live.

Kill noxious creatures, where 't is sin to save;
This only just prerogative we have:

But nourish life with vegetable food,
And shun the sacrilegious taste of blood." ⁷¹⁰

These precepts by the Samian sage were taught,

Which godlike Numa to the Sabines brought,

And thence transferr'd to Rome, by gift his own,

A willing people, and an offer'd throne.
O happy monarch, sent by Heav'n to bless
A salvage nation with soft arts of peace;
To teach religion, rapine to restrain,
Give laws to lust, and sacrifice ordain:
Himself a saint, a goddess was his bride,
And all the Muses o'er his acts preside. ⁷²⁰

THE CHARACTER OF A GOOD PARSON

IMITATED FROM CHAUCER, AND INLARG'D

A PARISH priest was of the pilgrim train;
An awful, reverend, and religious man.
His eyes diffus'd a venerable grace,
And charity itself was in his face.

Rich was his soul, tho' his attire was poor, }
(As God had cloth'd his own ambassador;) }
For such, on earth, his blest Redeemer bore.

Of sixty years he seem'd; and well might last

To sixty more, but that he liv'd too fast;
Refin'd himself to soul, to curb the sense;
And made almost a sin of abstinence.

Yet had his aspect nothing of severe,
But such a face as promis'd him sincere.
Nothing reserv'd or sullen was to see,
But sweet regards and pleasing sanctity; }
Mild was his accent, and his action free. }
With eloquence innate his tongue was arm'd;
Tho' harsh the precept, yet the preacher charm'd.

For, letting down the golden chain from high,

He drew his audience upward to the sky; ²⁰
And oft, with holy hymns, he charm'd their ears

(A music more melodious than the spheres):
For David left him, when he went to rest,
His lyre, and after him he sung the best.
He bore his great commission in his look;
But sweetly temper'd awe, and soften'd all he spoke.

He preach'd the joys of heav'n and pains of hell,

And warn'd the sinner with becoming zeal,

But on eternal mercy lov'd to dwell. ²⁹

He taught the gospel rather than the law,
And forc'd himself to drive, but lov'd to
draw:

For fear but freezes minds; but love, like
heat,

Exhales the soul sublime, to seek her native seat.

To threats the stubborn sinner oft is hard,

Wrapp'd in his crimes, against the storm
prepar'd;

But, when the milder beams of mercy play,
He melts, and throws his cumbrous cloak
away.

Lightnings and thunder (heav'n's artillery)

As harbingers before th' Almighty fly: 39
Those but proclaim his style, and disappear;
The stiller sound succeeds, and God is there.

The tithes his parish freely paid, he took;
But never sued, or curs'd with bell and book:
With patience bearing wrong, but off'ring
none,

Since every man is free to lose his own.
The country churls, according to their kind, (Who grudge their dues, and love to be behind,)

The less he sought his off'rings, pinch'd the
more.

And prais'd a priest contented to be poor.

Yet of his little he had some to spare, 50
To feed the famish'd, and to clothe the bare:
For mortified he was to that degree,
A poorer than himself he would not see.
True priests, he said, and preachers of the
word,

Were only stewards of their sovereign
Lord:

Nothing was theirs; but all the public store.
Intrusted riches, to relieve the poor;
Who, should they steal, for want of his
relief,

He judg'd himself accomplice with the thief.
Wide was his parish; not contracted
close 60

In streets, but here and there a straggling house;

Yet still he was at hand, without request,
To serve the sick, to succor the distress'd;
Tempting, on foot, alone, without affright,
The dangers of a dark, tempestuous night.

All this the good old man perform'd
alone,

Nor spar'd his pains; for curate he had none.
Nor durst he trust another with his care;

Nor rode himself to Paul's, the public fair,
To chaffer for preferment with his gold, 70
Where bishoprics and sinecures are sold;
But duly watch'd his flock, by night and

day,
And from the prowling wolf redeem'd
the prey,
And hungry sent the wily fox away.

The proud he tam'd, the penitent he
cheer'd,

Nor to rebuke the rich offender fear'd.
His preaching much, but more his practice
wrought;

(A living sermon of the truths he taught;)
For this by rules severe his life he squar'd,
That all might see the doctrine which they
heard. 80

For priests, he said, are patterns for the rest;
(The gold of heav'n, who bear the God im-
press'd;)

But when the precious coin is kept unclean,
The sovereign's image is no longer seen.
If they be foul on whom the people trust,
Well may the baser brass contract a rust.

The prelate for his holy life he priz'd;
The worldly pomp of prelacy despis'd.
His Savior came not with a gaudy show,
Nor was his kingdom of the world below. 90
Patience in want, and poverty of mind,
These marks of Church and Churchmen
he design'd,

And living taught, and dying left behind.
The crown he wore was of the pointed thorn;
In purple he was crucified, not born.
They who contend for place and high degree
Are not his sons, but those of Zebedee.

Not but he knew the signs of earthly
pow'r

Might well become Saint Peter's successor:
The holy father holds a double reign; 100
The prince may keep his pomp, the fisher must be plain.

Such was the saint; who shone with every
grace,

Reflecting, Moses-like, his Maker's face.
God saw his image lively was express'd,
And his own work, as in creation, bless'd.

The tempter saw him too, with envious
eye;

And, as on Job, demanded leave to try.
He took the time when Richard was depos'd,
And high and low with happy Harry clos'd.
This prince, tho' great in arms, the priest
withstood; 110

Near tho' he was, yet not the next of blood.

Had Richard, unconstrain'd, resign'd the throne,
A king can give no more than is his own;
The title stood entail'd, had Richard had a son.

Conquest, an odious name, was laid aside,
Where all submitted, none the battle tried.
The senseless plea of right by providence
Was, by a flatt'ring priest, invented since;
And lasts no longer than the present sway,
But justifies the next who comes in play. ¹²⁰

The people's right remains; let those who dare Dispute their pow'r, when they the judges are.

He join'd not in their choice, because he knew
Worse might, and often did, from change ensue.

Much to himself he thought, but little spoke;
And, underriv'd, his benefice forsook.

Now, thro' the land, his cure of souls he stretch'd,

And like a primitive apostle preach'd:
Still cheerful, ever constant to his call;
By many follow'd, lov'd by most, admir'd by all. ¹³⁰

With what he begg'd, his brethren he reliev'd,

And gave the charities himself receiv'd:
Gave, while he taught; and edified the more,
Because he shew'd, by proof, 't was easy to be poor.

He went not with the crowd to see a shrine,
But fed us, by the way, with food divine.

In deference to his virtues, I forbear
To shew you what the rest in orders were:
This brilliant is so spotless and so bright,
He needs no foil, but shines by his own proper light. ¹⁴⁰

CYMON AND IPHIGENIA

FROM BOCCACE

Poeta loquitur

OLD as I am, for ladies' love unfit,
The pow'r of beauty I remember yet,
Which once inflam'd my soul, and still inspires my wit.
If love be folly, the severe divine
Has felt that folly, tho' he censures mine;

Pollutes the pleasures of a chaste embrace,
Acts what I write, and propagates in grace,
With riotous excess, a priestly race.
Suppose him free, and that I forge th' offense,

He shew'd the way, perverting first my sense:
In malice witty, and with venom fraught,
He makes me speak the things I never thought.

Compute the gains of his ungovern'd zeal;
Ill suits his cloth the praise of railing well.
The world will think that what we loosely write,

Tho' now arraign'd, he read with some delight;

Because he seems to chew the cud again,
When his broad comment makes the text too plain;

And teaches more in one explaining page,
Than all the double meanings of the stage. ²⁰
What needs he paraphrase on what we mean?

We were at worst but wanton; he's obscene.
I nor my fellows nor myself excuse;
But love's the subject of the comic Muse:
Nor can we write without it, nor would you
A tale of only dry instruction view.

Nor love is always of a vicious kind,
But oft to virtuous acts inflames the mind,
Awakes the sleepy vigor of the soul,
And, brushing o'er, adds motion to the pool.
Love, studious how to please, improves our parts ³¹

With polish'd manners, and adorns with arts.

Love first invented verse, and form'd the rhyme,

The motion measur'd, harmoniz'd the chime;
To lib'ral acts enlarg'd the narrow-soul'd,
Softened the fierce, and made the coward bold;

The world, when waste, he peopled with increase,

And warring nations reconcil'd in peace.
Ormond, the first, and all the fair may find,

In this one legend, to their fame design'd,
When beauty fires the blood, how love exalts the mind. ⁴¹

IN that sweet isle where Venus keeps her court,

And ev'ry grace, and all the loves, resort;

Where either sex is form'd of softer earth,
And takes the bent of pleasure from their
birth;

There liv'd a Cyprian lord, above the rest
Wise, wealthy, with a num'rous issue blest.

But, as no gift of fortune is sincere,
Was only wanting in a worthy heir:
His eldest born, a goodly youth to view, ⁵⁰
Excell'd the rest in shape and outward
shew;

Fair, tall, his limbs with due proportion
join'd,

But of a heavy, dull, degenerate mind.
His soul belied the features of his face;
Beauty was there, but beauty in disgrace.
A clownish mien, a voice with rustic sound,
And stupid eyes that ever lov'd the ground.
He look'd like Nature's error, as the mind
And body were not of a piece design'd,
But made for two, and by mistake in one were join'd. ⁶⁰

The ruling rod, the father's forming care,
Were exercis'd in vain on wit's despair;
The more inform'd, the less he understood,
And deeper sunk by flound'ring in the mud.
Now scorn'd of all, and grown the public
shame,

The people from Galesus chang'd his name,
And Cymon call'd, which signifies a brute;
So well his name did with his nature suit.

His father, when he found his labor lost,
And care employ'd that answer'd not the cost. ⁷⁰

Chose an ungrateful object to remove,
And loath'd to see what Nature made him
love;

So to his country farm the fool confin'd,
Rude work well suited with a rustic mind.
Thus to the wilds the sturdy Cymon went,
A squire among the swains, and pleas'd with banishment.

His corn and cattle were his only care,
And his supreme delight, a country fair.

It happen'd on a summer's holiday,
That to the greenwood shade he took his way; ⁸⁰

For Cymon shunn'd the church, and us'd not much to pray.

His quarterstaff, which he could ne'er forsake,

Hung half before, and half behind his back.
He trudg'd along, unknowing what he
sought,

And whistled as he went, for want of
thought.

By chance conducted, or by thirst con-
strain'd,

The deep recesses of the grove he gain'd,
Where in a plain, defended by the wood,
Crept thro' the matted grass a crystal
flood,

By which an alabaster fountain stood; ⁹⁰
And on the margin of the fount was laid (Attended by her slaves) a sleeping maid;
Like Dian and her nymphs, when, tir'd with
sport,

To rest by cool Eurotas they resort.

The dame herself the goddess well ex-
press'd,

Not more distinguish'd by her purple vest,
Than by the charming features of her face,
And, ev'n in slumber, a superior grace:

Her comely limbs compos'd with decent
care.

Her body shaded with a slight simar; ¹⁰⁰
Her bosom to the view was only bare,
Where two beginning paps were scarcely
spied,

For yet their places were but signified.

The fanning wind upon her bosom blows,
To meet the fanning wind the bosom rose;
The fanning wind and purling streams continue her repose.

The fool of nature stood with stupid eyes,
And gaping mouth, that testified surprise,
Fix'd on her face, nor could remove his sight,
New as he was to love, and novice in delight: ¹¹⁰

Long mute he stood, and, leaning on his staff,

His wonder witness'd with an idiot laugh;
Then would have spoke, but by his glimmering sense

First found his want of words, and fear'd
offense;

Doubted for what he was he should be
known,

By his clown accent and his country tone.

Thro' the rude chaos thus the running
light

Shot the first ray that pierc'd the native
night;

Then day and darkness in the mass were
mix'd,

Till, gather'd in a globe, the beams were fix'd; ¹²⁰

Last shone the sun, who, radiant in his sphere,

Illumin'd heav'n and earth, and roll'd around the year.

So reason in this brutal soul began:
Love made him first suspect he was a man;
Love made him doubt his broad barbarian
sound;

By love his want of words and wit he found;
That sense of want prepar'd the future way
To knowledge, and disclos'd the promise of a day.

What not his father's care, nor tutor's art,
Could plant with pains in his unpolish'd
heart,

The best instructor, Love, at once inspir'd,
As barren grounds to fruitfulness are fir'd:
Love taught him shame, and shame, with love at strife,

Soon taught the sweet civilities of life;
His gross material soul at once could find
Somewhat in her excelling all her kind,
Exciting a desire till then unknown,
Somewhat unfound, or found in her alone.
This made the first impression in his mind,
Above, but just above, the brutal kind: ¹³⁰
For beasts can like, but not distinguish too,
Nor their own liking by reflection know;
Nor why they like or this or t'other face,
Or judge of this or that peculiar grace;
But love in gross, and stupidly admire;
As flies, allur'd by light, approach the fire.
Thus our man-beast, advancing by degrees,
First likes the whole, then seprates what he sees;

On sev'ral parts a sev'ral praise bestows,
The ruby lips, the well-proportion'd nose, ¹³⁰
The snowy skin, the raven-glossy hair,
The dimpled cheek, the forehead rising
fair,

And, ev'n in sleep itself, a smiling air. }
From thence his eyes descending view'd the
rest,

Her plump round arms, white hands, and heaving breast.

Long on the last he dwelt, tho' ev'ry part
A pointed arrow sped to pierce his heart.

Thus in a trice a judge of beauty grown,
(A judge erected from a country clown,)
He long'd to see her eyes, in slumber hid,
And wish'd his own could pierce within the lid:

He would have wak'd her, but restrain'd his thought,
And love new-born the first good manners
taught.

An awful fear his ardent wish withstood,
Nor durst disturb the goddess of the wood;
For such she seem'd by her celestial face,

Excelling all the rest of human race;
And things divine, by common sense he
knew,

Must be devoutly seen, at distant view.

So, checking his desire, with trembling
heart

Gazing he stood, nor would, nor could de-
part;

Fix'd as a pilgrim wilder'd in his way,
Who dares not stir by night, for fear to stray,

But stands with awful eyes to watch the dawn of day.

At length awaking, Iphigene the fair (So was the beauty call'd, who caus'd his
care)

Unclos'd her eyes, and double day reveal'd, While those of all her slaves in sleep were seal'd.

The slaving cudden, propp'd upon his
staff,

Stood ready gaping with a grinning laugh,
To welcome her awake, nor durst begin
To speak, but wisely kept the fool within.

Then she: "What make you, Cymon, here
alone?"

(For Cymon's name was round the country
known,

Because descended of a noble race,
And for a soul ill sorted with his face.)

But still the sot stood silent with surprise,
With fix'd regard on her new open'd eyes,
And in his breast receiv'd th' invenom'd
dart,

A tickling pain that pleas'd amid the smart.
But conscious of her form, with quick distrust

She saw his sparkling eyes, and fear'd his brutal lust:

This to prevent, she wak'd her sleepy crew,
And rising hasty, took a short adieu.

Then Cymon first his rustic voice essay'd,
With proffer'd service to the parting maid,
To see her safe; his hand she long denied,
But took at length, asham'd of such a guide.
So Cymon led her home, and, leaving there,
No more would to his country clowns repair,

But sought his father's house, with better
mind;

Refusing in the farm to be confin'd.

The father wonder'd at the son's return,
And knew not whether to rejoice or mourn;
But doubtfully receiv'd, expecting still
To learn the secret causes of his alter'd will.

Nor was he long delay'd; the first request
He made, was like his brothers to be
dress'd,

And, as his birth requir'd, above the rest.
With ease his suit was granted by his
sire, 210

Distinguishing his heir by rich attire:
His body thus adorn'd, he next design'd
With lib'ral arts to cultivate his mind;
He sought a tutor of his own accord,
And studied lessons he before abhorr'd.

Thus the man-child advanc'd, and learn'd
so fast,

That in short time his equals he surpass'd:
His brutal manners from his breast exil'd,
His mien he fashion'd, and his tongue he fil'd;

In ev'ry exercise of all admir'd, 220
He seem'd, nor only seem'd, but was in-
spir'd:

Inspir'd by love, whose business is to please;
He rode, he fenc'd, he mov'd with graceful
ease,

More fam'd for sense, for courtly carriage
more,

Than for his brutal folly known before

What then of alter'd Cymon shall we say,
But that the fire which chok'd in ashes lay,
A load too heavy for his soul to move,
Was upward blown below, and brush'd away by love?

Love made an active progress thro' his
mind; 230

The dusky parts he clear'd, the gross re-
fin'd,

The drowsy wak'd; and, as he went, im-
press'd

The Maker's image on the human beast.

Thus was the man amended by desire,
And, tho' he lov'd perhaps with too much
fire,

His father all his faults with reason scann'd,
And lik'd an error of the better hand;
Excus'd th' excess of passion in his mind,
By flames too fierce, perhaps too much re-
fin'd.

So Cymon, since his sire indulg'd his will, 240
Impetuous lov'd, and would be Cymon still;
Galesus he disown'd, and chose to bear
The name of fool, confirm'd and bishop'd by the fair.

To Cipeus by his friends his suit he mov'd,

Cipeus the father of the fair he lov'd.
But he was pre-ingag'd by former ties,

While Cymon was endeavoring to be wise;
And Iphigene, oblig'd by former vows,
Had giv'n her faith to wed a foreign spouse:
Her sire and she to Rhodian Pasimond, 250
Tho' both repenting, were by promise bound,
Nor could retract; and thus, as fate decreed,
Tho' better lov'd, he spoke too late to speed.

The doom was past, the ship already sent
Did all his tardy diligence prevent;
Sigh'd to herself the fair unhappy maid,
While stormy Cymon thus in secret said:
"The time is come for Iphigene to find
The miracle she wrought upon my mind:
Her charms have made me man, her ravish'd
love 260

In rank shall place me with the blest above;
For, mine by love, by force she shall be
mine,

Or death, if force should fail, shall finish my design."

Resolv'd he said; and rigg'd with speedy
care

A vessel strong, and well equipp'd for war.
The secret ship with chosen friends he
stor'd;

And, bent to die or conquer, went aboard.
Ambush'd he lay behind the Cyprian shore,
Waiting the sail that all his wishes bore;
Nor long expected, for the following tide 270
Sent out the hostile ship and beauteous
bride.

To Rhodes the rival bark directly steer'd,
When Cymon sudden at her back appear'd,
And stopp'd her flight; then, standing on his prow,

In haughty terms he thus defied the foe:
"Or strike your sails at summons, or pre-
pare

To prove the last extremities of war."

Thus warn'd the Rhodians for the fight provide;

Already were the vessels side by side,
These obstinate to save, and those to seize
the bride. 280

But Cymon soon his crooked grapples
cast,

Which with tenacious hold his foes em-
brac'd,

And, arm'd with sword and shield, amid the press he pass'd.

Fierce was the fight, but, hast'ning to his
prey,

By force the furious lover freed his way;
Himself alone dispers'd the Rhodian crew,
The weak disdain'd, the valiant overthrew;

Cheap conquest for his following friends
remain'd,
He reap'd the field, and they but only glean'd.

His victory confess'd, the foes retreat,²⁹⁰
And cast their weapons at the victor's feet.
Whom thus he cheer'd: "O Rhodian youth,
I fought

For love alone, nor other booty sought;
Your lives are safe; your vessel I resign;
Yours be your own, restoring what is mine:
In Iphigene I claim my rightful due,
Robb'd by my rival, and detain'd by you.
Your Pasimond a lawless bargain drove;
The parent could not sell the daughter's
love;

Or if he could, my love disdains the laws,³⁰⁰
And like a king by conquest gains his
cause:

Where arms take place, all other pleas are
vain;

Love taught me force, and force shall love
maintain.

You, what by strength you could not keep,
release,

And at an easy ransom buy your peace."

Fear on the conquer'd side soon sign'd th'
accord,

And Iphigene to Cymon was restor'd:
While to his arms the blushing bride he
took,

To seeming sadness she compos'd her look;
As if by force subjected to his will,³¹⁰
Tho' pleas'd, dissembling, and a woman still.
And, for she wept, he wip'd her falling tears,
And pray'd her to dismiss her empty fears;
"For yours I am," he said, "and have de-
serv'd

Your love much better, whom so long I
serv'd,

Than he to whom your formal father tied Your vows, and sold a slave, not sent a
bride."

Thus while he spoke, he seiz'd the willing
prey,

As Paris bore the Spartan spouse away;
Faintly she scream'd, and ev'n her eyes confess'd³²⁰

She rather would be thought, than was dis-
tress'd.

Who now exults but Cymon in his
mind?

Vain hopes, and empty joys of human-
kind,

Proud of the present, to the future blind!

Secure of fate while Cymon plows the sea,
And steers to Candy with his conquer'd
prey,

Scarce the third glass of measur'd hours
was run,

When like a fiery meteor sunk the sun;
The promise of a storm; the shifting gales
Forsake by fits, and fill, the flagging sails; Hoarse murmurs of the main from far were heard,³³¹

And night came on, not by degrees prepar'd,
But all at once; at once the winds arise,
The thunders roll, the fork lightning flies.
In vain the master issues out commands,
In vain the trembling sailors ply their hands;
The tempest unforeseen prevents their care,
And from the first they labor in despair.

The giddy ship betwixt the winds and tides,
Fore'd back and forwards, in a circle rides, Stunn'd with the diff'rent blows; then shoots again,³⁴¹

Till counterbuff'd, she stops, and sleeps
again.

Not more aghast the proud archangel fell, Plung'd from the height of heav'n to deepest hell,

Than stood the lover of his love possess'd,
Now curst the more, the more he had been blest;

More anxious for her danger than his own,
Death he defies, but would be lost alone.

Sad Iphigene to womanish complaints Adds pious pray'rs, and wearies all the saints;³⁵⁰

Ev'n if she could, her love she would repent,

But since she cannot, dreads the punishment;

Her forfeit faith, and Pasimond betray'd,
Are ever present, and her crime upbraid.
She blames herself, nor blames her lover
less;

Augments her anger, as her fears increase;
From her own back the burden would re-
move,

And lays the load on his ungovern'd love,
Which interposing durst, in Heav'n's despite,
Invade and violate another's right:³⁶⁰

The pow'rs incens'd a while deferr'd his
pain,

And made him master of his vows in vain;
But soon they punish'd his presumptuous
pride;

That for his daring enterprise she died,
Who rather not resisted than complied.

Then, impotent of mind, with alter'd
sense,
She hugg'd th' offender, and forgave th'
offense;
Sex to the last: meantime, with sails de-
clin'd,
The wand'ring vessel drove before the
wind;
Toss'd and retoss'd, aloft, and then alow, }
Nor port they seek, nor certain course }
they know,
But ev'ry moment wait the coming blow. }

Thus blindly driv'n, by breaking day they
view'd

The land before 'em, and their fears re-
new'd;

The land was welcome, but the tempest
bore

The threaten'd ship against a rocky shore.

A winding bay was near; to this they
bent,

And just escap'd, their force already spent.
Secure from storms, and panting from the
sea,

The land unknown at leisure they survey; }
And saw (but soon their sickly sight withdrew)

The rising tow'rs of Rhodes at distant view;
And curs'd the hostile shore of Pasimond, Sav'd from the seas, and shipwreck'd on the
ground.

The frighted sailors tried their strength
in vain,

To turn the stern, and tempt the stormy
main;

But the stiff wind withstood the lab'ring
oar,

And forc'd them forward on the fatal shore!
The crooked keel now bites the Rhodian
strand,

And the ship moor'd constrains the crew to
land:

Yet still they might be safe, because un-
known;

But, as ill fortune seldom comes alone,
The vessel they dismiss'd was driv'n before,
Already shelter'd on their native shore.

Known each, they know; but each with change of cheer;

The vanquish'd side exults; the victors fear
Not them but theirs, made pris'ners ere they fight,

Despairing conquest, and depriv'd of flight.

The country rings around with loud
alarms,

And raw in fields the rude militia swarms;
Mouths without hands; maintain'd at vast
expense,

In peace a charge, in war a weak defense:
Stout once a month they march, a blust'ring
band,

And ever, but in times of need, at hand.
This was the morn when, issuing on the
guard,

Drawn up in rank and file they stood pre-
par'd

Of seeming arms to make a short essay,
Then hasten to be drunk, the business of the day.

The cowards would have fled, but that they knew

Themselves so many, and their foes so few;
But crowding on, the last the first impel,
Till overborne with weight the Cyprians
fell.

Cymon inslav'd, who first the war begun,
And Iphigene once more is lost and won.

Deep in a dungeon was the captive cast,
Depriv'd of day, and held in fetters fast;
His life was only spar'd at their request,
Whom taken he so nobly had releas'd.

But Iphigenia was the ladies' care,
Each in their turn address'd to treat the
fair;

While Pasimond and his the nuptial feast
prepare.

Her secret soul to Cymon was inclin'd,
But she must suffer what her fates as-
sign'd;

So passive is the church of womankind.

What worse to Cymon could his Fortune
deal,

Roll'd to the lowest spoke of all her wheel?
It rested to dismiss the downward weight,
Or raise him upward to his former height;
The latter pleas'd, and Love (concern'd the most)

Prepar'd th' amends for what by love he lost.

The sire of Pasimond had left a son,
Tho' younger, yet for courage early known,
Ormisda call'd; to whom, by promise tied,
A Rhodian beauty was the destin'd bride:
Cassandra was her name, above the rest Renown'd for birth, with fortune amply blest.

Lysimachus, who rul'd the Rhodian state,
Was then by choice their annual magistrate:

He lov'd Cassandra too with equal fire,

But Fortune had not favor'd his desire; 440
Cross'd by her friends, by her not disap-prov'd,

Nor yet preferr'd, or like Ormisda lov'd.
So stood th' affair; some little hope re-
main'd,

That, should his rival chance to lose, he
gain'd.

Meantime young Pasimond his marriage
press'd,

Ordain'd the nuptial day, prepar'd the feast;
And frugally resolv'd (the charge to shun,
Which would be double should he wed
alone)

To join his brother's bridal with his own.

Lysimachus, oppress'd with mortal grief,
Receiv'd the news, and studied quick relief. 451

The fatal day approach'd: if force were
us'd,

The magistrate his public trust abus'd;
To justice liable, as law requir'd,

For when his office ceas'd, his pow'r expir'd:

While pow'r remain'd, the means were in his hand

By force to seize, and then forsake the land.
Betwixt extremes he knew not how to
move,

A slave to fame, but more a slave to love:
Restraining others, yet himself not free, 460
Made impotent by pow'r, debas'd by dignity!

Both sides he weigh'd; but, after much debate,

The man prevail'd above the magistrate.
Love never fails to master what he finds,

But works a diff'rent way in diff'rent minds,

The fool enlightens, and the wise he blinds.

This youth, proposing to possess and scape,
Began in murder, to conclude in rape:

Unprais'd by me, tho' Heav'n sometime may bless

An impious act with undeserv'd success; 470
The great, it seems, are privileg'd alone
To punish all injustice but their own.

But here I stop, not daring to proceed,
Yet blush to flatter an unrighteous deed:
For crimes are but permitted, not decreed.

Resolv'd on force, his wit the prætor bent,
To find the means that might secure th'
event;

Nor long he labor'd, for his lucky thought
In captive Cymon found the friend he
sought.

Th' example pleas'd: the cause and crime
the same; 480

An injur'd lover, and a ravish'd dame.
How much he durst he knew by what he dar'd,

The less he had to lose, the less he car'd
To menage loathsome life when love was the reward.

This ponder'd well, and fix'd on his in-
tent,

In depth of night he for the pris'n'r sent;
In secret sent, the public view to shun;
Then with a sober smile he thus begun:

"The pow'r's above, who bounteously bestow 489

Their gifts and graces on mankind below,
Yet prove our merit first, nor blindly give
To such as are not worthy to receive;
For valor and for virtue they provide

Their due reward, but first they must be tried.

These fruitful seeds within your mind they sow'd;

'T was yours t' improve the talent they be-
stow'd:

They gave you to be born of noble kind;
They gave you love to lighten up your mind,
And purge the grosser parts; they gave you care 491

To please, and courage to deserve the fair.
"Thus far they tried you, and by proof
they found

The grain intrusted in a grateful ground;
But still the great experiment remain'd —
They suffer'd you to lose the prize you
gain'd,

That you might learn the gift was theirs
alone,

And, when restor'd, to them the blessing
own.

Restor'd it soon will be; the means pre-
par'd,

The difficulty smooth'd, the danger shar'd:
Be but yourself, the care to me resign,
Then Iphigene is yours, Cassandra mine. 510

Your rival Pasimond pursues your life,
Impatient to revenge his ravish'd wife,
But yet not his; to-morrow is behind,

And Love our fortunes in one band has
join'd.

Two brothers are our foes, Ormisda mine,
As much declar'd as Pasimond is thine;

To-morrow must their common vows be
tied:
With Love to friend, and Fortune for our
guide,
Let both resolve to die, or each redeem
a bride.

"Right I have none, nor hast thou much to plead; ⁵²⁰

'T is force, when done, must justify the deed:
Our task perform'd, we next prepare for
flight,

And let the losers talk in vain of right.
We with the fair will sail before the wind;
If they are griev'd, I leave the laws behind.
Speak thy resolves: if now thy courage
droop,

Despair in prison, and abandon hope;
But if thou dar'st in arms thy love regain,
(For liberty without thy love were vain,)
Then second my design to seize the prey, ⁵³⁰
Or lead to second rape, for well thou know'st
the way."

Said Cymon, overjoy'd: "Do thou propose
The means to fight, and only shew the foes:
For from the first, when love had fir'd my
mind,

Resolv'd, I left the care of life behind."

To this the bold Lysimachus replied:
"Let Heav'n be neuter, and the sword decide:

The spousals are prepar'd, already play
The minstrels, and provoke the tardy day;
By this the brides are wak'd, their grooms are dress'd; ⁵⁴⁰

All Rhodes is summon'd to the nuptial
feast,

All but myself, the sole unbidden guest.)
Unbidden tho' I am, I will be there,
And, join'd by thee, intend to joy the fair.

"Now hear the rest: when day resigns
the light,

And cheerful torches gild the jolly night,
Be ready at my call; my chosen few
With arms administer'd shall aid thy crew.
Then ent'ring unexpected will we seize Our destin'd prey, from men dissolv'd in ease, ⁵⁵⁰

By wine disabled, unprepar'd for fight;
And, hast'ning to the seas, suborn our flight.
The seas are ours, for I command the fort;
A ship well mann'd expects us in the port:
If they, or if their friends, the prize contest,
Death shall attend the man who dares resist."

It pleas'd ! The pris'ner to his hold re-
tir'd;
His troop, with equal emulation fir'd,
All fix'd to fight, and all their wonted work requir'd.

The sun arose; the streets were throng'd around, ⁵⁶⁰
The palace open'd, and the posts were
crown'd;

The double bridegroom at the door attends Th' expected spouse, and entertains the friends.

They meet, they lead to church; the priests
invoke

The pow'rs, and feed the flames with fragrant smoke:

This done, they feast, and at the close of
night

By kindled torches vary their delight;
These lead the lively dance, and those the brimming bowls invite.

Now, at th' appointed place and hour as-
sign'd,

With souls resolv'd the ravishers were join'd. ⁵⁷⁰

Three hands are form'd; the first is sent
before

To favor the retreat and guard the shore,
The second at the palace gate is plac'd,
And up the lofty stairs ascend the last:
A peaceful troop they seem with shining vests,

But coats of mail beneath secure their breasts.

Dauntless they enter, Cymon at their
head,

And find the feast renew'd, the table spread:
Sweet voices, mix'd with instrumental
sounds,

Ascend the vaulted roof, the vaulted roof rebounds. ⁵⁸⁰

When, like the harpies, rushing thro' the hall,

The sudden troop appears, the tables fall,
Their smoking load is on the pavement
thrown;

Each ravisher prepares to seize his own:
The brides, invaded with a rude embrace,
Shriek out for aid, confusion fills the place.
Quick to redeem the prey, their plighted lords

Advance; the palace gleams with shining
swords.

But late is all defense, and succor vain;
The rape is made, the ravishers remain: ⁵⁹⁰

Two sturdy slaves were only sent before
To bear the purchas'd prize in safety to the shore.

The troop retires, the lovers close the
rear,

With forward faces not confessing fear:
Backward they move, but scorn their pace
to mend;

Then seek the stairs, and with slow haste
descend.

Fierce Pasimond, their passage to prevent,
Thrust full on Cymon's back in his descent;

The blade return'd unbath'd, and to the handle bent.

Stout Cymon soon remounts, and cleft in two ⁶⁰⁰

His rival's head with one descending
blow;

And, as the next in rank Ormisda stood,
He turn'd the point; the sword, inur'd to
blood,

Bor'd his unguarded breast, which pour'd
a purple flood.

With vow'd revenge the gath'ring crowd
pursues,

The ravishers turn head, the fight re-
news;

The hall is heap'd with corps; the sprinkled
gore

Besmears the walls, and floats the marble floor.

Dispers'd at length the drunken squadron
flies;

The victors to their vessel bear the prize; ⁶¹⁰

And hear behind loud groans and lamentable cries.

The crew with merry shouts their anchors weigh,

Then ply their oars, and brush the buxom
sea,

While troops of gather'd Rhodians crowd
the key.

What should the people do when left alone?

The governor and government are gone;

The public wealth to foreign parts convey'd;

Some troops disbanded, and the rest unpaid.

Rhodes is the sovereign of the sea no more;

Their ships unrigg'd, and spent their naval store; ⁶²⁰

They neither could defend, nor can pursue,

But grind their teeth, and cast a helpless
view:

In vain with darts a distant war they try;

Short, and more short, the missive weapons
fly.

Meanwhile the ravishers their crimes enjoy,

And flying sails and sweeping oars employ:

The cliffs of Rhodes in little space are lost;

Jove's isle they seek, nor Jove denies his
coast.

In safety landed on the Candian shore,

With generous wines their spirits they restore: ⁶³⁰

There Cymon with his Rhodian friend re-
sides;

Both court, and wed at once the willing brides.

A war ensues, the Cretans own their cause,

Stiff to defend their hospitable laws:

Both parties lose by turns; and neither wins,

Till peace propounded by a truce begins.

The kindred of the slain forgive the deed,

But a short exile must for show precede:

The term expir'd, from Candia they remove,

And happy each at home enjoys his love. ⁶⁴⁰

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, SONG, AND SECULAR MASQUE FROM THE PILGRIM

[On April 11, 1700, Dryden writes to Mrs. Steward: "Within this moneth there will be play'd for my profit, an old play of Fletcher's, call'd The Pilgrim, corrected by my good friend, Mr. Vanbrook [i. e. Vanbrugh]; to which I have added a new Masque, and am to write a new Prologue and Epilogue" (Malone, I, 2; 131, 132). It is not known whether this performance took place before May 1, the date of Dryden's death. The play as printed, June 18, 1700 (Malone, I, 1; 330, 331, on the authority of an advertisement in the London Gazette), closed with the following speech of the Governor: "I hope, before you go, sir, you'll share with us an entertainment the late great poet of our age prepar'd to celebrate this day. Let the masque begin." Late may or may not have been inserted between the time of acting and that of printing. It was probably the original intention, as Malone suggests, to have the play acted on March 25, on which day the year was then considered to begin. The Secular Masque would thus celebrate a day generally regarded as the opening of a new century.

The Song was probably written for the mad-house scene in the third act of the play. A scholar is there about to be discharged as sane, but immediately after shows his madness, fancying himself Neptune stilling a tempest; his mistress is Dryden's own invention.

The title of the play, as published in 1700, reads as follows: The Pilgrim, a Comedy: As it is Acted at the Theatre-Royal, in Drury-Lane. Written Originally by Mr. Fletcher, and now very much Alter'd, with several Additions. Likewise a Prologue, Epilogue, Dialogue, and Masque, Written by the late Great Poet Mr. Dryden, just before his Death, being the last of his Works.]

PROLOGUE

How wretched is the fate of those who write,
Brought muzzled to the stage, for fear they bite!

Where, like Tom Dove, they stand the common foe;

Lugg'd by the critic, baited by the beau.
Yet worse, their brother poets damn the play,

And roar the loudest, tho' they never pay.
The fops are proud of scandal, for they cry,

At every lewd, low character: "That's I."
He who writes letters to himself would swear

The world forgot him, if he was not there.
What should a poet do? 'Tis hard for one

To pleasure all the fools that would be shown,

And yet not two in ten will pass the town.
Most coxcombs are not of the laughing kind;

More goes to make a fop than fops can find.

Quack Maurus, tho' he never took degrees

In either of our universities,
Yet to be shown by some kind wit he looks,

Because he play'd the fool, and writ three books.

But, if he would be worth a poet's pen, ²⁰
He must be more a fool, and write again;
For all the former fustian stuff he wrote
Was dead-born dogg'rel, or is quite forgot;

His man of Uz, stripp'd of his Hebrew robe,

Is just the proverb, and as poor as Job.

One would have thought he could no longer jog;

But Arthur was a level, Job's a bog.

There, tho' he crept, yet still he kept in sight;

But here he founders in, and sinks downright.

Had he prepar'd us, and been dull by rule, ³⁰

Tobit had first been turn'd to ridicule;

But our bold Briton, without fear or awe,

O'erleaps at once the whole Apocrypha;

Invades the Psalms with rhymes, and leaves no room

For any Vandal Hopkins yet to come.

But what if, after all, this godly gear

Is not so senseless as it would appear?

Our mountebank has laid a deeper train;

His cant, like Merry Andrew's noble vein, }

Catealls the sects, to draw 'em in again. }

At leisure hours, in epic song he deals, ⁴¹

Writes to the rumbling of his coach's wheels,

Prescribes in haste, and seldom kills by rule,

But rides triumphant between stool and stool.

Well, let him go; 'tis yet too early day,

To get himself a place in farce or play.

We know not by what name we should arraign him,

For no one category can contain him;

A pedant, canting preacher, and a quack,

Are load enough to break one ass's back: ⁵⁰

At last grown wanton, he presum'd to write,

Traduc'd two kings, their kindness to requite;

One made the doctor, and one dubb'd the knight. }

EPILOGUE

PERHAPS the parson stretch'd a point too far,

When with our theaters he wag'd a war.

He tells you that this very moral age

Receiv'd the first infection from the stage.

But sure, a banish'd court, with lewdness fraught,

The seeds of open vice, returning, brought.

Thus lodg'd, (as vice by great example thrives,)

It first debauch'd the daughters and the wives.

London, a fruitful soil, yet never bore

So plentiful a crop of horns before. ¹⁰
The poets, who must live by courts, or starve,

Were proud so good a government to serve;
And, mixing with buffoons and pimps profane,

Tainted the stage, for some small snip of gain.

For they, like harlots, under bawds profess'd,

Took all th' ungodly pains, and got the least.

Thus did the thriving malady prevail,
The court its head, the poets but the tail.
The sin was of our native growth, 't is true;

The scandal of the sin was wholly new. ²⁰
Misses there were, but modestly conceal'd;
Whitehall the naked Venus first reveal'd,
Who standing, as at Cyprus, in her shrine,
The strumpet was ador'd with rites divine.

Ere this, if saints had any secret motion,
'T was chamber practice all, and close devotion.

I pass the peccadillos of their time;
Nothing but open lewdness was a crime.
A monarch's blood was venial to the nation,

Compar'd with one foul act of fornication.
Now, they would silence us, and shut the door ³¹

That let in all the barefac'd vice before.
As for reforming us, which some pretend,

That work in England is without an end:

Well we may change, but we shall never mend.

Yet, if you can but bear the present stage,
We hope much better of the coming age.

What would you say, if we should first begin

To stop the trade of love behind the scene,
Where actresses make bold with married men? ⁴⁰

For while abroad so prodigal the dolt is,
Poor spouse at home as ragged as a colt is.
In short, we'll grow as moral as we can,

Save here and there a woman or a man;
But neither you, nor we, with all our pains,

Can make clean work; there will be some remains,

While you have still your Oates, and we our Haynes.

SONG OF A SCHOLAR AND HIS MISTRESS, WHO, BEING CROSS'D BY THEIR FRIENDS, FELL MAD FOR ONE ANOTHER, AND NOW FIRST MEET IN BEDLAM

Music within.

The lovers enter at opposite doors, each held by a keeper.

Phyllis. Look, look, I see — I see my love appear!

'T is he — 't is he alone;

For like him there is none:

'T is the dear, dear man; 't is thee, dear!

Amyntas. Hark! the winds war;

The foamy waves roar;

I see a ship afar,

Tossing and tossing, and making to the shore:

But what's that I view,

So radiant of hue — ¹⁰

St. Hermo, St. Hermo, that sits upon the sails?

Ah! No, no, no.

St. Hermo never, never shone so bright;

'T is Phyllis, only Phyllis, can shoot so fair a light;

'T is Phyllis, 't is Phyllis, that saves the ship alone,

For all the winds are hush'd, and the storm is overblown.

Phyllis. Let me go, let me run, let me fly to his arms.

Amyntas. If all the Fates combine,

And all the Furies join,

I'll force my way to Phyllis, and break thro' the charms. ²⁰

Here they break from their keepers, run to each other, and embrace.

Phyllis. Shall I marry the man I love?

And shall I conclude my pains?

Now blest be the powers above,
I feel the blood bound in my veins;

With a lively leap it began to
move,
And the vapors leave my brains.

Amyntas. Body join'd to body, and heart
join'd to heart,
To make sure of the cure,
Go call the man in black, to mumble o'er his part.

Phyllis. But suppose he should stay — 30

Amyntas. At worst if he delay,
'T is a work must be done;
We'll borrow but a day,
And the better the sooner
begun.

Chorus of Both.

At worst if he delay, &c.

They run out together hand in hand.

THE SECULAR MASQUE

Enter JANUS.

Janus. CHIRONOS, Chronos, mend thy
pace;
An hundred times the rolling sun
Around the radiant belt has
run
In his revolving race.
Behold, behold, the goal in sight;
Spread thy fans, and wing thy
flight.

Enter CHRONOS, with a scythe in his hand, and a great globe on his back, which he sets down at his entrance.

Chronos. Weary, weary of my weight,
Let me, let me drop my freight,
And leave the world behind.
I could not bear 10
Another year
The load of humankind.

Enter MOMUS, laughing

Momus. Ha! ha! ha! ha! ha! well hast thou done
To lay down thy pack,
And lighten thy back;
The world was a fool, e'er since it begun,
And since neither Janus, nor Chronos, nor I
Can hinder the crimes,
Or mend the bad times, 10
'T is better to laugh than to
cry.

Chorus of all Three.

'T is better to laugh than to cry.

Janus. Since Momus comes to laugh
below,

Old Time, begin the show,
That he may see, in every scene,
What changes in this age have
been.

Chronos. Then, goddess of the silver bow,
begin.

Horns, or hunting music within.

Enter DIANA.

Diana. With horns and with hounds I waken the day,
And hie to my woodland walks
away;
I tuck up my robe, and am bus-
kin'd soon,
And tie to my forehead a waxing
moon. 30
I course the fleet stag, unkennel
the fox,
And chase the wild goats o'er summits of rocks;
With shouting and hooting we
pierce thro' the sky,
And Echo turns hunter, and doubles the cry.

Chorus of All.

*With shouting and hooting we
pierce thro' the sky,
And Echo turns hunter, and doubles the cry.*

Janus. Then our age was in its prime:

Chronos. Free from rage:

Diana. And free from crime:

Momus. A very merry, dancing, drinking,
Laughing, quaffing, and unthink-
ing time. 40

Chorus of All.

*Then our age was in its prime,
Free from rage, and free from
crime;
A very merry, dancing, drinking,
Laughing, quaffing, and unthink-
ing time.*

Dance of DIANA's attendants.

Enter MARS.

Mars. Inspire the vocal brass, inspire;
The world is past its infant age:
Arms and honor,
Arms and honor,
Set the martial mind on fire,
And kindle manly rage. 50

Mars has look'd the sky to red;
 And Peace, the lazy good, is fled.
 Plenty, Peace, and Pleasure fly;
 The sprightly green
 In woodland walks no more is
 seen;
 The sprightly green has drunk
 the Tyrian dye.

Chorus of All.

Plenty, Peace, &c.

Mars. Sound the trumpet, beat the drum;
 Thro' all the world around,
 Sound a reveille, sound, sound,
 The warrior god is come. 61

Chorus of All.

Sound the trumpet, &c.

Momus. Thy sword within the scabbard
 keep,
 And let mankind agree;
 Better the world were fast asleep,
 Than kept awake by thee.
 The fools are only thinner,
 With all our cost and care;
 But neither side a winner, 62
 For things are as they were.

Chorus of All.

The fools are only, &c.

Enter VENUS

Venus. Calms appear when storms are
 past,
 Love will have his hour at last:
 Nature is my kindly care;
 Mars destroys, and I repair;

Take me, take me, while you
 may;

Venus comes not ev'ry day.

Chorus of All.

Take her, take her, &c.

Chronos. The world was then so light,
 I scarcely felt the weight; 80
 Joy rul'd the day, and Love the
 night.

But since the Queen of Pleasure left the ground,

I faint, I lag,
 And feebly drag
 The pond'rous orb around.

Momus. All, all of a piece throughout:

Pointing to DIANA.

Thy chase had a beast in
 view;

To MARS.

Thy wars brought nothing about;

To VENUS.

Thy lovers were all untrue.

Janus. 'Tis well an old age is out: 90

Chronos. And time to begin a new.

Chorus of All.

All, all of a piece throughout:

Thy chase had a beast in view;

Thy wars brought nothing about;

Thy lovers were all untrue.

'Tis well an old age is out,

And time to begin a new.

Dance of houndsmen, nymphs, warriors, and lovers.

APPENDIX I

POEMS ATTRIBUTED TO DRYDEN OR ONLY IN PART WRITTEN BY HIM

[The canon of Dryden's writings is not easy to determine. Dryden seems to have had no trace of petty vanity in regard to his own minor works. For one of Tonson's miscellany volumes he might gather together a dozen old prologues and songs that he had lying by him, but further than this he made no attempt to collect his occasional poems. Hence it is likely that among the anonymous pieces printed in miscellanies, between 1660 and 1700, by busy and conscienceless editors, there may be found some written by him. After his death many pieces, some certainly genuine, others as certainly spurious, were published under his name.]

In the text of the present volume there are included several poems that are only in part by Dryden, or that may not be his work at all: see, for example, the headnotes on pages 76, 137. In the present Appendix there are included: (1) some pieces ascribed to Dryden in his own time, or shortly after it, but of doubtful authenticity; (2) some poems assigned to Dryden on internal evidence, in modern times; (3) a translation of Boileau's Art of Poetry, in which Dryden had some small share. Finally, there follows a series of titles of poems that have been printed in editions of Dryden's works, or have been otherwise attributed to him, but that are in all probability spurious. An explanatory note accompanies each title.]

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONG FROM THE INDIAN QUEEN

[This heroic play was first printed in Four New Plays . . . written by . . . Sir Robert Howard, 1665. It was first acted in January, 1664 (Pepys' Diary, January 27). Dryden's name was never joined to it in his lifetime; nor was the play included in the first collected edition of his dramatic works, published in 1701. But in his Connection of The Indian Emperor to The Indian Queen (Scott-Saintsbury edition, ii. 321) Dryden claims part of the latter drama as his own work. (Compare headnote, page 21.) It is therefore just possible that he is the author of one or more of the following pieces.]

PROLOGUE

As the music plays a soft air, the curtain rises softly, and discovers an Indian boy and girl sleeping under two plantain trees; and, when the curtain is almost up, the music turns into a tune expressing an alarm, at which the boy wakes, and speaks:

BOY. Wake, wake, Quevira! our soft rest must cease,

And fly together with our country's peace;
No more must we sleep under plantain shade,
Which neither heat could pierce, nor cold invade;

Where bounteous nature never feels decay,
And op'ning buds drive falling fruits away.

QUEVIRA. Why should men quarrel here, where all possess

As much as they can hope for by success?
None can have most, where nature is so kind
As to exceed man's use, tho' not his mind. 10

BOY. By ancient prophecies we have been told,

Our world shall be subdued by one more old;
And, see, that world already's hither come.

QUE. If these be they, we welcome then our doom.

Their looks are such that mercy flows from thence,

More gentle than our native innocence.

BOY. Why should we then fear these are enemies,

That rather seem to us like deities?

QUE. By their protection let us beg to live;
They came not here to conquer, but forgive. 10
If so, your goodness may your pow'r express,
And we shall judge both best by our success.

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BY MONTEZUMA

Not see what shifts we are inforc'd to try,
To help out wit with some variety;
Shows may be found that never yet were seen,
'Tis hard to find such wit as ne'er has been.
You have seen all that this old world could do,
We therefore try the fortune of the new,
And hope it is below your aim to hit
At untaught nature with your practice'd wit:
Our naked Indians, then, when wits appear,
Would as soon choose to have the Spaniards
here. 10

'Tis true, y' have marks enough, the plot, the show,

The poet's scenes, nay, more, the painter's too;
If all this fail, considering the cost,

'Tis a true voyage to the Indies lost:

But if you smile on all, then these designs,

Like the imperfect treasure of our minds,

Will pass for current wheresoe'er they go,

When to your bounteous hands their stamps they owe.

SONG IS SUPPOS'D SUNG BY AERIAL SPIRITS

POOR mortals that are clogg'd with earth below
Sink under love and care,

While we that dwell in air

Such heavy passions never know.

Why then should mortals be

Unwilling to be free

From blood, that sullen cloud

Which shining souls does shroud?

Then they'll shew bright,

And like us light,

When leaving bodies with their care,

They slide to us and air. 10

A SONG

[This song is found in Covent Garden Drollery, 1672. It is included here because of its resemblance to a song in An Evening's Love: compare page 58. It may have been a variation by Dryden on the same theme.]

I

FAIR was my mistress, and fine as a bride
That is deck'd in her wedding attire;
Her eyes do protest I shall not be denied,
And yet I dare hardly come nigh her.
I seem'd to be sad, and she smil'd,
Which I thought did a kindness betray;
Then forward I go,
But was dash'd with a no,
Yet came off with a ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha;
Hey, ha ha ha ha ha.

10

II

Strange was she then as a politic nun,
And I found my first courting was lost;
Her frowns put me farther then when I begun:
O see how poor mortals are cross'd!
I then made another assault,
When her kindness began to display;
And I brought her to this,
That she gave me a kiss.
And came off with a ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha;
Hey, ha ha ha ha ha.

20

III

High was my courage, but more my desire,
Which fed my addresses with force,
That you could not distinguish whose eyes had most fire,
Or who had the prettiest discourse.
Agreed we laid down and tumbled
Till both were weary of play:
Tho' I spent a full share,
Yet by Cupid I swear,
I came off with a ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha;
Hey, ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha.

ENJOYMENT

A SONG AT THE KING'S HOUSE

[This song is found, with title as above, in New Court Songs and Poems, by R. V., Gent., 1672, from which the following text is taken. It also occurs in Covent Garden Drollery, 1672, where it is headed simply Song. It is included here because of its resemblance to a song in Marriage à la Mode: compare page 68. It may have been a variation by Dryden on the same theme.]

I

So closely, closely press'd,
In his Clymena's arms young Damon lay;
Panting in that transport so o'er-blest,
He seem'd just ready, just to die away.
Clymena beheld him with amorous eyes,
And thus betwixt sighing and kissing she cries:
"O make not such haste to be gone:
'Tis too much unkind,
Whilst I stay behind,
For you to be dying alone."

10

II

This made the youth, now drawing to his end,
The happy moment of his death suspend;
But with so great a pain
His soul he did retain,
That with himself he seem'd at strife
Whether to let out love or keep in life.
Then she, who already was hasting to death,
Said softly, and trembling, and all out of
breath:
"O now, my love, now let us go!
Die with me, Damon, now; for I die too."²⁰
Thus died they, but 't was of so sweet a death,
That so to die again they took new breath.

[See headnote, page 68.]

I

FAREWELL, dear Revecchia, my joy and my
grief,
Too long I have lov'd you and found no relief;
Undone by your jailer too strict and severe,
Your eyes gave me love and he gives me despair.
Now urg'd by your interest I seek to retire
Far off from the cause of so hopeless a fire;
To stay near you still were in vain to torment
Your ears with a passion you must not content.

II

To live in the country with fools is less pain
Than still to endure an unwilling disdain;¹⁰
You're the cause of my exile, and far off I'll go,
That none of my suff'rings you ever may know.
But if some kind fate you should chance to convey,
And thro' woods where I've been your journey
should lay,
Your name when you find upon every tree, You'll say: "Poor Alexis! 't was written by
thee."

PROLOGUE TO JULIUS CÆSAR

[This prologue was first printed in Covent Garden Drollery, 1672, a miscellany which contains several of Dryden's early poems: see headnotes on pages 51, 56, 64-66, 68. Mr. Bolton Corney, in Notes and Queries, series I, ix 95, 96, assigns this prologue to Dryden, largely because the criticism of Shakespeare and Jonson here expressed greatly resembles that embodied in Dryden's Essay of Dramatic Poesy. The present editor finds much force in this argument and in that based on the general style of the prologue. On the other hand, it may be urged that Dryden never included the piece in any of his miscellany volumes. In a man of Dryden's careless habits, such reasoning has little weight: compare headnotes on pages 51, 65, 68.]

In country beauties as we often see Something that takes in their simplicity;
Yet while they charm, they know not they are
fair,
And take without their spreading of the snare:
Such artless beauty lies in Shakespeare's wit;
'T was well in spite of him whate'er he writ.

His excellencies came and were not sought;
 His words like casual atoms made a thought,
 Drew up themselves in rank and file and writ,
 He wond'ring how the devil it were such wit.
 Thus, like the drunken tinker in his play, ¹¹
 He grew a prince and never knew which way.
 He did not know what trope or figure meant,
 But to persuade is to be eloquent;
 So in this Cæsar which this day you see,
 Tully ne'er spoke as he makes Anthony.
 Those then that tax his learning are to blame;
 He knew the thing, but did not know the name.
 Great Jonson did that ignorance adore,
 And, tho' he envied much, admir'd him more. ²⁰
 The faultless Jonson equally writ well;
 Shakespeare made faults, but then did more excel.

One close at guard like some old fencer lay;
 T'other more open, but he shew'd more play.
 In imitation Jonson's wit was shown;
 Heaven made his men, but Shakespeare made his own.

Wise Jonson's talent in observing lay,
 But others' follies still made up his play.
 He drew the like in each elaborate line,
 But Shakespeare like a master did design. ³⁰
 Jonson with skill dissected humankind,
 And show'd their faults that they their faults might find;

But then, as all anatomists must do,
 He to the meanest of mankind did go, ¹
 And took from gibbets such as he would show. ²
 Both are so great that he must boldly dare
 Who both of 'em does judge and both compare.

If amongst poets one more bold there be,
 The man that dare attempt in either way, is he.

Lines on SETTLE'S EMPRESS OF MOROCCO

[In 1673 Elkanah Settle, a dramatist seventeen years younger than Dryden, won great success by his heroic play, The Empress of Morocco, and seemed in a fair way to eclipse the fame of the author of The Conquest of Granada. The Empress of Morocco, when published, was decorated with engravings, then first used in a drama, and was sold for two shillings, double the ordinary price. Dryden, bitterly mortified, joined Crowne and Shadwell in writing a scurrilous pamphlet, published in 1674, entitled Notes and Observations on The Empress of Morocco; or, Some few Erratas to be Printed instead of the Sculptures with the Second Edition of that Play. Settle, in a reply published in the same year, treated Dryden as the principal author of this pamphlet; but Crowne, in his epistle before Caligula (Works, 1874, iv. 353), claims three fourths of the piece as his own. From this least known of Dryden's works, which has never been reprinted in full, the following lines are taken. They parody a passage in The Empress of Morocco describing the approach of a fleet. Since they rise far above the general level of the pamphlet, they may be ascribed, though with some hesitation, to Dryden rather than to one of his collaborators.]

—To jerk him a little the sharper, I will not trans-prose his verse, but by the help of his own words trans-nonsense sense, that by my stuff people may judge the better what his is.

GREAT boy, thy tragedy and sculptures done
 From press and plates in fleets do homeward
 come,

And in ridiculous and humble pride
 Their course in ballet-singers' baskets guide, Whose greazy twigs do all new beauties take
 From the gay shews thy dainty sculptures make.
 Thy lines a mess of rhyming nonsense yield,
 A senseless tale, with fluttering fustian fill'd.
 No grain of sense does in one line appear;
 Thy words big bulks of boist'rous bombast bear; ¹⁰

With noise they move, and from players' mouths
 rebound,
 When their tongues dance to thy words' empty
 sound.

By thee inspir'd, thy rumbling verses roll,
 As if that rhyme and bombast lent a soul;
 And with that soul they seem taught duty too.
 To huffing words does humble nonsense bow,
 As if it would thy worthless worth enhance,
 To the lowest rank of fops thy praise advance,
 To whom by instinct all thy stuff is dear;
 Their loud claps echo to the theater. ²⁰

From breaths of fools thy commendation spreads;

Fame sings thy praise with mouths of logger-
 heads;

With noise and laughing each thy fustian greets;

'T is clapp'd by choirs of empty-headed cits,
 Who have their tribute sent and homage given,
 As men in whispers send loud noise to heaven.

Thus I have daub'd him with his own puddle.

AN ESSAY UPON SATIRE

[This poem is here reprinted from Poems on Affairs of State, ed. 4, 1702. It was first printed early in 1680, being mentioned in the Term Catalogue for Hilary Term (February) of that year. According to the half-title preceding the poem, in The Works of John Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave, Marquis of Normanby, and Duke of Buckingham, 1723, it was written in 1675. Dryden certainly had little share in writing this poem, perhaps no share at all. The evidence, which is inconsistent and perplexing, may be summarized as follows:

When the poem was circulated, apparently in manuscript, in 1679, Lord Rochester affected to believe Dryden the author, and in consequence of the attack on himself in lines 250-269 had him assaulted one evening in Rose Alley—see Biographical Sketch, pp. xxv, xxvi. The poem is assigned to Dryden in Poems on Affairs of State, ed. 4, 1702, and ed. 5, 1703. (The earlier editions have not been accessible to the present editor.) In Spencer's Anecdotes there occurs the following passage, attributed to Dean Lockier, who knew Dryden well:

"Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham's famous essay, has certainly been cried up much more than it deserves, though corrected a good deal by Dryden. It was this which set him up for a poet; and he was resolved to keep up that character, if he could, by any means, fair or foul. Could anything be more impudent than his publishing that satire, for writing which Dryden was beat in Rose Alley (and which was so remarkably known by the name of the Rose Alley Satire), as his own! He made, indeed, a few alterations in it first; but these were only verbal, and generally for the worse."

On the other hand, the poem is attributed to Lord Mulgrave in A New Collection of Poems relating to State Affairs, 1705. More important, Mulgrave positively denied Dryden's authorship, in a passage of his own Essay on Poetry, first published in 1682. (For notice of publication, see the Term Catalogue for Michaelmas Term (November) of that year: this first edition of the Essay has not been accessible to the present editor.) In the second edition of the Essay on Poetry, 1691, he made the denial more emphatic by adding sidenotes: passage and notes are as follows:

The * Laurent here [in satire] may justly claim our Praise, Crown'd by Mac-Fleckno with immortal Bays;
Tho' prais'd and punish'd for another's * Rhimes,
His own deserve as great Applause sometimes;
But once his Pegasus has born dead Weight,
Rid by some lumpish Minister of State.

* Mr. D—n. || A famous Satyrical Poem of his. * A Libel, for which he was both applauded and wounded, tho' intirely innocent of the whole matter.

In a later edition, 1713, of the Essay on Poetry (included by Tonson in one volume with Poems by the Earl of Roscomon, 1717), the last note becomes:

A Copy of Verses, call'd An Essay on Satyr, for which Mr. Dryden was both Applauded and Beaten, tho' not only innocent but ignorant, of the whole matter.

Finally, the Essay upon Satire appears in Mulgrave's Works, 1723.

Thus the evidence for Dryden's having a share in the authorship of the Essay upon Satire is extremely slender. The ascriptions of authorship in Poems on Affairs of State doubtless rested only on current gossip, and are of no authority. Lockier's testimony is emphatically at secondhand; moreover, the first part of it seems inconsistent with the conclusion. Still, Mulgrave's vanity would lead him to minimize any aid he may have received from Dryden, and even his footnote of 1713 does not state that Dryden was "ignorant" of the poem as a whole, but only of the attack on Rochester contained in it. The present editor, however, thinks it certain that Mulgrave was the real author of this poem, which is here reprinted because of its bearing on Dryden's biography, and because of the possibility that some parts of it may have been his work.]

How dull, and how insensible a beast
Is man, who yet would lord it o'er the rest!
Philosophers and poets vainly strove
In every age the lumpish mass to move;
But those were pedants, when compar'd with
these,
Who know not only to instruct, but please.
Poets alone found the delightful way,
Mysterious morals gently to convey
In charming numbers; so that as men grew Pleas'd with their poems, they grew wiser too.
Satire has always shone among the rest, ¹¹
And is the boldest way, if not the best.
To tell men freely of their foulest faults;
To laugh at their vain deeds, and vainer thoughts.
In satire too the wise took different ways,
To each deserving its peculiar praise.
Some did all folly with just sharpness blame, Whilst others laugh'd and scorn'd them into
shame;
But of these two, the last succeeded best,
As men aim rightest when they shoot in jest. ²⁰
Yet, if we may presume to blame our guides,
And censure those who censure all besides,
In other things they justly are preferr'd;
In this alone methinks the ancients err'd:

Against the grossest follies they declaim;
Hard they pursue, but hunt ignoble game.
Nothing is easier than such blots to hit,
And 't is the talent of each vulgar wit:
Besides, 't is labor lost; for who would preach
Morals to Armstrong, or dull Aston teach? ³⁰
'T is being devout at play, wise at a ball,
Or bringing wit and friendship to Whitehall.
But with sharp eyes those nicer faults to find,
Which lie obscurely in the wisest mind;
That little speck which all the rest does spoil,
To wash off that would be a noble toil,
Beyond the loose-writ libels of this age,
Or the forc'd scenes of our declining stage:
Above all censure, too, each little wit
Will be so glad to see the greater hit; ⁴⁰
Who, judging better, tho' concern'd the most,
Of such correction will have cause to boast.
In such a satire all would seek a share,
And every fool will fancy he is there.
Old story-tellers too must pine and die,
To see their antiquated wit laid by;
Like her who miss'd her name in a lampoon,
And griev'd to find herself decay'd so soon.
No common coxcomb must be mention'd here,
Nor the dull train of dancing sparks appear, ⁵⁰
Nor fluttering officers who never fight:
Of such a wretched rabble who would write?
Much less half wits: that's more against our rules;
For they are fops, the other are but fools.
Who would not be as silly as Dunbar:
As dull as Monmouth, rather than Sir Carr?
The cunning courtier should be slighted too,
Who with dull knavery makes so much ado;
Till the shrewd fool, by thriving too too fast,
Like Æsop's fox becomes a prey at last. ⁶⁰
Nor shall the royal mistresses be nam'd,
Too ugly, or too easy to be blam'd;
With whom each rhyming fool keeps such a pothar.
They are as common that way as the other:
Yet sauntering Charles between his beastly }
brace
Meets with dissembling still in either place, [†]
Affected humor, or a painted face.
In loyal libels we have often told him,
How one has jilted him, the other sold him:
How that affects to laugh, how this to weep; ⁷⁰
But who can rail so long as he can sleep?
Was ever prince by two at once misled,
False, foolish, old, ill-natur'd, and ill-bred?
Earnest and Ayles—y, with all that race
Of busy blockheads, shall have here no place;
At council set as foils on D—by's score,
To make that great false jewel shine the more;
Who all that while was thought exceeding wise,
Only for taking pains and telling lies.
But there's no meddling with such nauseous ⁸⁰
men;
Their very names have tir'd my lazy pen:
'T is time to quit their company, and choose
Some fitter subject for a sharper Muse.
First, let's behold the merriest man alive
Against his careless genius vainly strive;
Quit his dear ease, some deep design to lay,
'Gainst a set time, and then forget the day:

Yet he will laugh at his best friends, and be
Just as good company as Nokes and Lee.
But when he aims at reason or at rule, 90
He turns himself the best in ridicule.
Let him at business ne'er so earnest sit,
Shew him but mirth, and bait that mirth with
wit;

That shadow of a jest shall be enjoy'd,
Tho' he left all mankind to be destroy'd.
So cat transform'd sat gravely and demure,
Till mouse appear'd, and thought himself secure;
But soon the lady had him in her eye,
And from her friend did just as oddly fly.
Reaching above our nature does no good; 100
We must fall back to our old flesh and blood;
As by our little Machiavel we find, [E. of S-y.
That nimblest creature of the busy kind.
His limbs are crippled and his body shakes; }
Yet his hard mind, which all this bustle makes, }
No pity of its poor companion takes.
What gravity can hold from laughing out,
To see him drag his feeble legs about?
Like hounds ill-coupled, Jowler hugs him still Thro' hedges, ditches, and thro' all that's ill. 110
'T were crime in any man but him alone,
To use a body so, tho' 't is one's own:
Yet this false comfort never gives him o'er,
That whilst he creeps his vigorous thoughts can soar.

Alas! that soaring, to those few that know,
Is but a busy groveling here below.
So men in rapture think they mount the sky,
Whilst on the ground th' intranced wretches
lie:

So modern fops have fancied they could fly,
Whilst 't is their heads alone are in the air, 120
And for the most part building castles there;
As the new earl, with parts deserving [E. of E-x.
praise,

And wit enough to laugh at his own ways;
Yet loses all soft days and sensual nights,
Kind nature checks, and kinder fortune slights;
Striving against his quiet all he can,
For the fine notion of a busy man.
And what is that at best, but one whose mind
Is made to tire himself and all mankind? 120
For Ireland he would go; faith, let him reign;
For if some odd fantastic lord would fain
Carry in trunks, and all my drudgery do,
I'll not only pay him but admire him too.
But is there any other beast that lives,
Who his own harm so wittily contrives?
Will any dog that hath his teeth and stones
Refin'dly leave his bitches and his bones,
To turn a wheel? and bark to be employ'd.
While Venus is by rival dogs enjoy'd? 130
Yet this fond man, to get a statesman's name,
Forfeits his friends, his freedom, and his fame.

Tho' satire nicely writ no humor stings
But those who merit praise in other things;
Yet we must needs this one exception make,
And break our rules for folly 'Tropos' sake;
Who was too much despis'd to be accus'd,
And therefore scarce deserves to be abus'd,
Rais'd only by his mercenary tongue,
From railing smoothly, and from reasoning wrong.

As boys on holidays let loose to play, 150
Lay waggish traps for girls that pass that way;
Then shout to see in dirt and deep distress
Some silly cit in flower'd foolish dress;
So have I mighty satisfaction found,
To see his tinsel reason on the ground:
To see the florid fool despis'd (and know it)
By some who scarce have words enough to show it;

For sense sits silent, and condemns for weaker
The finer, nay sometimes the wittiest speaker.
But 't is prodigious so much eloquence 160
Should be acquir'd by such a little sense;
For words and wit did anciently agree,
And Tully was no fool, tho' this man be:
At bar abusive, on the bench unable,
Knaves on the woollack, fops at council table.
These are the grievances of such fools as would Be rather wise than honest, great than good.
Some other kind of wits must be made known,
Whose harmless errors hurt themselves alone;
Excess of luxury their think can please, 170
And laziness call loving of their ease:
To live dissolv'd in pleasures still they feign,
Tho' their whole life's but intermitting pain:
So much of surfeits, headaches, claps are seen,
We scarce perceive the little time between:
Well-meaning men, who make this gross mistake.

And pleasure lose only for pleasure's sake.
Each pleasure has its price, and when we pay
Too much of pain, we squander life away.
Thus D—et, purring like a thoughtful cat, 180
Married, but wiser puss ne'er thought of that:
And first he worried her with railing rhyme,
Like Pembroke's mastives at his kindest time;
Then for one night sold all his slavish life,
A teeming widow, but a barren wife.
Swell'd by contact of such a fulsome toad,
He lugg'd about the matrimonial load;
Till Fortune, blindly kind as well as he,
Has ill restor'd him to his liberty;
Which he would use in all his sneaking way, 190
Drinking all night and dozing all the day;
Dull as Ned Howard, whom his brisker times
Had fam'd for dullness in malicious rhymes.

Mul—ve had much ado to scape the snare,
Tho' learn'd in those ill arts that cheat the fair:
For after all his vulgar marriage mocks,
With beauty dazzled, Numps was in the stocks;
Deluded parents dried their weeping eyes,
To see him catch his Tartar for his prize;
Th' impatient town waited the wish'd-for change, 200

And cuckolds smil'd in hopes of sweet revenge;
Till Petworth plot made us with sorrow see,
As his estate, his person too was free.
Him no soft thoughts, no gratitude could move;
To gold he fled from beauty and from love;
Yet failing there, he keeps his freedom still,
Forc'd to live happily against his will:
'T is not his fault, if too much wealth and pow'r Break not his boasted quiet every hour.

And little Sid, for simile renown'd, 210
Pleasure has always sought but never found;
Tho' all his thoughts on wine and women fall,
His are so bad, sure he ne'er thinks at all.

The flesh he lives upon is rank and strong,
His meat and mistresses are kept too long.
But sure we all mistake this pious man,
Who mortifies his person all he can :
What we uncharitably take for sin.
Are only rules of this old capuchin ;
For never hermit under grave pretence
Has liv'd more contrary to common sense ;
And 't is a miracle, we may suppose,
No nastiness offends his skilful nose,
Which from all stink can with peculiar art
Extract perfume and essence from a f—t :
Expecting supper is his great delight ;
He toils all day but to be drunk at night ;
Then o'er his cups this night bird chirping sits,
Till he takes Hewet and Jack Hall for wits.

Rochester I despise for 's want of wit,
Tho' thought to have a tail and cloven feet ;
For while he mischief means to all mankind,
Himself alone the ill effects does find ;
And so like witches justly suffers shame,
Whose harmless malice is so much the same.
False are his words, affected is his wit ;
So often he does aim, so seldom hit ;
To every face he cringes while he speaks,
But when the back is turn'd, the head he
breaks :

Mean in each action, lewd in every limb,
Manners themselves are mischievous in him ;
A proof that chance alone makes every creature
A very Killigrew without good nature.
For what a Bessus has he always liv'd,
And his own kickings notably contriv'd.
For (there's the folly that 's still mix'd with
fear)

Cowards more blows than any hero bear ;
Of fighting sparks some may their pleasures say,
But 't is a bolder thing to run away.
The world may well forgive him all his ill,
For every fault does prove his penance still ;
Falsely he falls into some dangerous noose,
And then as meanly labors to get loose.
A life so infamous is better quitting,
Spent in base injury and low submitting.

I'd like to have left out his poetry,
Forgot by all almost as well as me.
Sometimes he has some humor, never wit ;
And if it rarely, very rarely, hit.
'T is under so much nasty rubbish laid,
To find it out 's the cinder-woman's trade.
Who for the wretched remnants of a fire
Must toil all day in ashes and in mire.
So lowly dull his idle works appear.

The wretched texts deserve no comments here ;
Where one poor thought 's sometimes left all
alone

For a whole page of dulness to atone :
'Mongst forty bad, one tolerable line,
Without expression, fancy, or design.

How vain a thing is man, and how unwise,
Ev'n he who would himself the most despise !
I, who so wise and humble seem to be,
Now my own vanity and pride can't see ;
While the world's nonsense is so sharply shown,
We pull down others but to raise our own ;
That we may angels seem, we paint them elves,
And are but Satyrs to set up ourselves.

I, who have all this while been finding fault,
Even with my masters who first satire taught,
And did by that describe the task so hard,
It seems stupendous and above reward,
Now labor with unequal force to climb
That lofty hill, unreach'd by former time :
'T is just that I should to the bottom fall,
Learn to write well, or not to write at all.

THE ART OF POETRY

WRITTEN IN FRENCH BY THE SIEUR DE BOILEAU, MADE ENGLISH

[This translation of Boileau's Art Poétique was first published in 1683, with title as above, and with no indication of the translator's name. In 1708 Tonson reprinted it in the second edition of The Annual Miscellany for the Year 1694 (the Fourth Miscellany) with the following advertisement :

"This translation of Monsieur Boileau's Art of Poetry was made in the year 1680, by Sir William Soame of Suffolk, Bart. ; who, being very intimately acquainted with Mr. Dryden, desir'd his revival of it. I saw the manuscript he in Mr. Dryden's hands for above six months, who made very considerable alterations in it, particularly the beginning of the fourth canto ; and it being his opinion that it would be better to apply the poem to English writers than keep to the French names, as it was first translated, Sir William desir'd he would take the pains to make that alteration ; and accordingly that was entirely done by Mr. Dryden.

"The poem was first publish'd in the year 1683 ; Sir William was after sent ambassador to Constantinople, in the reign of King James, but died in the voyage.

J. T."

The truth of Tonson's statement is confirmed by the remarkable agreement in substance of lines 101, 102 and 555-557 in the present translation with passages in Dryden's dedication to The Spanish Friar (Scott-Saintsbury edition, v. 402-411). The general finish of the verse probably owes much to Dryden's correcting hand.

Collins : Poetage of England, ed. Brydges, vol. iv, p. 475, mentions a "William Soames, Esq., of Thurlowe, in Suffolk, who was . . . created a baronet."

The present text follows that of 1683.]

CANTO I

RASH author, 't is a vain presumptuous crime
To undertake the sacred art of rhyme,
If at thy birth the stars that rul'd thy sense
Shone not with a poetic influence ;
In thy strait genius thou wilt still be bound,
Find Phœbus deaf, and Pegasus unsound.

You then that burn with the desire to try
The dangerous course of charming poetry ;
Forbear in fruitless verse to lose your time,
Or take for genius the desire of rhyme ;
Fear the allurements of a specious bait,
And well consider your own force and weight.

Nature abounds in wits of every kind,
And for each author can a talent find :
One may in verse describe an amorous flame,
Another sharpen a short epigram ;
Waller a hero's mighty acts extol,
Spenser sing Rosalind in pastoral ;
But authors that themselves too much esteem,
Lose their own genius, and mistake their theme.
Thus in times past Dubartas vainly writ,

Allaying sacred truth with trifling wit ;
 Impertinently, and without delight,
 Describ'd the Israelites' triumphant flight,
 And following Moses o'er the sandy plain,
 Perish'd with Pharaoh in th' Arabian main.

Whate'er you write of pleasant or sublime,
 Always let Sense accompany your Rhyme :
 Falsely they seem each other to oppose ;
 Rhyme must be made with Reason's laws to
 close ; 30

And when to conquer her you bend your force,
 The mind will triumph in the noble course ;
 To Reason's yoke she quickly will incline,
 Which, far from hurting, renders her divine :
 But, if neglected, will as easily stray,
 And master Reason, which she should obey.
 Love Reason then ; and let whate'er you write Borrow from her its beauty, force, and light.
 Most writers, mounted on a resty Muse,
 Extravagant and senseless objects choose ; 40
 They think they err, if in their verse they fall
 On any thought that 's plain or natural :
 Fly this excess ; and let Italians be Vain authors of false glitt'ring poetry.

All ought to aim at sense ; but most in vain
 Strive the hard pass and slipp'ry path to gain :
 You drown, if to the right or left you stray ;
 Reason to go has often but one way.

Sometimes an author, fond of his own thought,
 Pursues his object till it 's overwrought : 50

If he describes a house, he shews the face,
 And after walks you round from place to place ;
 Here is a vista, there the doors unfold,
 Balconies here are baluster'd with gold ;
 Then counts the rounds and ovals in the halls,
*The festoons, friezes, and the astragals.*¹

Tir'd with his tedious pomp, away I run,
 And skip o'er twenty pages to be gone.
 Of such descriptions the vain folly see,
 And shun their barren superfluity. 60

All that is needless carefully avoid ;
 The mind once satisfied is quickly cloy'd :
 He cannot write, who knows not to give o'er ;
 To mend one fault, he makes a hundred more :
 A verse was weak, you turn it much too strong,
 And grow obscure, for fear you should be long.
 Some are not gaudy, but are flat and dry ;
 Not to be low, another soars too high.

Would you of every one deserve the praise ?
 In writing, vary your discourse and phrase ; 70

A frozen style, that neither ebbs or flows,
 Instead of pleasing, makes us gape and doze.
 Those tedious authors are esteem'd by none,
 Who tire us, humming the same heavy tone.
 Happy, who in his verse can gently steer
 From grave to light, from pleasant to severe ;
 His works will be admir'd wherever found.
 And oft with buyers will be compass'd round.
 In all you write, be neither low nor vile ;
 The meanest theme may have a proper style. 80

The dull burlesque appear'd with impudence,
 And pleas'd by novelty, in spite of sense.
 All, except trivial points, grew out of date ;
 Parnassus spoke the cant of Belinsgate :
 Boundless and mad, disorder'd Rhyme was
 seen ;

1 Verse of Soudery

Disguis'd Apollo chang'd to Harlequin.

This plague, which first in country towns began,
 Cities and kingdoms quickly overran ;
 The dullest scribblers some admirers found,
 And *The Mock-Tempest*² was a while renown'd :
 But this low stuff the town at last despis'd, 91
 And scorn'd the folly that they once had priz'd ;
 Distinguish'd dull from natural and plain,
 And left the villages to Flecknoe's reign.
 Let not so mean a style your Muse debase,
 But learn from Butler³ the buffooning grace ;
 And let burlesque in ballads be employ'd :
 Yet noisy bumbast carefully avoid,

Nor think to raise, tho' on Pharsalia's plain,
Millions of mourning mountains of the slain :⁴
 Nor, with Dubartas, bridge up the floods, 101
 And periwig with wool the baldpate woods.⁵
 Choose a just style ; be grave without constraint,
 Great without pride, and lovely without paint :
 Write what your reader may be pleas'd to hear ;
 And for the measure have a careful ear.

On easy numbers fix your happy choice ;
 Of jarring sounds avoid the odious noise :
 The fullest verse and the most labor'd sense
 Displease us, if the ear once take offense. 110
 Our ancient verse (as homely as the times)
 Was rude, unmeasur'd, only tagg'd with rhymes ;

Number and cadence, that have since been shown,

To those unpolish'd writers were unknown.

Fairfax⁶ was he, who, in that darker age,
 By his just rules restrain'd poetic rage.

Spenser did next in pastorals excel,
 And taught the noble art of writing well ;
 To stricter rules the stanza did restrain,
 And found for poetry a richer vein. 120

Then Davenant came ; who, with a new-found
 art,

Chang'd all, spoil'd all, and had his way apart :
 His haughty Muse all others did despise,
 And thought in triumph to bear off the prize,
 Till the sharp-sighted critics of the times,
 In their mock Gondibert, expos'd his rhymes ;
 The laurels he pretended did refuse,
 And dash'd the hopes of his aspiring Muse.
 This headstrong writer, falling from on high,
 Made following authors take less liberty. 130

Waller came last, but was the first whose art
 Just weight and measure did to verse impart ;
 That of a well-plac'd word could teach the force,
 And shew'd for poetry a nobler course.

His happy genius did our tongue refine,
 And easy words with pleasing numbers join ;
 His verses to good method did apply,
 And chang'd harsh discord to soft harmony.
 All own'd his laws ; which, long approv'd and
 tried,

To present authors now may be a guide. 140

Tread boldly in his steps, secure from fear.
 And be, like him, in your expressions clear.
 If in your verse you drag, and sense delay,
 My patience tires, my fancy goes astray ;

² The Mock-Tempest, a play written by Mr. Duffet.

³ Huubras.

⁴ Verse of Brébeuf.

⁵ Verse of Dubartas.

⁶ Fairfax in his translation of Godfrey of Bullen.

And from your vain discourse I turn my mind,
Nor search an author troublesome to find.
There is a kind of writer pleas'd with sound,
Whose fustian head with clouds is compass'd
round —

No reason can disperse 'em with its light:
Learn then to think ere you pretend to write.
As your idea's clear, or else obscure, ¹⁵¹
Th' expression follows perfect or impure:
What we conceive, with ease we can express;
Words to the notions flow with readiness.

Observe the language well in all you write,
And swerve not from it in your loftiest flight.
The smoothest verse and the exactest sense
Displease us, if ill English give offense:
A barb'rous phrase no reader can approve;
Nor bombast, noise, or affectation love. ¹⁶⁰
In short, without pure language, what you write
Can never yield us profit or delight.
Take time for thinking; never work in haste;
And value not yourself for writing fast.
A rapid poem, with such fury writ,
Shews want of judgment, not abounding wit.
More pleas'd we are to see a river lead
His gentle streams along a flow'ry mead.
Than from high banks to hear loud torrents
roar,

With foamy waters on a muddy shore. ¹⁷⁰
Gently make haste, of labor not afraid;
A hundred times consider what you've said:
Polish, repolish, every color lay,
And sometimes add, but oft'ner take away.
'Tis not enough, when swarming faults are
writ,

That here and there are scatter'd sparks of wit:
Each object must be fix'd in the due place,
And diff'ring parts have corresponding grace;
Till by a curious art dispos'd, we find
One perfect whole, of all the pieces join'd. ¹⁸⁰
Keep to your subject close in all you say,
Nor for a sounding sentence ever stray.
The public censure for your writings fear,
And to yourself be critic most severe.
Fantastic wits their darling follies love:
But find you faithful friends that will reprove,
That on your works may look with careful eyes,
And of your faults be zealous enemies.
Lay by an author's pride and vanity,
And from a friend a flatterer desery. ¹⁹⁰
Who seems to like, but means not what he says:
Embrace true counsel, but suspect false praise.
A sycophant will everything admire:
Each verse, each sentence sets his soul on fire;
All is divine! there's not a word amiss!
He shakes with joy, and weeps with tenderness;
He overpower's you with his mighty praise.
Truth never moves in those impetuous ways:
A faithful friend is careful of your fame,
And freely will your heedless errors blame; ²⁰⁰
He cannot pardon a neglected line,
But verse to rule and order will confine;
Reproves of words the too affected sound:
Here the sense flags, and your expression's
round;

Your fancy tires, and your discourse grows vain,
Your terms improper — make them just and
plain.

Thus 't is a faithful friend will freedom use;
But authors, partial to their darling Muse,
Think to protect it they have just pretense,
And at your friendly counsel take offense. ²¹⁰
Said you of this, that the expression's flat?
"Your servant, sir, you must excuse me that,"
He answers you. "This word has here no grace;
Pray leave it out." "That, sir, 's the proper'st
place."
"This turn I like not." " 'Tis approv'd by
all."

Thus, resolute not from a fault to fall,
If there's a syllable of which you doubt,
'T is a sure reason not to blot it out.
Yet still he says you may his faults confute,
And over him your pow'r is absolute: ²²⁰
But of his feign'd humility take heed;
'T is a bait laid to make you hear him read.
And when he leaves you, happy in his Muse,
Restless he runs some other to abuse,
And often finds; for in our scribbling times
No fool can want a sot to praise his rhymes:
The flattest work has ever in the court
Met with some zealous ass for its support;
And in all times a forward, scribbling fop
Has found some greater fool to cry him up. ²³⁰

CANTO II

PASTORAL

As a fair nymph, when rising from her bed,
With sparkling diamonds dresses not her head,
But without gold, or pearl, or costly scents,
Gathers from neighb'ring fields her ornaments;
Such, lovely in its dress, but plain withal,
Ought to appear a perfect Pastoral.
Its humble method nothing has of fierce,
But hates the rattling of a lofty verse:
There native beauty pleases, and excites,
And never with harsh sounds the ear affrights.
But in this style a poet often spent, ²⁴¹
In rage throws by his rural instrument,¹
And vainly, when disorder'd thoughts abound,
Amidst the Eclogue makes the trumpet sound:
Pan flies, alarm'd, into the neighb'ring woods,
And frighted nymphs dive down into the floods.
Oppos'd to this, another, low in style, Makes shepherds speak a language base and vile:

His writings, flat and heavy, without sound,
Kissing the earth, and creeping on the ground;
You'd swear that Randal, in his rustic strains,
Again was quav'ring to the country swains, ²⁵²
And changing, without care of sound or dress, Strephon and Phyllis into Tom and Bess.
'Twixt these extremes 't is hard to keep the
right;

For guides take Virgil, and read Theocrite:
Be their just writings, by the gods inspir'd,
Your constant pattern, practis'd and admir'd.
By them alone you'll easily comprehend
How poets, without shame, may condescend ²⁶⁰
To sing of gardens, fields, of flow'rs, and fruit.
To stir up shepherds, and to tune the flute;
Of love's rewards to tell the happy hour,

Daphne a tree, Narcissus made a flow'r,
And by what means the Eclogue yet has pow'r
To make the woods worthy a conqueror :¹
This of their writings is the grace and flight ;
Their risings lofty, yet not out of sight.

ELEGY

The Elegy, that loves a mournful style,
With unbound hair weeps at a funeral pile ;²⁷⁰
It paints the lover's torments and delights ;
A mistress flatters, threatens, and invites :
But well these raptures if you'll make us see,
You must know love as well as poetry.
I hate those lukewarm authors, whose forc'd
fire

In a cold style describes a hot desire ;
That sigh by rule, and, raging in cold blood,
Their sluggish Muse whip to an amorous mood :
Their feign'd transports appear but flat and vain ;²⁷⁰

They always sigh, and always hug their chain,
Adore their prison, and their suff'rings bless,
Make sense and reason quarrel as they please.
'T was not of old in this affected tone
That smooth Tibullus made his amorous moan ;
Nor Ovid, when, instructed from above,
By nature's rules he taught the Art of Love.
The heart in Elegies forms the discourse.

ODE

The Ode is bolder, and has greater force ;
Mounting to heav'n in her ambitious flight,
Amongst the gods and heroes takes delight ;²⁸⁰
Of Pisa's wrestlers tells the sinewy force,
And sings the dusty conqueror's glorious
course ;

To Simois' streams does fierce Achilles bring,
And makes the Ganges bow to Britain's king.
Sometimes she flies, like an industrious bee,
And robs the flow'rs by nature's chymistry ;
Describes the shepherds' dances, feasts, and bliss,

And boasts from Phyllis to surprise a kiss,
When gently she resists with feign'd remorse,
That what she grants may seem to be by force :
Her generous style at random oft will part,³⁰¹
And by a brave disorder shows her art :
Unlike those fearful poets, whose cold rhyme
In all their raptures keep exactest time,
That sing th' illustrious hero's mighty praise (Lean writers !) by the terms of weeks and
days,

And dare not from least circumstances part,
But take all towns by strictest rules of art.
Apollo drives those fops from his abode ;
And some have said, that once the humorous
god.³¹⁰

Resolving all such scribblers to confound,
For the short Sonnet order'd this strict bound :
Set rules for the just measure, and the time,
The easy running, and alternate rhyme ;
But, above all, those licenses denied
Which in these writings the lame sense supplied ;

¹ Virgil, Eclogue IV.

Forbade an useless line should find a place,
Or a repeated word appear with grace.
A faultless Sonnet, finish'd thus, would be Worth tedious volumes of loose poetry.³²⁰
A hundred scribbling authors, without ground,
Believe they have this only Phoenix found ;
When yet th' exactest scarce have two or three,
Among whole tomes, from faults and censure
free.

The rest, but little read, regarded less,
Are shovel'd to the pastry from the press.
Closing the sense within the measur'd time,
'T is hard to fit the reason to the rhyme.

EPIGRAM

The Epigram, with little art compos'd,
Is one good sentence in a distich clos'd.³³⁰
These points, that by Italians first were priz'd,
Our ancient authors knew not, or despis'd :
The vulgar, dazzled with their glaring light,
To their false pleasures quickly they invite ;
But public favor so increas'd their pride,
They overwhelm'd Parnassus with their tide.
The Madrigal at first was overcome,
And the proud Sonnet fell by the same doom ;
With these grave Tragedy adorn'd her flights,
And mournful Elegy her funeral rites :³⁴⁰
A hero never fail'd 'em on the stage,
Without his point a lover durst not rage ;
The amorous shepherds took more care to prove

True to their point, than faithful to their
love.

Each word, like Janus, had a double face ;
And prose, as well as verse, allow'd it place :
The lawyer with conceits adorn'd his speech,
The parson without quibbling could not preach.
At last affronted reason look'd about,
And from all serious matters shut 'em out ;³⁵⁰ Declar'd that none should use 'em without
shame.

Except a scattering in the Epigram ;
Provided that by art, and in due time,
They turn'd upon the thought, and not the rhyme.

Thus in all parts disorders did abate ;
Yet quibblers in the court had leave to prate :
Luspid jesters, and unpleasant fools,
A corporation of dull punning drolls.
'T is not, but that sometimes a dext'rous Muse
May with advantage a turn'd sense abuse,³⁶⁰
And on a word may trifle with address ;
But above all avoid the fond excess,
And think not, when your verse and sense are lame,

With a dull point to tag your Epigram.

Each poem his perfection has apart ;
The British Round in plainness shows his art.
The Ballad, tho' the pride of ancient time,
Has often nothing but his humorous rhyme ;
The *Madrigal*² may softer passions move,
And breathe the tender ecstasies of love :³⁷⁰
Desire to show itself, and not to wrong,
Arm'd Virtue first with Satire in its tongue.

² An old way of writing, which began and ended with the same measure

SATIRE

Lucilius was the man who, bravely bold,
 To Roman vices did this mirror hold,
 Protected humble goodness from reproach,
 Show'd worth on foot, and rascals in the coach.
 Horace his pleasing wit to this did add,
 And none uncensur'd could be fool, or mad:
 Unhappy was that wretch, whose name might be Squar'd to the rules of their sharp poetry. 380
 Persius, obscure, but full of sense and wit,
 Affected brevity in all he writ:
 And Juvenal, learn'd as those times could be,
 Too far did stretch his sharp hyperbole;
 Tho' horrid truths thro' all his labors shine,
 In what he writes there's something of divine,
 Whether he blames the Caprean debauch,
 Or of Sejanus' fall tells the approach,
 Or that he makes the trembling senate come
 To the stern tyrant to receive their doom; 390
 Or Roman vice in coarsest habits shews,
 And paints an empress reeking from the stews:
 In all he writes appears a noble fire;
 To follow such a master then desire.
 Chaucer alone, fix'd on this solid base,
 In his old style conserves a modern grace.
 Too happy, if the freedom of his rhymes
 Offended not the method of our times.
 The Latin writers decency neglect;
 But modern readers challenge our respect, 400
 And at immodest writings take offense,
 If clean expression cover not the sense.
 I love sharp satire, from obscenity free,
 Not impudence that preaches modesty.
 Our English, who in malice never fail,
 Hence in lampoons and libels learnt to rail:
 Pleasant detraction, that by singing goes
 From mouth to mouth, and as it marches grows!
 Our freedom in our poetry we see,
 That child of joy, begot by liberty. 410
 But, vain blasphemer, tremble when you choose
 God for the subject of your impious Muse;
 At last, those jests which libertines invent,
 Bring the lewd author to just punishment.
 Ev'n in a song there must be art and sense;
 Yet sometimes we have seen that wine or
 chance
 Have warm'd cold brains, and given dull writers mettle,
 And furnish'd out a scene for Mr. S —.
 But for one lucky hit that made thee please,
 Let not thy folly grow to a disease. 420
 Nor think thyself a wit; for in our age
 If a warm fancy does some fop ingage,
 He neither eats or sleeps till he has writ,
 But plagues the world with his adulterate wit.
 Nay, 't is a wonder, if in his dire rage
 He prints not his dull follies for the stage;
 And, in the front of all his senseless plays,
 Makes David Logan¹ crown his head with bays.

CANTO III

TRAGEDY

THERE'S not a monster bred beneath the sky,
 But, well-dispos'd by art, may please the eye; 430

A curious workman, by his skill divine,
 From an ill object makes a good design.
 Thus, to delight us, Tragedy, in tears
 For Œdipus,² provokes our hopes and fears;
 For paricide Orestes asks relief,
 And, to encrease our pleasure, causes grief.
 You then, that in this noble art would rise,
 Come, and in lofty verse dispute the prize.
 Would you upon the stage acquire renown,
 And for your judges summon all the town? 440
 Would you your works for ever should remain,
 And after ages past be sought again?
 In all you write observe with care and art
 To move the passions and incline the heart.
 If, in a labor'd act, the pleasing rage
 Cannot our hopes and fears by turns ingage,
 Nor in our mind a feeling pity raise,
 In vain with learned scenes you fill your plays:
 Your cold discourse can never move the mind
 Of a stern critic, nat'rally unkind; 450
 Who, justly tir'd with your pedantic flight,
 Or falls asleep, or censures all you write.
 The secret is, attention first to gain;
 To move our minds, and then to entertain:
 That, from the very opening of the scenes,
 The first may show us what the author means.
 I'm tir'd to see an actor on the stage
 That knows not whether he's to laugh or rage;
 Who, an intrigue unraveling in vain,
 Instead of pleasing, keeps my mind in pain. 460
 I'd rather much the nauseous dunce should say Downright: "My name is Hector in the play;"
 Than with a mass of miracles, ill-join'd,
 Confound my ears and not instruct my mind.
 The subject's never soon enough express'd;
 Your place of action must be fix'd, and rest.
 A Spanish poet may, with good event,
 In one day's space whole ages represent;
 There off the hero of a wand'ring stage
 Begins a child, and ends the play of age. 470
 But we, that are by reason's rules confin'd,
 Will that with art the poem be design'd,
 That unity of action, time, and place,
 Keep the stage full, and all our labors grace.
 Write not what cannot be with ease conceiv'd;
 Some truths may be too strong to be believ'd.
 A foolish wonder cannot entertain:
 My mind's not mov'd, if your discourse be vain.
 You may relate what would offend the eye:
 Seeing, indeed, would better satisfy; 480
 But there are objects that a curious art
 Hides from the eyes, yet offers to the heart.
 The mind is most agreeably surpris'd,
 When a well-woven subject, long disguis'd,
 You on a sudden artfully unfold,
 And give the whole another face and mold.
 At first the Tragedy was void of art;
 A song, where each man danc'd and sung his
 part;
 And of god Bacchus roaring out the praise,
 Sought a good vintage for their jolly days: 490
 Then wine and joy were seen in each man's eyes,
 And a fat goat was the best singer's prize.
 Thespis was first, who, all besmear'd with lee,
 Began this pleasure for posterity;

² Writ by Mr. Dryden.

³ The beginning and progress of tragedies.

And with his carted actors, and a song,
Amus'd the people as he pass'd along.
Next Æschylus the diff'rent persons plac'd,
And with a better mask his players grac'd;
Upon a theater his verse express'd,
And show'd his hero with a buskin dress'd. 500
Then Sophocles, the genius of his age,
Increas'd the pomp and beauty of the stage,
Ingag'd the chorus song in every part,
And polish'd rugged verse by rules of art:
He in the Greek did those perfections gain,
Which the weak Latin never could attain.

Our pious fathers, in their priest-rid age,
As impious and profane abhorr'd the stage;
A troop of silly pilgrims, as 't is said,
Foolishly zealous, scandalously play'd 510
(Instead of heroes, and of love's complaints)
The angels, God, the Virgin, and the saints.
At last, right Reason did his laws reveal,
And show'd the folly of their ill-plac'd zeal,
Silenc'd those nonconformists of the age,
And rais'd the lawful heroes of the stage:
Only th' Athenian mask was laid aside,
And chorus by the music was suppld.
Ingenious love, inventive in new arts, Mingled in plays, and quickly touch'd our hearts: 520

This passion never could resistance find,
But knows the shortest passage to the mind.
Paint then, I'm pleas'd my hero be in love;
But let him not like a tame shepherd move;
Let not Achilles be like Thyrsis seen,
Or for a Cyrus show an Artamène;¹
That, struggling off, his passions we may find;
The frailty, not the virtue of his mind.
Of romance heroes shun the low design;
Yet to great hearts some human frailties join: 530
Achilles must with Homer's heat engage;
For an affront I'm pleas'd to see him rage.
Those little failings in your hero's heart
Show that of man and nature he has part.
To leave known rules you cannot be allow'd:
Make Agamemnon covetous and proud,
Æneas in religious rites austere;
Keep to each man his proper character.
Of countries and of times the humors know;
From diff'rent climates diff'ring customs grow:
And strive to shun their fault, who vainly dress
An antique hero like some modern ass; 542
Who make old Romans like our English move,
Show Cato sparkish, or make Brutus love.
In a romance those errors are excus'd;
There 't is enough that, reading, we're amus'd:
Rules too severe would then be useless found;
But the strict scene must have a juster bound:
Exact decorum we must always find.
If then you form some hero in your mind, 550
Be sure your image with itself agree;
For what he first appears, he still must be.
Affected wits will nat'rally incline
To paint their figures by their own design:
Your bully poets, bully heroes write;
Chapman in Russey d'Ambois took delight,
And thought perfection was to huff and fight.
Wise nature by variety does please:
Clothe diff'ring passions in a diff'ring dress;

¹ Artamène, the name of Cyrus in Scudéry's romance

Bold anger in rough haughty words appears;
Sorrow is humble, and dissolves in tears. 561
Make not your Hecuba² with fury rage,
And show a ranting grief upon the stage;
Or tell in vain how the rough Tanais bore
His sevenfold waters to the Euxine shore:
These swoln expressions, this affected noise,
Shows like some pedant that declaims to boys.
In sorrow, you must softer methods keep;
And, to excite our tears, yourself must weep.
Those noisy words with which ill plays abound Come not from hearts that are in sadness
drown'd. 571

The theater for a young poet's rhymes
Is a bold venture in our knowing times;
An author cannot eas'ly purchase fame;
Critics are always apt to hiss and blame:
You may be judg'd by every ass in town;
The privilege is bought for half a crown.
To please, you must a hundred changes try;
Sometimes be humble, then must soar on high:
In noble thoughts must everywhere abound, 580
Be easy, pleasant, solid, and profound:
To these you must surprising touches join,
And show us a new wonder in each line;
That all, in a just method well-design'd,
May leave a strong impression in the mind.
These are the arts that Tragedy maintain.

THE EPIC

But the Heroic claims a loftier strain.
In the narration of some great design,
Invention, art, and fable, all must join:
Here fiction must employ its utmost grace; 590
All must assume a body, mind, and face:
Each virtue a divinity is seen;
Prudence is Pallas; beauty, Paphos' Queen.
'T is not a cloud from whence swift lightnings
fly,

But Jupiter, that thunders from the sky;
Nor a rough storm that gives the sailor pain,
But angry Neptune, plowing up the main;
Echo's no more an empty airy sound,
But a fair nymph that weeps her lover drown'd.
Thus in the endless treasure of his mind 600
The poet does a thousand figures find;
Around the work his ornaments he pours,
And strows with lavish hand his op'ning flow'rs.
'T is not a wonder if a tempest bore
The Trojan fleet against the Libyan shore;
From faithless Fortune this is no surprise,
For every day 't is common to our eyes.
But angry Juno, that she might destroy
And overwhelm the rest of ruin'd Troy;
That Æolus, with the fierce goddess join'd, 610
Open'd the hollow prisons of the wind,
Till angry Neptune, looking o'er the main,
Rebukes the tempest, calms the waves again,
Their vessels from the dang'rous quicksands
steers —

These are the springs that move our hopes and
fears:

Without these ornaments before our eyes
Th' unsinew'd poem languishes and dies;
Your poet in his art will always fail,
And tell you but a dull insipid tale.

² Seneca Trag.

In vain have our mistaken authors tried 620
 These ancient ornaments to lay aside,
 Thinking our God, and prophets that he sent,
 Might act like those the poets did invent,
 To fright poor readers in each line with hell,
 And talk of Satan, Ashtaroth, and Bel.
 The mysteries which Christians must believe Disdain such shifting pageants to receive :
 The gospel offers nothing to our thoughts
 But penitence, or punishment for faults ; 625
 And mingling falsehoods with those mysteries
 Would make our sacred truths appear like lies.
 Besides, what pleasure can it be to hear
 The howlings of repining Lucifer,
 Whose rage at your imagin'd hero flies,
 And oft with God himself disputes the prize ?
 Tasso, you 'll say, has done it with applause :
 It is not here I mean to judge his cause ;
 Yet, tho' our age has so extoll'd his name,
 His works had never gain'd immortal fame,
 If holy Godfrey in his ecstasies 640
 Had only conquer'd Satan on his knees ;
 If Tancred, and Armida's pleasing form,
 Did not his melancholy theme adorn.
 'Tis not that Christian poems ought to be Fill'd with the fictions of idolatry ;
 But in a common subject to reject
 The gods, and heathen ornaments neglect ;
 To banish Tritons who the seas invade,
 To take Pan's whistle, or the Fates degrade,
 To hinder Charon in his leaky boat 650
 To pass the shepherd with the man of note,
 Is with vain scruples to disturb your mind,
 And search perfection you can never find :
 As well they may forbid us to present
 Prudence or Justice for an ornament,
 To paint old Janus with his front of brass ;
 And take from Time his scythe, his wings, and
 glass ;

And everywhere, as 't were idolatry,
 Banish descriptions from our poetry.
 Leave 'em their pious follies to pursue, 670
 But let our reason such vain fears subdue ;
 And let us not, amongst our vanities,
 Of the true God create a God of lies.
 In fable we a thousand pleasures see,
 And the smooth names seem made for poetry ;
 As Hector, Alexander, Helen, Phyllis,
 Ulysses, Agamemnon, and Achilles :
 In such a crowd, the poet were to blame
 To choose King Chilperic for his hero's name.
 Sometimes, the name being well or ill applied,
 Will the whole fortune of your work decide, 675
 Would you your reader never should be tir'd ?
 Choose some great hero, fit to be admir'd,
 In courage signal, and in virtue bright ;
 Let ev'n his very failings give delight ;
 Let his great actions our attention bind ;
 Like Cæsar, or like Scipio, frame his mind,
 And not like Edipus his perjur'd race ;
 A common conqueror is a theme too base.
 Choose not your tale of accidents too full ; 680
 Too much variety may make it dull :
 Achilles' rage alone, when wrought with skill,
 Abundantly does a whole Iliad fill.
 Be your narrations lively, short, and smart ;
 In your descriptions show your noblest art :

There 't is your poetry may be employ'd ;
 Yet you must trivial accidents avoid.
 Nor imitate that fool, who, to describe
 The wondrous marches of the chosen tribe,
 Plac'd on the sides, to see their armies pass, 690
 The fishes staring thro' the liquid glass ;
 Describ'd a child, who, with his little hand,
 Pick'd up the shining pebbles from the sand.
 Such objects are too mean to stay our sight ;
 Allow your work a just and nobler flight.
 Be your beginning plain, and take good heed
 Too soon you mount not on the airy steed ;
 Nor tell your reader, in a thund'ring verse,
 " I sing the conqueror of the universe." 700
 What can an author after this produce ?
 The lab'ring mountain must bring forth a mouse.
 Much better are we pleas'd with his address,
 Who, without making such vast promises,
 Says, in an easier style and plainer sense :
 " I sing the combats of that pious prince,
 Who from the Phrygian coast his armies bore,
 And landed first on the Lavinian shore."
 His op'ning Muse sets not the world on fire,
 And yet performs more than we can require :
 Quickly you 'll hear him celebrate the fame 710
 And future glory of the Roman name ;
 Of Styx and Acheron describe the floods,
 And Cæsars wand'ring in th' Elysian woods ;
 With figures numberless his story grace,
 And everything in beauteous colors trace.
 At once you may be pleasing and sublime :
 I hate a heavy melancholy rhyme ;
 I'd rather read Orlando's comic tale,
 Than a dull author always stiff and stale,
 Who thinks himself dishonor'd in his style, 720
 If on his works the Graces do but smile.
 'T is said that Homer, matchless in his art,
 Stole Venus' girdle, to ingage the heart :
 His works indeed vast treasures do unfold,
 And whatsoever he touches turns to gold :
 All in his hands new beauty does acquire ;
 He always pleases, and can never tire.
 A happy warmth he everywhere may boast,
 Nor is he in too long digressions lost :
 His verses without rule a method find, 730
 And of themselves appear in order join'd :
 All without trouble answers his intent ;
 Each syllable is tending to th' event.
 Let his example your endeavors raise ;
 To love his writings is a kind of praise.
 A poem where we all perfections find
 Is not the work of a fantastic mind :
 There must be care, and time, and skill, and
 pains ;
 Not the first heat of unexperienc'd brains.
 Yet sometimes artless poets, when the rage 740
 Of a warm fancy does their minds ingage,
 Puff'd with vain pride, presume they understand,
 And boldly take the trumpet in their hand ;
 Their fustian Muse each accident confounds ;
 Nor can she fly, but rise by leaps and bounds,
 Till, their small stock of learning quickly spent,
 Their poem dies for want of nourishment.

² The first line of Scudéry's Ataric.

³ Virgil's Æneids.

In vain mankind the hot-brain'd fools deeries,
 No branding censures can unveil his eyes;
 With impudence the laurel they invade, ⁷⁵⁰
 Resolv'd to like the monsters they have made.
 Virgil, compar'd to them, is flat and dry,
 And Homer understood not poetry;
 Against their merit if this age rebel,
 To future times for justice they appeal.
 But, waiting till mankind shall do 'em right,
 And bring their works triumphantly to light,
 Neglected heaps we in by- corners lay,
 Where they become to worms and moths a prey;
 Forgot, in dust and cobwebs let 'em rest, ⁷⁶⁰
 Whilst we return from whence we first digress'd.

The great success which tragic writers found,
 In Athens first the Comedy renown'd.
 Th' abusive Grecian there, by pleasing ways,
 Dispers'd his nat'ral malice in his plays;
 Wisdom and virtue, honor, wit, and sense,
 Were subject to buffooning insolence:
 Poets were publicly approv'd, and sought,
 That vice extoll'd, and virtue set at naught;
 And Socrates himself, in that loose age, ⁷⁷⁰
 Was made the pastime of a scoffing stage.
 At last the public took in hand the cause,
 And cur'd this madness by the pow'r of laws;
 Forbade at any time, or any place,
 To name the person, or describe the face.
 The stage its ancient fury thus let fall.
 And comedy diverted without gall;
 By mild reproofs recover'd minds diseas'd,
 And, sparing persons, innocently pleas'd.
 Each one was nicely shown in this new glass, ⁷⁸⁰
 And smil'd to think he was not meant the ass.
 A miser oft would laugh the first, to find
 A faithful draught of his own sordid mind;
 And fops were with such care and cunning writ.
 They lik'd the piece for which themselves did sit.

You then that would the comic laurels wear,
 To study nature be your only care:
 Whoe'er knows man, and by a curious art
 Discerns the hidden secrets of the heart;
 He who observes and naturally can paint ⁷⁹⁰
 The jealous fool, the fawning sycophant.
 A sober wit, an enterprising ass,
 A humorous Otter, or a Hudibras, --
 May safely in these noble lists engage,
 And make 'em act and speak upon the stage
 Strive to be natural in all you write,
 And paint with colors that may please the
 sight.

Nature in various figures does abound,
 And in each mind are diff'rent humors found;
 A glance, a touch, discovers to the wise, ⁸⁰⁰
 But every man has not discerning eyes.
 All-changing time does also change the mind.
 And diff'rent ages diff'rent pleasures find:
 Youth, hot and furious, cannot brook delay;
 By flattering vice is eas'ly led away;
 Vain in discourse, inconstant in desire;
 In censure, rash; in pleasures, all on fire.
 The manly age does steady thoughts enjoy;
 Pow'r and ambition do his soul employ;
 Against the turns of fate he sets his mind, ⁸¹⁰
 And by the past the future hopes to find.
 Decrepit age, still adding to his stores,

For others heaps the treasure he adores;
 In all his actions keeps a frozen pace;
 Past times extols, the present to debase:
 Incapable of pleasures youth abuse,
 In others blames what age does him refuse.
 Your actors must by reason be controll'd;
 Let young men speak like young, old men like
 old;

Observe the town, and study well the court, ⁸²⁰
 For thither various characters resort:
 Thus 't was great Jonson purchas'd his renown,
 And in his art had borne away the crown;
 If, less desirous of the people's praise,
 He had not with low farce debas'd his plays;
 Mixing dull buffoon'ry with wit refin'd,
 And Harlequin with noble Terence join'd.
 When in The Fox I see the tortoise hiss'd,
 I lose the author of The Alchymist.
 The comic wit, borne with the smiling air, ⁸³⁰
 Must tragic grief and pompous verse forbear;
 Yet may he not, as on a market place,
 With bawdy jests amuse the populace.
 With well-bred conversation you must please,
 And your intrigue unravel'd be with ease;
 Your action still should reason's rules obey,
 Nor in an empty scene may lose its way.
 Your humble style must sometimes gently rise,
 And your discourse sententious be and wise;
 The passions must to nature be confin'd, ⁸⁴⁰
 And scenes to scenes with artful weaving join'd.
 Your wit must not unseasonably play,
 But follow bus'ness, never lead the way.
 Observe how Terence does this error shun;
 A careful father chides his am'rous son:
 Then see that son, whom no advice can move,
 Forget those orders, and pursue his love:
 'T is not a well-drawn picture we discover:
 'T is a true son, a father, and a lover.
 I like an author that reforms the age, ⁸⁵⁰
 And keeps the right decorum of the stage:
 That always pleases by just reason's rule:
 But for a tedious droll, a quibbling fool,
 Who with low nauseous bawdry fills his plays,
 Let him be gone, and on two trestles raise Some Smithfield stage, where he may act his pranks.
 And make Jack Puddings speak to mountebanks.

CANTO IV

IN Florence dwelt a doctor of renown,
 The scourge of God, and terror of the town, ⁸⁶⁰
 Who all the cant of physic had by heart,
 And never murder'd but by rules of art.
 The public mischief was his private gain:
 Children their slaughter'd parents sought in
 vain;
 A brother here his poison'd brother wept;
 Some bloodless died, and some by opium slept.
 Colds, at his presence, would to frenzies turn,
 And agues like malignant fevers burn.
 Hated, at last, his practice gives him o'er;
 One friend, unkill'd by drugs, of all his store,
 In his new country house affords him place; ⁸⁷⁰
 'T was a rich abbot, and a building ass.
 Here first the doctor's talent came in play;

He seems inspir'd, and talks like Wren or May;¹

Of this new portico condemns the face,
And turns the entrance to a better place;
Designs the staircase at the other end.
His friend approves, does for his mason send:
He comes; the doctor's arguments prevail.
In short, to finish this our hum'rous tale,
He Galen's dang'rous science does reject, 880
And from ill doctor turn good architect.

In this example we may have our part:
Rather be mason ('t is an useful art!)
Than a dull poet; for that trade accurst
Admits no mean betwixt the best and worst.
In other sciences, without disgrace
A candidate may fill a second place;
But poetry no medium can admit,
No reader suffers an indiff'rent wit;
The ruin'd stationers against him bawl, 890
And Herringman degrades him from his stall.
Burlesque at least our laughter may excite,
But a cold writer never can delight.
The Counter Scuffle has more wit and art
Than the stiff formal style of Gondibert.
Be not affected with that empty praise
Which your vain flatterers will sometimes raise.
And when you read, with ecstasy will say,
"The finish'd piece! the admirable play!"
Which, when expos'd to censure and to light,
Cannot endure a critic's piercing sight. 900
A hundred authors' fates have been foretold.
And Sh—ll's works are printed, but not sold.
Hear all the world; consider every thought;
A fool by chance may stumble on a fault:
Yet, when Apollo does your Muse inspire,
Be not impatient to expose your fire;
Nor imitate the Settles of our times,
Those tuneful readers of their own dull rhymes,
Who seize on all th' acquaintance they can meet, 910

And stop the passengers that walk the street:
There is no sanctuary you can choose
For a defense from their pursuing Muse.
I've said before, be patient when they blame;
To alter for the better is no shame.
Yet yield not to a fool's impertinence:
Sometimes conceited sceptics, void of sense,
By their false taste condemn some finish'd part,
And blame the noblest flights of wit and art.
In vain their fond opinions you deride; 920
With their lov'd follies they are satisfied.
And their weak judgment, void of sense and light,

Thinks nothing can escape their feeble sight.
Their dang'rous counsels do not cure, but wound;

To shun the storm they run your verse aground;

And, thinking to escape a rock, are drown'd.
Choose a sure judge to censure what you write,
Whose reason leads, and knowledge gives you light,

Whose steady hand will prove your faithful guide, 930

And touch the darling follies you would hide:
He, in your doubts, will carefully advise,

And clear the mist before your feeble eyes.

'T is he will tell you to what noble height

A generous Muse may sometimes take her flight;

When, too much fetter'd with the rules of art,
May from her stricter bounds and limits part:

But such a perfect judge is hard to see,

And every rhymers knows not poetry; 938

Nay some there are, for writing verse extoll'd,
Who know not Lucan's dross from Virgil's gold.

Would you in this great art acquire renown?
Authors, observe the rules I here lay down.

In prudent lessons everywhere abound;

With pleasant join the useful and the sound:

A sober reader a vain tale will slight;

He seeks as well instruction as delight.

Let all your thoughts to virtue be confin'd,

Still off'ring noble figures to our mind:

I like not those loose writers, who employ 940

Their guilty Muse, good manners to destroy;

Who with false colors still deceive our eyes,

And show us Vice dress'd in a fair disguise.

Yet do I not their sullen Muse approve,

Who from all modest writings banish love;

That strip the playhouse of its chief intrigue,

And make a murderer of Roderigue;²

The lightest love, if decently express'd,

Will raise no vicious motions in our breast.

Dido in vain may weep, and ask relief;

I blame her folly, whilst I share her grief. 950

A virtuous author, in his charming art,

To please the sense needs not corrupt the heart;

His heat will never cause a guilty fire:

To follow virtue then be your desire.

In vain your art and vigor are express'd;

Th' obscene expression shows th' infected breast.

But, above all, base jealousies avoid,

In which detracting poets are employ'd.

A noble wit dares lib'rally commend, 960

And scorns to grudge at his deserving friend.

Base rivals, who true wit and merit hate,

Caballing still against it with the great,

Maliciously aspire to gain renown

By standing up and pulling others down.

Never debase yourself by treacherous ways,

Nor by such abject methods seek for praise:

Let not your only bus'ness be to write;

Be virtuous, just, and in your friends delight.

'T is not enough your poems be admir'd;

But strive your conversation be desir'd: 970

Write for immortal fame, nor ever choose

Gold for the object of a gen'rous Muse.

I know a noble wit may, without crime,

Receive a lawful tribute for his time;

Yet I abhor those writers who despise

Their honor, and alone their profit prize;

Who their Apollo basely will degrade,

And of a noble science make a trade.

Before kind Reason did her light display,

And government taught mortals to obey, 980

Men, like wild beasts, did Nature's laws pursue;

They fed on herbs, and drink from rivers drew:

Their brutal force, on lust and rapine bent,

Committed murders without punishment.

Reason at last, by her all-conquering arts,

² The Cid, translated into English.

Reduc'd these savages and tun'd their hearts;
Mankind from bogs, and woods, and caverns
calls,

And towns and cities fortifies with walls:
Thus fear of justice made proud rapine cease,
And shelter'd innocence by laws and peace. ¹⁰⁰⁰

These benefits from poets we receiv'd,
From whence are rais'd those fictions since believ'd,

That Orpheus, by his soft harmonious strains,
Tam'd the fierce tigers of the Thracian plains;
Amphion's notes, by their melodious pow'rs,
Drew rocks and woods, and rais'd the Theban
tow'rs:

These miracles from numbers did arise;
Since which, in verse Heav'n taught his mysteries,

And by a priest, possess'd with rage divine.
Apollo spoke from his prophetic shrine. ¹⁰¹⁰

Soon after, Homer the old heroes prais'd,
And noble minds by great examples rais'd;
Then Hesiod did his Grecian swains incline
To till the fields, and prune the bounteous vine.
Thus useful rules were by the poets' aid,
In easy numbers, to rude men convey'd.
And pleasingly their precepts did impart;
First charm'd the ear, and then engag'd the
heart:

The Muses thus their reputation rais'd, ¹⁰²⁰
And with just gratitude in Greece were prais'd.
With pleasure mortals did their wonders see,

And sacrific'd to their divinity;
But want, at last, base flatt'ry entertain'd.

And old Parnassus with this vice was stain'd:
Desire of gain dazzling the poets' eyes,

Their works were fill'd with fulsome flatteries.
Thus needy wits a vile revenue made,

And verse became a mercenary trade.
Debase not with so mean a vice thy art:

If gold must be the idol of thy heart, ¹⁰³⁰
Fly, fly th' unfruitful Heliconian strand;

Those streams are not enrich'd with golden
sand:

Great wits, as well as warriors, only gain
Laurels and honors for their toil and pain.

But what? an author cannot live on fame,
Or pay a reck'ning with a lofty name:

A poet to whom fortune is unkind,
Who when he goes to bed has hardly din'd,

Takes little pleasure in Parnassus' dreams,
Or relishes the Heliconian streams. ¹⁰⁴⁰

Horace had ease and plenty when he writ,
And, free from cares for money or for meat,

Did not expect his dinner from his wit.
'Tis true; but verse is cherish'd by the great,

And now none furnish who deserve to eat:
What can we fear, when virtue, arts, and sense,

Receive the stars' propitious influence;
When a sharp-sighted prince, by early grants,

Rewards your merits, and prevents your wants? ¹⁰⁵⁰
Sing then his glory, celebrate his fame;

Your noblest theme is his immortal name.
Let mighty Spenser raise his reverend head,

Cowley and Denham start up from the dead;
Waller his age renew, and off' rings bring;

Our monarch's praise let bright-ey'd virgins
sing;

Let Dryden with new rules our stage refine,
And his great models form by this design:
But where's a second Virgil, to rehearse
Our hero's glories in his epic verse? ¹⁰⁵⁰

What Orpheus sing his triumphs o'er the main,
And make the hills and forests move again;

Show his bold fleet on the Batavian shore,
And Holland trembling as his cannons roar;

Paint Europe's balance in his steady hand,
Whilst the two worlds in expectation stand

Of peace or war, that wait on his command? }
But, as I speak, new glories strike my eyes,

Glories which Heav'n itself does give, and prize,
Blessings of peace; that with their milder rays

Adorn his reign, and bring Saturnian days. ¹⁰⁷⁰
Now let rebellion, discord, vice, and rage,

That have in patriots' forms debauch'd our age,
Vanish, with all the ministers of hell:

His rays their pois'nous vapors shall dispel.
'Tis he alone our safety did create;

His own firm soul secur'd the nation's fate, }
Oppos'd to all the boutefeus of the state.

Authors, for him your great endeavors raise;
The loftiest numbers will but reach his praise.

For me, whose verse in satire has been bred, ¹⁰⁸⁰
And never durst heroic measures tread;

Yet you shall see me, in that famous field,
With eyes and voice my best assistance yield;

Offer you lessons that my infant Muse Learnt, when she Horace for her guide did
choose;

Second your zeal with wishes, heart, and eyes,
And afar off hold up the glorious prize.

But pardon too, if, zealous for the right,
A strict observer of each noble flight,

From the fine gold I separate th' allay, ¹⁰⁹⁰
And show how hasty writers sometimes stray:

Apter to blame, than knowing how to mend;
A sharp, but yet a necessary friend.

ON THE YOUNG STATESMEN

[The following verses are reprinted from Poems on Affairs of State, the fourth edition, 1702, where they are headed On the Young Statesman [sic]. By J. Dryden, 1680. The style of this piece is entirely unlike Dryden's, and the sneers at Danby and at Laurence Hyde, created Earl of Rochester in 1681, both of whom he compliments in dedications, are still more emphatically not in his manner. In A New Collection of Poems relating to State Affairs, 1705, this poem is ascribed to the Earl of Rochester [i. e. John Wilmot], who is much more likely to have been its author than is Dryden. Scott, on internal evidence, is "tempted to ascribe" the verses to the Earl of Dorset, whose poem On the Countess of Dorchester they resemble in "the turn of wit and structure of verse." H. C. Foxcroft (Life and Letters of Sir George Savile, Bart., First Marquis of Halifax, vol. i, p. 205) states that Burnet attributes them to the Duke of Buckingham.

In A Collection of Poems on Affairs of State, 1689, there occurs a poem called Young Statesman on the title-page, but headed A Young Gentleman, desirous to be a Minister of State, thus pretends to qualify himself. It has nothing in common with the present piece.]

I

CLARENDON had law and sense,
Clifford was fierce and brave;

Bennet's grave look was a pretense,
And D——y's matchless impudence
Help'd to support the knave.

II

But Sund——d, God——n, L——y,
These will appear such chits in story,
'T will turn all politics to jests,
To be repeated like John Dory,
When fiddlers sing at feasts.

III

Protect us, mighty Providence ;
What would these madmen have ?
First, they would bribe us without pence,
Deceive us without common sense,
And without pow'r enslave.

IV

Shall freeborn men in humble awe
Submit to servile shame ;
Who from consent and custom draw
The same right to be rul'd by law,
Which kings pretend, to reign ?

V

The duke shall wield his conqu'ring sword,
The chancellor make a speech ;
The king shall pass his honest word,
The pawn'd revenue sums afford —
And then, come kiss my breech.

VI

So have I seen a king on chess,
(His rooks and knights withdrawn,
His queen and bishops in distress,)
Shifting about, grow less and less,
With here and there a pawn.

ÆSACUS TRANSFORM'D INTO A CORMORANT

FROM OVID'S METAMORPHOSES, BOOK XI

[So far as the present editor can ascertain, the following piece was first printed in Ovid's Metamorphoses, in fifteen books, Translated by the most Eminent Hand, published by Tonson in 1717. It is assigned to Dryden in the table of contents of this collection, which was edited by Sir Samuel Garth. It was reprinted in the edition of Dryden's Original Poems and Translations, edited by Broughton, and published in 1743.]

THESE some old man sees wanton in the air,
And praises the unhappy constant pair ;
Then to his friend the long-neck'd corm'rant
shows,

The former tale reviving others' woes.
"That sable bird," he cries, "which cuts the
flood

With slender legs, was once of royal blood ;
His ancestors from mighty Tros proceed,
The brave Laomedon, and Ganymede,
(Whose beauty tempted Jove to steal the boy.)
And Priam, hapless prince ! who fell with Troy.

Himself was Hector's brother, and (had fate
But giv'n his hopeful youth a longer date)

Perhaps had rival'd warlike Hector's worth,
Tho' on the mother's side of meaner birth.
Fair Alyxothoe, a country maid,
Bare Æsacus by stealth in Ida's shade.
He fled the noisy town and pompous court,
Lov'd the lone hills and simple rural sport,
And seldom to the city would resort. }
Yet he no rustic clownishness profess'd, }
Nor was soft love a stranger to his breast. }
The youth had long the nymph Hesperie woo'd ;
Oft thro' the thicket or the mead pursued :
Her haply on her father's bank he spied,
While fearless she her silver tresses dried.
Away she fled : not stags with half such speed
Before the prowling wolf scud o'er the mead ;
Not ducks, when they the safer flood forsake,
Pursued by hawks, so swift regain the lake.
As fast he follow'd in the hot career ;
Desire the lover wing'd, the virgin fear.
A snake unseen now pierc'd her heedless foot ;
Quick thro' the veins the venom'd juices shoot :
She fell, and 'scaped by death his fierce pursuit.

Her lifeless body, frighted, he embrac'd,
And cried : ' Not this I dreaded, but thy haste :
O had my love been less, or less thy fear !
The victory, thus bought, is far too dear.
Accursed snake ! yet I more curst than he !
He gave the wound ; the cause was giv'n by me.
Yet none shall say that unreveng'd you died.'
He spoke ; then climb'd a cliff's o'erhanging
side,

And, resolute, leap'd on the foaming tide.
Tethys receiv'd him gently on the wave ;
The death he sought denied, and feathers gave.
Debar'd the surest remedy of grief,
And forc'd to live, he curs'd th' unask'd relief ;
Then on his airy pinions upward flies,
And at a second fall successful tries ;
The downy plume a quick descent denies. } Enrag'd, he often dives beneath the wave,
And there in vain expects to find a grave.
His ceaseless sorrow for th' unhappy maid
Meager'd his look, and on his spirits prey'd.
Still near the sounding deep he lives ; his name
From frequent diving and em'br'ging came."

KING JAMES TO HIMSELF

[The following poem is taken from Poems on Affairs of State, vol. II. 1703, where it is ascribed to Mr. D——n. Though the style has little of Dryden's vigor, the piece is in itself not uninteresting.]

UNHAPPY I, who once ordain'd did bear
God's justice sword, and his vicergerent here,
Am now depos'd : 'gainst me my children rise ;
My life must be their only sacrifice.
Highly they me accuse, but nothing prove ;
But this is out of tenderness and love.
They seek to spill my blood ; 't is that alone
Must for the nation's crying sins atone.
But careful Heaven forewarn'd me in a dream.
And shew'd me that my dangers were extreme.
The heavenly vision spoke and bid me flee :
Th' ungrateful wretches were not worthy me.
Alarm'd, I fled at the appointed time ;
Thus mere necessity was made my crime.

HYMNS ATTRIBUTED TO DRYDEN

[In 1693 Dryden published in Examen Poeticum a translation of the hymn Veni, Creator Spiritus, which has been printed above, pages 406, 407.

In his edition of Dryden, 1808, Scott printed as Dryden's work two more hymns, which he had received from manuscript sources: see the Scott-Saintsbury edition, vol. i, pp. xvi, 288-290. His account of their origin contains some peculiar inconsistencies: see the article on Dryden by the Rev H. Leigh Bennett, in the Dictionary of Hymnology, London, 1892. Nevertheless the two hymns have been somewhat rashly accepted as authentic by later editors.

We now turn to a more important matter. After the Reformation, a series of devotional books, under the general title of Primer, was published for the use of English Catholic laymen. These books contained English translations of the Latin church hymns, which were modified from time to time to suit the literary fashions of the day. The Primer of 1706, of which the full title is, The Primer; or, Office of the B. Virgin Mary, revised: with a New and Approved Version of the Church-Hymns throughout the Year, contains, among the 120 hymns included in it, both Dryden's acknowledged hymn and the two assigned to him by Scott. (This volume is very scarce, and has been inaccessible to the present editor, who draws his information from secondary authorities.) Moreover, these three hymns are linked to others in the collection in such a way as to indicate that, if they are genuine, — as one of them certainly is, — nearly the whole body of verse in the Primer of 1706 must be assigned to Dryden. The question of authenticity rests almost entirely on internal evidence.

In a sumptuous, many-volumed edition of Dryden the proper course would be to reprint all the hymns contained in the Primer of 1706, give a thorough discussion of the evidence, and let the reader form his own conclusions. In an edition of the present form and scope such a procedure seems out of the question. The present editor reprints only the two hymns published by Scott, and, as a matter of curious interest, preserves Scott's text, which differs somewhat from that of the Primer. Several of the hymns from the Primer are reprinted in the Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 269-281, many more in Annus Sanctus (London, 1884), edited by Mr. Orby Shipley. Discussions of the question of authorship may be found in Annus Sanctus, in an article by Mr. Shipley in the Dublin Review (Oct., 1884, vol. xcv, pp. 245-269), in two articles in the Saturday Review (Aug. 23, Sept. 20, 1884; vol. lxxiii, pp. 241-246, 370-372), and, most conveniently, in the articles on Dryden and Primers, by the Rev H. Leigh Bennett, in the Dictionary of Hymnology.]

THE TE DEUM

THEE, Sovereign God, our grateful accents
praise;

We own thee Lord, and bless thy wondrous
ways;

To thee, Eternal Father, earth's whole frame,
With loudest trumpets, sounds immortal fame.
Lord God of Hosts! for thee the heavenly powers

With sounding anthems fill the vaulted towers.

Thy Cherubims thrice, Holy, Holy, Holy,
cry;

Thrice, Holy, all the Seraphims reply,
And thrice returning echoes endless songs
supply.

Both heaven and earth thy majesty display; 10
They owe their beauty to thy glorious ray.

Thy praises fill the loud apostles' choir;
The train of prophets in the song conspire.

Legions of martyrs in the chorus shine,
And vocal blood with vocal music join.

By these thy church, inspir'd by heavenly art,
Around the world maintains a second part;

And tunes her sweetest notes, O God, to thee,
The Father of unbounded majesty;

The Son, ador'd copartner of thy seat, 20
And equal everlasting Paraclete.

Thou King of Glory, Christ, of the most high,
Thou coeternal filial Deity;

Thou who, to save the world's impending
doom,

Vouchsaf'dst to dwell within a Virgin's womb;
Old tyrant Death disarm'd, before thee flew

The bolts of heaven, and back the foldings
drew,

To give access, and make thy faithful way;
From God's right hand thy filial beams display.

Thou art to judge the living and the dead; 30
Then spare those souls for whom thy veins have bled.

O take us up amongst thy blest above,
To share with them thy everlasting love.

Preserve, O Lord, thy people, and enhance Thy blessing on thine own inheritance.

For ever raise their hearts, and rule their ways;
Each day we bless thee, and proclaim thy
praise:

No age shall fail to celebrate thy name,
No hour neglect thy everlasting fame.

Preserve our souls, O Lord, this day from ill; 40
Have mercy on us, Lord, have mercy still:

As we have hop'd, do thou reward our pain;
We've hop'd in thee — let not our hope be vain.

HYMN FOR ST. JOHN'S EVE

(20 June)

I

O SYLVAN prophet, whose eternal fame

Echoes from Judah's hills, and Jordan's stream,

The music of our numbers raise,
And tune our voices to thy praise.

II

A messenger from high Olympus came

To bear the tidings of thy life and name;
And told thy sire each prodigy

That Heaven design'd to work in thee.

III

Hearing the news, and doubting in surprise,

His falt'ring speech in fetter'd accent dies; 10
But Providence, with happy choice,

In thee restor'd thy father's voice.

IV

In the recess of nature's dark abode,

Tho' still inclos'd, yet knewest thou thy God!
Whilst each glad parent told and bless'd

The secrets of each other's breast.

THRENI CANTABRIGIENSES

[In 1661 there was published at Cambridge a volume entitled Threni Cantabrigienses in Funere duorum Principum, Henrici Glocestrensis, et Mariæ Aragoniensis, Serenissimi Regis Caroli II, Fratris et Sororis (British Museum Catalogue). This contains, according to Malone (I, 1, 17), poems by Jonathan Dryden, a cousin of our author. The pieces are sometimes ascribed to John Dryden.]

SATIRE UPON THE DUTCH

WRITTEN BY MR. DRYDEN IN THE YEAR 1662

[A poem under this title is found in Poems on Affairs of State, vol. iii, 1704. See headnote, pages 70, 71.]

THE MALL

OR, THE MODISH LOVERS

[A comedy of this title, published in 1674, has a dedication, To William Whitcomb, Junior, Esq., signed J. D. It has been conjectured that this piece is identical with The Ladies a la Mode, a play which Pepys saw on September 15, 1668, and which he terms "a translation out of French by Dryden." That drama signally failed on representation, and, unless it be really the same as The Mall, seems never to have been printed.

The Mall is printed in the Scott-Sainsbury edition, viii. 507-576. The evidence does not warrant reproducing here the prologue and the epilogue, and the one song inserted in the play (pages 537, 538).]

THE MISTAKEN HUSBAND

[A comedy of this title, "printed for J. Magnes and R. Bentley" in 1675, contains a short preface, The Bookseller to the Reader, signed "R. Bentley," which begins as follows:

"This play was left in Mr. Dryden's hands many years since. The author of it was unknown to him, and returned not to claim it: 't is therefore to be presum'd that he is dead. After twelve years' expectation, Mr. Dryden gave it to the players, having upon perusal of it found that it deserv'd a better fate than to be buried in obscurity. I have heard him say that finding a scene wanting he supplied it, and many have affirm'd that the style of it is proper to the subject, which is that the French call basse comedy."

A. C. Swinburne (in the Gentleman's Magazine, Oct., 1880; vol. cclix, pp. 416-425) while arguing that one scene of this play was really written by Dryden, condemns the prologue and epilogue as none of his work. They are not intrinsically interesting, and have no claim to be reprinted in this edition. They may be found in the Scott-Sainsbury edition, where the play is printed, viii. 577-643.]

TO BE WRITTEN UNDER THE DUCHESS OF PORTSMOUTH'S PICTURE

[In Poems on Affairs of State, vol. iii, 1704, there is found an excellent epigram of six lines, with title as above, which, from the concluding couplet:

A nobler theme had been this poet's boast,
That all the world for love had well been lost -- might well be ascribed to Dryden. Unfortunately it occurs in Examen Poeticum, 1693 (a volume edited by Dryden himself), with no mention of the author, and with the reading the poet's instead of this poet's, in the next to the last line.

The editor of Poems on Affairs of State, while not assigning this epigram to Dryden, does attribute to him (in his Index) Another on the same subject, printed on the same page. This second epigram is a piece of no merit, and cannot be regarded as Dryden's work. It may be found in the Scott-Sainsbury edition, xv. 266.]

SATIRE UPON ROMISH CONFESSORS

[A poem under this title, printed in Poems on Affairs of State, vol. iii, 1704, and there ascribed to Dryden, is nothing but the epilogue to The Spanish Friar, lacking the first four lines. This second epigram was by a friend of Dryden: see headnote, page 103. The epilogue may be found in the Scott-Sainsbury edition, vi. 522, 523.]

EPILOGUE SPOKEN AT MITHRIDATES KING OF PONTUS

THE FIRST PLAY ACTED AT THE THEATER ROYAL, 1681

[Under the title above, Scott reprinted an epilogue from a broadside, but gave no evidence that the piece was by Dryden. Christie (page 434) very properly rejects it. The epilogue may be found in the Scott-Sainsbury edition, x. 351. Compare headnote, page 81.]

TO MR. CREECH, UPON HIS TRANSLATION OF LUCRETIIUS INTO ENGLISH

[A complimentary poem under this heading, prefixed to Creech's translation of Lucretius, published in 1682, was early attributed to Dryden; and on it was built a scandalous story, that Dryden "incited Creech to translate Horace, that by his failure in that work he might lose the reputation which he had gained by his poetical version of Lucretius" (Malone). For this assumption the only tangible evidence is that the verses are dated January 25, 1682, and contain the couplet:

Believe me, youth, for I am read in cares,
And bend beneath the weight of fifty years, which tallies exactly with Dryden's age at the time. Malone (I, 1, 505-511) successfully refuted this ancient calumny. The old story was revived by a writer in Notes and Queries, series VI. iv. 24.]

ON THE DUKE OF BUCKS

[A lampoon on George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, is printed under this title in Poems on Affairs of State, vol. ii, 1703, where it is ascribed to Mr. Dr. — n. A long excerpt is given in Malone, I, 1, 95-97. The style of the piece proves conclusively that it is not Dryden's work.]

EPILOGUE TO DISAPPOINTMENT

OR, THE MOTHER IN FASHION

[The prologue to this play by Southerne has been printed on page 171. In the first edition of the play, 1684, and in the collected editions of Southerne's works, the epilogue is ascribed to the Hon. John Stafford. But it appears in the third edition, 1702, of Miscellany Poems, the First Part, under the heading An Epilogue by Mr. Dryden. The piece may be found in the Scott-Sainsbury edition, x. 421.]

AN EPITAPH UPON THE E. OF RO—S—TER'S BEING DISMISS'D FROM THE TREASURY IN 1687

[A lampoon upon Laurence Hyde, Earl of Rochester, is printed under this title in Poems on Affairs of State, vol. ii, 1703, and ascribed to Dryden. It has no claim to authenticity. In 1692 Dryden dedicated Cleomenes to Rochester in terms of great respect. The piece may be found in the Scott-Saintsbury edition, xv. 265, 266.]

TARQUIN AND TULLIA

[A poem violently attacking King William and Queen Mary is printed under this title in Poems on Affairs of State, vol. iii, 1704, and in the index is ascribed to Mr. D—n. It may be found in the Scott-Saintsbury edition, xv. 257-262.

In The Life and Posthumous Works of Arthur Maynwaring, Esq. [by John Oldmixon], 1715, pages 9-13. Oldmixon gives extensive quotations from this poem, which he says was one of Mainwaring's first productions. On page 14 he says that another poem by Mainwaring, The King of Hearts, was falsely attributed to Dryden.

Pope told Spence (see Anecdotes) "that that very hot copy of verses against King William and Queen Mary . . . was written by the famous Mr. Mainwaring."]

SUUM CUIQUE

[This poem may be found in the Scott-Saintsbury edition, xv. 263-265. The present editor has been unable to discover where it was first published. Scott attributes it, like Tarquin and Tullia, to Mainwaring, but cites no authority for doing so.]

SONGS FROM THE PROPHETESS

[Professor Saintsbury conjectures, on what seems to the present editor insufficient evidence, that certain songs in the revised version of The Prophetess, published in 1690 (see headnote, page 200), may have been written by Dryden. See Scott-Saintsbury edition, viii 10, and xviii. 302-308.]

A FAMILIAR EPISTLE TO MR. JULIAN
SECRETARY OF THE MUSES

[A lampoon with this title is printed under Dryden's name in the second edition, 1716, of The Sixth Part of Miscellany Poems. It may be found in the Scott-Saintsbury edition, xv. 214-219.

The piece is printed anonymously in Poems on Affairs of State, vol. iii, 1704. It is also found in the second volume of Miscellaneous Works written by his Grace, George, late Duke of Buckingham, 1705-07. Whether by Buckingham or not, the poem is certainly not by Dryden. The style is entirely unlike his, and the following couplet could not have been written by him:

Less art thou help'd by Dryden's bedrid age;
That drone has lost his sting upon the stage.]

OF A NOBLE RACE WAS SHENKIN

[A song under this title, really by D'Urfey, has been attributed to Dryden: see Notes and Queries, series III. xi. 316, 348.]

ON THE MARRIAGE OF THE FAIR AND VIRTUOUS LADY MRS. ANASTASIA
STAFFORD

WITH THAT TRULY WORTHY AND PIOUS GENT
GEORGE HOLMAN, ESQ.

TO MATILDA

ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF OUR MARRIAGE

[At the close of the Aldine edition of Dryden (London, 1843, 1844, vol. v, pp. 313, 317) there are found two poems, with titles as above, which have been reprinted in some later editions. The present editor has been unable to discover the place of the original publication of these pieces, or, in fact, to find any notice of them earlier than the Aldine edition, which was first published in 1832, 1833.]

APPENDIX II

TRANSLATIONS FROM VIRGIL INCLUDED IN SYLVÆ (THE SECOND MISCELLANY), 1685

[The following episodes from the Æneid, first published in Sylvæ, 1685 (compare headnote, page 175), Dryden thoroughly recast when he made his complete translation of Virgil. In the texts printed below, lines which Dryden later retained unchanged are inclosed in brackets, those which he retained with minor changes are marked with a single bracket; those which he entirely rewrote are left unmarked. In The Episode of Mezentius and Lausus, which Dryden changed comparatively little in rewriting, passages which he left intact are indicated merely by the numbers of the lines in the later text.]

THE ENTIRE EPISODE OF NISUS AND EURYALUS, TRANSLATED FROM THE FIFTH AND NINTH BOOKS OF VIR-GIL'S ÆNEIDS

[See pages 583, 584, lines 373-475, and pages 641-646, lines 221-600.]

Connection of the first part of the Episode in the Fifth Book with the rest of the foregoing poem.

Æneas having buried his father Anchises in Sicily, and setting sail from thence in search of Italy, is driven by a storm on the same coasts from whence he departed. After a year's wand'ring, he is hospitably re-ceiv'd by his friend Acestes, king of that part of the island, who was born of Trojan parentage. He applies himself to celebrate the memory of his father with divine honors, and accordingly institutes funeral games, and appoints prizes for those who should conquer in them. One of these games was a foot race, in which Nisus and Euryalus were engag'd amongst other Trojans and Sicilians.

[FROM thence his way the Trojan hero bent]
[Into a grassy plain, with mountains pent, [Whose brows were shaded with surrounding
wood,
[Full in the midst of this fair valley stood]

[A native theater, which, rising slow]
 [By just degrees, o'erlook'd the ground below.]
 [A numerous train attend in solemn state;]
 [High on the new-raised turf their leader sate.
 Here those who in the rapid race delight,
 Desire of honor and the prize invite.] 10
 The Trojans and Sicilians mingled stand,
 With Nisus and Euryalus, the foremost of the band:

Euryalus with youth and beauty crown'd,
 Nisus, for friendship to the boy renown'd.
 Diorex next, of Priam's regal race,
 Then Salius, join'd with Patron, took his place;
 But from Epirus one deriv'd his birth,
 The other ow'd it to Arcadian earth:
 Then two Sicilian youths — the name of this
 Was Helymus, of that was Panopes; 20
 Two jolly huntsmen in the forest bred,
 And owning old Acestor for their head;
 With many others of obscurer name,
 Whom time has not deliver'd o'er to fame.]

To these Æneas in the midst arose,
 And pleasingly did thus his mind expose:
 "Not one of you shall unrewarded go;
 On each I will two Cretan spears bestow,
 Pointed with polish'd steel; a battle-axe too,
 With silver studded: these in common share;
 The foremost three shall olive garlands wear.
 The victor, who shall first the race obtain,
 Shall for his prize a well-breath'd courser gain,
 Adorn'd with trappings; to the next in fame,
 The quiver of an Amazonian dame,
 With feather'd Thracian arrows well supplied,
 Hung on a golden belt, and with a jewel tied;
 The third this Grecian helmet must content.
 He said. To their appointed base they went;
 With beating hearts th' expected sign receive,
 And, starting all at once, the station leave. 40
 Spread out, as on the wings of winds they flew,
 And seiz'd the distant goal with eager view.
 Shot from the crowd, swift Nisus all o'er-
 pass'd;]

[Not storms, nor thunder, equal half his haste,
 The next, but, tho' the next, yet far disjoin'd,
 Came Salius; then, a distant space behind,
 Euryalus the third:
 Next Helymus, whom young Diorex plied,
 Step after step, and almost side by side. 50
 His shoulders pressing; and, in longer space,
 Had won, or left at least a doubtful race.
 [Now, spent, the goal they almost reach at last.]

[When eager Nisus, hapless in his haste,
 Slipp'd first, and, slipping, fell upon the plain,
 Moist with the blood of oxen lately slain.
 The careless victor had not mark'd his way;
 But, treading where the treacherous puddle lay.]

[His heels flew up, and on the grassy floor] 60
 [He fell, besmear'd with filth and holy gore.]
 Nor mindless then, Euryalus, of thee,
 Nor of the sacred bonds of amity,
 He strove th' immediate rival to oppose,
 And caught the foot of Salius as he rose.
 So Salius lay extended on the plain;
 Euryalus springs out, the prize to gain,
 And cuts the crowd: applauding peals attend

[The conqueror to the goal, who conquer'd thro' his friend.]

[Next Helymus; and then Diorex came.]
 [By two misfortunes now the third in fame. 70
 [But Salius enters, and, exclaiming loud]

[For justice, deafens and disturbs the crowd;]
 [Urges his cause may in the court be heard;]
 [And pleads the prize is wrongfully conferr'd.]
 [But favor for Euryalus appears;]
 [His blooming beauty and his graceful tears
 Had brib'd the judges to protect his claim;
 Besides, Diorex does as loud exclaim,
 Who vainly reaches at the last reward,]
 [If the first palm on Salius be conferr'd.] 80
 [Then thus the prince: "Let no disputes arise;]
 [Where Fortune plac'd it, I award the prize.]
 [But give me leave her errors to amend,
 [At least to pity a deserving friend."
 Thus having said,

A lion's hide, amazing to behold,
 Pond'rous with bristles, and with paws of gold,
 He gave the youth; which Nisus griev'd to
 view. —

[If such rewards to vanquish'd men are due,"]

[Said he, "and falling is to rise by you, 90
 [What prize may Nisus from your bounty claim,
 [Who merited the first rewards and fame?]
 [In falling, both did equal fortune try;
 [Would Fortune make me fall as happily!"]
 [With this he pointed to his face, and show'd]
 [His hands and body all besmear'd with blood,
 [Th' indulgent father of the people smil'd,
 And caus'd to be produc'd a massy shield,
 Of wondrous art, by Didymaon wrought,
 Long since from Neptune's bars in triumph
 brought:]

[With this, the graceful youth he gratified;
 Then the remaining presents did divide.]

Connection of the remaining part of the Episode, translated out of the Ninth Book of Virgil's Æneids, with the foregoing part of the story.

The war being now broken out betwixt the Trojans and Latins, and Æneas being overmatch'd in numbers by his enemies, who were aided by King Turnus, he fortifies his camp, and leaves in it his young son Ascanus, under the direction of his chief counselors and captains, while he goes in person to beg succors from King Evander and the Tuscans. Turnus takes advantage of his absence, and assaults his camp. The Trojans in it are reduc'd to great extremities, which gives the poet the occasion of continuing this admirable episode, wherein he describes the friendship, the generosity, the adventures, and the death of Nisus and Euryalus.

The Trojan camp the common danger shar'd;
 By turns they watch'd the walls, and kept the nightly guard.

To warlike Nisus fell the gate by lot,
 Whom Hyrtæus on huntress Ida got,
 And sent to sea Æneas to attend:
 [Well could he dart the spear, and shafts unerring send.]

[Beside him stood Euryalus, his ever faithful
 friend:]

No youth in all the Trojan host was seen 110
 More beautiful in arms, or of a nobler mien —

[Scarce was the down upon his chin begun.
[One was their friendship, their desire was one ;
[With minds united in the field they warr'd,
[And now were both by choice upon the guard.]

[Then Nisus thus :

“ Or do the gods this warlike warmth inspire,
[Or makes each man a god of his desire ?
[A noble ardor boils within my breast,
[Eager of action, enemy of rest ; 120
[That urges me to fight, or undertake
Some deed that may my fame immortal make.
[Thou see'st the foe secure ; how faintly shine]
[Their scatter'd fires ! the most, in sleep supine,] [Dissolv'd in ease, and drunk with victory ;
[The few awake the fuming flagon ply :
[All hush'd around. Now hear what I revolve] [Within my mind, and what my laboring thoughts resolve.

[Our absent lord both camp and council mourn ;
[By message both would hasten his return :] 130
[The gifts propos'd if they confer on thee,
[For fame is recompense enough to me,)

[Methinks, beneath yon hill, I have espied]
[A way that safely will my passage guide.”]

[Euryalus stood list'ning while he spoke,]

[With love of praise and noble envy strook ;
[Then to his ardent friend expos'd his mind :]

“ All this, alone, and leaving me behind !
[Am I unworthy, Nisus, to be join'd ?] 140

[Think'st thou my share of honor I will yield,
[Or send thee unassisted to the field ?]

[Not so my father taught my childhood arms ;]
[Born in a siege, and bred amongst alarms !

[Nor is my youth unworthy of my friend,]
[Or of the heav'n-born hero I attend.

[The thing call'd life with ease I can disclaim,]
[And think it over-sold to purchase fame.”]

[To whom his friend :

“ I could not think, alas, thy tender years
[Would minister new matter to my fears :] 150
[Nor is it just thou shouldst thy wish obtain —

[So Jove in triumph bring me back again
[To those dear eyes, or if a god there be

[To pious friends propitious more than he !
[But if some one — as many sure there are

[Of adverse accidents in doubtful war —
[If one should reach my head, there let it fall,]

[And spare thy life ; I would not perish all.]
[Thy youth is worthy of a longer date :

[Do thou remain to mourn thy lover's fate. 160
[To bear my mangled body from the foe,]

[Or buy it back, and fun'ral rites bestow ;]
[Or, if hard fortune shall my corpse deny

[Those dues, with empty marble to supply.
[O let not me the widow's tears renew !]

[Let not a mother's curse my name pursue :
[Thy pious mother, who, in love to thee,

[Left the fair coast of fruitful Sicily,
[Her age committing to the seas and wind,]

[When every weary matron stay'd behind.”] 170
[To this, Euryalus : “ Thou plead'st in vain,

[And but delay'st the cause thou canst not gain.
[No more ! 'tis loss of time.” With that he wakes

[The nodding watch : each to his office takes.]
[The guard reliev'd, in company they went

[To find the council at the royal tent.]

Now every living thing lay void of care,
[And sleep, the common gift of nature, share :]
[Meantime the Trojan peers in council sate,
[And call'd their chief commanders, to de- 180

bate

[The weighty business of th' indanger'd state ;
[What next was to be done, who to be sent

[To inform Æneas of the foes' intent.
[In midst of all the quiet camp they held

[Nocturnal council ; each sustains a shield
[Which his o'er-labor'd arm can hardly rear,

[And leans upon a long projected spear.
[Now Nisus and his friend approach the

guard,]

[And beg admittance, eager to be heard :
[Th' affair important, not to be deferr'd.] 190

[Ascanius bids them be conducted in ;
[Then thus, commanded, Nisus does begin :

“ Ye Trojan fathers, lend attentive ears ;
[Nor judge our undertaking by our years.

[The foes, securely drench'd in sleep and wine,
[Their watch neglect ; their fires but thinly

shine ;
[And, where the smoke in thick'ning vapors

flies,
[Cov'ring the plain, and clouding all the skies,

[Betwixt the spaces we have mark'd a way,
[Close by the gate, and coasting by the sea. 200

[This passage undisturb'd, and unespied,
[Our steps will safely to Æneas guide :

[Expect each hour to see him back again,
[Loaded with spoils of foes in battle slain.]

[Snatch we the lucky minute while we may,]
[Nor can we be mistaken in the way ;]

[For, hunting in the vale, we oft have seen
[The rising turrets with the stream between,

[And know its winding course, with every ford.”
[Hepaus'd ; and old Alethes took the word : 210

“ Our country gods, in whom our trust we
place,]

[Will yet from ruin save the Trojan race,]
[While we behold such springing worth appear

[In youth so brave, and breasts so void of fear.”
[With this he took the hand of either boy,

[Embrace'd them closely both, and wept for joy :
[“ Ye brave young men, what equal gifts can

we,]
[What recompense for such desert, decree !

[The greatest, sure, and best you can receive,]
[The gods, your virtue, and your fame will

give. 220
[The rest our grateful general will bestow,]

[And young Ascanius till his manhood owe.”]
[“ And I, whose welfare in my father lies,"]

[Ascanius adds, “ by all the deities,
[By our great country, and our household gods,

[By hoary Vesta's rites and dark abodes,]
[Adjure you both (on you my fortune stands,]

[That and my faith I plight into your hands,]
[Make me but happy in his safe return,]

[For I no other loss but only his can mourn,] 230 [Nisus, your gift shall two large goblets be,

[Of silver, wrought with curious imagery,]
[And high emboss'd, which, when old Priam

reign'd,]
[My conquering sire at sack'd Arisba gain'd ;]

[And more, two tripods cast in antique mold,]

[With two great talents of the finest gold ;]
 [Besides a bowl which Tyrian art did grave,
 The present that Sidonian Dido gave.
 But if in conquer'd Italy we reign,]
 [When spoils by lot the victors shall obtain — Thou saw'st the courser by proud Turnus
 press'd :]

[That, and his golden arms, and sanguine crest,
 [And shield, from lot exempted, thou shalt
 share :

[With these, twelve captive dam'sels young and
 fair ;

Male slaves as many, well appointed all
 With vests and arms, shall to thy portion fall ;
 And last, a fruitful field to thee shall rest,
 The large demesnes the Latian king possess'd.
 [But thou, whose years are more to mine allied —]

[No fate my vow'd affection shall divide]
 [From thee, O wondrous youth ! Be ever mine ;
 Take full possession ; all my soul is thine.]
 [My life's companion, and my bosom friend,
 One faith, one fame, one fate, shall both attend.]

[My peace shall be committed to thy care,]
 [And to thy conduct my concerns in war.]"

[Then thus the bold Euryalus replied :
 "Whatever fortune, good or bad, betide,]
 The same shall be my age, as now my youth ;]
 No time shall find me wanting to my truth.]

[This only from your bounty let me gain
 (And this not granted, all rewards are vain):
 Of Priam's royal race my mother came —]

[And sure the best that ever bore the name —]
 [Whom neither Troy nor Sicily could hold]
 [From me departing, but, o'erspent and old,]
 [My fate she follow'd. Ignorant of this]
 (Whatever) danger, neither parting kiss,]
 [Nor pious blessing taken, her I leave,]
 [And in this only act of all my life deceive.]

[By this your hand and conscious Night I swear,
 My youth so sad a farewell could not bear.
 Be you her patron ; fill my vacant place
 (Permit me to presume so great a grace) ;]
 [Support her age, forsaken and distress'd.]

[That hope alone will fortify my breast]
 [Against the worst of fortunes, and of fears.]"

[He said. Th' assistants shed presaging tears ;
 But, above all, Ascanius, mov'd to see [That image of paternal piety.]

[Then thus replied :
 "So great beginnings, in so green an age,]
 Exact that faith which firmly I engage.
 Thy mother all the privilege shall claim
 Creüsa had, and only want the name.]

[Whate'er event thy enterprise shall have,
 'T is merit to have borne a son so brave.]

[By this my head, a sacred oath, I swear,
 [My father us'd it,) what, returning here]
 [Crown'd with success, I for thyself prepare,]
 [Thy parent and thy family shall share.]

[He said, and weeping, while he spoke the
 word,]

[From his broad belt he drew a shining sword,]
 [Magnificent with gold. Lycaon made,]
 [And in an iv'ry scabbard sheath'd the blade.]

[This was his gift ; while Mnestheus did provide,

For Nisus' arms, a grisly lion's hide,
 [And true Alethes chang'd with him his helm of temper tried.]

[Thus arm'd they went. The noble Trojans wait]

[Their going forth, and follow to the gate [With pray'rs and vows. Above the rest appears]

[Ascanius, manly far above his years,
 [And messages committed to their care,]
 [Which all in winds were lost, and empty air.]

[The trenches first they pass'd ; then took
 their way]

[Where their proud foes in pitch'd pavilions
 lay ;]

[To many fatal, e'er themselves were slain.]
 [The careless host dispers'd upon the plain [They found, who, drunk with wine, supinely
 snore.]

[Unharness'd chariots stand upon the shore ;
 'Midst wheels and reins, and arms, the goblet
 by,]

[A medley of debauch and war, they lie.]
 [Observing Nisus shew'd his friend the sight ;]
 [Then thus : " Behold a conquest without fight.
 Occasion calls the sword to be prepar'd ;
 Our way lies there : stand thou upon the guard,
 [And look behind, while I securely go
 To cut an ample passage thro' the foe."]

[Softly he spoke ; then stalking took his way,
 [With his drawn sword, where haughty Rham-nes lay :]

[His head rais'd high on tapestry beneath,] [And heaving from his breast, he puff'd his
 breath ;]

[A king and prophet, by King Turnus lov'd :]
 [But fate by prescience cannot be remov'd.]

[Three sleeping slaves he soon subdues ; then spies]

[Where Remus, with his proud retinue, lies.
 [His armor-bearer first, and next he kills]
 [His charioteer, entrench'd betwixt the wheels]
 [And his lov'd horses ; last invades their lord ;]
 [Full on his neck he aims the fatal sword :]

[The gasping head flies off ; a purple flood] [Flows from the trunk, that wallows in the
 blood.]

[Which, by the spurning heels dispers'd around,]
 [The bed besprinkles and bedews the ground.]

[Then Lamyrus with Lamus and the young Serranus, who with gaming did prolong
 The night : oppress'd with wine and slumber
 lay]

[The beauteous youth, and dreamt of lucky
 play —]

[More lucky, had it been protracted till the
 day.]

[The famish'd lion thus, with hunger bold,]
 [O'erleaps the fences of the nightly fold,]
 [The peaceful flock devours, and tears, and draws :

[Wrapp'd up in silent fear, they lie and pant beneath his paws.]

[Nor with less rage Euryalus employs]
 [The vengeful sword, nor fewer foes destroys ;
 [But on th' ignoble crowd his fury flew,]
 [Which Fadius, Hebesus, and Rhætus slew,

With Abaris : in sleep the rest did fall,
 [But Rhætus waking, and observing all.
 Behind a mighty jar he slunk for fear ; 350
 The sharp-edg'd iron found and reach'd him
 there :

[Full as he rose he plung'd it in his side ;
 The cruel sword return'd in crimson dyed.
 The wound a blended stream of wine and blood Pours out ; the purple soul comes floating in the flood.]

[Now, where Messapus quarter'd, they arrive.]
 [The fires were fainting there, and just alive ;]
 [The warlike horses, tied in order, fed.
 Nisus the discipline observ'd, and said :
 " Our eagerness of blood may both betray ; 360
 Behold the doubtful glimmering of the day, Foe to these nightly thefts. No more, my
 friend ;

[Here let our glutt'd execution end.]
 [A lane thro' slaughter'd bodies we have
 made,"]

[The bold Euryalus, tho' loth, obey'd.]
 Rich arms and arras, which they scatter'd find,
 [And plate, a precious load, they leave behind.
 Yet, fond of gaudy spoils, the boy would stay]
 To make the proud caparisons his prey,
 Which deck'd a neighb'ring steed. 370

[Nor did his eyes less longingly behold]
 The girdle, studded o'er with nails of gold,
 Which Rhamnes wore. This present long ago
 On Remulus did Cædicius bestow,
 [And, absent, join'd in hospitable ties :]
 [He, dying, to his heir bequeath'd the prize ;]
 [Till, by the conquering Rutuli oppress'd,
 [He fell, and they the glorious gift possess'd.]
 These gaudy spoils Euryalus now bears,

And vainly on his brawny shoulders wears : 380
 [Messapus' helm he found amongst the dead,
 Garnish'd with plumes, and fitted to his head.
 They leave the camp, and take the safest road.

Meantime a squadron of their foes abroad,
 Three hundred horse with bucklers arm'd,
 they spied,
 Whom Volscens by the king's command did
 guide.

To Turnus these were from the city sent,
 And to perform their message sought his tent.
 Approaching, near their utmost lines they
 draw ;

When, bending tow'rd's the left, their captain
 saw 390

[The faithful pair ; for, thro' the doubtful
 shade,

[His glitt'ring helm Euryalus betray'd,
 [On which the moon with full reflection
 play'd.]

[" 'T is not for naught," cried Volscens from
 the crowd,]

[" These men go there ; " then rais'd his voice
 aloud :]

[" Stand ! stand ! why thus in arms ? And whether bent ?]

[From whence, to whom, and on what errand
 sent ? "]

[Silent they make away, and haste their flight To neighb'ring woods, and trust themselves to
 night.]

The speedy horsemen spur their steeds to get 400

'Twixt them and home ; and every path be-
 set,

And all the windings of the well-known wood.
 [Black was the brake, and thick with oak it
 stood,

[With fern all horrid, and perplexing thorn,
 Where tracks of bears had scarce a passage
 worn.]

[The darkness of the shades, his heavy prey,]
 [And fear, misled the younger from his way,]
 [But Nisus hit the turns with happier haste,]

Who now, unknowing, had the danger pass'd, [And Alban lakes, from Alba's name so
 call'd, 410

[Where King Latinus then his oxen stall'd ;]
 [Till, turning at the length, he stood his
 ground,]

[And vainly cast his longing eyes around
 For his lost friend !

[" Ah wretch ! " he cried, " where have I left
 behind ?]

[Where shall I hope th' unhappy youth to
 find ?

[Or what way take ? " Again he ventures
 back,]

[And treads the mazes of his former track]
 Thro' the wild wood ; at last he hears the noise

[Of trampling horses, and the riders' voice. 420
 [The sound approach'd ; and suddenly he view'd]
 [His foes inclosing, and his friend pursued,
 Forelaid and taken, while he strove in vain]

[The covert of the neighb'ring wood to gain.
 What should he next attempt ? what arms
 employ,]

[With fruitless force to free the captive boy ?
 Or tempt unequal numbers with the sword,
 And die by him whom living he ador'd ?

[Resolv'd on death, his dreadful spear he shook ;

[And, casting to the moon a mournful look : 430
 " Fair queen," said he, " who dost in woods
 delight,

[Grace of the stars, and goddess of the
 night,

[Be present, and direct my dart aright.
 [If e'er my pious father, for my sake,]

[Did on thy altars grateful offerings make,
 Or I increas'd them with successful toils,

[And hung thy sacred roof with savage spoils,
 Thro' the brown shadows guide my flying spear
 To reach this troop." Then, poisoning from his ear, 440

The quiv'ring weapon with full force he threw.
 Thro' the divided shades the deadly javelin
 flew ;

On Sulmo's back it splits ; the double dart
 Drove deeper onward, and transfix'd his heart.

[He staggers round ; his eyeballs roll in death,]
 [And with short sobs he gasps away his breath.]

[All stand amaz'd -- a second javelin flies]
 From his stretch'd arm, and hisses thro' the
 skies.

[The lance thro' Tagus' temples forc'd its way,
 And in his brainpan warmly buried lay.]

[Fierce Volscens foams with rage, and, gazing round,]⁴⁵⁰

[Descried no author of the fatal wound,
Nor where to fix revenge: "But thou," he cries,

"Shalt pay for both," and at the pris'n'r flies]
[With his drawn sword. Then, struck with deep despair,]

[That fatal sight the lover could not bear;
But from his covert rush'd in open view,
And sent his voice before him as he flew:]

"Me, me, employ your sword on me alone:
The crime confess'd; the fact was all my own.
He neither could nor durst, the guiltless youth:"]⁴⁶⁰

[Ye moon and stars, bear witness to the truth!]
[His only fault (if that be to offend)
Was too much loving his unhappy friend."
Too late, alas, he speaks:]

[The sword, which unrelenting fury guides,
Driv'n with full force, had pierc'd his tender sides.]

[Down fell the beauteous youth: the gaping wound
Gush'd out a crimson stream, and stain'd the ground.

[His nodding neck reclines on his white breast,
Like a fair flow'r, in furrow'd fields oppress'd
By the keen share; or poppy on the plain,⁴⁷¹
Whose heavy head is overcharg'd with rain.]

[Disdain, despair, and deadly vengeance vow'd,
Drove Nisus headlong on the hostile crowd.]

[Volscens he seeks; at him alone he bends:
Borne back, and push'd by his surrounding friends,

[He still press'd on, and kept him still in sight;
Then whirl'd aloft his sword with all his might:]

Th' unerring weapon flew; and, wing'd with death,

Enter'd his gaping mouth and stopp'd his breath.⁴⁸⁰

[Dying, he slew; and, stagg'ring on the plain,]
[Sought for the body of his lover slain;
Then quietly on his dear breast he fell.

[Content, in death, to be reveng'd so well.]
[O happy pair! for, if my verse can give Eternity, your fame shall ever live,

Fix'd as the Capitol's foundation lies.]

[And spread, where'er the Roman eagle flies.]

THE ENTIRE EPISODE OF MEZENTIVS AND LAUSUS, TRANSLATED OUT OF THE TENTH BOOK OF VIRGIL'S ÆNEIDS

[See pages 667-671, lines 1071-1313.]

Connection of the Episode with the foregoing story.

Mezentius was King of Etruria, or Tuscany, from whence he was expell'd by his subjects, for his tyrannical government and cruelty, and a new king elected. Being thus banish'd, he applies himself to King Turnus, in whose court he and his son Lausus take sanctuary. Turnus for the love of Lavinia making war with Æneas, Mezentius engages in the cause of his benefactor, and performs many great actions, particularly in revenging himself on his late subjects, who now assisted Æneas, out of hatred to him. Mezentius is everywhere describ'd by Virgil as an atheist; his son Lausus is made the pattern of filial piety and virtue; and the death of those two is the subject of this noble episode.

[THUS equal deaths are dealt, and equal chance;

[1072-74]

[The gods from heav'n survey the doubtful strife,

[1077-79]

[Her scourge aloft, and hissing crest of snakes.
[Once more Mezentius, with a proud disdain,

[1082-83]

[Like vast Orion stalking o'er the flood.

[1085-88]

Thus arm'd, he took the field.

[The Trojan prince beheld him from afar,]
With joyful eyes, and undertook the war.²⁰

[Collected in himself, and like a rock,
Pois'd on his base, Mezentius stood the shock]
Of his great foe. Then, measuring with his eyes

[The space his spear could reach, aloud he cries:]

"My own right hand, and sword, assist my stroke!

[1096-97]

[Shall by my Lausus be in triumph worn."
[He said; and straight with all his force he threw²⁹

[1100-14]

[All these it pass'd with unresisted course,

[1116-20]

[His father's danger Lausus view'd with grief;

⁵¹

[He sigh'd, he wept, he ran to his relief.]
[And here, O wondrous youth, 't is here I must

[1124-25]

[Posterity shall scarce believe it true.

[1127-30]

[The pious youth, resolv'd to undergo⁶¹
[The lifted sword, springs out to face his foe,] Protects his father, and prevents the blow.

[1134-35]

[All, fir'd with noble emulation, strive,

[1137-54]

[For now the Fates prepar'd their cruel shears;
[And lifted high the conquering sword ap-

pears,

[Which, full descending with a fearful sway, [Thro' shield and cuirass forc'd th' impetu-ous way,

[And buried deep in his fair bosom lay.]

[The springing streams thro' the thin armor strove,⁹⁰

[And drench'd the golden coat his careful mother wove;

[1162-63]

[But when, with blood and paleness all be-spread,

[1165-67]

[Then stretch'd his hand to raise him up,⁹⁸

[1169-76]

[To please thy ghost, at least, if shadows know,
[Or have a taste of human things below.

[1179-80]
[With this, he bids his distant friends draw near,¹¹¹
[Provokes their duty, and prevents their fear:]
[Himself assists to raise him from the ground ;
[His locks deform'd with blood, that well'd from out his wound.

[Meantime, the father, now no father, stood,

[1186-87]
[His fainting limbs against a tree he leant.
[1189-90]
[Of youth a chosen troop around him stand ; 121
[His head hung down, and rested on his hand :

[1193-95]
[Much he enquir'd, and many a message sent [1197-98]

[On their broad shields ! Still gush'd the gaping wound,¹²⁹

[1200-03]
[Then both his lifted arms to heav'n he spread ;
[1205-18]

[With less injustice could have borne my
fate.

[And yet I live, and yet support the sight 150
[Of hateful men, and of more hated light !

[1222-29]
[The horse seem'd sensible, while thus he spoke :¹⁶⁰

[“ O Rhæbus, we have liv'd too long for
me —]

[If long and life were terms that could agree !
[1233-44]

[With crested horsehair, nodding from afar ;
[1246-52]

[“ Great Jove,” said he, “ and the far-shooting
god.

[Inspire thy mind to make thy challenge
good !”]

[He said no more ; but hasten'd to appear,
[1256-59]

This was my only way to be undone. 190
[1261-72]

[To wrench the darts that in his buckler
light,

[Urg'd and o'er-labor'd in unequal fight.]
[At last resolv'd, he throws with all his force

[Full at the temples of the warlike horse.
[Betwixt the temples pass'd th' unerring spear,

[And, piercing, stood transfix'd from ear to
ear.

[Seiz'd with the sudden pain, surpris'd with fright,²⁰⁹

The courser bounds aloft and stands upright :
He beats his hoofs a while in air ; then, press'd

[With anguish, floundering falls the gen'rous
beast,

And his cast rider with his weight oppress'd.] [1287-93]

[With scarce recover'd breath, he thus replies :

[“ Why these insulting threats, this waste of breath,²²²

[1296-98]
But, with a glorious fate, to end my pain :
When Lausus fell, I was already slain.

[Nor ask I life :
[My dying son contracted no such band.]

[Nor would I take it from his murd'rer's
hand.

[For this, this only favor let me sue,]²²¹
[If pity to a conquer'd foe be due :

[Refuse not that ; but let my body have
[The last retreat of humankind, a grave.]

[Too well I know my injur'd people's hate ;
[1308-13]

THE SPEECH OF VENUS TO VULCAN

WHEREIN SHE PERSUADES HIM TO MAKE ARMS
FOR HER SON ÆNEAS, THEN ENGAG'D IN A WAR AGAINST THE LAIANS AND KING TUR-NUS. TRANSLATED OUT OF THE EIGHTH BOOK OF VIRGIL'S ÆNEIDS

[See pages 631, 632, lines 484-538.]

Now Night with sable wings the world o'er-
spread ;

But Venus, not in vain, surpris'd with dread
Of Latian arms, before the tempest breaks,

Her husband's timely succor thus bespeaks,
[Couch'd in his golden bed ;

[And, that her pleasing speech his mind may
move,]

[Inspires it with diviner charms of love :
[“ While adverse fate conspir'd with Grecian
pow'rs,

[To level with the ground the Trojan tow'rs,]
[I begg'd no aid th' unhappy to restore,

[Nor did thy succor, nor thy art implore ;
[Nor sought, their sinking empire to sustain,

[To urge the labor of my lord in vain,
[Tho' much I ow'd to Priam's house, and more]

[The dangers of Æneas did deplore.]
[But now, by Jove's command, and fate's decree,]

[His race is doom'd to reign in Italy :]
[With humble suit I ask thy needful art,

[O still propitious pow'r, O sovereign of my
heart !

[A mother stands a suppliant for a son. 230
[By silver-footed Thetis thou wert won

For fierce Achilles, and the rosy Morn
Mov'd thee with arms her Menion to adorn.

Are these my tears less pow'rful on thy mind ?
[Behold, what warlike nations are combin'd

[With fire and sword my people to destroy,]
[And twice to triumph over me and Troy.”]

[She said ; and straight her arms, of snowy
hue,]

[About her unresolving husband threw.]
[Her soft embraces soon infuse desire:]²³⁰

[His bones and marrow sudden warmth inspire ;]

[And all the godhead feels the wonted
fire,]

[Not half so swift the rolling thunder flies,
[Or streaks of lightning flash along the skies.

[The goddess, pleas'd with her successful wiles,
[And conscious of her conquer'd beauty, smiles.

[Then thus the good old god, sooth'd with her charms,

[Panting, and half dissolving in her arms :]
[“ Why seek you reasons for a cause so just,]

[Or your own beauty or my love distrust ? 230

[Long since, had you requir'd my helpful hand,]
[You might the artist and his art command,
To arm your Trojans: nor did Jove or fate
Confine their empire to so short a date.
And, if you now desire new wars to wage,]
[My care, my skill, my labor I engage.
[Whatever melting metals can conspire,]

[Or breathing bellows, or the forming fire,]
I freely promise: all your doubts remove,
[And think no task is difficult to love."]]
[He said; and, eager to enjoy her charms,
He snatch'd the lovely goddess to his arms;
Till, all infus'd in joy, he lay possess'd
Of full desire, and sunk to pleasing rest.]

NOTES

NOTES

THE following Notes are to a considerable extent taken from Sir Walter Scott, whose edition of Dryden, first published in 1808, has become an English classic. The text printed in Professor Saintsbury's revision of Scott's edition (London and Edinburgh, 1882-93) has been used as a basis. When a note is taken from Scott with no change whatever, it is inclosed in quotation marks and his name is added. When Scott's note has been modified by the omission, alteration, or addition of even a single word, quotation marks are retained, but the name is inclosed in brackets [Scott]. When the note has been entirely rewritten, quotation marks are omitted, but the name, in brackets, is retained. The same notation is used for the comments, comparatively few in number, that have been taken from other critics.

Variant readings of Dryden's text are cited in the original spelling, punctuation, and capitals. Quotations from other authors of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, however, are usually given in modern spelling. Frequent references are made to the following works:—

The Critical and Miscellaneous Prose Works of John Dryden, edited by Edmond Malone, London, 1800. References to this work here, and in the headnotes throughout the volume, are in the form, "Malone, I, 1, 69;" i. e. vol. i. part i. page 69.

The Poetical Works of John Dryden, edited by W. D. Christie (Globe edition). (Unless otherwise specified, references to Christie are to this edition.)

In the headnotes throughout the volume there are many references to the Term Catalogues, as edited by Professor Arber, London, 1903-06. An expression such as "Term Catalogue for Easter Term (May), 1677" [p. 78], indicates that the Catalogue in question was itself published in May.

The system of reference in the following Notes and in the Glossary is as follows: the numbers go in pairs, in which the first (of heavier type) stands for the page, the second for the line on that page. When needed, an exponent indicates the column of the page. Thus 111, 163 = page 111, line 163; 127¹, 35 = page 127, column 1, line 35.

GENERAL NOTES

DRYDEN'S RHYMES. For extended discussions of this topic, see A. J. ELLIS, Early English Pronunciation, pp. 1033-1039; DIERBERGER, John Dryden's Reime, Freiburg i. Br., 1895. The reader may find it useful to remember that, according to the pronunciation of the later seventeenth century, rhymes of the following types, among many others that seem peculiar to a modern ear, were nearly or quite perfect:—

war : far ; 206, 169.

hand : wand ; 765, 460.

brought : fault ; 887, 223.

draught : ought ; 236, 1417.

desert : art ; 110, 559.

garment : preferment ; 417, 21.

wreck : back ; 187, 244.

serv'd : starv'd ; 248, 2268.

sea : way ; 27, 42; cf. 850, 360, n.

key : way ; 794, 133.

corn : line ; 237, 1449.

CHANGEABLE ACCENT OF ADJECTIVES. In Dryden there are numerous instances of "Schmidt's rule," according to which dissyllabic adjectives, normally accented on the second syllable, shift the accent to the first syllable when followed by a noun accented on the first syllable. Thus: sublime soul, 1, 27; di'vine progeny, 2, 104.

CORPSE. The usual spelling of this word in the early editions is corps, which is used both as a singular and as a plural: v. 780, 911; 664, 800. It may be construed as a plural (cf. remains) even when used of a single body: v. 243, 1931. In the present volume corpse has been used as the singular and corps as the plural form.

NOTES ON TEXT.

1. UPON THE DEATH OF THE LORD HASTINGS. v. B. S. xvi. Only the 1650 issue has been accessible to the present editor, who has depended on an account of the 1649 issue sent him from the British Museum.
27. Orb. Christie calls attention to parallel passages in Stanzas on Cromwell, Absalom and Achitophel, and Eleonora: v. 4, 18; 120, 838, 839; 274, 272, 273.
43. Tycho. Tycho Brahe, the Danish astronomer (1546–1601), increased his reputation by the discovery of a new star in 1572.
44. Others' beam. Printed others beam in 1649 edition and others Beam in 1702 edition. C. and SS. insert no apostrophe and take beam as a verb.
- 2, 66. Constellation. Dryden occasionally employs, for the sake of rhyme, the archaic pronunciation of -tion as two syllables. Cf. 11, 70; 54¹, 2 (Epil.).
72. Metempsychosis. So printed in the original edition. The word is here accented on the third syllable, as in Greek. Cf. 162, 43, n.
81. Three-legg'd graybeards. The reference is of course to the riddle of the Sphinx. An old man's staff is his third leg.
82. Achēs. Two syllables. In Dryden's time the noun ache was pronounced like the name of the letter "h."
84. An antiquary's room. The 1649 edition reads an Antiquaries room; the 1702 edition omits an; C. and SS. restore an but read rooms.
93. O virgin-widow. This refers to Hastings' betrothed, the daughter of Sir Theodore Turquet de Mayerne, a noted physician, who attended the young nobleman in his last illness. Mayerne's name is mentioned by other elegists in Lachrymæ Musarum, notably by Marvell.
97. Platonic love. This was a favorite subject of interest among the poets of the time: see an article by Professor J. B. Fletcher on "Précieuses at the Court of Charles I." in the Journal of Comparative Literature, i. 120–153. Ideas in l. 100 of course carries out the conceit; the ideas of Hastings' virtue, etc., would be, in the Platonic philosophy, their eternal archetypes. Cf. 6, 103, 28, 41.
- 3¹, 11. Young eaglet. Dryden alludes to the familiar story of the eagle, which mounts to heaven and renews its sight by gazing upon the sun. To it he gives a Puritanic flavor by his phrase the Sun of Righteousness.
20. Helicon. "Dryden confuses Helicon and Hippocrene. Helicon was a mount and not a fount." [SAINTSBURY.]
21. Be. On this use of be for are, cf. 11, 22; 12, 78. The form was already archaic in Dryden's time: in his Defense of the Epilogue of The Conquest of Granada (published in 1672; v. SS. iv. 233) he condemns Ben Jonson for using it.

LETTER TO MADAME HONOR DRYDEN. On the date of this letter Malone makes the following comment: "Lest the date should too nearly discover her [Madame Honor's] age, the two latter figures have been almost obliterated, but the last numeral, when viewed through a microscope, is manifestly a 5; and that the other numeral, which, as being more material, was more carefully defaced, was not a 4, but a 5 also, may be collected not only from the lady's age, (for in 1645 she was probably not more than eight years old,) but from the time of our author's admission and residence at Cambridge." If this account be correct, it proves that Dryden continued at Cambridge after April, 1655, at which time Christie supposes that he had ceased to reside there: v. CF. pp. xv, xvi.

- 3², 11. Persons. That is, parsons. For the spelling, cf. sterve, starve; kerve, carve, and the like. "An hour, measured by an hourglass fixed at the side of the pulpit, was the usual length of a sermon at this time." [MALONE.]
4. STANZAS ON CROMWELL. The Three Poems text is the basis of the present edition, but its frequent italics are neglected, while the more sparing italics of the separate edition are usually preserved.
1. And now 't is time. Dryden apparently contrasts his own discretion in awaiting the time of Cromwell's funeral, with the haste of some other poets, who glorified him immediately after his death.
3. Like eager Romans, etc. An allusion to the Roman custom of letting fly from the funeral pyre of a deceased emperor an eagle, which was supposed to bear his soul to heaven. After that the emperor was worshiped among the other gods: v. Herodian, iv. 2. 11. [SCOTT.]
18. A fame so truly circular. The idea is a common one. v. 1, 27, n. Christie quotes in illustration Horace's fortis, et in se ipso lotus, teras atque rotundus (2 Satires, vii. 86), and Massinger's phrase, "Your wisdom is not circular" (The Emperor of the East, iii. 2. 9).
32. Pompey. "Pompey began to decline and Cromwell to rise at forty-five." SAINTSBURY.
- 5, 41. Our former chiefs, like sticklers of the war, etc. "Essex, Manchester, Sir William Waller, and the earlier generals of the Parliament, were all of the Presbyterian party, who, though they had drawn the sword against the king, had no will to throw away the scabbard. They were disposed so to carry on the war, that, neither party being too much weakened, a sound and honorable peace might have been accomplished on equal terms. Cromwell openly accused the Earl of Manchester of having refused to put an end to the war after the last battle at Newbury, when a single charge upon the King's rear might have dissipated his army for ever." [SCOTT.]

"Sticklers are seconds who first arrange a

- fight, and then, if they can, part the combatants." [SAINTSBURY.]
48. To slanch the blood by breathing of the vein. The separate edition reads slench. On the meaning of breathing, cf. 336, 65; 473, 700. "This passage, which seems to imply nothing further than that Cromwell conducted the war so as to push it to a conclusion, was afterwards invidiously interpreted by Dryden's enemies as containing an explicit approbation of the execution of Charles I." [SCOTT.]
55. Of conquests. Christie construes this with thick, and compares thick of bars (755, 230). This seems a better interpretation than, following Saintsbury, to "take of with maps, and construe thick as an adverb with strew'd."
56. Is sown. The separate edition reads are sown. This variant indicates that the separate edition is the older; Dryden later corrected his slip of grammar.
57. His palms, etc. Professor E. S. Parsons, in Modern Language Notes, xix, 47-49, gives for the first time a satisfactory explanation of this line. The idea that the palm, if loaded with heavy weights, does not give way, but grows with new vigor, is well known. In 1648-49 there had appeared a famous book, the Eikon Basilike, which was supposed to be by King Charles I, and to contain a "pourtraicture" of him "in his solitudes and sufferings." The frontispiece of this "represents Charles I in his royal robes, kneeling, . . . looking upward toward the heavenly crown, soon to be his. From a cloud in the background a beam of light shines out and rests on the king's head, . . . and two palms are disclosed, carrying heavy weights, with the motto: Crescit sub Pondere Virtus." Cromwell's palms, though, unlike those of Charles, under weights they did not stand, still thrived. Cf. 17, 151.
60. And drew, etc. Dryden's poems contain several references to the technique of painting: v. 6, 94-96; 8, 125-128; 414, 41-44; 741², 44-49.
63. Bologna's walls, etc. During the siege of Bologna in 1512, according to a story told by Guicciardini, a mine was laid beneath a portion of the wall on which stood a chapel of the Virgin. When the mine was fired, the wall was blown into the air, so that through the breach the assailants could see the defenders, but a moment later it returned to its former place, as if it had never been moved.
66. Treacherous Scotland. The epithet probably refers rather to the general shifting course of the Scots during the Civil War than to any particular event.
71. Influence . . . mien. Influence is here used in its astrological sense, of the influence of the stars on human affairs. Mien is spelled mine in the Three Poems text, mien in the separate edition; perhaps the former spelling should be retained here, to mark the rhyme.
- 77, 78. When past, etc. These two lines are here punctuated as in the separate edition of 1659; the Three Poems text omits the comma after Jove, and has commas after depos'd and yield. SS. and C. insert a comma after when, thereby making depos'd the verb of a subordinate clause. This certainly gives a better sense, but the change does not seem quite necessary.
- Feretrian Jove.* Pheretrian in the separate edition. To Jupiter Feretrius there were consecrated only the spolia opima, which were won but three times in Roman history. Dryden writes as if all spoils of war were offered to that divinity. As Christie points out, Dryden was apparently fond of the phrase, introducing it, without warrant from the Latin, into his translations of Juvenal and Virgil: v. 350, 208; 609, 1187.
84. Her idol, gain. Dryden loses no opportunity for expressing his hostility to the Dutch; see, for example, 233, 1140-1147.
- 6, 90. Mounsire. The separate edition reads Monsieur.
91. Where it was. Where e'er 't was in the separate edition.
100. Complexions. The complexion, or temperament, was supposed to be determined by the mixture in the body of the four humors, blood, phlegm, choler, and melancholy.
103. Ideas. Cf. n. 2, 97.
113. He made us freemen, etc. "The poet alludes to the exertions of the six thousand British auxiliaries whom Cromwell sent to join Marshal Turenne in Flanders. The English were made freemen of the continent by the cession of Dunkirk." [SCOTT.]
118. Heard. So the separate edition; the Three Poems text reads har'd, which perhaps should have been retained in the present edition.
120. Alexander. Alexander VII, pope from 1655 to 1667.
- "The thunder of his guns [those of Admiral Blake, cruising in the Mediterranean], every Puritan believed, would be heard in the castle of St. Angelo, and Rome itself would have to bow to the greatness of Cromwell." J. R. GREEN, Short History of the English People, ch. viii, § 10.
121. By his command, etc. "A powerful army and squadron were sent by Cromwell, 1654, under the command of Penn and Venables, to attack San Domingo. The main design misgave: they took, however, the island of Jamaica, whose importance long remained unknown; for, notwithstanding the manner in which Dryden has glossed over these operations in the West Indies, they were at the time universally considered as having been unfortunate." [SCOTT.]
136. Under spoils de cease "Tarpeia, the virgin who betrayed a gate of Rome to the Sabines, demanded, in recompense, what they wore on their left arms, meaning their golden bracelets. But the Sabines, detesting her treachery, or not disposed to gratify her avarice, chose to understand that her request related to their bucklers, and flung them upon her in such numbers as to kill her." SCOTT.
137. But first, etc. Professor Firth (in Notes and Queries, series VII. v. 404) well illustrates this stanza by a quotation from James Heath's Flagellum, 1663, p. 205:

"It pleased God to call him to an account of all that mischief he had perpetrated; ushering his end with a great whale, some three months before, on the second of June, that came up as far as Greenwich, and was there killed, and more immediately by a terrible storm of wind, the prognostic that the great Leviathan of men, that tempest and overthrow of government, was now going to his own place."

- 7, 144. Halcyons. Cf. 10, 236; 845, 495, n.

ASTRÆA REDUX. This title means Justice Brought Back. On the coming of the Iron Age, Astræa, the virgin Goddess of Justice, is fabled to have fled from earth to heaven: v. 335, 28; 346² (n. 4); 389, 191; 462, 671, 672; 630, 425-432. Dryden's idea is that with the restoration of Charles, the Golden Age, when Saturn reigned, has been again established. His motto (VIRGIL, Eclogues, iv. 6; cf. 428, 5-8) means: "Now too the Virgin returns, and the reign of Saturn returns."

On the title-pages of both the 1660 and the 1688 editions the poet's name is spelled Driden.

2. A world divided from the rest. Dryden borrows the thought from Virgil: v. 422, 89, 90.

7. An horrid stillness first invades the ear. This line was much ridiculed by the wits of the time. Scott quotes a couplet parodying it:

A horrid silence does invade my eye,

While not one sound of voice from you I spy.

9. Th' ambitious Swede, etc. "The royal line of Sweden has produced more heroic and chivalrous monarchs than any dynasty of Europe. The gallant Charles X, who is here mentioned, did not degenerate from his warlike stem. He was a nephew of the great Gustavus Adolphus; and, like him, was continually engaged in war, particularly against Poland and Austria. He died at Gothenburg in 1660, and the peace of Sweden was soon afterwards restored by the treaty of Copenhagen." SCOTT.

13. And Heaven, etc. By the treaty of the Pyrenees in 1659 peace was concluded between France and Spain. The union was cemented by the marriage of Louis XIV to the Infanta Maria Theresa, on June 9, 1660, soon after this poem was written.

35. The sacred purple, etc. The sacred purple refers, as Christie indicates, to the Bishops, and the scarlet gown to the Peers. "The sight of them animated the people to such senseless fury as elephants, and many other animals, are said to show upon seeing any object of a red color." [SCOTT.]

37. Typhoeus. The giant who for a time expelled Jupiter from heaven, but was later overcome by him and imprisoned beneath Mount Ætna: v. 651, 969-972. In the passage just cited the name appears, in accordance with the reading of the early editions, as Typhæus.

41. The lesser gods, etc. After the execution of Charles I, the House of Commons proceeded (1649) to abolish the House of Lords and to take the name of Parliament for itself.

45. The Cyclops. Polyphemus, who was blinded by Ulysses. Dryden has translated from Ovid one story in regard to him: v. 403-408.

- 8, 57. His wounds, etc. "It is surely unnecessary to point out to the reader the confusion of metaphor, where virtue is said to dress the wounds of Charles with laurels; the impertinent antithesis of finding light alone in dark afflictions (l. 96); and the extravagance of representing the winds that wafted Charles as out of breath with joy (l. 244)." [SCOTT.]

67. Soft Otho, etc. The Roman emperor Galba, who reigned A. D. 68, 69, refused to make Otho his successor, on account of the latter's effeminate life, and adopted Piso as the heir to the throne. Otho then gained power by a revolt, but, after ruling only three months, was defeated by Vitellius at Brixellum, and slew himself.

74. And all at Worcester but the honor lost. "This is in imitation of the famous phrase which Francis I of France is said to have written to his mother after the battle of Pavia: 'Madam, all is lost except our honor.' That of Charles II certainly was not lost at Worcester. He gave many marks of personal courage, and was only hurried off the field by the torrent of fugitives." [SCOTT.]

94. On Night, etc. "That 'night brings counsel' is a well-nigh universal sentiment." [SAINTSBURY.]

98. His famous grandsire. "Henry IV of France, maternal grandfather of Charles II." SCOTT.

101. A Covenanting League's vast powers. Cf. 154, 155. There is a reference to the Solemn League and Covenant of 1643.

106. Chronicles. For the rhyme, cf. 208, 414; 215, 37.

108. Epochs. Three syllables, as is indicated by the spelling epoche's in the editions of 1660 and 1688.

117. Rous'd by the lash, etc. In illustration of this passage Professor W. A. Neilson of Harvard University kindly sends the following quotation: "By the tayle the boldnesse & heart of the Lyon is knowen, . . . for when the Lion is wroth, first he beateth the Earthe with his Tayle, and afterwarde, as the wrath increaseth, he smiteth and beateth his owne backe." Batman upon Bartholome, London, 1582, lib. xviii, cap. 65.

121. Portunus. Portunus, the Roman god of harbors, was invoked to secure a safe return from a voyage: cf. 582, 314, 315; 750, 48-50.

125. Yet as, etc. Cf. n. 5, 60.

- 9, 144. As hear'n, etc. v. Matthew xi. 12.

115. Booth's forward valor. After the death of Cromwell, Sir George Booth rose in Cheshire for Charles II, but was speedily defeated by General Lambert.

150. Lay. The grammatical subject of this verb is not clear.

151. Monk. General George Monk, the com-

- mander of the English forces in Scotland. He took a prominent part in the restoration of Charles II.
154. Did, etc. Cf. 774, 442.
162. It shuns, etc. "It is said, believe who list, that the ingenious Mr. Robert Boyle invented a metal which had all the properties of gold except malleability." SCOTT.
163. How hard, etc. The passage is far from clear: Dryden's style is not yet fully developed. Monk's task is explained in ll. 167, 168. In the natural body this is the charge of three distinct organs, muscles, nerves, and brain. The 1660 edition has no pause after see (l. 164); the 1688 edition has a semi-colon. Christie rightly restored the original punctuation.
182. Whence Legion twice before was disposess'd. This alludes to Cromwell's dispersing the Rump Parliament, April, 1653, and Lambert's similar act, October, 1659.
195. Th' incensed, etc. v. 604, 788-803.
201. Sforza. Lodovico Sforza (1451-1508) made himself Duke of Milan by the murder of his nephew. After a series of successful intrigues, he was finally captured by the French, and died in captivity.
205. Suffer'd to live, etc. Many prominent Puritans were deprived of the right to hold any public office. "Thus disqualified, the poet compares these republicans to the Spartan slaves, made drunk to excite the contempt of the youth for that degrading vice. By the bye, Dryden's kinsman, Sir Gilbert Pickering, was among the persons so incapacitated." [SCOTT.]
- 10, 211-214. Like . . . renew. This construction is supported by the authority of some good writers both before and after Dryden.
219. Scheveline's. "A small village near the Hague, at which Charles embarked on his joyful voyage." SCOTT. Now called Scheveningen.
230. The Naseby. "After dinner the king and duke altered the name of some of the ships, viz., the Naseby into Charles." Pepys' Diary, May 23, 1660.
235. Gloc'ster's. Henry, Duke of Gloucester (1639-60), fourth son of Charles I.
236. Secure, etc. Cf. 7, 141; 815, 495, n.
249. Submitted fasces. The fasces, a bundle of rods surrounding an ax, were the symbol of office of the highest Roman magistrates, showing their power both to flog and to put to death. Valerius Poplicola, consul in the first year of the city, when accused of ambition, defended himself before the people. Livy relates, with lowered fasces (submissis fascibus, whence Dryden's submitted), as a sign of submission to their superior power. Cf. 31, 199, n.; 312, 27-30; 738, 1 f.
251. Th' approaching cliffs. "The civility of such inanimate objects, according to the poets of this reign, was truly wonderful, considering their present insensibility." [SCOTT.]
262. Thus, when, etc. v. Exodus xxxiii. 20-23; xxxiv. 5-7.
267. Your goodness only is above the laws. Charles II pressed the Act of Indemnity upon the House of Lords in the most earnest terms.
284. How shall I speak, etc. "Charles II was born on May 29, 1630; and upon the same day of the same month, 1660, made his triumphal entry into London." [SCOTT.]
- 11, 288. That star, etc. "There was a star visible on Charles's birthday, May 29, 1630, a circumstance much dwelt on by his party during the civil wars. Lilly, the astrologer, assures us it was nothing more than the planet Venus, which is sometimes visible in the daytime." [SCOTT.] Cf. 29, 69-72.
292. Time's whiter series. The use of white in the sense of fortunate is, as Christie indicates, a Latinism. On the line, cf. 29, 71, n.; 122, 1028.
305. Our merchants, etc. The reference is to the commercial rivalry of England and Holland in the East: cf. 28, 1-4; 71, Prol. and Epil.
310. France. In June, 1654, owing to negotiations for an alliance between Louis XIV and Cromwell, Charles II left France. His presence there was dangerous only because it might be displeasing to Cromwell.
316. Your edicts, etc. This refers, as Professor Firth shows, to a proclamation by the king against vicious persons, including Cavaliers who by their riotous lives disgraced the cause they defended, issued on May 30, 1660, the day after his entrance into London. See Somers Tracts, vii. 423-425.
16. Samson's riddle. v. Judges xiv. 5-18.
26. Rete mirabile. "A network of blood vessels in the basis of the brain of quadrupeds." R. HOOPER, Medical Dictionary.
- 12, 31. No atoms, etc. A reference to the atomic theory, as set forth by Lucretius.
37. Carry weight. To be handicapped by carrying an extra burden.
68. Achilles. According to Statius, Thetis, the mother of Achilles, disguised her son as a maiden, hoping that in this way he might escape being sent to the Trojan War, where she knew he was fated to be slain — Statius's bad poetry was a favorite object of attack for the critics of Dryden's time.
96. Rufus. Verginius Rufus, who, in the reign of Nero, put down the rebellion of Vindex in Gaul, and later more than once resisted the attempts of his soldiers to make him emperor. He is said to have composed for himself the epitaph quoted in the margin: "Here lies Rufus, who once, defeating Vindex, upheld the empire, not for his own sake, but for his country's."
104. Geniture. "The author speaks the language of astrology, in which geniture signifies nativity, horoscope." [SCOTT.] According to Malone (I, 1, 45) Howard's book was entered on the Stationers' Register April 16, 1660, so that it must have appeared at about the time of the king's return.
- 13, 18. Some guilty months. In Dryden's time the year was reckoned as beginning March 25.

Had Charles II been crowned before March 25, 1661, the two months (March 25–May 25, 1660) immediately preceding his return from exile would have been included in the year of his coronation.

- 14, 70. Fruition. For the rhyme, cf. 2, 66, n.
79. Sedition's. The 1688 edition reads seditious, probably a mere misprint.
81. The jealous sects, etc. "The conferences held at Savoy House, in April, 1661, betwixt the Presbyterians and the bishops, excited hopes that these two powerful divisions of the Protestant Church might be reconciled to each other. The Quakers, Anabaptists, and other inferior sects, applied, by petitions and humble addresses, to the king, to be permitted to worship God according to their consciences. Thus the whole modeling of ecclesiastical matters seemed to be in the hands of the king." [SCOTT.] The Nonconformists relied on the king's promises in his Declaration from Breda, which he proved unable to fulfil.
104. With Cæsar's heart. Plutarch relates that Cæsar encouraged a timorous ship captain with the words: "Go on, my friend, and fear nothing; you carry Cæsar and his fortune in your boat."
107. In stately frigates, etc. Charles II had an amateur's interest and delight in shipbuilding and seamanship.
111. Beyond your court, etc. "By the improvements made by Charles II on St. James's Park there was a connection made with the river." [SCOTT.]
115. The mistrustful fowl. "The canal in St. James's Park formed a decoy for water-fowl, with which it was stocked." [SCOTT.]
127. Two kingdoms, etc. Portugal had revolted from Spain in 1640, but its independence was not secure. It received valuable aid from an alliance with England, confirmed by the marriage of Charles II to Catharine of Braganza, daughter to the King of Portugal. This marriage had been favored by France, but opposed by Spain. Spain and Portugal are then the two nations to which Dryden refers.
129. Your Royal Oak. "This is in allusion to a device exhibited over the triumphal arch through which the king passed on the day of his coronation. Behind a picture of the king appeared 'the Royal Oak, bearing crowns and scepters, instead of acorns, . . . as designing its reward for the shelter it afforded his Majesty after the fight at Worcester'" [SCOTT.] The Royal Oak was that in which Charles once concealed himself, thereby escaping capture, after the battle of Worcester in 1651.
- 15, 5. The Muses, etc. In his youth Hyde was intimate with the most famous literary men of his time, but he was apparently never himself a writer of verse.
14. As those that see, etc. The Cardinals.
53. Young David, etc. v. 1 Samuel xvii 38, 39.
- 16, 81. Their subjects. Their subjects in 1688 edition; the 1662 text reads the instead of their.
106. War's. Wars in editions of 1662 and 1688.
119. Envy, etc. Clarendon's enemies finally triumphed, and secured his banishment in 1667. He died in exile at Rouen in 1674.
139. Sometimes the hill, etc. Christie calls attention to the following passage in Denham's Cooper's Hill, which was probably in Dryden's mind:
- Windsor the next . . . above the valley swells
Into my eye, and doth itself present
With such an easy and unforc'd ascent,
That no stupendous precipice denies Access, no horror turns away our eyes;
But such a rise as doth at once invite
A pleasure and a rev'rence from the sight.
- 17, 151. Without a weight. Cf. 5, 57, n.
- To MY HONOR'D FRIEND, DR CHARLETON. This poem is signed John Dryden in both issues of 1663.
3. The Stagirite. Aristotle.
7. Until 't was bought. So both issues of 1663; the 1704 text reads Till it was bought.
- 18, 13. Men, who. So 1663 text, without imprimatur, and 1704 text; the 1663 text, with imprimatur, reads men, that.
22. Th' English are not the least. The 1663 text, with imprimatur, reads, The English are not least; the 1704 text reads, Our nation's not the least.
25. Gilbert. William Gilbert (1540–1603), physician to Queen Elizabeth, wrote a treatise on the magnet, the first great physical book published in England.
27. Boyle. "The Hon. Robert Boyle (1627–91), who so laudably distinguished his name by his experimental researches, was a son of the great Earl of Cork. He was about this time actively engaged in the formation of the Royal Society. His great brother was Roger, Lord Broghill (1621–79), poet and politician, created upon the Restoration Earl of Orrery, to whom Dryden dedicated The Rival Ladies." [SCOTT.] Cf. B. S. xix.
31. Harvey. "William Harvey (1578–1657), the famous discoverer of the circulation of the blood. His last treatise was published in 1651, at the request of Dr. George Ent, a learned physician, mentioned by Dryden in the next line." [SCOTT.]
- 182, 50. Joy'd with. So the 1663 text, without imprimatur, and the 1704 text; the 1663 text, with imprimatur, reads Chose by.
52. Rule. So the 1663 text, without imprimatur, and the 1704 text, the 1663 text, with imprimatur, reads sway.
53. These ruins, etc. Charleton, in his dedication of Chorea Gigantum to Charles II, alludes to a visit which the king paid to Stonehenge immediately after the defeat of his army at Worcester in 1651.
54. Then when from Wor'ster's fatal field he fled. So both issues of 1663; the 1704 text reads, When he from Wor'ster's fatal battle fled.
55. Royal. So the 1663 text, without imprimatur, and the 1704 text; the 1663 text, with imprimatur, reads kingly.
13. First Astrol. Dryden by his frequent refer-

- ences to astrology shows his interest in the science. A passage in one of his letters shows that he had faith in it: v. Malone, I, 2, 57; 88. xviii. 134; cf. 50, 1165, n; 758, 500, n.
- 19¹, 15. Half an hour after three, etc. This indicates the hour at which plays began at the time this comedy was first acted.
26. The ascendant's. The heavens were divided, by six great circles passing through the north and south poles of the horizon, into twelve houses, of which the first, or ascendant, lay just above the eastern horizon. As the houses were numbered downwards, the twelfth lay just above the first. In l. 36 Dryden puns on the double meaning of house.
28. Denote. The form of the verb is affected by the plural idea in the preceding clauses.
37. Peregrine. "Situated in a part of the zodiac where it has none of its essential dignities." N. E. D.
38. One continued song. This is probably, as Malone says, a reference to Davenant's Siege of Rhodes, a semi-operatic play, which had been acted with great success at the Duke's Theater in 1661. The Wild Gallant was presented at the rival house, the Theater Royal.
43. A Spanish plot. v. B. S. xviii, xix.
- 19², 55. Mistakes. A reference, as Malone points out, to the mistakes of Teg, an Irish servant in The Committee, a comedy by Sir Robert Howard, Dryden's brother-in-law.
23. Leander. The lover of Hero, drowned in swimming the Hellespont.
- 20, 9. Cato's virtue, etc. The reference is to Lucan's famous line:

Victrix causa deis placuit sed victa Catoni.
(Pharsalia, l. 128.)

"The conquering cause pleased the gods; but the conquered cause, Cato." As Scott remarks, there is "little propriety in comparing the influence of the royal mistress to the virtue of Cato."

PROLOGUE TO THE RIVAL LADIES. The two editions of 1664 may be distinguished by the fact that one, "printed by W. W.," lacks the prose preface and has no author's name on the title-page. The other, "printed by T. N.," includes the prose preface, and is said to be by John Dryden, Esquire.

- 21¹, 11. Habits, dances, etc. This is probably a reference to The Siege of Rhodes: cf. n. 19, 38.
34. All slighted maid. There is a possible reference to The Slighted Maid, a comedy by Sir Robert Stapylton, acted and published in 1663.
- PROLOGUE, . . . TO THE INDIAN EMPEROR. In A Defense of an Essay of Dramatic Poesy, printed with the second edition of The Indian Emperor in 1668, Dryden tells us that he has carefully corrected the text of the play since the first edition was published. The text of the second edition is therefore followed in the present volume.
- 21¹, 6. Before the Spaniards came. The Spaniards do not appear in The Indian Queen.

7-9. Our prologue . . . beast. These lines are found only in the first edition.

- 2 (Epil.). Sends me. So all editions from 1667 to 1686; editions from 1692 to 1701 read sends you.
- 22¹, 8. Who write. So all editions except the first, which reads, That write.
20. To damn the Dutch. Hostilities had broken out between England and Holland in 1664.
- 22², 5. Which would too fast. So all editions except the first, which reads, that does too fast.
22. ANNUS MIRABILIS. The first Latin motto is taken (with a change of order) from Pliny, Epist. x. 33, and means: "It matters much whether the occasion demands, or whether men wish to extend their power." The second is Æneid, ii. 363; cf. 542, 490.

In the 1667 edition occurs a note To the Readers: "Notwithstanding the diligence which has been us'd in my absence, some faults have escap'd the press: and I have so many of my own to answer for, that I am not willing to be charg'd with those of the printer. I have only noted the grossest of them, not such as by false stops have confounded the sense, but such as by mistaken words have corrupted it." This is followed by a list of errata.

In the following notes the readings of the 1667 edition (in octavo) are marked O, due account being taken of the list of errata; those of the 1688 edition (in quarto) are marked Q. Insignificant variations are not recorded: in general O has the spellings then, show, latter; Q has than, shew, later.

- 23¹, 3. It is. O reads is it.
- 23². Sir Robert Howard. v. B. S. xvii. This letter is dated from Charlton in Wiltshire, the residence of the Earl of Berkshire, Sir Robert Howard's father. The play to which Dryden refers (l. 9 of Account) is probably Secret Love.
- 24¹, 12. Nobless. That is, the nobility. O reads noblesse, which perhaps should have been retained in the text.
34. Lucan. Lucan (39?-65) wrote his Pharsalia on the war between Cæsar and Pompey. Silius Italicus, of about the same date, wrote his Punica on the second Punic war.
- 24², 9. Female rhymes. Rhymes in which an unaccented syllable follows the rhyming syllable, as twenty: plenty.
13. Alarique . . . Pucelle. By Georges de Scudéry (1601-67), on the conquest of Rome by Alaric; and by Chapelain (1595-1674), on Joan of Arc. Cf. 491², 5-9.
17. Chapman. Chapman's Iliad is really in verses of seven feet and his Odyssey in verses of five feet.
22. Gondibert. An epic poem by Sir William Davenant, in the same stanza as Annus Mirabilis, published in 1651. In the present essay Dryden draws some material from Davenant's preface to Gondibert, and from the Answer to it by Thomas Hobbes, the philosopher. What he borrows he improves, by expressing it in his own terse and elegant style.

30. Art. O reads arts.
36. In general terms. "Dryden changed his mind about terms of art, and in the Dedication of the Æneis has given the opposite view. The Annus Mirabilis is an Elizabethan poem, reckless in the use of minute particulars." [KER.] v. 519², 52, n.
40. Descriptas, etc. HORACE, Ars Poet. 86, 87. "Settled are the various forms and shades of style in poetry: if I lack the ability and knowledge to maintain these, how can I have the honored name of poet?" (Lonsdale and Lee's translation.)
- 25¹, 5. Omnia, etc. "The earth, with perfect justice, gives back all things of its own free will." The line seems like one from a school-boy's exercise, compounded of Virgil's Georgics, ii. 460 and Eclogues, iv. 39 and Ovid's Metamorphoses, i. 416, 417 and Fasti, iv. 370.
15. It is. O reads is it.
28. Wit. Dryden in the following passage is indebted to Davenant and Hobbes.
39. Of imagination. O reads, of that imagination.
47. Paronomasia. A pun: spelled paronomasia in O and Q.
57. Deriving. O reads driving.
- 25¹, 27. Tho' he describes, etc. Contrast Dryden's later comparison of Virgil and Ovid: v. 502, 503; 744¹, 4-10.
40. Represents us with in. So O and Q: Christie reads within. It seems better to retain the text as printed, and construe represent as re-present. Compare:
- Thy truth,
Like a transparent mirror, represents
My reason with my errors.
FORD, Lore's Sacrifice, Act v. sc. 3.
41. So we. O reads we so.
47. Totamque, etc. VIRGIL, Æneid, vi. 726, 727: cf. 606, 982, 983.
52. Lumenque, etc. Ibid. i. 590-93: cf. 532, 826-831.
- 26¹, 5. Materiam, etc. "The workmanship surpassed the material." Metamorphoses, ii. 5.
15. Dixeris, etc. "You will express yourself excellently, if a skilful combination makes a well-known word seem a new one." Ars Poet. 47, 48.
41. Et nova, etc. "And new and newly coined words will have credit, if they are only derived from a Greek source, a little altered in form." Ars Poet. 52, 53.
55. Tediousness. O reads the tediousness.
- 26¹, 7. Antic. Spelled antique in O and Q.
14. Stantes, etc. "Æmiliani standing in their chariots." JUVENAL, viii. 3.
17. Spirantia, etc. "Bronze statues that breathe more tenderly." Æneid, vi. 847, torn from its context.
24. They said. O reads, they have said.
Humi serpere. "Crawl on the ground." Cf. Horace, Ars Poet. 28.
27. Nunc non erat his locus. "This was not the place for such things." HORACE, Ars Poet. 19. O and Q both read hic instead of his.
- VERSES TO HER HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS.
"The victory of June 3, 1665, was gained by the British fleet, commanded by the Duke of York, over the Dutch, under the famous Opdam. — The duchess came down to Harwich to see her husband embark, and afterwards made the triumphant progress to the North which is here commemorated. — The poem itself is adapted to the capacity and taste of a lady." [SCOTT.]
27. 18. As when, etc. v. Exodus xiv. 21, 22.
28. New vigor, etc. v. Exodus xvii. 11-13.
30. We heard the cannon play. The battle was off the coast of Suffolk, near Lowestoft; the noise of the cannon could be heard even at London.
45. The stubborn North. After returning from this battle, the Duke of York was sent into Yorkshire, where a rising was apprehended, and whither the duchess accompanied him.
52. The newborn Phenix. v. 886, 887, 578-611; cf. 208, 364-369.
- 10 (prose). Nec sunt, etc. "There are a good many people, who think they show critical ability by picking flaws in their friends." PLINY, Epist. vii. 28.
- 24 (prose). The children. So O; Q by an evident misprint omits the.
- 28, 1. In thriving arts, etc. Cf. n. 11, 305.
5. Trade, etc. There is an implied reference to Harvey's discovery: v. n. 18¹, 31.
11. The Idumæan balm. An imitation of Virgil: cf. 455, 165, 166.
13. Their year. So O; Q reads the year, probably by a mere misprint.
20. Second Punic war. The first English war against the Dutch (1652-54) had been carried on with great vigor by Cromwell. This second war, which Dryden trusted would result in a victory as complete as that of Rome over Hannibal, ended with the disgrace of England by the entrance of a Dutch fleet into the Thames in 1667. The comparison of Holland to Carthage later became famous by Shaftesbury's repetition of Cato's phrase, Delenda est Carthago, "Carthage must be destroyed:" cf. 71², 19, n.
32. The babe of Spain. Louis XIV was plotting to seize the Spanish Netherlands in the right of his wife, the elder half-sister of King Charles II of Spain, who was a sickly child. He sought, however, to conceal his designs, thus rocking the cradle of the Spanish king. He at first made a treaty to aid the Dutch against England; later, in 1667, when the English government agreed not to oppose his projects, he abandoned the cause of Holland.
41. Idras. Cf. n. 2, 97.
- 29, 54. He in himself did whole armadoes bring. v. n. 14, 107.
59. Cæruleus Proteus, etc. Quoted incorrectly from Georgics, iv. 388, 394, 395; cf. 483, 557-568.
64. Two glaring comets. A comet had appeared in December, 1664, and another in the following April. By a poetical license (v. 50, 1162) Dryden continues the influence of these comets until the time of the Fire.

69. Or one, etc. v. 11, 288, n.
71. A round, etc. A Virgilian imitation: cf. 11, 292, 293; 428, 5-8.
73. Victorious York. v. 26, VERSES TO . . . THE DUCHESS, and note.
81. Lawson. Sir John Lawson, vice admiral to the Duke of York, who died from a wound received in this battle. Lawson had won distinction under the Commonwealth, and had later helped to bring about the Restoration. His death is compared with that of Protesilaus, who was the first of the Greeks to leap on the Trojan shore, where he was killed by Hector: v. 855, 94.
85. Their chief, etc. "Admiral Opdam blew up while alongside the Duke of York." [SCOTT.]
94. The attempt at Berghen. Two rich Dutch merchant fleets had taken refuge in the Norwegian harbor of Bergen. The King of Denmark, on a promise of a share in the profits connived at their capture by the English. The English, however, began the attack before his orders reached the governor of Bergen, and on August 3, 1665, were repulsed by the combined force of the Danes and the Dutch, and by a contrary wind. But when the Dutch fleet was proceeding on its way, it was shattered by a storm, and several vessels fell into the hands of the English (ll. 117-120).
95. Southern climates, etc. The war had opened with hostilities off the coast of Guinea.
- 30, 137. Si bene, etc. "If you reckon up things well, there is shipwreck everywhere." Sat. 115, with a change of est to fit. Christie points out that the three previous stanzas are suggested by the same chapter in Petronius.
145. Munster's prelate. The Bishop of Munster, on the payment of a subsidy by Charles, attacked Holland: later, when Louis XIV joined the Dutch, he retired.
146. Nullos, etc. "No men excel the Germans in fighting or in keeping their word." Tacitus (Annals, xiii. 54) reports these words (in a slightly different order) as the boast of two Frisian chiefs on an embassy to Nero. The Bishop of Munster had promised Sir William Temple, the English envoy, that he would keep his word fide sincera et Germanica, "with a sincere and German faith." (TEMPLE, Works, 1814, vol. i, p. 213.)
- 31, 165. With France, etc. Early in 1666 France and Denmark both joined Holland against England.
169. Lewis, etc. On the declaration of war, Louis XIV required all English subjects to leave France: Charles II, on the other hand, promised protection and religious toleration to any French or Dutch subjects who should come to England. [SCOTT.]
171. Solomon. v. 1 Kings iii. 16-28.
181. The doubled charge, etc. This refers to the enormous grants of money made to the king by parliament.
186. Prince Rupert, etc. Prince Rupert of Bavaria, the nephew of Charles I, had served with distinction in the civil wars. George Monk (v. 9, 151, n) had on the Restoration been created Duke of Albemarle. He had commanded the English fleet in a great victory over the Dutch in 1653: v. l. 198.
199. Fasces. v. n. 10, 249. According to a story told by Herodotus (History, iv. 3, 4) the Scythians, being unable to suppress by arms a revolt of their slaves, laid aside their spears and bows, and went forth with only their horsewhips. "The slaves were so astounded that they forgot to fight, and immediately ran away."
- 32, 204. Examina, etc. "Swarms of children, and the future people" PLINY, Panegyricus, xxvi.
213. Our fleet divides, etc. "When Prince Rupert and Albemarle were about to sail from the Downs, they received advice from the king that the French had fitted out a strong squadron to join with the Dutch fleet, accompanied by a positive order that Prince Rupert, with seventy men-of-war, should sail in quest of the French, and fight them before the intended junction. This order occasioned the separation of the fleet, a circumstance which, as the intelligence concerning the supposed French squadron was totally false, occasioned a heavy, and, but for the bravery of Albemarle, an overwhelming disaster. On June 1 the duke descried the Dutch fleet, consisting of seventy-six sail, under the famous de Ruyter, whereas he himself had not above fifty. After a council of war, the duke began the battle, which was continued with incredible fury during that whole day." [SCOTT.]
228. Lands unfir'd, etc. Æneid, viii. 691, 692: cf. 637, 915, 916.
231. In its eye. Against it.
- 33, 251. With such respect. "The Gauls, when they first entered the Roman senate, were so much struck with the solemn appearance of the venerable senators on their chairs of state, that for a time their fury was absorbed in veneration." SCOTT.
253. Patroclus' body, etc. v. Iliad, xvii.
267. Berkeley alone, who nearest danger lay. Christie states that the 1667 edition here reads, not making equal way, for the last half of this line: but the British Museum, Harvard, and Yale copies all read, who nearest Danger lay. If Christie is correct, there must have been two issues of the book. — Vice Admiral Sir William Berkeley was killed in this battle, after fighting bravely against heavy odds.
268. Lost Creusa. v. 549, 1002-1005.
287. Of ships, etc. "The Dutch, in the morning of June 2, were reinforced by a fresh squadron of sixteen men-of-war." [SCOTT.]
292. Spem, etc. Æneid, i. 209; allo should be altum: cf. 525, 292.
- 34, 311. Steer. O reads sheer. Whether the change to steer was a misprint, or Dryden's substitution of a familiar word for an archaic one, must remain doubtful.
330. Fiery Cacus. v. 639, 335-342.
- 35, 364. From the noise. O reads, are from noise.
366. Following. So O; Q reads following.

374. As he, etc. v. 1 Chronicles xiii. 7-10.
384. Vestigia, etc. Æneid, ix. 797, 798, quoted loosely: cf. 652, 653, 1072-1081.
391. Nec trucidibus, etc. Incorrectly quoted from Sylvæ, v. 4, 5, 6; antennis (ac tenis in O), should be et terris: "Fierce rivers have not their wonted sound; the uproar of the deep declines, and the seas, leaning on the lands, become calm."
396. Two former victories. "By the English fleet over the Dutch in 1653 and 1665. On the last occasion the fleets met on the third, though the Dutch avoided fighting till the fourth of the month." SCOTT.
- 36, 435. Him, whom, etc. Christie calls attention to the imitation of Æneid, ii. 726-728: cf. 519, 988-991.
460. Doth. O reads does.
- 37, 472. Joshua's. v. Joshua x. 12, 13.
491. Quum medi, etc. Georgics, iii. 423, 424; cf. 473, 644-646.
- 38, 514. Dreadful, etc. Christie remarks that there is here a fresh reminiscence of Virgil. Cf. 629, 327, 328.
521. So have, etc. Cf. 396, 718-725.
536. Quos opimus, etc. Odes, iv. 4, 51, 52.
545. As when fiends. v. Mark iii. 11.
553. Unripe. Cf. 28, 10.
- 39, 573. Fervet opus. Georgics, iv. 169: cf. 479, 230-273.
577. Foundations. O reads foundation.
586. Friendly Sweden. "Sweden was the only Continental power friendly to Britain during this war." [SCOTT.]
588. Shakes. So O and Q, whether by Dryden's error or the printer's.
601. London. "The former vessel, called the London, had been destroyed by fire. The city now built a new vessel, under the name of the Loyal London, and presented her as a free gift to Charles." SCOTT.
- 40, 629. Saturn. According to the Roman poets, Saturn, after his overthrow by his son Jupiter, came to Italy, introduced civilization, and established a reign of peace and happiness. v. 335, 1: 388, 113-145, 608, 1080, 1081.
639. Extra anni, etc. Æneid, vi. 796. cf. 608, 1084. For similar expressions, v. 208, 353, 258, 306.
649. Measure of longitude. O reads knowledge of Longitudes.
653. Our globe's last verge. This passage has been condemned as senseless. Lowell, however, in his Essay on Dryden, illustrates it by the American "jumping-off place," at the end of the world, which is thought of as a flat plate. There the sea meets the sky and leans upon it.
659. The Royal Society. Founded in 1660 for the promotion of science. Dryden himself was elected a member in November, 1662.
- 41, 669. Already, etc. "Notwithstanding the exertions of the English, the Dutch fleet, which needed fewer repairs, was first at sea, and their admirals braved the coast of England." [SCOTT.]
681. Nova come in. O reads, new come in.
685. Allen. Sir Thomas Allen, an old Cavalier, had routed near Cadiz a large Dutch merchant fleet, on its way home from Smyrna, and had taken valuable prizes. [SCOTT.]
687. Holmes. Sir Robert Holmes had begun the war by aggressions on the coast of Guinea. He is compared here to Achates, the faithful follower of Æneas.
689. Gen'ral's. O and Q read gen'ral's, which may mean either gen'ral's or gen'ral's.
691. Cato. Plutarch tells how Cato the Censor, as an argument for the destruction of Carthage, exhibited some fresh figs in the Roman senate, and reminded his hearers that they had been gathered in Africa, only three days' sail from Rome. Cf. 712, 19, n.
693. Sprag. Sir Edward Sprag [Spragge], knighted and appointed rear admiral for bravery shown in the fight off Lowestoft.
695. Harman. Sir John Harman, who saved his vessel, the Henry, after it had twice been set on fire by the Dutch, in the battle of June 1-4.
697. Hollis. Sir Frescheville Hollis, who had lost an arm in the battle of June 3. His father had been distinguished in the civil wars; why his mother is here called a Muse is unknown. [SCOTT.]
701. Thousands, etc. A reminiscence of Virgil, as Christie indicates: cf. 583, 397, 398.
- 42, 734. Hosts. O reads host.
736. Levat, etc. Æneid, i. 145, 146: cf. 524, 208, 209.

760. Possunt, etc. Æneid, v. 231: cf. 582, 300.
- 43, 773. O famous leader, etc. Michael Adrian de Ruyter, chosen lieutenant admiral of the States in 1666. Dryden compares him to Varro, who commanded the Romans at the battle of Cannæ, in which they were fatally defeated by Hannibal, and to whom the senate voted thanks, "because he had not despaired of the Republic." [SCOTT.]
778. Close to fight. O reads, to the fight.
801. But uhalt'er, etc. "The poet here follows up the doctrine he has laid down by a very bold avowal, that Henry IV of France, and the first Prince of Orange, instructed in sound policy by their translation to the blessed, would, the one disown the war against Henry III, into which he was compelled to enter to vindicate his right of succession to the crown against the immediate possessor, and the other detest the Dutch naval power, although the only means which could secure his country's independence." SCOTT.
813. Nor was this all, etc. In August, 1666, the English under Sir Robert Holmes destroyed a large Dutch merchant fleet near the Vlie, the strait between the islands of Vlieland and Terschelling, and then burnt a town on the latter island.
824. Turbants. O reads turbans.
825. English wool, etc. Professor Firth explains that the Dutch undersold English cloth manufacturers in foreign markets. English

- wool was exported to Holland, despite laws to the contrary.
827. Doom into. "Destine for." SAINTSBURY.
- 44, 836 (margin). Transit. O reads Transitum.
847. Quum mare, etc. Slightly altered from Metamorphoses, i. 257, 258; cf. 391, 347-350.
863. All was the Night's, etc. The fire of London broke out on the night preceding September 2. The phrase, All was the Night's translates part of a line of Varro, Omnia noctis erant, placida composita quiete, quoted by the elder Seneca (Controversiae, vii. 1 (16). 27).
881. Hæc arte, etc. "She artfully managed the greedy man, that privation might inflame his mind." Quoted freely from Terence, Heautontimorumenos, ii. 3. 125, 126.
- 45, 889. The Bridge. "London Bridge was a place allotted for affixing the heads of persons executed for treason. The skulls of the regicides, of the Fifth Monarchy insurgents, and of other fanatics, were placed on the Bridge and on other conspicuous places. The sabbath notes, imputed to this assembly of fanatic specters, are the infernal hymns chanted at the witches' sabbath — a meeting concerning which antiquity told and believed many strange things." [SCOTT.] Ghosts' voices were thought to be shrill and feeble.
922. A blaze. O reads the blaze.
- 922 (margin). Sigæa, etc. Aeneid, ii. 312; cf. 541, 419, 420.
926. Simoeis. The river Xanthus, which had endeavored to drown Achilles, was nearly dried up by Hephaestus. During the conflict it had called for aid on its tributary Simois. Dryden remembered in a general way Homer's account of the battle in Iliad, xxi.
- 46, 939. Straggle. So O; Q reads struggle.
949. The king. "It is not indeed imaginable how extraordinary the vigilance and activity of the king and the duke was, even laboring in person, and being present to command, order, reward, or encourage workmen: by which he showed his affection to his people, and gained theirs." Evelyn's Diary, Sept. 6, 1666.
- 47, 1004. Tempests. O reads tempest.
- 48, 1057. Or, if, etc. On the prayer of King Charles, cf. 1 Chronicles xxi. 12, 13, 17.
1066. Spotted deaths. "In 1665 the plague broke out in London with the most dreadful fury. In one year upwards of 90,000 inhabitants were cut off by this frightful visitation." [SCOTT.]
1077. Threatings. O reads threatnings.
1094. In dust. So O; Q reads, in the Dust.
- 49, 1099. A poet's song. Alluding to Waller's poem, addressed to Charles I, Upon his Majesty's Repairing of St. Paul's. The walls of Thebes were fabled to have been built by the music of Amphyon's lyre; cf. 917, 1005.
1113. The'empyrean heaven. The highest heaven, the abode of God and the angels. The Thrones and the Dominions are the third and the fourth of the nine orders of angels.
1120. Drive on. O reads, give on.
1121. An hollow, etc. "The flames of London are first a tallow candle; and secondly hawks, which, while pouncing on their quarry, are hooded with an extinguisher." [SCOTT.]
- 50, 1157. The Jews, etc. v. Ezra i-iii.
1165. Trines. Astrologers taught that a trine, that is, an aspect of two planets distant from each other 120 degrees (one third of the zodiac), had a benign influence. To this Dryden adds the happy omen of Jupiter in ascension. Cf. 18², 13, n; 758, 500, n.
1168. Works. O reads work.
- 1177 (margin). Augusta. Cf. 135, 64.
1185. A maiden queen. Compare the title of Dryden's play, 51.
1195. And Seine, etc. This refers to the designs of Louis XIV on the Spanish Netherlands.
- 51, 1211. Our trouble, etc. "The disgraceful surprise of Chatham, in 1667, baffled this prophecy." SCOTT.
- 4 The unities, etc. v. B. S. xix.
- 52, 16 (Epil.). [F]or. CGD reads or.
- PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO THE WILD GALLANT, REVIV'D. Christie apparently makes a mistake in saying that these two pieces are printed in the Covent Garden Drollery.
- 53¹, 8 (Prol.). Whetstone's Park. This is a narrow street (now, and more usually in Dryden's time, called Whetstone Park) near Lincoln's Inn Fields. It was notorious for its brothels. Cf. 169¹, 31.
15. He thought, etc. Pepys, who saw a court performance of The Wild Gallant on February 23, 1663, writes: "The play [was] so . . . little answering the name, that from beginning to end, I could not, nor can at this time, tell certainly which was the Wild Gallant."
- 53², 44. Vests. Charles II vainly attempted to introduce this garment into England. According to Pepys (October 15, 1666) the king's vest was "a long cassock close to the body, of black cloth, and pinked with white silk under it, and a coat over it, and the legs ruffled with black riband like a pigeon's leg." Pepys adds: "Upon the whole, I wish the king may keep it, for it is a very fine and handsome garment." But on November 22 Pepys has received the news, "how the King of France hath, in defiance to the King of England, caused all his footmen to be put into vests, and that the noblemen of France will do the like; which, if true, is the greatest indignity ever done by one prince to another, and would incite a stone to be revenged."
- 51¹, 10 (Prol.). Woodcocks. This word was a cant term for simpleton.
- 2 (Epil.). Benediction. For the rhyme, cf. 2, 66, n.
- 54², 13 (Epil.). Lilly. William Lilly (1602-81), astrologer and almanac-maker. Cf. n. 11, 288.
- SONG I. In WD this song is headed, A Song at the Duke's House. The first line reads: "Make ready, fair Lady, to nights Innocence."
- SONG II. This song is imitated from one by Voiture, beginning, L'amour sous sa loi: see Œuvres de Voiture, 1856, p. 493.

- 55², 3. Abroad. So the editions of 1670 and 1690; that of 1676 reads aboard.
- 56¹, 5 (Epil.). The rhyming Mounsieur, etc. v. B. S. xix.
9. King Richard's. Referring, of course, to Shakespeare's Richard III, v. 3.
- PROLOGUE TO ALBUMAZAR, REVIV'D. CGD contains the following variant readings: (4) and fewer; (6) And the best; (8) by this Astrologer; (9) and I should suppose; (10) He likes my fashion well, that wears my Cloaths; (12) became his Gold; (16) a word; (21) Who scarce; (28) They stript the living, but they rob the dead; (29) 'T will with the mumrey; (30) to 'em; (33) Yet such in Poetry; (35) Such as in Sparta wright [sic] for Laurels stand; (37) their benefit; (39) Where Broth to claim there's no one has the courage; (40) after he has spit; (41) y' are all; (43) thefts will; (45, 46) omitted in CGD; (47) Now should we Letters of reprimall seal.
- 7 (Prol.). Subtle. The chief character in Jonson's Alchemist.
- 56², 25. Toms. "This seems to have been a cant name for highwaymen." [SCOTT.]
- 57¹, 33. Thrice a year. A reference to Dryden's recent contract to furnish three plays a year for the King's Company. v. B. S. xv.
4. Like Jews, etc. Cf. 1 Kings xxii. 17.
16. The Feign'd Astrologue. Dryden's play, as the second title indicates, is imitated from Le Feint Astrologue of Thomas Corneille, who again was indebted to El Astrologo Fingido of Calderon.
22. This night or next. Referring to the discussions over the unity of time. v. B. S. xix. The whole action of the play, as the title would indicate, takes place in one evening.
- 59¹. SONG IV. This song is a duet between Willblood and Jacintha, the lively hero and heroine of the play.
- 59², 14. And he, who servilely, etc. Dryden writes as follows in his preface to the second edition of Tyrannic Love: "For the little critics, who pleas'd themselves with thinking they have found a flaw in that line of the prologue, 'And he . . . ' as if I patroniz'd my own nonsense, I may reasonably suppose they have never read Horace. Serpi humitulus, etc. [Ar. Poet. 28] are his words: he who creeps after plain, dull, common sense, is safe from committing absurdities, but can never reach any height, or excellence of wit; and sure I could not mean that any excellence were to be found in nonsense."
18. A tyrant. Maximin, "tyrant of Rome," is the chief character in the play.
- 60¹, 30. St. Cathar'n. "In the Wentworth Papers Lady Wentworth and Lady Strafford, whose spelling of proper names is almost purely phonetic, write usually Cathern." [SAINTSBURY.] St. Catharine was the heroine of the play, the Royal Martyr.
- SONO. This is sung by a spirit, in order to tempt St. Catharine to love.
- 60², 1. This jest, etc. "The dress is said to have been begun by Nokes, a famous comic actor at the Duke's Theater, as a caricature of French attire when Henrietta of Orleans visited England in May, 1670." [SAINTSBURY.]
- 61¹, 27. They bring, etc. This may be a reference to The Indian Emperor; v. 21.
33. To like. As to like.
- 61², 38. French farce, etc. v. 65¹, 6; 73¹, 7; 74¹, 38.
19. When forty comes, etc. Dryden jests at his own expense; he was thirty-nine at the time.
25. This year's delay. Apparently alluding to the lapse of a year since the production of Tyrannic Love, despite Dryden's contract to write three plays a year.
26. The women were away. On Nell Gwyn, v. headnote; other actresses were apparently away for similar reasons.
- 62¹, 13. Vizard-mask. The mark of a courtesan.
- 62². EPILOGUE. To justify the arrogant tone of this epilogue Dryden published with the first three editions of his play a critical essay entitled Defense of the Epilogue; or, An Essay on the Dramatic Poetry of the Last Age.
6. Cob's tankard, etc. "The characters alluded to are Cob, the water-bearer, in Every Man in his Humor; and Captain Otter, in Epicene; or, The Silent Woman, whose humor it was to christen his drinking cups by the names of Horse, Bull, and Bear." [SCOTT.]
63. THE ZAMBRA DANCE. This heading merely indicates the occasion at which the song was sung in the play. The text of this song printed in WD under the title, A Song at the King's House, supplies the following variants: (2) Which none but Love, for; (6) Whilst; (7) Flowers, that; (8) bright Virgins; (10) temple . . . shady; (14) that languish; (16) can my bliss and you; (17) lovely shade; (23) For rather then; (27) And yet, Thus, thus, she cry'd; (32) I fancy I had done; (34) Whilst; (35) I must ease. The text printed in the same collection under the title, A Vision, supplies the following variants: (2) Which Jove for none; (10) white shoulders; (11) nor too; (13) ev'ry part; (16) will you; (17) by Jove this lonesome shade; (24) she spoke me-thought; (34) your scorn.
- SONG II. In WD the last line in each stanza is repeated. That text also furnishes the following variants: (8) heart burns; (11) mine eyes; (12) sweet dream; (14) Then I sigh; (15) being rival; (19) and erer.
64. PROLOGUE . . . AFTER THE FIRE. CGD supplies the following variants: (2) on bare; (4) from a desert; (10) of charity; (12) Whilst . . . our guests; (13) besides; (16) cherish; (18) the Fire; (23-30) omitted in CGD. — WD supplies the following variants: (2, 4, 10, 12, 13, 18) as in CGD; (23) doth; (24) equald; (25) doth.
20. But as. Cf. 44, 847, 848.
- 65¹, 1. With sickly actors, etc. v. headnote, p. 64.
7. Broad bloody bills. Apparently the bills, or advertisements of the French troupe, were red, or printed in red ink. v. Lowe's Life of Betterton, pp. 14, 15.

12. Send lackeys. Seats were not reserved at this time: ibid. pp. 16-18.
- 65², 6. Wonted. The 1684 text reads wanted.
13. Burgundian. A slang term for bully, bragadoccio. v. N. E. D. under Burgullian.
14. Benches. The pit seats were apparently without backs.
23. Gaudy house. v. headnote, p. 64.
- 66², 26. Too. CGD reads two.
30. Mamamouchi. This refers to a play by Ravenscroft, The Citizen turned Gentleman, a free adaptation of Molière's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, which was acted at the Duke's Theater in 1671 or 1672. The citizen in the play is tricked into believing that he has been given the Turkish title of Mamamouchi, and is invested with the office amid much mock solemnity.
- PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO MARRIAGE À LA MODE. These pieces were spoken, as we learn from CGD, by Hart and Mohun, the two chief actors in the King's Company, who played the parts of Palamede and Rhodophil, the principal male characters in the play. The humor of the comedy consists in a double intrigue, between Palamede and Doralice, the wife of Rhodophil, and between Rhodophil and Melantha, the betrothed of Palamede. Neither couple can gain their end, and at the close of the play all resolve to respect one another's rights.
- CGD furnishes the following variant readings: PROLOGUE, (4) While Wuy and Vizard Masks, no longer jar; (5) hath swept; (7, 8) found only in CGD; (9) went from home; (18) the grinning; (23) venter in; (24) her half-Crown; (26) hardly roame; (28) with gaudy; (29) For 'tis presumed; (31) cunning Morecraft, strut; (32) Here's all . . . to do; (34, 37) them (for 'em); (38) falls. — EPILOGUE, (7) example; (8) see and hear; (13) Women faulty barr; (14) them (for 'em); (15) were less; (17) Satyr lent; (18) would fret; (19) of Husband; (21) which of them; (26) are all; (31) Town, nor Court.
- 67¹, 5. France, etc. England was now in alliance with France against Holland.
18. Grinning honor. The phrase is borrowed from Shakespeare, 1 Henry IV, v. 3. 62.
24. Half-crown. The price of admission to the pit.
25. The Mall. A walk in St James Park: pronounced Mell; cf. l. 20 of EPILOGUE.
31. Cutting Morecraft. In Beaumont and Fletcher's play, The Scornful Lady, Morecraft, a usurer, turns a gallant, and hence receives the title cutting (swaggering, ruffling) Morecraft. Malone, and Scott following him, see here a reference to the Mamamouchi episode in Ravenscroft's Citizen turned Gentleman (v. n. 66², 30), which is of a somewhat similar character, but this conjecture is far from convincing. There may have been a revival of The Scornful Lady at the Duke's Theater, of which record is lost.
- 67², 32. The city. The wives of the city merchants were conventionally regarded as the lawful prey of men of society.
- 68¹. SONG I. This song is sung by Doralice at the opening of the play, and is overheard by Palamede, who straightway begins his addresses to her. It thus forms the keynote of the action of the comedy.
- NCS affords the following variants: (10) further joys; (12) can give; (15) When all; (16) And neither.
- SONG II. This is sung at a court masquerade. NCS reads While in l. 1. WD and CGD read whilst in l. 13, and did (for died) in ll. 19, 20.
- 68². A SONG. In CGD this song is addressed to Arminda: The Rehearsal gives the name as Armida. CGD furnishes the following variants: (2) hope no; (6) The fate; (11) gave, though; (12) My fall; (14) would lay!
69. THE ANSWER. CGD furnishes the following variants: (1) Arminda; (8) a fall; (9) In Seas.
- 70¹, 30. Mamamouchi. v. n. 66², 30. The gibberish quoted below is passed off for Turkish upon the citizen in Ravenscroft's play.
- 36, 37. Touch you: Mamamouchi. For the rhyme, cf. ll. 40, 41, uneasy: please ye.
45. Haynes. Joseph Haynes, a noted comic actor, who played the part of Benito, the fool in Dryden's comedy. Cf. 280², 20, n.
3. Coleman Street. "Coleman Street had an ancient notoriety. In Dekker's Seven Deadly Sins of London (1606), Lying 'musters together all the Hackney-men and Horse-courers in and about Coleman-streete.'" (WARD: History of English Dramatic Literature, iii. 327.) Cowley wrote a play called, Cutler of Coleman Street. Cf. n. 67¹, 31.
- 70². PROLOGUE . . . FROM AMBOYNA. The "cruelties of the Dutch" on which this play is founded occurred in 1622. Dryden dedicated Ambayna in terms of extravagant flattery to Lord Clifford, a colleague of the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Cabal ministry: cf. 419¹, n. On the play, v. B. S. xxii.
- 71¹, 12. Love. The 1673 text reads loves, by an evident misprint.
22. States. Republics: the Dutch Republic was frequently called simply the States.
33. Least. The 1673 text reads lest; the text in the folio of 1701 reads less.
- 71², 1 (Epil.). A poet, etc. A reference to Tyræus, who inspired by his verses the Spartans, in their wars against the Messenians.
6. Boor. Spelled bore in the 1673 edition.
18. Two kings' touch. "The poet alludes to the king's evil [scrofula, which the king was supposed to heal by his touch], and to the joint war of France and England against Holland." SCOTT.
19. Cato. v. 41, 691, n. After the incident of the figs, Cato is said to have concluded every speech by urging that Carthage should be destroyed. The comparison of Holland to Carthage was common at the time: cf. 28, 17-20. Shaftesbury used of Holland the phrase Delenda est Carthago in a famous speech on the assembling of parliament in February, 1673, but this was after the date of Dryden's play.

- 73¹, 32. The Lucretian way. The reference is to the atomic theory, as set forth by Lucretius in his poem, De Rerum Natura.
40. Prætorian bands. The reference is to the violent election of Roman emperors by the Prætorian guards, in contrast to their legal choice by the senate.
7. A French troop. v. 61², 38; 65¹, 6; 74¹, 38.
- 73², 30. Macbeth, etc. This refers to the performance, at the Duke's Theater, of "the tragedy of Macbeth, altered by Sir William Davenant; being dressed in all its finery, as new clothes, new scenes; machines, as flyings for the witches; with all the singing and dancing in it." (DOWNES.) It was apparently first acted in 1667 and revived with greater magnificence in 1672, when it proved "a lasting play." It is notable that Dryden here seems to ridicule Davenant, whom, as we know, in general he valued highly at this time: cf. 24², 22, n. For the comparison with Simon Magus (Simon the Sorcerer), see Acts viii. 9.
- 74¹, 36. Empty operas. v. n. 73², 30.
38. While troops. v. 61², 38, 65¹, 6; 73¹, 7.
- 74², 53. Machines and tempests. This refers to the performance at the Duke's Theater of "The Tempest . . . made into an opera by Mr. Shadwell, having all new in it, as scenes, machines; particularly one scene painted with myriads of Ariel [sic] spirits; and another flying away, with a table furnished out with fruits, sweetmeats and all sorts of viands, just when Duke Trinculo and his companions were going to dinner." (DOWNES.) Cf. 909, 90, n.; and see supplementary note in Additions and Corrections.
7. Thro'. Tho' in the 1684 text, probably by a mere misprint.
22. But leave you, etc. "This seems to be an allusion to the recent death of a Mr. Scroop, who, about this time, was stabbed in the theater at Dorset Gardens by Sir Thomas Armstrong. Langbaine says he witnessed this real tragedy, which happened during the representation of Macbeth, as altered and revised by Davenant." [SCOTT]
- 75¹, 27. Our house relieves, etc. That is, Drury Lane was a more convenient situation for a theater than Dorset Gardens, where the rival house, the Duke's Theater, was situated.
32. Three boys in buff. This may possibly be a reference to a droll, The Three Merry Boys, founded on the comic scenes in Beaumont and Fletcher's Rollo, which was acted during the suppression of the theaters: see Ward, English Dramatic Literature, ii. 734, or perhaps, to the comic parts of Rollo itself. Scott, however, supposes that there is a reference to The Bold Beauchamps, an old play ascribed to Thomas Heywood, which must have been quite forgotten by Dryden's time.
33. The poets' heads. "Some part of the ornaments of Davenant's scenes probably presented the portraits of dramatic writers." SCOTT. Really, busts of the dramatic writers. That of Shakespeare was recovered in 1845: v. Sidney Lee, Life of Shakespeare, ch. xviii.
- 75², 13. Man, the little world, etc. Man was termed the microcosm, or little universe, in opposition to the exterior universe, or macrocosm. The sphere of crystal is described in Spenser's Faerie Queene, iii. 2. 18, 19.
24. Muses so severe. There is an implied reference to Martial, ix. 12 (11). 16, 17:
- Nobis non licet esse tam desertis,
Qui Musas colimus severiores;
- "We who serve severer Muses cannot be so eloquent." Cf. 385², 48; 512¹, 36.
27. Rather than, etc. Cf. Exodus xxxiii. 20-23.
- 76¹, EPILOGUE TO OXFORD. The other text of this epilogue (see headnote) reads in l. 4, He sought for quiet; and in l. 25, Whose kindness.
17. Bathurst. Ralph Bathurst (1620-1704) was vice chancellor of the University of Oxford from October 3, 1673, to October 9, 1676. (WOOD, Faith Oronienses.) He was celebrated as a writer of Latin prose and verse.
- 77¹, 21. These peaceful triumphs, etc. On the Continent France was now at war with a coalition led by the Prince of Orange. Charles II was seeking to remain on good terms with both sides in the struggle.
29. One. So the 1684 text: SS. and C. read own, which may be what the author intended.
- PROLOGUE TO AURENG-ZEBE. On this play, v. B. S. xxi; and on the substance of the Prologue, cf. the passage quoted from the Dedication, in B. S. xvi, xxvii. The play was probably acted in the spring or summer of 1675, since the entry in the Stationers' Register usually followed about half a year after the first production. It is entered in the Term Catalogue for Easter term, 1676.
12. Correct. Constructed according to the rules of dramatic criticism. Cf. the opening lines of the Epilogue.
15. Romans. Perhaps this should be printed Roman's, in reference to Antony and Cleopatra. Duke, in a poem addressed to Dryden (v. SS. vi. 288) has the line:
- Envy not now the godlike Roman's rage.
- 77², 22. The first, etc. Dryden feels himself superior to the other authors of heroic plays, such as Settle and Crowne, but inferior to the great Elizabethan dramatists.
37. We and our neighbors, etc. This refers to the rivalry of the two theaters. For the comparison, v. 77¹, 21, n.
- 78¹, 21. Silk-weavers. "Enemies, namely, like the English silk-weavers, to the manufactures of France." SCOTT.
22. Bear Garden. "Alluding to the prize fighting with broadswords at the Bear Garden." [SCOTT.]
- EPILOGUE TO THE MAN OF MODE. "Sir Fopling Flutter was supposed to represent Sir George Hewet, one of the most choice coxcombs of the period. The satire being in fact personal, it followed as a matter of course that the Epilogue should disclaim all personality, that being an attribute to be discovered by the audience, but not avowed by the poet." [SCOTT.] The identification of Sir Fopling with Hewet (cf. 908. 229) is far from certain; it rests only on the authority of Oldys' sketch of Etherege in the Biographia Britannica.

78¹, 22. The toss, etc. "The toss was presumably a mode of shaking the voluminous wig-hair back, and the wallow either a deep courtesying bow or a rolling kind of strut in the walk. The yard-long snake must be the tail of the wig, and a shog is a shake like that of a wet dog." [SAINTSBURY.] In the present editor's opinion, the snake is simply the top's cane; gentlemen at this time wore full flowing wigs, not those with cues.

79¹, 1. Y'are. The 1677 text reads you're.

12. Arbaces. The chief character in Beaumont and Fletcher's King and No King. — Volpone is one of Jonson's best comedies.

15. Slighted Maid. Dryden elsewhere speaks contemptuously of this play: v. 21¹, 34, n; SS. xvii. 325.

16. Shakespeare's. As Scott indicates, this statement, which is entirely incorrect, is doubtless founded only on the inferiority of Pericles as a play.

19. All hawthorns. "Alluding to the legend of the Glastonbury thorn, supposed to bloom on Christmas day." SCOTT.

24. Stew'd. Mr. W. A. Wright (v. C. xiii) suggested stew'd (i. e. stare'd) as an emendation for this unintelligible word.

79¹, 1. The blast, etc. "Our author alludes to the verses addressed to him by Lee, on his drama called The State of Innocence. Dryden expresses some apprehension lest his friend and he should be considered as vouching for each other's genius, in the same manner that Bessus and the two swordsmen, in Beaumont and Fletcher's King and No King (act iv. sc. 3) grant certificates of each other's courage, after having been all soundly beaten and kicked by Bacurius." [SCOTT.]

80¹, 31. His heroic worth. This probably refers to Sir Edward Spragge, who had in May, 1671, cut a boom defending the Bay of Bugia and attacked Algerine pirates there concealed. [SCOTT.] He had earlier distinguished himself against the Dutch: v. 41, 693, n.

80¹, PROLOGUE . . . TO ALL FOR LOVE. On this play, v. B. S. xxiii.

15. Tonies. Tony, the abbreviated form of Antony, was a cant term for simpleton.

81¹, 37. And since, etc. These lines indicate that the play was acted early in the winter season — say in October or November, 1677.

81¹, 17. Mr. Bayes. v. B. S. xvi, xxvii.

1. You're. The 1678 text reads, Yo're.

82¹, PROLOGUE . . . FROM THE KING KEEPER. This play and its successors, Edipus, Troilus and Cressida, and The Spanish Friar, Dryden gave to the Duke's Company. In 1678 his partners in the King's Company addressed a memorial to the Lord Chamberlain, in which, after setting forth their liberal treatment of Dryden, they complained of his désertion of them. (Malone, I, 1, 72-75.) How the matter was settled is unknown. The memorial shows Dryden in a bad light, but we must not judge a suit at law merely from the brief for the plaintiff. If Dryden was really guilty of knavery, it is strange that none of his many literary foes made any mention of the affair. Cf. B. S. xx.

8. Machining lumber. Another fling at opera (cf. n. 73¹, 30; n. 74¹, 53), which had apparently lost its popularity at the Duke's Theater.

82¹, 16 (Prol.). Sturbridge fair. "The fair annually held at Cambridge between September 18 and October 10." SAINTSBURY.

23. Nostradamus. v. 242, 1814, n.

EPILOGUE. Limberham, the kind keeper of the comedy, after being grossly betrayed by his mistress Mrs. Tricksy (nicknamed Pug), who intrigues with Woodal, finally marries her.

83¹, 22. A Smithfield horse, etc. "Alluding to an old proverb, that whoso goes to Westminster for a wife, to St. Paul's for a man, and to Smithfield for a horse, may meet with a whore, a knave, and a jade. Falstaff, on being informed that Bardolph is gone to Smithfield to buy him a horse, observes: 'I bought him in Paul's, and he'll buy me a horse in Smithfield. An I could get me but a wife in the stews, I were mann'd, hors'd, and wiv'd (2 Henry IV, i. 2. 58-61)." SCOTT.

9 (Prol.). Cruse. The text printed with The Widow Ranter reads cause, probably by a misprint.

83¹, PROLOGUE . . . TO EDIPUS. v. n. 83¹ (Prol.): This whole prologue shows the influence that Rymers's Tragedies of the Last Age had upon Dryden: cf. B. S. xxiii, xxiv. For instance Rymers writes, early in his book: "And now it was that . . . Socrates set up for morality, and all the buzz in Athens was now about virtue and good life. Camerades with him, and confederates in his worthy design, were our Sophocles and Euripides; but these took a different method."

84¹, 25. Mons. On August 15, 1678, the Prince of Orange, aided by some English and Scotch regiments, attacked and defeated a French army blockading Mons. This date aids in determining the time of the play.

36. The Woollen Act. This provided that after August 1, 1678, all persons should be buried in woollen.

1. What Sophocles, etc. Sophocles, Seneca, and Corneille had all written tragedies on the subject of Edipus: the last two writers proved unequal to their subject.

84¹, 34. Burning of a pope. "The burning a pope in effigy was a ceremony performed upon the anniversary of Queen Elizabeth's coronation." [SCOTT.] Cf. 87¹, 11.

PROLOGUE . . . FROM TROILUS AND CRESSIDA. Of this play there seem to have been three issues in 1679, which differ in the imprint: one being printed for Jacob Tonson, the second printed for Jacob Tonson . . . and Abel Swall, and the third printed for Abel Swall

- ... and Jacob Tonson. The first two are in the Harvard Library, the third is mentioned in the Catalogue of the Hos Library, vol. ii, pp. 110, 111.
85. PROLOGUE SPOKEN BY MR. BETTERTON. Betterton, the most famous actor of the Duke's Company, took the part of Troilus in the play.
38. How Trojan, etc. "The conceit which our ancestors had adopted of their descent from Brutus, the great-grandson of Æneas, induced their poets to load the Grecian chiefs with every accusation of cowardice and treachery, and to extol the character of the Trojans in the same proportion." [SCOTT.] The conceit goes back to Geoffrey of Monmouth; on it cf. 494², 52 f.
40. Homer's, etc. Cf. 497², 34, n.
- 86¹, 26. John Lilburne. "John Lilburne (1614?-57) the most turbulent, but the boldest and most upright of men, had the merit of defying and resisting the tyranny of the king, of the parliament, and of the protector." [SCOTT.] When on trial in 1649 and in 1653 he maintained a defiant attitude towards his judges, but was on both occasions acquitted by the jury.
28. The plot. Dryden here avails himself of the anti-Catholic feeling roused by the Popish Plot.
- 86², 8. Because, etc. "An obvious reference to the fate of The Kind Keeper." [SAINTSBURY.]
23. Requests, etc. "The Court of Requests was a general rendezvous for the newsmongers, politicians, and busybodies of the time. Swift, in his Journal to Stella, makes frequent mention of it as a scene of political bustle and intrigue." [SCOTT.]
- 87¹, 42. The Pope, etc. Dryden again avails himself of the excitement caused by the Popish Plot: cf. 86¹, 28, n. At the burning, the Devil was prominent as the Pope's counselor.
7. The Shrovetide crew. Shrovetide is specifically the time between the evening before Quinquagesima Sunday and the morning of Ash Wednesday; it is often used loosely for Shrove Tuesday. That was the traditional holiday of the London apprentices, when they were wont to "take the law in their own hands and do what they list." (DEKKER, Seven Deadly Sins of London, ed. Arber, p. 40.) Cf. 824, 106, n.
11. The Devil and the Pope. Cf. 86¹, 28, n; 87¹, 42, n.
16. The style of forty-one. "The meaning is that the poets rebel against sense and criticism, as the parliament, in 1641, did against the king; and that the audience judge as ill as those who, in 1648, condemned Charles to the block." [SCOTT.]
- 87². PROLOGUE AT OXFORD. The text printed with Sophonisba, 1681, furnishes the following variant readings: (2) in a cart; (5) Eschilus [Eschilus in Miscellany]; (6) e're trod [for that trod]; (11) some years . . . go on; (12) will here; (15) you Heathen; (17, 18) not found in this text; (19) we want; (21-24) not found in this text; (25) Occam, Dun, Scotus must, though learn'd, go down; (27) Aristotle, for; (30) Shall thence be call'd a Pipe of Inspiration. After (30) this text adds the following lines:
- Your wiser Judgments farther penetrate,
Who late found out one Tare amongst the Wheat.
This is our comfort, none e're cry'd us down,
But who dislik'd both Bishop and a Crown.
- In Tory Oxford, Dryden ventures to ridicule the Popish Plot, instead of playing on the passions raised by it, as he had done in earlier prologues, and as he did later in The Spanish Friar.
4. Dicitur, etc. "Thespis is said to have carried his poems in wagons." HORACE, Ars Poet. 276.
5. In some page. Really, in the following lines of the Ars Poetica.
8. A tennis court. "Apparently a tennis court was the place where the temporary stage was erected at Oxford." SCOTT.
18. The Oxford Bells. "Probably some pasquinade against the Whigs, then current in the University." SCOTT.
- 88, 25 (verse). Scot, etc. Duns Scotus, Thomas Aquinas, and William of Occam (mentioned in the variant reading of this line) were famous scholastic philosophers; Francisco Suarez was a Spanish theologian: the triple crown is of course that of the Pope.
- TRANSLATIONS FROM OVID'S EPISTLES. The text has been collated with that of the first edition, 1680, which is the only one the present editor has seen. The motto of the book is from Ovid, Ars Amat. iii. 345, 346: "Or let his Epistles be sung to thee with well-modulated voice; that type of poetry, which others knew not, he invented."
- 88¹, 4. Mr. Sandys. The translation of the Metamorphoses by George Sandys was first published in 1626, and was several times reprinted.
30. A certain epigram. MARTIAL, xi. 20.
37. That author's life. Suetonius's life of Horace.
- 88², 36. Cur, etc. "Why did I behold anything? Why did I make my eyes criminal?" OVID, Tristia, ii. 103.
- 89¹, 19. Nudam, etc. "Diana naked and unclothed." Quoted inaccurately from Tristia, ii. 105.
40. Cavalèrement. With courtly grace.
47. He tells you himself, etc. In Tristia, iv. 10. 43-52. But there Ovid says that with Tibullus, as with Virgil, he was not personally acquainted.
- 89², 18. Metamorphoses. The 1680 text reads Metamorphosis.
30. Nescirũ, etc. "He did not know how to leave alone what had gone well." From the elder Seneca, Controversia, ix. 5 (28). 17, with a change of tense.
- 90¹, 5. Purpureus, etc. "One or two purple patches are sewn on, to glitter far and wide." HORACE, Ars Poet. 15, 16.
18. Heinsius. In his introductory note to the

- Heroides*, to which Dryden is also indebted at the close of this paragraph.
30. Jupiter, etc. "Jupiter used to go as suppliant to the heroines of olden times." OVID, Ars Amat. i. 713.
37. Quam celer, etc. "How swiftly did my Sabinus return from all parts of the world." OVID, Amores, ii. 18. 27.
40. Arethusa to Lycotas. PROPERTIUS, iv. 3.
- 90², 39. To run division. "The common old term for executing variations on a musical theme." KER.
45. Nec verbum, etc. Ars Poet. 133, 134.
48. The Earl of Roscommon. Roscommon translated the entire Ars Poetica.
55. Thal servile, etc. "Dryden has greatly improved his quotation by omitting four lines after the first couplet." KER.
- 91¹, 9. Atque, etc. "And the same winds will bear away your sails and your faith." OVID, Heroides, vii. 8; cf. 98², 9.
33. Brevis, etc. "I try to be brief, and become obscure." Ars Poet. 25, 26.
39. Dic mihi, etc. Ibid. 141, 142.
48. Denham and Cowley. Dryden refers to Denham's preface to The Destruction of Troy (a translation from the second book of the Aeneid), and Cowley's preface to his Pindaric Odes. Cf. 181¹, 45, n; 319², 50, n.
- 92², 3. Et qua, etc. "You may drop that which you despair of making brilliant, if treated." Slightly altered from Horace, Ars Poet. 149, 150.
29. The author. Aphra Behn.
- 93, 39-42. When . . . great. These four lines are Dryden's own composition, without warrant in the Latin text. The inverted commas, which are here retained from the edition of 1680, were probably intended to call attention to this fact.
95. HELEN TO PARIS. The foregoing epistle mentioned in the argument, was that from Paris to Helen, translated by Duke.
- 97, 180. Let me not live, etc. A literal translation of the Latin would be: "May I perish, if all things do not invite sin."
- 98, 17. What people, etc. Dryden has inserted into his poem a sly reference to the Exclusion Bill, by which the Whigs sought to deprive the Catholic Duke of York of the succession to the crown. The Latin says simply: "Who will yield the possession of their fields to men whom they know not?" Cf. 196², 35, n.
- 100, 139. Hyarbas. Properly, Iarbas.
101. UPON YOUNG MR. ROGERS. "The family of Rogers seems to have been of considerable antiquity in Gloucestershire. They possessed the estate of Dowdeswell during the greater part of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Many of their monuments are in the church of Dowdeswell, of which they were patrons. The subject of this epitaph was probably of this family." [SCOTT.]
- EPITAPH ON THE MONUMENT OF THE MARQUIS OF WINCHESTER. The editor is indebted for a copy of this epitaph to the courtesy of the Reverend G. Gore Skipwith, rector of Englefield. For the use of Miscellany Poems, 1712, he is indebted to Mrs. Edward Deshon Brandegee, of Faulkner Farm, Brookline, Massachusetts.
- In line 1 the text of 1712 reads undaunted (for untainted).
102. EPITAPH ON MRS. MARGARET PASTON. "This is an ancient and distinguished family in Norfolk. The interest attaching to it from the Paston Letters is now considerable. Barningham is a charming Jacobean manor house between Aylsham and Cromer." [SCOTT and SAINTSBURY.]
- EPITAPH ON SIR PALMES FAIRBORNE. The editor is indebted to the kindness of his friend Miss Elizabeth King, for a copy of the inscription in Westminster Abbey.
4. Undaunted. On the inscription un- seems to have been smoothed down and dis- substituted for it.
5. Palladium. The sacred image on which the safety of Troy was supposed to depend. Balladium on the inscription, by an evident mistake.
- 103¹. PROLOGUE . . . FROM THE SPANISH FRIAR. On this play, v. B. S. xxiv, xxv, xxvii.
11. Bromingham, Birmingham acquired an evil repute for the coinage of counterfeit groats. Its name, under various forms, of which this is one (see N. E. D. under Brummagem), became a cant term for spurious: cf. 109¹, 6, n.
21. Notch'd. N. E. D. explains as "having unevenly or closely cropped hair," and cites parallel passages. Scott comments: "It was anciently a part of the apprentice's duty . . . to take notes of the sermon for the edification of his master."
- 103², 43. A fair attempt, etc. The reference may be to the assault on Dryden himself in Rose Alley on December 18, 1679 (v. B. S. xxxv), but is more probably to the murder of Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey: v. n. 118, 676.
46. The new-found, etc. The Chambre Ardente had been in session in 1679-80, investigating the Voisin and other notorious poisoning cases.
- 104¹, 3. A woman uit, etc. Aphra Behn.
7. Cowley. "Cowley published in his sixteenth year a book called Poetical Blossoms." SCOTT.
- 104², 17 (Prol.). Mercury. This was a favorite title for newspapers at the time: a Mercurius Domesticus, published in 1679, may be intended here, though there need be no definite reference.
- 105¹, 25. Take him for the blue. Blue here seems equivalent to bloom: Dr. Johnson defines bloom as "the blue color upon plums and grapes newly gathered." The sense then is: "Accept the fruit, unripe as it is, since it is at least perfectly fresh."
1. Discord and plots. A reference to the disorders occasioned by the Popish Plot, and in particular (l. 4) to the suppression of the rebellion of the Scotch Covenanters by Monmouth in June, 1679.
- 105², 19. Indian Emperor. Dryden's own play: cf. 21.
27. Teg. Cf. n. 19², 55. But Teg seems to have been the regular name for any stage Irishman, as Pat is to-day.

- 106¹, 31. The suffragating tribes. "The right of voting was only gradually extended to others than Romans proper." [SAINTSBURY.]

- 106¹, 35. Oxford, etc. This preference of Oxford to Cambridge must not be taken too seriously: cf. the quotation in headnote, p. 72.

PROLOGUE to OXFORD. The concluding lines of this prologue apparently refer to Dryden's political satires. If that is the case, too early a date has been assigned to the poem in the headnote.

1. The Jam'd Italian Muse, etc. "Dryden seems, though perhaps unconsciously, to have borrowed the two first lines of this prologue from Drayton:

The Tuscan poet doth advance
The frantic Paladin of France.
Nymphidia." SCOTT.

The reference is to Ariosto, Orlando Furioso, xxxiv. 70, 82-86. (The editor is indebted for aid to Professor J. B. Fletcher, of Columbia University.)

11. London votes. London was the stronghold of the king's Whig opponents.

- 107¹. PROLOGUE . . . TO THE UNHAPPY FAVORITE. Christie suggests that this play was selected for the occasion because of a possible parallel between the story of Essex and that of Monmouth.

1. When first, etc. Cf. 750, 70 f.

- 107². EPILOGUE. The text of this piece printed with the play furnishes the following variant readings: (11) the Vision; (14) Pent here; (18) their venom daily spit; (20) To the Upper Gallery is inserted as a side-note; (22) Or what is . . . does spite; (24) These are the Authors that have; (25) exercise; (31) You had agreed your Play before the Prize; (32) Faith you may hang your Harps; (36) her if he.

5. Lottery cavaliers. "The lottery cavaliers were the loyal indigent officers, to whom the right of keeping lotteries was granted by patent in the reign of Charles II" [SCOTT.]

8. Three last ungiving parliaments. "These were the parliaments of 1679, 1680, and the Oxford parliament of March, 1681. All three refused supplies to the crown, until they should obtain security, as they termed it, for the Protestant religion." [SCOTT.]

10. Seven lean kine. v. Genesis xi. 1-4.

- 108, 13. Playhouse earth. Cf. 117, 636, 637.

14. Our last fire. v. headnote, p. 64. On Lilly, v. n. 11, 288; n. 54², 13 (Epil.)

15. Third-days. The third day of a play was the author's benefit performance: cf. 417, 13 (Epil.)

21. The Hatfield Maid. This was a pamphlet telling of the apparition of a ghost of Whiggish inclinations to one Elizabeth Freeman, later called the Maid of Hatfield. [SCOTT.]

23. Democritus, etc. "Heraclitus Rudens was a paper published weekly on the part of the court, and answered by one called Democritus on that of the Whigs." [SCOTT.] Cf. 442², 3, n.

32. Hang their harps, etc. v. Psalm cxxxvii, 2. ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL. On the general occasion of this poem, see B. S. xxvii, xxviii. The motto: "If you stand nearer, it will attract you more," is from Horace, Ars Poet. 361, 362. In the following notes, F designates the first edition, Q the second; later editions are called ed. 3, ed. 4, etc. In 1716, in The Second Part of Miscellany Poems, Tonson published a Key to both parts of Absalom and Achitophel, to which all succeeding commentators are indebted.

- 108², 4. Whig and Tory. "These famous expressions of party distinction were just coming into fashion. Whig, a contraction of Whigamore, is derived from a word used by the peasantry in the west of Scotland in driving their horses, and gave a name to those fanatics who were the supporters of the Covenant in that part of Scotland. The Tories owe their name [Irish toiridhe, a pursuer] to the Irish banditti." [SCOTT.] Thus one side were fanatic rebels, the other Popish thieves.

- 109¹, 1. A treasury of merits. The saints, according to the Catholic doctrine, have merits more than sufficient for their own salvation; these merits may be applied to the saving of less holy persons.

6. Enough F reads enow.

Anti-Bromingham. Anti-Whig. For the reputation of Birmingham, see 103¹, 11, n. The Tories applied the term to the Whigs, perhaps in allusion to Monmouth's spurious pretensions to legitimacy. Or, according to another story, the Tories gave the name Birmingham Protestants to the Whigs, in sarcastic allusion to their claim of being the only True Blue Protestants: cf. the title of Mac Flecknoe, 134. Cf. 124¹, 40, n.

- 109², 20. Origen. Origen believed that salvation was possible for every rational creature. "The evil spirits which fell have not lost that spirit by which they are akin to God, which in its essence is inaccessible to evil, though it can be overgrown and overpowered." WESTCOTT, in Dictionary of Christian Biography.

33. Ense recidendum. "Something that must be cut off with the sword." Ovid, Met. i. 191, has ense recidendum; Virgil, Æneid, xii. 389, 390, has ense . . . rescindant. Cf. 314¹, 27.

- 1 (verse). In pious times, etc. The profanity of these lines, which seek to excuse the profligacy of Charles II, aroused the wrath of a Nonconformist parson, who in 1682 published A Whip for the Fools Back, who styles Honorable Marriage a Curs'd Confinement, in his Profane Poem of Absalom and Achitophel, followed by, A Key (with the Whip) to open the Mystery and Iniquity of the Poem call'd Absalom and Achitophel. The two form one pamphlet, paged continuously: the first consists of just but crude rillery at the immorality of Dryden's opening lines. Dryden sneers at this writer in his Epistle to the Whigs, prefixed to The Medal; v. 127², 30. Halkett and Laing's Dictionary of Anonymous and Pseudonymous Literature identifies him with Christopher Nesse.

7. Israel's monarch, etc. David (v. 1 Samuel xiii. 14) and, in the parallel, King Charles II.
11. Michal. "Queen Catherine of Portugal, the wife of Charles II, resembled the daughter of Saul in the circumstance mentioned in the text." [Scott.] v. 1 Samuel xviii. 27; 2 Samuel vi. 23.
13. Several mothers, etc. This refers to Charles II's numerous family of illegitimate children.
- 110, 18. Absalon. F reads Absolon. The same variation occurs in line 221.

"James Scott, Duke of Monmouth and Buccleuch, was born at Rotterdam, April 9, 1649. He was the son of Charles II and of Lucy Walters, a beautiful young lady of a good Welsh family. After the Restoration, the king sent for this young gentleman to court, where the royal favor and his own personal and acquired accomplishments soon made him very remarkable. 'Nature,' says Count Hamilton, 'perhaps never formed anything so perfect as the external graces of his person.' Yet his mental qualities did not altogether support this prepossessing exterior [Cf. 906, 56.]—He was married, by the king's interference, to Anne Scott, Countess of Buccleuch, and heiress of the extensive estate which the powerful family she represented had acquired on the frontiers of Scotland. Thus favored at home, he was also fortunate enough to have an opportunity of acquiring military fame by serving two campaigns in Louis XIV's army against the Dutch, in 1672 and 1673. He also served with the Dutch against the French in 1678, and is on all hands allowed to have displayed great personal bravery. On his return to England, the duke met with a distinguished reception from Charles, by whom he was loaded with favors.

"Thus highly distinguished by rank, reputation, and royal favor, he appears for some time to have dedicated himself to the pleasures of the court. During the agitations over the Popish Plot, he was led to head the faction most inimical to the interests of the Duke of York, and speedily became distinguished by the name of the Protestant Duke. The prospect which now opened itself before Monmouth was such as might have turned the head of a man of deeper political capacity. The heir apparent, his personal enemy, had become the object of popular hatred to such a degree that the bill excluding him from the succession seemed to have every chance of being carried through the House of Lords, as it had already passed the Commons. It seems generally to have been believed that Charles was too fond of Monmouth, and too jealous of his brother, to hesitate at declaring this favorite youth his legitimate successor.

"Thus it is no wonder that Monmouth gave way to the dictates of ambition; and, while he probably conceived that he was only giving his father an opportunity to manifest his secret partiality, he became more and more deeply involved in the plots of Shaftesbury, whose bustling and intriguing spirit saw at once the use to be made of Monmouth's favor with the king and popularity with the public. From that time their union became close and inseparable. Some of Monmouth's partisans had even the boldness to assert his legitimacy, which, however, was formally denied by the king. When the insurrection of the Covenanters broke out in Scotland, Monmouth was employed against them, a duty which he executed with fidelity and success. This was in the year 1679, and Monmouth's good fortune had then attained its summit. He was beloved by the people and general of all the forces; London was at the devotion of Shaftesbury; the Duke of York banished to Brussels, and universally detested on account of his religion. But either the king's attachment to the Catholic religion, or his sense of justice and hereditary right, occasioned an extraordinary alteration of measures at this momentous crisis. The Duke of York was summoned from abroad, and by his presence and activity at once assumed his ascendancy over Charles. For although he was obliged to retire to Scotland to avoid the fury of the exclusionists, yet a sharper exile awaited his rival Monmouth, who, deprived of his commission as general, was sent into the foreign banishment from which his uncle had just been recalled. Accordingly he retired to Holland. Meanwhile the factions waxed still more furious, and Shaftesbury utterly embroiled the kingdom by persuading Monmouth to return to England (in November, 1679) without license from his father. This conduct deeply injured Monmouth in his father's favor, who refused to see him, had his chief offices taken from him, and caused him to be formally sent out of the kingdom by order in council. Monmouth, instead of leaving the country, in August, 1680, started on a quasi-royal progress through the west of England, with an affectation of popularity which gained the vulgar, but terrified the reflecting. Above all, by a close alliance with the Machiavel, Shaftesbury, he showed his avowed determination to maintain his pretensions against those of the lawful successor. This was the state of parties in 1681, when Absalom and Achitophel first appeared.

"The permission of so sharp a satire against the party of Monmouth, though much qualified as to his individual person, plainly showed the king's intention to proceed with energy against the leaders of the country party. Monmouth was arrested on September 20, 1682, and obliged to enter bail for his peaceable deportment and appearance when called on to answer any suit against him by the king. He was subsequently involved in the Rye House Plot, but was pardoned by the king. Being banished from court, he retreated to Holland, where he remained until after the

- accession of James II. He then headed a rebellion, which resulted in his entire defeat and in his execution on the scaffold, July 15, 1685." [SCOTT.]
19. Inspir'd by. F reads inspir'd with.
34. The charming Annabel. See note on l. 18, and B. S. xvi.
39. Amnon's murder. v. 2 Samuel xiii. 28, 29. Scott and Christie think that this refers to an assault in December, 1670, by some of Monmouth's troopers, upon Sir John Coventry, a member of the House of Commons who had made a sarcastic allusion to the king's amours. Coventry was not murdered, though he was brutally disfigured, so that the parallel is not accurate.
42. Sion. London.
45. The Jews. The English.
51. Adam-wits. Probably only an allusion to the state of Adam in Paradise, free except that he was prohibited to eat of the tree of knowledge. Want in the next line means lack.
57. Saul. Oliver Cromwell.
58. Ishbosheth. Richard Cromwell: v. 2 Samuel iii, iv.
59. Hebron. Scotland, where Charles had been crowned on January 1, 1651; in England he was not crowned until April 23, 1661. So David reigned in Hebron before he reigned in Jerusalem: v. 2 Samuel v. 4, 5.
66. A State. The word, as in l. 24, means republic.
82. Good Old Cause. That is, of the Commonwealth; Dryden's aim is to identify the Whigs with the men who rebelled against Charles I. There is, possibly, a more specific reference to the intrigues between Charles I and the Presbyterians and the parliament in 1647-48, which led ultimately to the execution of the king and the establishment of the Commonwealth.
85. Jerusalem. London.
86. Jebusites. Roman Catholics: for the name, v. Judges i. 21; xix. 10.
87. And theirs the native right. As Professor Collins points out, this and other unfinished lines are probably in imitation of Virgil's hemistichs: cf. 517¹, 55, n.
88. The chosen people. The Protestants.
90. And every loss, etc. The following lines do not exaggerate the treatment of the Catholics by the government and the people of England.
- 111, 104. The Jewish rabbins. "Doctors of the Church of England." CHRISTIE.
108. That Plot. The Popish Plot, of which Titus Oates gave the first information in August, 1678. According to Oates' story, Charles was to be murdered and James made king as the agent of the Jesuits. A French army was to support these schemes and aid in suppressing Protestantism. Oates may have had some slight foundation of truth for his structure of lies.
114. Some truth there was, etc. A recent investigator of the Popish Plot, Mr. John Pollock, gives Dryden the following high (perhaps excessive) praise:
- "Of all men whose reputation was made or raised by the Popish Plot, none have since maintained their fame at so even a height as John Dryden. His person but not his name suffered from the changes of fortune, and at a distance of more than two centuries the sum of continuous investigation has little to add to the judgments passed on his times by the greatest of satirists. The flashes of Dryden's insight illumine more than the light shed by many records. In politics, no less than in society, his genius had ample room. The Plot gave him a subject worthy of a master, [Lines 114-117, 134-141 quoted.] The lines are a witness against the two great parties whose intrigues were woven to menace the security of the English state. Oates' false oaths ruined the hopes of the Roman Catholics: the designs of the English Whigs were grounded on them." The Popish Plot, London, 1903, p. 222.
118. Egyptian. French: cf. 113, 281-286. At this time France was the leading Catholic power. The following lines are a sneer at the doctrine of transubstantiation, which Dryden later defends in The Hind and the Panther: v. 219, 220, 85-153. Dryden is indebted to the opening lines of Juvenal, xv, where, after describing the Egyptian worship of animals, the satirist exclaims: "It is impiety to violate and break with the teeth the leek and the onion. O holy races, to whom such deities as these are born in their gardens! Every table abstains from woolly animals; it is impiety there to cut the throat of a young kid; it is lawful to feed on human flesh." (J. D. Lewis's translation.)
121. As serv'd. F reads And serv'd.
128. Hebrew priests. Anglican clergymen. The fleece is of course the tithes paid by the parishioners. Dryden's sneers at priests are incessant.
150. Of these, etc. Professor Firth calls attention to the following passage in Coleridge's Table Talk, August 6, 1832:
- "You will find this a good gauge or criterion of genius — whether it progresses and evolves, or only spins upon itself. Take Dryden's Achutophel and Zimri: . . . every line adds to or modifies the character, which is, as it were, a-building up to the very last verse; whereas in Pope's Timon, &c., the first two or three couplets contain all the pith of the character, and the twenty or thirty lines that follow are so much evidence or proof of overt acts of jealousy, or pride, or whatever it may be that is satirized."
- Achutophel*. Anthony Ashley Cooper (1621-83), created Earl of Shaftesbury in 1672. He inherited a large fortune, and became a member of parliament in 1640. On the outbreak of the civil war he supported the king, and in 1643 raised troops in his aid. In 1644 he changed sides, and performed military service under the parliamentary commanders. He sat in the Burebone's Parliament in 1653, where he was a leader of the moderate party, and in later parliaments under Oliver Cromwell and Richard Cromwell. He was also a member of Cromwell's Council of State in 1653-54, but did not receive the usual salary of £1000 for his services, and about the close of 1654 became estranged from Cromwell, from whom he afterwards held aloof, and whom he at times opposed. He actively promoted the Restoration, and after it became prominent in the government. In 1661 he was made Baron Ashley. In 1670-73 he was a member of the Cabal ministry and in 1672-73 Lord Chancellor. After the fall of the Cabal he became the most conspicuous leader of the Opposition. In 1678 and the following years he took advantage of the belief in the Popish Plot, and was the chief supporter of the Exclusion Bill, which was brought forward to deprive the Duke of York of the succession. In 1679 he was for a short time in office as Lord President of the Council. On July 2, 1681, he was arrested and confined to the Tower on a charge of high treason, but was released when the Middlesex grand jury refused to indict him. When set free, he remained in London, where he was safe so long as Whig sheriffs remained in power. In 1682, when the Tories had gained control of London, Shaftesbury, with Monmouth and others, formed fruitless plans for a rising against the king. In November, 1682, he fled to Holland, where he died on January 21 of the next year. He was a constant supporter, though sometimes by unscrupulous means, of parliamentary government and, except as regards Catholics, whom he dreaded for political reasons, of religious liberty. Dryden's wonderful satires have done permanent injury, it may be feared, to the reputation of a great man.

152. Counsels. F reads Counsell.

154. Principles. F reads principle.

158. A fiery soul, etc. A writer in Notes and Queries, series I. ii. 468, cites the following passages as possibly furnishing Dryden hints for these lines:

"He was one of a lean body and visage, as if his eager soul, biting for anger at the clog of his body, desired to fret a passage through it." FULLER, The Holy State and the Profane State (in the life of Alva).

The purest soul that e'er was sent Into a clayey tenement.

CARRW, Epitaph on the Lady Mary Villiers.

The general idea of the contrast between Shaftesbury's body and his mind is found in Mulgrave's Essay on Satire: v 907, 100-116.

157. Pigmy body. In reference to Shaftesbury's small stature.

163. Great IVits, etc. Seneca writes, quoting inaccurately from Aristotle (Problems, xxx. 1): "There has been no great genius without a mixture of madness." (De Tranq. Animi, xvii.) But Dryden may have taken the idea from Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, i. 3. 3.

170. To that unfeather'd, etc. Shaftesbury's son was a man of no capacity. Dryden contemptuously applies to him the definition of man attributed to Plato: "A two-legged unfeather'd animal."

112, 175. The triple bond he broke. In 1668 a triple alliance had been formed between England, Sweden, and the Dutch Republic, against France. Shaftesbury played a prominent part in breaking up this alliance and bringing on the Dutch war of 1672-74, in which England was aided by France. He was however not privy to any designs of France against English freedom. In 1672 Dryden had been an ardent advocate of the policy of the Cabal: v. B. S. xxii; 70, 71. In 1673 dread of France, and of Catholic influence in England, replaced the previous jealousy of Holland. There were fears, not entirely groundless, of a French invasion in the Catholic interest.

179. Usurp'd a patriot's. F reads Assum'd a Patron's. The next twelve lines do not appear at all in F. Their absence occasions an abrupt and awkward transition. We may at least conjecture — proof of course is impossible — that they were present in Dryden's original draught of the poem, but omitted, in order to deepen the satire on Shaftesbury, when it was first published; and that line 179 was then altered in order partially to bridge the gap caused by their omission. So far as the editor can learn, Shaftesbury was not specially distinguished as a patron, nor can that name be called all-atoning. If this conjecture be correct, Dryden in the second edition simply reverted to his original text.

Patriot was the name affected by the faction (the germ of the Whig party) that in 1680 sent up petitions to Charles asking him to allow Parliament to meet, that the Exclusion Bill might be passed: cf. 121, 122, 963-988.

188. Abbethdin. A rabbinical term for a certain officer of the high court of justice of the Jews: literally, father of the house of judgment. See the Jewish Encyclopedia under bet din. It is here applied to Shaftesbury as Lord Chancellor, the presiding judge in the Court of Chancery.

196, 197. David, etc. Two interpretations are possible for this couplet: David would have made a song in honor of Achitophel, so that (a) one of David's songs (perhaps Psalm iii, or the lament of David for Absalom in 2 Samuel xviii. 33) would have been lacking; or (b) so that Dryden would have had no need to write his immortal poem of Absalom and Achitophel. The former meaning seems the more likely to be true. The application to Charles II is by no means clear.

198, 199. But wild, etc. "In Knolles' History of the Turks, printed more than sixty years before the appearance of Absalom and Achitophel, are the following verses, under a portrait of the Sultan Mustapha I:

Greatness on Goodness loves to slide, not stand,
And leaves for Fortune's ice Virtue's firme land.

The circumstance is the more remarkable, because Dryden has really no couplet more intensely Drydenian than this [lines 198, 199 of A. and A.], of which the whole thought, and almost the whole expression, are stolen." MACAULAY, Essay on Temple.

The poem from which this couplet is taken is found on p. 1370 of the 1621 edition of Knolles' work; it is in a continuation not included in the earlier editions. — The editor is here indebted to Professor W. A. Neilson of Harvard University.

201. Manifest of crimes. A Latinism, from Salust's manifestus sceleris (Jugurtha, xxxv). [CHRISTIE.] Cf. 767, 623.

209. More he makes. Christie remarks that the charge against Shaftesbury of fabricating evidence for the Popish Plot is without foundation. Shaftesbury probably shared in the belief in it by which he profited.

213. Proves the king himself a Jebusite. This was, to quote Christie, "no calumnious invention of Shaftesbury." Charles II professed himself a Catholic on his deathbed, and was probably one in heart at the time of the Restoration.

227. Drawn, etc. This line is repeated in The Hind and the Panther, 220, 211. The hunt for it he found in a couplet:

It is decreed, we must be drain'd, I see,
Down to the dregs of a democracy, —

which begins one of the poems in Lachrymæ Musarum, 1649, the volume in which Dryden's poem Upon the Death of the Lord Hastings was first published. The poem is signed M. N., which is expanded into M. Needham in the copy of the book (in the issue of 1650) once owned by the Countess of Huntingdon, Hastings' mother, and now by Mr. Chew.

235. Divides. F reads Shuts up.

240. Thee, Savior, thee, etc. Dryden is indebted, as Professor Collins shows, to Lucretius, i 6: Te, dea, te fugiunt venti (cf. 182, 7); or to Milton's imitation of that line in Lycidas, 39:

Thee, shepherd, thee the woods and desert caves, etc

113, 264. Gath. Explained in Tonson's Key, published in The Second Part of Miscellany Poems, 1716, as, "The Land of Exile, more particularly Brussels, where King Charles II long resided."

270-272. He . . . strand Cf. 10, 276-279. Jordan's sand here means Dover, but in 120, 820 Jordan's flood is the Irish Channel.

281. Pharaoh. Louis XIV, with whom Charles II was in alliance.

299. And nobler, etc. These lines probably express Shaftesbury's real motive. In desiring a king who should hold power only by the will of the people he anticipated the policy of the Revolution.

310. Metal. Metal and mettle were at this time not distinguished in spelling.

314. Loyal. So F and Q. Eds. 4, 5, and 6 read Royal, probably by a misprint; the editor has not seen ed. 3.

318. Mankind's delight. Copied from a phrase used by Suetonius of the Emperor Titus: amor ac delicia generis humani. Cf. 282¹, 11 f.

114, 353. His brother. James, Duke of York. For further tributes to him by Dryden, v. 204, 36-77; 217, 2200-2231.

381. Contemn. F reads condemn.

390. Sanhedrin. The high council of the Jews: here, the parliament.

402. My arts, etc. "In 1679, when the antipathy to Popery had taken the deepest root in men's minds, the House of Commons passed a vote: 'That the Duke of York's being a Papist, and the hopes of his coming to the crown, had given the highest countenance to the present conspiracies and designs of the Papists against the king and the Protestant religion.' Charles endeavored to parry the obvious consequences of this vote by proposing to the Council a set of limitations which deprived his successor, if a Catholic, of the chief branches of royalty. Shaftesbury, then President of the Council, argued against this plan as totally ineffectual; urging that when the future kings should find a parliament to his mind the limitations might be as effectually taken off as they could be imposed. When the bill was brought in, for the total exclusion of the Duke of York from the succession, Shaftesbury favored it with all his influence. It passed the Lower House by a very large majority, but was rejected by the House of Lords, where Halifax opposed it with very great ability. Shaftesbury, who had taken so decided a part against the Duke of York in his dearest interests, now could only look for safety in his ruin." [SCOTT.]

416. A nation. F reads a Million.

418. God was their king. Alluding to the Commonwealth "without a king," established in 1649, which is compared to the condition of Israel under the Judges. It was brought to an end by the creation of the Protectorate under Cromwell (Saul) in 1653.

115, 447. And, like a lion, etc. Cf. 795, 242-244.

455. Your case, etc. Shaftesbury's party were justly believed willing and anxious to raise an armed rebellion against the king if they could gain their ends in no other way.

116, 513. Solymaan rout. The London rabble: Solyma is another name for Jerusalem. The following lines refer to the submission of the City to Cromwell, and its later turbulence under Charles II.

517. Ethnic plot. The Popish Plot, made by the Gentiles (τὰ ἔθνη), that is, here, the Jebusites, or Catholics.

519. Hot Levites. The Presbyterian clergymen, who in 1662 had been forced to leave the Church of England by the Act of Uniformity, which required unfeigned consent to everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer as a condition of holding a benefice. Their followers were mainly among the tradesmen and merchants of the towns.

525. Aaron's race. The priesthood: v. 1 Chronicles vi. 49.

536. Fathers. Q and eds. 5, 6 read Father's; F reads fathers.

539. Born to be sav'd, etc. A sneer at the Calvinistic doctrine of election.

544. Zimri. George Villiers, second Duke of Buckingham. On his relations with Dryden, v. B. S. xxi, xxviii. Dryden was fully aware of the genius shown in this portrait: v. 313, 314. The portrait is not only brilliant but just. As Scott writes: "The Restoration put into the hands of the most lively, mercurial, ambitious, and licentious genius who ever lived, an estate of £20,000 a year, to be squandered in every wild scheme which the lust of power, of pleasure, of license, or of whim could dictate to an unrestrained imagination." Buckingham was a member of the Cabal ministry, but was dismissed from office in 1674. Changing sides, he strove to become a leader of the Opposition, and "made a most active figure in all proceedings which had relation to the Popish Plot." — "As Dryden owed the duke no favor, he has shown him none. Yet, even here, the ridiculous rather than the infamous part of his character is touched upon, and the unprincipled libertine, who slew the Earl of Shrewsbury while his adulterous countess held her lover's horse in the disguise of a page, is not exposed to hatred." Yet Dryden glances at this intrigue in the name Zimri: v. Numbers xxv. 6-15. A pamphlet, replying to Dryden, Poetical Reflections on a late Poem entitled Absalom and Achitophel, by a Person of Honour, is ascribed to Buckingham by Wood in Athenæ Oxonienses. Malone (I, 1: 36, 37) reprints the opening lines of it. It has none of the sparkle shown in The Rehearsal.

Professor Collins points out that Dryden drew hints for his portrait from Horace, I Satires, iii. 1-20, and Juvenal, iii. 73-77: cf. 329, 133-141.

Pope, in Moral Essays, iii. 297-314 (Cambridge edition, p. 169) gives a brilliant, though inaccurate, description of the death of Buckingham.

117, 574. Balaam. Theophilus Hastings, Earl of Huntingdon, younger brother of the Lord Hastings whom Dryden lamented in his first poem. At first an adherent of Monmouth, he later changed sides and joined the party of James II. — Well-hung may mean fluent, voluble, as in the following couplet, cited by Professor Firth:

Flippant of talk and voluble of tongue,
With words at will, no lawyer better hung.

OLDHAM, Satire in Imitation of the Third of Juvenal.

It has also, however, a coarser meaning, which would make a truly Drydenian antithesis to cold: v. N. E. D. and E. D. D.

Caleb. Lord Grey, called cold because of the report that he consented to an intrigue between his wife and Monmouth.

575. Nadab. "William, Lord Howard of Escrick, although an abandoned debauchee, made occasional pretensions to piety. He had served under Cromwell and been a preacher of the Anabaptists. Being accused of inspiring a treasonable libel on the court party, he was sent to the Tower, where he uttered and published a canting declaration, asserting his innocence, upon the truth of which he received the sacrament. He is said, however, to have taken the communion in lamb's wool — ale poured on roasted apples and sugar." [Scott.] There is a certain propriety in the name, since Nadab "offered strange fire before the Lord:" v. Leviticus x. 1.

581. Jonas. Sir William Jones, the attorney general who conducted the prosecution of those implicated in the Popish Plot. In November, 1679, he resigned his office, disgusted, it is said, with his work, and became an opponent of the court party. He drew up the Habeas Corpus Act, passed in 1679, which was a most important check on the arbitrary power of the government. Christie conjectures that he also draughted the Exclusion Bill.

585. Shimei. Slingsby Bethel, one of the two Whig sheriffs of London. He was a consistent republican, who had written both against royalty and against Cromwell. In lines 614, 615 Dryden probably refers to his recent tract, The Interest of Princes and States. Bethel's stinginess, in contrast to the hospitality expected of a sheriff, became proverbial. — By packing juries with Whigs, the sheriffs protected persons prosecuted by the court party, thus securing an ignoramus verdict on Shaftesbury himself shortly after this poem was published. — Dryden applies to him the name of the "man of the family of the house of Saul" who cursed David: v. 2 Samuel xvi. 5; 1 Kings ii. 36-46.

Youth did early. F reads, early Youth did.

598. Sons of Bethel. For the phrase, cf. Deuteronomy xiii. 13; 1 Samuel x. 27.

617. Rechabite. v. Jeremiah xxxv. 14.

624. Towns once burnt. Referring to the great fire of London: cf. 44, 833 f.

628. Moses. Here and in l. 649 the early editions print Moses's.

632. Corah. Titus Oates (1649-1705), the contriver of the Popish Plot. Except that Korah was a rebellious Levite (v. Numbers xvi) there is no special appropriateness in the name. Oates was the son of an Anabaptist, of a family of ribbon-weavers, who later became a Church of England clergyman. He himself first took orders in the Church of England; then, being disgraced for misconduct, became ostensibly a Catholic. During his subsequent travels in Spain he professed to have received a degree from the University of Salamanca (l. 658), and to have gained a knowledge of Jesuit plots against the English government. In his testimony, he continually pieced out his original deposition by additional information, which he stated he had at first forgotten. During the reign of James II he was fined, whipped, and pilloried for his perjuries; under William III he received a pension.

633. Erect thyself, etc. Dryden sarcastically compares Oates to the brazen serpent made by Moses, which brought salvation to the children of Israel: v. Numbers xxi 6-9.
- 118, 649. A church vermilion, etc. Jovial churchmen are proverbially of a ruddy complexion: Molière speaks of Tartuffe's teint frais and bouche vermeille in a line (v. Tartuffe, i. 4) that may have been in Dryden's mind. — And when Moses came down from Mount Sinai after his talk with the Lord, "the skin of his face shone:" v. Exodus xxxiv. 29-35; cf. 889, 103.
665. Writ. F reads Wit.
676. Agag's murder. Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey, the magistrate before whom Oates had made his deposition, was soon after found dead in a field, with his sword run through his body. Oates hastened to assert that he had been murdered by Catholics, and by his complete success gained credence for his other stories. Dryden here represents Oates as instigating Godfrey's murder in order to profit by it, and, though the mystery will probably never be solved, his explanation has important arguments in its favor. (Of the most recent writers, John Pollock, in The Popish Plot (1903) maintains that Godfrey was killed by Jesuits, as Oates asserted, Alfred Marks, in Who killed Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey? (1905), argues that he committed suicide.) For the scriptural comparison, v. 1 Samuel xv. Samuel reproached Saul for not killing Agag, king of the Amalekites.
682. Surrounded, etc. v. n. 110, 18.
688. His joy conceal'd. F reads Dissembling Joy.
697. Hybla-drops. The honey of Hybla in Sicily was famous: cf. 152, 1123, n.
705. Egypt and Tyrrus. France and Holland.
710. Bathshe'a. Louise de Kéroualle, Duchess of Portsmouth, the reigning mistress of Charles II. The preceding line refers to the subsidies which Charles received from France.
727. Believe. F reads believes.
- 119, 738. Wise Issachar. Thomas Thynne, of Longleat in Wiltshire, who entertained Monmouth on his progress through the kingdom in 1680. Wise is sarcastic: compare the description (Genesis xlix. 14) of Issachar as "a strong ass couching down between two burdens."
742. Depths. F reads depth.
750. A brother and a wife. Oates attempted to involve both the Duke of York and Queen Catherine in the Popish Plot. The queen's failure to bear children, by opening the way for the Duke of York's succession, was in a sense the cause of the party strife in England.
759. What shall we think? etc. In the remarkable passage that follows, Dryden sets forth his views on political philosophy. Unlike most Tories, he grounds the royal power not on divine right, but on a covenant made by the governed, to avoid the anarchy of a state of nature where all have right to all (l. 794). He thus shows his sceptical turn of mind by accepting a fundamental tenet of Hobbes. He will not, however, agree with Hobbes that this covenant once made is irrevocable, since such a conclusion leaves the people defenseless. Yet he sees, as well as Hobbes himself, that to admit that the governed can revoke their covenant, opens the door to anarchy. Unable to extricate himself from this logical dilemma, he subsides into a kind of opportunistic conservatism: innovation is justified in extreme cases, to preserve the falling State; otherwise, it is to be condemned. In Religio Laici (165, 166, 276-355) Dryden adopts a similarly shuffling attitude when discussing the relative authority of Scripture and tradition.
777. Add, that the pow'r. F reads, That Pow'r, which is.
The pow'r for property allow'd. The recognized possession of power.
- 785, 786. What standard, etc. The couplet is, for Dryden, singularly obscure. The fickle crowd is apparently compared to water, which, after rising to the mark or boundary it was intended to reach, overflows all the faster. (The editor is here somewhat indebted to a note by Professor Collins.)
804. To touch our ark. To commit sacrilege: for touching the ark of the covenant Uzzah was struck dead: v. 2 Samuel vi. 6, 7.
- 120, 817. Barzillai. James Butler, Duke of Ormond (1610-88). As Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (cf. l. 820) he had fought bravely on the side of Charles I. He was a companion in exile, and later a most loyal and honorable servant, of Charles II. To him Dryden dedicated in 1683 the translation of Plutarch's Lives for which he wrote the Life of Plutarch. Here he appropriately gives him the name of the aged benefactor of David, "a very great man:" v. 2 Samuel xix. 31-39.
829. His bed, etc. "The Duke of Ormond had eight sons and two daughters. Six of those sons were dead in 1681, when this poem was published." [SCOTT.]
831. His eldest hope, etc. Thomas, Earl of Ossory (1634-80). He had distinguished himself on sea in the Dutch wars of 1665-67 and 1672-74, and on land in 1677 and 1678, fighting with the Dutch under the Prince of Orange against the French. At the battle of Mons (v. n. 84¹, 25) he had commanded the English auxiliaries. He died of a fever in 1680. — In ll. 832, 833 Dryden is indebted to Virgil, Aeneid, v. 49, 50.
834. Unequal fates. Virgil's fata iniqua (unjust fates), Aeneid, ii. 257; x. 380.
838. O narrow circle, etc. Cf. 4, 18, n; 274, 270-273.
844. O ancient honor, etc. Dryden is again indebted to Virgil; Aeneid, vi. 878-880.
846. Thy name. F reads, thy Birth; eds. 4, 5, 6 read, his Name.
847. Fame. F reads Worth.
858. And left this verse, etc. The hearse was, according to N. E. D.: "A temple-shaped structure of wood used in royal and noble funerals. . . . It was customary for friends to pin short poems or epitaphs upon it."

864. Zadoc. William Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury. v. 2 Samuel viii. 17.

866. The Sagan of Jerusalem. Henry Compton, Bishop of London, the youngest son of the second Earl of Northampton. Dryden takes the word sagan (more correctly segen), meaning prefect, governor, from the Hebrew. In post-biblical times the segen (abbreviated for segen of the priests) was the priest next in rank to the high priest. For this note, and for that on abbethdin (l. 188) the editor is indebted to Professor William Popper of the University of California.

868. Him of the western dome. John Dolben (1625-88), Dean of Westminster. By the prophets' sons (cf. 2 Kings ii. 3) Dryden means the boys of Westminster School. Dolben became Archbishop of York in 1683: cf. 708², 5-7.

877. Adriel. John Sheffield (1648-1721), Earl of Mulgrave, and afterwards Marquis of Normanby (1694) and Duke of Buckingham and Normanby (1703). He was the patron to whom Dryden dedicated his Aureng-Zebe and his translation of the Æneid. He is probably called sharp-judging because of his Essay on Satire (v. 905-908) and his Essay on Poetry. In 1679 Charles II bestowed on him the governorship of Hull, and the lord lieutenantancy of Yorkshire, two of the offices that had been taken from Monmouth. For further details, v. B. S. xxv, xxvi.

882. Jotham. George Savile (1633-95), Viscount, Earl, and finally Marquis of Halifax, was the leader of the Trimmers, a small party that sought to mediate between the Whigs and the Tories, thus trimming the boat. From 1673 to 1679 he had been in opposition to the government, as a leader of the Country party, the predecessors of the Whigs; he was thus associated by political principles with Lord Shaftesbury, with whom he was also connected by marriage. From the first, however, he opposed the project of excluding the Duke of York from the succession; and by his eloquent speeches in the House of Lords, November 15, 1680, in opposition to Shaftesbury, he actually turned the balance against the Exclusion Bill (cf. n. 114, 402). (So Jotham in a parable rebuked the conspirator Abimelech and his followers, and foretold their ruin: v. Judges ix.) His services to the king's party gained him a commanding influence in the government from May, 1681, to March, 1682. Dryden in 1691 dedicated to him his opera of King Arthur.

"Curiously enough, Halifax records, on the authority of Dryden himself, that the poet was at one time offered money to write verses against him (Devonshire House 'note book')." H. C. FOXCROFT: Life and Letters of Sir George Savile, Bart., First Marquis of Halifax, London, 1898, vol. i, p. 327.

Piercing. F reads ready.

888. Hushai. Laurence Hyde (1641-1711),

Viscount Hyde, later Earl of Rochester, son of the Earl of Clarendon, whom Dryden addressed in an early poem: v. 15. Hyde, when young, held important diplomatic offices; in 1679 he was made First Lord of the Treasury, and became one of the most important ministers of the time. He was a patron of Dryden, to whom poems ridiculing him are falsely ascribed: v. 917, 921. Hushai, the friend of David, was the chief agent in overthrowing the counsel of Achitophel: v. 2 Samuel xv-xvii.

121, 899. Amiel. "Edward Seymour was descended of the elder branch of the illustrious family of that name. [The then Duke of Somerset was descended from a younger branch of the same family.] He was Speaker of the House of Commons, 1673-79." [SCOTT.]

910. Th' unequal ruler of the day. Phaethon, the son of Apollo, god of the sun, who rashly attempted to drive his father's chariot.

944. Th' offenders, etc. The Whigs had questioned the king's power to pardon and commute punishment, notably in the cases of the Earl of Danby and Lord Stafford.

957-960. But O . . . son! These lines are not found in F; they were added to soften the satire on Monmouth.

965. Patriot's. v. n. 112, 179.

966. Supplant. F reads destroy; the change is again in the direction of mildness.

971. His old instructor, etc. "Shaftesbury, who lost his place as Chancellor in November, 1673." CHRISTIE. But the line may possibly refer to Shaftesbury's dismissal in October, 1679, from the post of Lord President of the Council, to which he had been appointed in the preceding April: cf. 140, 203.

122, 981. They petition. v. n. 112, 179. The next line refers of course to Genesis xxvii. 22.

987. Unsatiate, etc. v. Proverbs xxx. 15, 16.

1006. Law, etc. Moses on Mount Sinai was not allowed to behold the face of the Lord. "For there shall no man see me, and live;" he was permitted, however, to see the "back parts" of the Lord (Exodus xxxiii. 20-23). Dryden here terms Grace the hinder parts of Law: the Whigs have clamored for Law against the Catholics and denied the king's power to grant pardon; hence they shall behold the face of Law and die themselves.

1010. By their own arts, etc. Dryden borrows from Ovid: cf. 727, 739, 740.

1012. Against themselves, etc. "This is rather an imprudent avowal of what was actually the policy of the court faction at this time. They contrived to turn against Shaftesbury and his party many of those very witnesses by whom so many Catholics had been brought to execution." [SCOTT.]

1028. Henceforth, etc. Cf. 11, 292, 293; 29, 71, n.: 428, 5-8.

PROLOGUE . . . TO THE LOYAL BROTHER. Neither of these pieces is directly assigned to Dryden in the 1682 edition of Southern's play, from which the present texts are taken.

But in the dedicatory letter in which South-erne offers to the Duke of Richmond "the first fruits of his Muse," there occurs the following sentence: "Nor durst I have attempted thus far into the world, had not the Laureate's own pen secur'd me, maintaining the out-works, while I lay safe intrench'd within his lines; and malice, ill nature, and censure were forc'd to grin at a distance."

The two pieces were also published by Tonson as a broadside (undated), of which the editor has used a copy made at the British Museum. Here both pieces are ascribed to Dryden, and the epilogue is said to have been "spoken by Mrs. Sarah Cook:" cf. 155² (Epil.). The only variations of text of any importance are And (for But) in l. 43 of the Prologue, and to (for till) in l. 2 of the Epilogue. In ll. 36 and 46 of the Prologue the text published with the play reads, They miter'd and inspire: both obvious misprints.

123¹, 7. Petitions. v. n. 112, 179.

13. The Whig, etc. This was part of the program of Shaftesbury's party in 1681.

19. Grave penny chroniclers, etc. Scott printed a copy (v. SS. vi. 237-240) of the identical pamphlet to which Dryden refers, and of which his verses might serve as a summary. It describes the pope-burning of November 17, 1679.

20. Sir Edmond-berry. v. n. 118, 676.

123², 50. Five praying saints, etc. The Conventicle Act of 1664 prohibited all religious meetings, not in accordance with the practice of the Church of England, at which there should be assembled "five persons or more . . . over and above those of the same household."

7. The King's House. "Where the play was acted." Scott.

124¹, 15. An honest jury, etc. Cf. n. 117, 585.

21. The leaden farthing. "Alluding to the tokens issued by tradesmen in place of copper money, which, though not a legal tender of payment, continued to be current by the credit of the individual whose name they bore." [Scott.]

25. Pension-parliament. "The parliament which sat from the Restoration till 1678 bore this ignominious epithet among the Whigs." Scott.

40. True Protestants. A title that the Whigs arrogated to themselves, insinuating that the Tories were false ones, almost Papists: cf. n. 109¹, 6, and heading to Mac Flecknoe, 134. There is also an allusion to the emigration of the French Huguenots into England, caused by the persecuting spirit of the French government.

PROLOGUE . . . TO THE PRINCESS OF CLEVES.

Lee based his play on the celebrated romance of the same title, by Mme. de La Fayette. The virtuous Princess of Cleves confesses her love for the Duke Nemours to her husband, and claims his protection against herself. The Prince of Cleves dies of grief at the thought of her (assumed) infidelity. Thereupon her sense of honor and duty proves stronger than her love for Nemours, whose advances she rejects, afterwards retiring entirely from life at court: v. Epilogue, ll. 23-32. This delicate central situation Lee surrounds with an underplot unusually filthy even for the Restoration stage. Nemours is the person described in the opening lines of the Prologue.

124², 19. Perjuria, etc. OVID, Ars Amat. i. 633: cf. 727, 714, 715.

125¹, 34. Renouncing. At this time, to renounce was to fail to follow suit, though in possession of a proper card. It now usually means to fail to follow suit through the lack of a proper card.

6. High-flying. An epithet applied to the extreme Tories, who supported lofty claims on behalf of the authority of the king and the Church.

THE MEDAL. On this poem, v. B. S. xxviii. The motto is from Virgil, Æneid, vi. 588, 589: cf. 604, 792-795. As in the case of Absalom and Achitophel, Dryden's name was never directly joined to the poem during his lifetime.

126¹, 14. Polander. "It was a standing joke among the opponents of Shaftesbury, that he hoped to be chosen King of Poland at the vacancy in 1673-74 when John Sobieski was elected." [Scott.] Hence his followers were called Polanders.

23. B. George Bower, the artist of the Medal: v. headnote.

34. No-Protestant Plot. A tract in three parts, by Robert Ferguson (v. 142, 321, n.) published in 1681-82. The full title of the first part is: No Protestant-Plot: or the pretended conspiracy of Protestants against the King and Government discovered to be a conspiracy of the Papists against the King and his Protestant Subjects. Mr. T. F. Henderson writes in D. N. B.: "The authorship of the first two parts has usually been ascribed to Shaftesbury, but Ferguson claims the authorship of the whole three." The object of it was to defend Shaftesbury and the Whigs from the charge of having treasonable designs against the king at Oxford.

42. Scanderbeg. An Albanian prince (1414?-67), famous for his wars against the Turks. When the Turks captured Alessio, where he was buried, the janizaries disinterred his bones, and used them as amulets.

126², 10. Association. Among Shaftesbury's papers there was found the draught of a project, unsigned, and not in his handwriting, for an Association to protect the Protestant religion, the king's person, and the liberties of the subject, against the exercise of arbitrary power. This was a main support of the charge of high treason that had been rejected by the grand jury.

Similar projects had also been mooted in parliament. — "Another vote [in the House of Commons of the second short parliament, 1680] went much higher: it was for an Association, copied from that in Queen Elizabeth's time, for the revenging the king's death upon all Papists, if he should happen to be killed. The precedent of that time was a specious color. But this difference was assigned between the two cases: Queen Elizabeth was in no danger but from Papists; so that Association struck a terror into that whole party, which did prove a real security to her, and therefore her ministers set it on. But now it was said there were many republicans still in the nation, and many of Cromwell's officers were yet alive, who seemed not to repent of what they had done; so some of these might by this means be encouraged to attempt on the king's life, presuming that both the suspicions and revenges of it would be cast upon the duke and the Papists. Great use was made of this to possess all people that this Association was intended to destroy the king instead of preserving him." BURNET.

"Lord Essex . . . moved [in the House of Lords of the same parliament] that an Association should be entered into to maintain those expedients [of limiting the royal power in case a Catholic should become king], and that some cautionary towns should be put into the hands of the Associators during the king's life to make them good after his death. The king looked on this as a deposing of himself . . . and as worse than the Exclusion." IBID.

37. To petition in a crowd. The Act of 13 Car. II. c. 5 (1661), provided that no persons, without previous legal permission, should procure more than twenty signatures to any petition, and that no petition should be presented to the king or the parliament by a body of more than ten persons.

127¹. 6. Your dead author's pamphlet, etc. The reference is to An Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England, by Andrew Marvell (1621-78), published in 1677. "As it traced the intrigues of the court of England with that of France, it made a great impression on the nation." [SCOTT.]

9. Buchanan. George Buchanan (1506-82), famous as historian, political writer, and Latin poet. In the work mentioned in the text he defends limited monarchy. The book was a favorite with the men of the Long Parliament, but the editor can find no confirmation for the statement that Milton was particularly indebted to it.

12. Guisards. Cf. 154, 155 (Prol.); 8, 101, 102.

Davila. An Italian historian (1576-1631). His Storia delle Guerre Civili di Francia is said to have gone through more than two hundred editions.

20. Theodore Beza. A French reformer (Théodore de Bèze, 1519-1605), the leader of the Calvinist party after the death of its founder.

35. Some. So in eds. 1 and 3; ed. 2 reads same.

53. A parallel betwixt this Association, etc. "In 1584 there was a general Association entered into by the subjects of Queen Elizabeth for the defense of her person, supposed to be endangered by the plots of the Catholics and malcontents." [SCOTT.]

56. Of the one. Eds. 2 and 3 omit the.

127². 23. Let your verses, etc. Settle, for example, continually introduces parodies of Dryden's own verses into his Abraham Senior, which he wrote in reply to Abraham and Achitophel; cf. B. S. xxviii.

30. The Nonconformist parson, etc. v. n. 109², 1 (verse).

41. Is printed. Eds. 2 and 3 read are printed.

61. Saucy Jack. Jack was a common epithet at this time for a low-bred or ill-mannered fellow.

128, 10 (prose). Irish witnesses. Certain Irishmen who, protected by Shaftesbury, had told of a Catholic plot in Ireland, later turned against him. The Whigs refused to credit them when they began to swear on the Tory side.

3 (verse). Polish. v. n. 126¹, 14.

26. A martial hero, etc. There is much misrepresentation in the following lines; v. n. 111, 150. Shaftesbury was twenty-three before he became a rebel; and, according to Christia, the charges in ll. 32-35, 38, lack authority, and that in l. 37 is exaggerated.

27. Pigmy. Cf. 111, 157, n.

41. Interlope. To traffic irregularly, without a proper license: cf. 261, 17.

62. White witches. Witches using their supernatural arts only for good purposes.

65. He loos'd, etc. v. 112, 175, n.

129, 73. So Samson, etc. v. Judges xvi. 15-20.

77. When his just sovereign, etc. In March, 1672, the king, supported by Ashley, who was shortly afterwards created Earl of Shaftesbury, issued a Declaration of Indulgence, granting toleration to Catholics and Dissenters. When parliament resisted this measure, as an abuse of the prerogative, Charles withdrew it, in March, 1673. Shaftesbury, who seems to have learned in the meantime of the intrigues of Charles with France for the establishment of the Catholic religion in England, then supported, in opposition to the king, the Test Act, by which all honest Catholics and most dissenters were excluded from office. Owing to this proceeding he lost his place as Chancellor in November, 1673, and ceased to be one of the king's advisers. He then entered on a course of violent opposition to the king.

94. Thou leap'st, etc. Dryden inserts this long line of fourteen syllables, for which he was unjustly ridiculed by contemporaries, to symbolize, by its departure from regular meter, the departures of the crowd from reason. (Cf. 429, 75, n; 785, 83, n; 820, 666; 891, 106, n; 897, 568.) At this time, also, Pindar was regarded as a peculiarly wild and ungovernable poet: v. 91², 26. Hence, in translating some of his odes, Cowley used an irregular versification, in which he frequently employed Alexandrine lines, of twelve syllables, hence called Pindaric lines; and occasionally still longer lines, of fourteen syllables: cf. 181, 512.

95. Athens, etc. The Athenians put to death Phocion on a charge of treason (B. C. 317) and Socrates on a charge of impiety (B. C. 399). In both cases they later repented of their acts, and raised statues to the memory of their victims.
119. Jehu. v. 2 Kings ix. 20.
131. We loathe, etc. v. Numbers xi.
135. That kings, etc. A Tory maxim, still maintained as an English legal fiction.
145. The man, etc. Dryden is probably indebted, as Saintsbury shows, to Sir Thomas Browne, Pseudodoxia Epidemica, vii. 16. 2 The story goes back ultimately to an anecdote concerning Marcus Licinius Crassus Agellastus (the never-laughing), the grandfather of the triumvir: v. C. Lucili Carminum Reliquiæ, ed. F. Marx, Leipzig, 1904, vol. i, p. 89, vol. ii, pp. 412-414.
- 130, 149. The witnesses, etc. See note on Irish witnesses, 128, 10 (prose). Other witnesses also had changed sides. The Whigs were loth to admit that they had been the dupes of men who lived by perjury, and yet could make no other tenable defense against the accusations brought against them.
156. They rack, etc. Referring to the dissenters' plea that each individual should interpret the Scriptures for himself; and to some extremists' claim of an immediate inspiration, which authorized them to preach in public, all laws to the contrary notwithstanding Cf. 159², 9-22; 167. 398-426, 223, 224, 452-496; 227, 676-708.
173. Yet monsters, etc. A reminiscence of Ovid: cf. 391, 565-572.
174. Engender'd on. So ed. 1 (without Latin motto) and eds. 2, 3; ed. 1 (with Latin motto) reads Entirend by.
- 179-182. Thy . . . hands. So ed. 1 (without Latin motto), and eds. 2, 3; ed. 1 (with Latin motto) transposes the couplets 179, 180 and 181, 182, and in 182 reads, But what's the Head.
181. The head, etc. "As matters carried more and more the appearance of actual insurrection and civil war, the more wealthy of the citizens of London began to draw to the royal party. By means of this party Sir John Moore, a man favorable to the court, was elected Lord Mayor." [SCOTT.] He could, however, accomplish little while hampered by his two gouty hands, the Whig sheriffs, Shute and Pilkington. v. 152, 1131-1140, and note on 1135.
201. Whether, etc. Cf. 127¹, 159-161.
205. Their trait'rous combination. The Association: v. n. 126², 10.
217. Thus, etc. v. Matthew xxi. 33-39.
- 131, 226. Cyclop-like. A reference to the story of the Cyclops Polyphemus, who ate the flesh of men: v. Odyssey, ix.
229. Clip . . . ring. Until 1662, most of the money coined in England was hammered, not milled, and the hammered money continued in circulation after that date: cf. 518¹, 45, n. Such coins were liable to be clipped on the edge: if the clipping extended within the ring inside which the sovereign's head was placed, the piece would not pass current. v. Hamlet, ii. 2. 447: "Pray God, your voice, like a piece of uncurrent gold, be not crack'd within the ring."
237. Their crime. Eds. 2 and 3 read the Crime.
240. Whet like a Croatian band. Taken merely as a symbol of lawless ferocity, probably with an allusion to the wars between Austria and Turkey.
270. Stum. "New wine used to freshen up stale and cause a second fermentation." [SAINTSBURY.] Cf. n. 741¹, 50.
272. The formidable cripple. For further satire on Shaftesbury's bodily infirmities, v. 907, 100-114.
285. Bedlam. The popular term for a famous lunatic asylum, the Hospital of St. Mary of Bethlehem, in London: cf. 375, 212.
287. Without, etc. Compare the conclusion to The Hind and the Panther (252, 256¹ f), which similarly prophesies discord among the poet's opponents.
293. Thy decrepit age. "Shaftesbury was at this period little above sixty years old. But he was in a state of premature decrepitude; partly owing to natural feebleness of body, and partly to an injury which he received by an overturn in a Dutch carriage when he was in Holland, in 1660, as one of the Parliamentary Committee." [SCOTT.]
- 132, 317. Collatine. Lucius Tarquinius Collatinus took a prominent part in the dethronement of the last king of Rome, his kinsman Tarquinius Superbus, and was elected one of the first two consuls. He was later compelled to withdraw himself, owing to his bearing the name of Tarquin. Thus, Dryden predicts, Monmouth, if he ever became king, would be compelled to withdraw, owing to his kinship with the royal line.
323. Pudet, etc. Ovid, Metamorphoses, i. 757, 758, with a change of nobis to obis to suit the context. "Shameful is it that these insults could be spoken to you, and could not be refuted." Cf. 400, 1063, 1064.
20. Once, when, etc. v. Job i. 9.
21. Whitthall. Cf. 390, 227, n.
- 133¹, 29. The father, etc. Cf. 121, 957-960.
- To THE DUCHESS. Dryden had already (1677) dedicated The State of Innocence to this lady. Scott writes of her: "She was at this time in all the splendor of beauty; tall, and admirably formed in her person; dignified and graceful in her deportment, her complexion very fair, and her hair and eyebrows of the purest black. Her personal charms fully merited the encomiastic strains of the following epistle."
- 133¹, 22. Three gloomy years. The Duke of York's continuous residence in Scotland, as high commissioner, had begun only in October, 1680. But Dryden apparently counts the time since his withdrawal to the Low Countries, in March, 1679, during the excitement over the Popish Plot.

24. Joseph's dream. The dream of Pharaoh interpreted by Joseph: v. Genesis xli.
 38. The people's, etc. Cf. 112, 238, 239.
 134. MAC FLECKNOE. For further details on the occasion of this poem, v. B. S. xxviii, xxix. — Dr. Johnson was probably led into his misstatement in regard to it by a passage in Cibber's life of Dryden.

On True-Blue-Protestant, cf. 124¹, 40, n.

3. Flecknoe. Flecknoe was, it is said, by birth an Irishman, and by profession a Catholic priest. Marvell saw him in Rome about 1645, and describes the meeting in a rough-hewn satire, Flecknoe, an English Priest at Rome. Dryden, who apparently had no personal quarrel with him, selected him for his purpose simply as a man who for a generation had been a notoriously bad poet. The verses in which Flecknoe complimented Dryden are as follows:

Dryden the Muses darling and delight,
 Than whom none ever flew so high a flight,
 Some have their vains so drosie, as from earth.
 Their Muses onely seem to have tane their birth.
 Others but water-Poets are, have gon
 No farther than to th' Fount of Helicon:
 And they'r but atery ones, whose Muse soars up
 No higher than to mount Parnassus top;
 Whilst thou, with thine, dost seem to have mounted
 higher,

Then he who feteht [sic] from Heaven Celestial fire:
 And dost as far surpass all others, as Fire does all other elements surpass.

FLECKNOE, Epigrams, 1670, p. 70.

For a passage in which Dryden seems indebted to Flecknoe, v. 143, 418-420, n.

11. Was fit. Ed. 1 reads was fit.
 12. War. Ed. 1 reads was.
 15. Sh——. Ed. 1, here and elsewhere, reads Shad——.

"Thomas Shadwell (1642?-92) made several essays in verse, all of which are deplorably bad. But in comedy he was much more successful; and, in that capacity, Dryden does him great injustice in pronouncing him a dunce. On the contrary, I think most of Shadwell's comedies may be read with great pleasure. They do not, indeed, exhibit any brilliancy of wit, or ingenuity of intrigue; but the characters are truly dramatic, original, and well drawn, and the picture of manners which they exhibit gives us a lively idea of those of the author's age. As Shadwell proposed Jonson for his model, peculiarity of character, or what was then technically called humor, was what he chiefly wished to exhibit; and in this it cannot be denied that he has often succeeded admirably.

"In his Epistle Dedicatory to Bury Fair (1689) Shadwell complains of the hardships he suffered owing to his Whig principles: 'I never could recant in the worst of times, when my ruin was designed, and my life was sought, and for near ten years I was kept from the exercise of that profession which had afforded me a competent subsistence.' It is no wonder, therefore, he was among the first to hail the dawn of the Revolution, and that King William distinguished him by the laurel, of which Dryden was deprived. Shadwell did not long enjoy this triumph over his great enemy. His death is said to have been hastened by his taking an overdose of opium, to the use of which he was inordinately addicted. — In person, Shadwell was large, corpulent, and unwieldy, a circumstance which our author generally keeps in the eye of the reader." [SCOTT.] Cf. 153, 33, n.

29. Heywood and Shirley. Thomas Heywood (d. 1650?) was probably the most prolific of the Elizabethan dramatists; he claims to have had a hand in the writing of two hundred and twenty plays, of which, however, only twenty-four are preserved. — James Shirley (1596-1666) the last of the Elizabethan dramatists, was also a prolific writer; thirty-six plays by him survive. These authors do not deserve the contempt here shown them by Dryden, who probably was ill acquainted with their writings. Heywood wrote a play called The Late Lancashire Witches, the title of which reappears in The Lancashire Witches of Shadwell; and in his Love's Mistress he treated the story of Psyche, which Shadwell took for the subject of an opera. But it may be doubted whether Dryden had these facts in mind when he made Heywood a type of Shadwell.

33. And, coarsely, etc. Ed. 1 reads:

I coudry Cloath'd in Druggert Russet, came.

Norwich druggel. "This stuff (a coarse woolen fabric) appears to have been sacred to the use of the poorer votaries of Parnassus; and it is somewhat odd that it seems to have been the dress of our poet himself in the earlier stage of his fortunes. An old gentleman who corresponded with the Gentleman's Magazine says he remembers our author in this dress." [SCOTT.]

"I remember plain John Dryden (before he paid his court with success to the great) in one uniform clothing of Norwich druggel. I have eat tarts with him and Madam Reeve at the Mulberry Garden, when our author advanced to a sword and chadreur wig." GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE, xv. 99 (February, 1745).

36. King John of Portugal. Flecknoe had visited Portugal, and boasts of being patronised by the king.
 37. The prelude. Ed. 1 reads a prelude.
 135, 41. Commander. Ed. 1 reads commanders.
 42. Epsom blankets, etc. Tossing in a blanket is the punishment visited upon Sir Samuel Hearty (v. n. 136, 181) in The Virtuoso: see act ii of that play. There is also a reference to the title of Shadwell's play Epsom Wells.
 43. The new Arion. Arion was an ancient Greek musician, who lived about B. C. 700. Once, when he was returning to Corinth from Sicily, where he had won the prize in a musical contest, his life was threatened by the rude sailors, who were greedy for his property. He gained permission once more to delight himself with his music, placed himself in the prow of the ship, sang and played upon his lyre, and threw himself into the sea. The song-loving dolphins that had crowded about his ship carried him safe to land. — Dryden in these lines apparently refers to some actual festival, now lost to memory, in which Shadwell took part. Shadwell in his preface to Psyche boasts of his skill in music.

44. Trembling. Ed. 1 reads trembles.
 47. Echoes. Ed. 1 reads Echo. Pissing Alley is shown on a map in Stow's Survey of London, 1720 (book iv, between pp. 108 and 109), as a passage between the Strand and Hollowell St.
 48. Aston Hall. So ed. 1; ed. 2 reads A — Hall. This allusion has never been explained.
 50. As at, etc. Ed. 1 reads:

And gently waft the over all along.

52. Papers, etc. Ed. 1 reads, Paper in thy Thrashing-Hand.
 53. St. André's. Ed. 1 reads St. Andrew's. "St. André was an eminent dancing master of the period." [SCOTT.]
 54. Psyche. "This unfortunate opera was imitated from the French of Molière, and finished, as Shadwell assures us, in the space of five weeks. The author having no talents for poetry and no ear for versification, Psyche is one of the most contemptible of the frivolous dramatic class to which it belongs. It was, however, got up with extreme magnificence, and received much applause on its first appearance in 1674." [SCOTT.]

Some expressions in Shadwell's preface might be interpreted as a sneer at the heroic plays of Dryden, with whom, however, he was apparently still on good terms: "Though I expect more candor from the best writers in rhyme, the more moderate of them . . . are very much offended with me for leaving my own province of comedy, to invade their dominion of rhyme. But methinks they might be satisfied, since I have made but a small incursion, and am resolved to retire. And were I never so powerful, they should escape me, as the northern people did the Romans, their craggy barren territories being not worth the conquering."

57. Singleton. "Singleton was a musical performer of some eminence, and is mentioned as such in Shadwell's Bury Fair, act iii, sc. 1. Villerius, the Grand Master of Rhodes, is a principal character in Davenant's Siege of Rhodes, where a great part of the dialogue is in a sort of lyrical recitative. — The combination of the lute and sword is taken from The Rehearsal (act v), where Bayes informs his critical friends that his whole battle is to be represented by two persons: 'for I make 'em both come out in armor, cap-a-pie, with their swords drawn, and hung with a scarlet ribbon at their wrists, (which, you know, represents fighting enough,) each of 'em holding a lute in his hand. . . . I make 'em, sir, play the battle in recitativo.' The adverse generals enter accordingly, and perform a sort of duet, in parody of passages in The Siege of Rhodes." [SCOTT.]

58. Bore. Ed. 1 reads wore.
 64. Close to. Ed. 1 reads Close by.
Augusta. v. 50, 1177, n. The following line alludes to the fears, especially rife in the City, of Popish intrigues; cf. 141, 308–309. Professor Saintsbury points out that the phrase, "Augusta is inclin'd to fears," is found in [the prologue of] Crowne's Calisto (1675). It is there also applied to London.
 69. Of all, etc. Ed. 1 reads:

An Empty name of all the Pile Remains.

71. Loves. Ed. 1 reads Love.
 72, 73. Where . . . sleep. A parody of a couplet in the first book of Cowley's Davidis:

Where their vast court the mother waters keep,
 And, undisturb'd by moons, in silence sleep.

Another couplet in the same passage:

Beneath the dens where unfetted tempests lie,
 And infant winds their tender voices try, — is parodied in lines 76, 77.

74. Nursery. This was a theater erected under a patent issued by Charles II in 1664: "for the making up and supplying of a company for acting of playes, and instructing boyes and gyrls in the art of playing, to bee in the nature of a Nursery, from time to time to be removed to the said two severall theatres abovementioned [that is, those of the King's Company and of the Duke's Company], which said company shall bee called by the name of a Nursery" (Shakespeare Society's Papers, vol. iii, 1847, p. 167). The patent adds: "We doe expressly hereby prohibite that any obscene, scandalous, or offensive passages be brought upon the stage, but such onely shalbe there had and used, as may consist with harmeless and inoffensive delights and recreations." The Nursery stood in Golding (later Golden) Lane, which adjoins the Barbican, a street which took its name in the manner described by Dryden. It was much ridiculed by the wits of the time. In Buckingham's Rehearsal (act ii, sc. 2), Bayes, representing Dryden, makes the following magnificent threat: "I vow to gad, I have been so highly disoblig'd by the peremptoriness of these fellows, that I am resolv'd hereafter to bend all my thoughts for the service of the Nursery, and mump your proud playes, i' gad."

78. Maxims. Dryden here ridicules the ranting hero of his own early play Tyrannic Love.
 81. Simpkin. Professor Collins states that a piece entitled The Humors of Simpkin is found in "a collection of drolls and farces, compiled by Francis Kirkman in 1673." Simpkin, he tells us, is "a stupid clown who is represented as intriguing with an old man's wife."

82. Amidst, etc. Ed. 1 reads:

Amidst these Monuments of Varnisht Minds.

Professor Collins points out that Dryden is here indebted to Davenant:

This to a structure led, long known to fame,
And call'd the monument of vanish'd minds.
Gondibert, book ii, canto v, st. 38.

83. Suburbian. So ed. 2: ed. 1 reads Suburbane.
84. Panton. "A celebrated punster, according to Derrick." SCOTT.
87. Dekker. "Dekker, who did not altogether deserve the disgraceful classification which Dryden has here assigned to him, was a writer of the reign of James I, and the antagonist of Jonson. I suspect Dryden knew, or at least recollected, little more of him than that he was ridiculed by his more renowned adversary, under the character of Crispinus in The Poetaster." [SCOTT.] v. Additions and Corrections. Later critics are emphatic in their praise of Dekker. In The Poetaster Demetrius, not Crispinus, is his real representative.
88. Pile. Ed. 1 reads Isle.
91. Misers, etc. Shadwell wrote an adaptation of Molière's L'Avare under the title of The Miser. Raymond is "a gentleman of wit and honor" in his Humorists, and Bruce and Longvil (v. l. 212) are "gentlemen of wit and sense" in his Virtuoso. No special application of hypocrites is now known, unless Scott is right in his conjecture: "Perhaps Dryden means the characters of the Irish priest and Tory chaplain in The Lancashire Witches."
92. It should. Ed. 1 reads, his Pen should.
94. Empress Fame. For the reference to Virgil, v. 567, 251-281.
96. Fame. Ed. 1 reads Pomp.
97. And distant. Ed. 1 reads to distant.
98. Carpets. Ed. 1 reads Carpet.
102. Ogleby. John Ogleby (Ogilby), 1600-76. "This gentleman, whose name, thanks to our author and Pope, has become almost proverbial for a bad poet, was originally a Scottish dancing master. He translated the Iliad, the Odyssey, the Æneid, and Æsop's Fables into verse; and his versions were splendidly adorned with sculpture. He also wrote three epic poems, one of which was fortunately burned in the fire of London." [SCOTT.] For further comments on him by Dryden, v. 1763, 3-9; 7483, 40-46.
105. Herringman. So ed. 1; ed. 2 reads H— —. On Herringman, v. B. S. xvii, xviii; xxv. He had published for Shadwell as well as for Dryden.
107. Throne. Ed. 1 reads State.
108. Our young Ascanius, etc. Dryden here adapts Virgil to his satiric purpose: cf. 548, 926-932; 692, 253, 254.
Sate. So ed. 1; ed. 2 reads sat.
111. Around. Ed. 1 reads about.
112. As Hannibal, etc. Hannibal, according to a story told by Livy, is said to have been forced by his father, when only nine years old, to swear eternal hatred to Rome.
115. Till. Ed. 1 reads to.
136, 117. Ne'er to, etc. Ed. 1 reads:
 Would bid defiance unto Wit and Sense.
121. He plac'd. Ed. 1 reads Was plac'd.
122. Love's Kingdom. A "pastoral tragi-

- comedy" by Flecknoe, the only one of his plays ever acted.
124. Lore. Ed. 1 reads Love.
126. Poppies. Ed. 1 reads Poppey. "Perhaps in allusion to Shadwell's frequent use of opium, as well as to his dullness." SCOTT.
132. Th' admiring. Ed. 1 reads Th' advancing.
133. Hia. Ed. 1 reads the.
134. Of his. Ed. 1 reads on his.
135, 136. Shed Full on the. Ed. 1 reads, Shed : Full of the.
139. Heavens. Ed. 1 reads Heaven.
143. Kingdom let him. Ed. 1 reads Kingdoms may he.
148. And fruitless. Ed. 1 reads a fruitless.
149. Let Virtuosos, etc. "Shadwell's comedy The Virtuoso was first acted in 1676, with great applause. As the whole piece seems intended as a satire on the Royal Society, its scope could not be very pleasing to Dryden, even if he could have forgiven some hits leveled against him personally in the preface, prologue, and epilogue." [SCOTT.]
In the Epistle Dedicatory to The Virtuoso Shadwell complains of having scant time for writing, and in the preface to another comedy, The Libertine, he boasts of the speed with which he finished his work. Rochester, in his Allusion to the Tenth Satire of the First Book of Horace, terms him "hasty Shadwell." Dryden evidently knew the contrary to be the case: in his preface to All for Love (1678), written before his quarrel with Shadwell, he censures Rochester for calling "a slow man hasty." Cf. n. 135, 54; 7412, 33-43.
150. Toil. Ed. 1 reads Soul.
151. Gentle George. v. headnote, p. 78. In The Man of Mode; or, Sir Fopling Flutter, Dorimant is the betrayer of Mrs. Loveit. Cully is found in The Comical Revenge; or, Love in a Tub, and Cockwood in She Would if She Could, other comedies by the same writer.
In. Ed. 1 reads with.
157. Let 'em be all by thy. Ed. 1 reads: Let them be all of thy.
159. Future. Ed. 1 reads after.
160. Issue of thy own. Ed. 1 reads issues of thine own.
162. Full of thee. Ed. 1 reads like to thee.
163. S—d—y. Ed. 1 reads Sydney.—Sir Charles Sedley was a noted wit and a minor poet and dramatist; a patron and friend of Dryden, who dedicated to him The Assignment, and introduced him, under the name of Lisideius, as one of the speakers in An Essay of Dramatic Poesy. He wrote a prologue for Shadwell's Epsom Wells, and was apparently suspected of aiding him in the comedy itself. Shadwell acknowledges receiving aid from him in another comedy, A True Widow.
167. And top. Ed. 1 reads on th' top.
168. Sir Formal. Sir Formal Trifle is a character in The Virtuoso, whom Shadwell justly terms "the orator, a florid coxcomb." In this line ed. 1 reads Wit instead of will.
170. Does. Ed. 1 reads doth.
Northern dedications. An allusion to Shadwell's frequent dedication of his plays to the Duke of Newcastle and his family. In his Vindication of the Duke of Guise, 1683, Dryden terms Shadwell "the northern dedicator."

172. Jonson's hostile name. Shadwell praises Jonson and professes himself his disciple with such fervor that he seems to claim kinship with him. In his Epistle Dedicatory to The Virtuoso he writes: "Nor do I hear of any professed enemies to the play, but some women, and some men of feminine understandings, who like slight plays only, that represent a little tattle-sort of conversation, like their own. But true humor is not liked or understood by them, and therefore even my attempt towards it is condemned by them. But the same people, to my great comfort, damn all Mr. Jonson's plays, who was incomparably the best dramatic poet that ever was, or, I believe, ever will be; and I had rather be author of one scene in his best comedies than of any play this age has produced."

175. Has. Ed. 1 reads hath.

177. On. Ed. 1 reads or. This line and the following probably refer to Shadwell's satire on the Royal Society in The Virtuoso.

178. And. Ed. 1 reads Or.

179. Prince Nicander's vein. Prince Nicander is a character in Shadwell's Psyche.

181. Where sold he bargains. Selling bargains consisted in answering innocent questions with coarse phrases like that quoted in the text: cf. 261, 46.

Whip-stitch, etc. A similar phrase is a favorite with Sir Samuel Hearty in The Virtuoso, "one that by the help of humorous, nonsensical by-words, takes himself to be a great wit." In this line ed. 1 reads mine instead of my.

182. Promis'd, etc. This apparently refers to the Epistle Dedicatory to The Virtuoso. Here Shadwell writes, for example: "I say nothing of impossible, unnatural farce fools, which some intend for comical, who think it the easiest thing in the world to write a comedy, and yet will sooner grow rich upon their ill plays than write a good one."

183. When . . . Fletcher. Ed. 1 reads, Where . . . Fletchers.

184. As thou, etc. No commentator has investigated this charge of wholesale plagiarism, which is probably based mainly on Shadwell's Epsom Wells. Raines and Bevil, "men of wit and pleasure" in that play, and their lady-loves Lucia and Carolina, suggest the corresponding pairs Courtal and Freeman and Gatty and Ariana, in Etherege's She Would if She Could; and Shadwell's Mrs. Woody has many traits of Etherege's Lady Cockwood. In each play the young men first meet the young women wearing vizards, and persuade them to unmask in somewhat the same fashion. Mrs. Woody, who is carrying on an intrigue with Bevil, discovers his passion for Carolina, and entraps him by a forged letter, just as Lady Cockwood endeavors to trick Courtal and Freeman by the same device. Mrs. Woody again copies Lady Cockwood's behavior when she hides Bevil in her bed-chamber; when she slanders Bevil and Raines to their sweethearts, saying that they have boasted of the favor accorded them; and when, near the close of the play, she discards the faithless Bevil and tries to gain the affection of Raines. Lucia and Carolina behave towards their slandered lovers in much the same way as do Gatty and Ariana. — Furthermore, Kick and Cuff, two cheating bullies in Epsom Wells, resemble Wheedle and Palmer in Etherege's Comical Revenge, and trick Clodpate as their predecessors do Sir Nicholas Cully. At the end of the play Clodpate marries Mrs. Jilt just as Sir Nicholas marries Mrs. Lucy.

Yet no fair-minded reader can deny the essential originality of Epsom Wells, inferior though its vulgar humor may be to the sprightly dialogue of the better scenes in Etherege. Other dramatists than these two have created pairs of rakish lovers, wanton damsels, and cowardly sharpers; and Etherege would have no good ground of complaint if Shadwell adopted the same familiar devices as himself. Shadwell probably took suggestions for some situations from Etherege, but he made these situations his own by his treatment of them. In another statement, however, Dryden is quite correct: certain scenes in Epsom Wells that Shadwell cannot even be accused of purloining, distinctly sink below those that remind one of Etherege.

Langbaine, who to be sure is always friendly to Shadwell, writes of Epsom Wells: "T is true that some endeavored to fix a calumny upon our author, alleging that this play was not ingenious; but this stain was quickly wiped off by the plea he makes for himself in the prologue spoken to the king and queen at Whitehall, where he says:

If this for him had been by others done,

After this honor sure they'd claim their own."

185. Oil, etc. Ed. 1 reads, Oyls on Water Flow; ed. 2 reads Oyl on Waters flow. Flow is certainly a noun; it is not clear whether one should read water's or waters.

187. This is, etc. "Four of the humors are entirely new; and (without vanity) I may say I ne'er produced a comedy that had not some natural humor in it not represented before, nor I hope ever shall." SHADWELL. Epistle Dedicatory to The Virtuoso.

Province. Ed. 1 reads Promise.

189. This is that, etc. The passage is a parody of four lines in the epilogue to Shadwell's The Humorists:

A humor is the bias of the mind,
By which with violence 't is one way inclin'd:
It makes our actions lean on one side still,
And in all changes that way bends the will.

Thy. Ed. 1 reads the.

191. Lean. Ed. 1 reads lame.
 192. Changes. Ed. 1 reads Charges.
 194. Of likeness. That is, to Ben Jonson.
 196. Thou 'rt but a. Ed. 1 reads, thou art a.
 199. Sett'st. Ed. 1 reads sets.
 202. Does. Ed. 1 reads doth.

Thy Irish pen. In the Epistle Dedicatory to his translation of The Tenth Satyr of Juvenal (1687) Shadwell retorts indignantly: "— Sure he goes a little too far in calling me the dullest, and has no more reason for that than for giving me the Irish name of Mack, when he knows I never saw Ireland till I was three-and-twenty years old, and was there but four months."

- 137, 204. Iambics. Since the iambic was the appropriate meter for Greek satire, the name iambics has become equivalent to satire, even in languages like English, where it has no special fitness. In this line ed. 1 misprints wild instead of mild.
 207. There thou may'st wings display, etc. "Among other efforts of gentle dullness may be noticed the singular fashion which prevailed during the earlier period of the seventeenth century, of writing in such changes of measure that by the different length and arrangement of the lines the poem was made to resemble an egg, an altar, a pair of wings, a cross, or some other fanciful figure." [SCOTT.] Dryden may possibly intend a specific reference to George Herbert's poems An Altar and Easter Wings.
 209. Diff'rent talents. Ed. 1 reads different Talent.
 212. Bruce, etc. v. n. 135, 91. The two gentlemen are present at a scene in which their lady-loves, Clarinda and Miranda, entice Sir Formal to stand upon a secret trapdoor while he delivers a speech, and then dispose of him by releasing the trap. v. The Virtuoso, act. iii.
 213. Declaiming. Ed. 1 reads declining.
 214. His druggel robe. Ed. 1 reads the Druggel Robes.
 216. The mantle, etc. v. 2 Kings ii. 12-15, where "Elisha, dividing Jordan with Elijah's mantle, is acknowledged his successor."
 217. Double. Ed. 1 reads doubled.

THE SECOND PART OF ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL. Nahum Tate (1652-1715) was a young Tory poet, for whose tragedy, The Loyal General, Dryden had written a prologue in 1679 (v. 87). His best known works are an adaptation of King Lear, which held the stage until about 1840, and a version of the Psalms, which he made in conjunction with Nicholas Brady. He seems later to have changed his politics, for in 1692 he succeeded Shadwell as poet laureate.

The Grolier Club's Catalogue of Original and Early Editions of English Writers from Wither to Prior, New York, 1905, states that two issues of this poem were printed in 1682. The editor has seen only that reading Fleet-Street (not Fleetstreet) on the title-page.

The notes on Tate's portion of the poem are made as brief as possible. Explanations of names that occur also in Dryden's poem are not repeated here.

- 138, 9. Clemency was. Ed. 1 reads, Goodness was e'en.
 20. Flattering. Ed. 1 reads Flatterie's.
 33. As all. Ed. 1 reads since all.
 38. Guilty Jebusites, etc. Charles II was ambitious for power, and was well inclined to the Catholic religion. During the excitement caused by the Popish Plot, however, he did not deem it prudent to protect such Catholics as were accused, or to pardon those convicted. He refused, for example, to interfere, as he might well have done, in behalf of Lord Stafford.
 40. Nay, etc. Christie glosses this line: "Some of those employed for sham plots whereby to sacrifice opponents have been executed." One Fitzharris, who swore that he had been bribed to concoct a sham plot and ascribe it to the Whigs, was later condemned and executed. But may not sacrificers here mean simply priests?
 48. Pamper'd Corah, etc. "The Salamanca doctor [Oates] . . . robed like a bishop and puffed with insolence . . . became the darling of the Whig party. . . . Each morning there waited at his lodgings to dress him two or three gentlemen who vied for the honor of holding his basin." JOHN POLLOCK, The Popish Plot, 1903, p. 227.
 51. Such was, etc. On November 25, 1678, Oates accused Queen Catherine, before the king and council, of plotting against her husband's life.
 58. The Hermon, etc. Cf. Song of Solomon ii. 1.
 69. The pest, etc. The references are to the Great Plague of 1665, the Fire of London in 1666, and the wars with Holland (Tyre) in 1665-67 and 1672-74.
 139, 95. And now. Ed. 1 reads For now.
 96. 'T was worse, etc. "The very breath of him was pestilential; and, if it brought not imprisonment or death over such on whom it fell, it surely poisoned reputation." NORTH, Eramen, p. 205.
 109. These raise the Plot, etc. The charge that Shaftesbury was the real author of the Popish Plot, and Oates merely his tool, is supported by no evidence, and is wholly incredible. Shaftesbury was, however, quick to take advantage of a situation that he did not create.
 142. O rather. Ed. 2 reads Oh! rather; ed. 1, Or rather.
 140, 165-170. The crown's . . . hour. Imitated from 115, 441-446.
 181. "The factious tribes—" "And this reproof from thee?" As there are no quotation marks in the early editions, it is hard to tell where one speech ends and the other begins. The text follows C.: SS. makes Achitophel's speech extend through from thee.
 189. Who reach, etc. Those who reach for the crown, but miss that prize, receive death.
 190-195. Did you . . . afar. Imitated from 118, 119, 688, 689, 729-734.

203. My removal. From the office of Lord President of the Council: v. n. 121, 971.
216. Who at your instance, etc. This refers to Shaftesbury's support of the Declaration of Indulgence: v. n. 129, 77.
220. Ev'n property, etc. At the opening of 1672, the king, being straitened for money, refused to repay £1,400,000 lent him by the goldsmiths, and arbitrarily reduced the interest from 12 to 6 per cent. This he seems to have done by the advice of Lord Clifford, and against the protest of Ashley, who, however, as a member of the Cabal ministry, received a large share of the blame. Nor is there any good evidence that Ashley turned the proceeding to his personal profit.
226. Recount, etc. Cf. 112, 175, n.
- 141, 255. Debar, etc. The Commons had desired to make the passage of the Exclusion Bill the condition of their votes of supply: v. 107³, 8, n.
268. Subtile. Ed. 1 reads subtle.
269. Till peace, etc. Cf. 119, 752.
270. Associations. v. n. 126², 10.
280. Ishban. Sir Robert Clayton, alderman, and representative of the City in parliament. Other writers make the same charges against him as those in the text.
298. Rabsheka. "Sir Thomas Player, Chamberlain of the City of London, and one of the city members of parliament. When the Duke of York unexpectedly returned from Brussels, Player made his appearance before the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen, and gravely demanded that the city guards should be doubled. In the vehemence of his oratory a remarkable expression chanced to escape him, 'that he durst hardly go to sleep, for fear of awaking with his throat cut.'" [SCOTT.] For the name, v. 2 Kings xviii. 17-xix. 4.
310. Next these, etc. Cf. 599, 461.
315. Streams. Ed. 1 reads Waves.
- 142, 321. Judas. Robert Ferguson (d. 1714), the "Plotter." He was a Nonconformist preacher, who, being ejected from his living by the Act of Uniformity in 1662, supported himself by teaching boys at Islington, near London. He aided Shaftesbury by his pamphlets (cf. n. 126⁴, 34), and fled with him to Holland. He became famous as a plotter against the governments of Charles, James, and William.
340. Phaleg. "James Forbes (1629?-1712), a Scotch dissenting clergyman of some distinction. He was placed by the Duke of Ormond as traveling tutor to the young Earl of Derby, who had married his granddaughter." [SCOTT.] The statements of the text seem to lack corroboration, especially as regards Forbes's relations with Ormond. Carte terms him "a gentleman of parts, virtue, and prudence, but of too mild a nature to manage his pupil," and tells how he was maltreated by the young earl and his riotous companions. (Life of Ormond, Oxford, 1851, vol. iv, pp. 488, 489.)
353. Ben-Jochanan. "The Reverend Samuel Johnson (1649-1703), a party writer of considerable merit. He was a native of Warwickshire, and took orders after a regular course of study at Cambridge. He obtained a small living of eighty pounds a year, the only church preferment he ever enjoyed. He later became chaplain to Lord Russell, the Whig leader in the House of Commons. During the dependence of the Bill of Exclusion, he endeavored at once to show the danger to a national religion from a sovereign who held opposite tenets, and to explode the doctrine of passive obedience, in a work entitled Julian the Apostate: being a Short Account of his Life; the Sense of the Primitive Christians about his Succession; and their Behaviour towards him: together with a Comparison of Popery and Paganism (London, 1682). There can be little doubt that, so far as the argument from the example of the primitive Christians is sound, Johnson has fairly made out his case. Indeed Dryden has little left to say, except that if they did resist Julian, which he seems to admit, they were very wrong in so doing, and the less that is said about it, the more will be the credit of the ancient Church.
- "For this and subsequent writings, Johnson was fined, imprisoned, degraded from ecclesiastical orders, pilloried, and whipped. After the Revolution the proceedings against him were declared illegal, and he received a pension of £300 yearly, with £1000 in money, and a post for his son.
- "The reader may contrast the character which Dryden has given of Johnson with that of John Hampden, who, in an account of him to the Duchess of Mazarin, says: 'Being two years with him in the same prison, I had the opportunity to know him perfectly well; and, to speak my thoughts of him in one word, I can assure your Grace that I never knew a man of better sense, of a more innocent life, nor of greater virtue, which was proof against all temptation, than Mr. Johnson.' See Memorials of his life prefixed to his Works in folio." [SCOTT.] The name Ben-Jochanan is taken as an equivalent of Johnson.
384. But, tell me, etc. v. Genesis ix. 18-27.
- 388, 389. Made? . . . trade. Eds. 1 and 2 read made. . . Trade?
392. And thy hot father, etc. St. Gregory Nazianzenus. Johnson in his work relies for his argument largely on the invectives of St. Gregory Nazianzenus against Julian's memory. Gregory rebukes the dead Constantius for allowing Julian to succeed him; Julian he addresses as "Thou traitor next to Judas—only thou hast not testified thy repentance by hanging thyself, as he did." (Op. cit. p. 63.) Dryden rightly thinks that Gregory showed sectarian fury rather than Christian charity. He may have taken his cue from Johnson himself, who writes: "And yet how do the Christians treat this emperor! One would take them to be the apostates; one while reproaching him, ruffling with him, and vexing every vein in his royal heart; another while . . . dancing and leaping for joy at his death, and insulting over his memory. But for the name of Christians, he had better have fallen amongst barbarians." (Ibid. p. 66.)

396. Balak. "The famous Gilbert Burnet was then preacher at the Rolls Chapel, under the patronage of Sir Harbottle Grimstone, Master of the Rolls. King Charles was so anxious that he should be dismissed, as to make it his particular request to Sir Harbottle, but the Master excused himself." [Scorr.] Dryden later satirized him in The Hind and the Panther as the Buzzard: v. 250, 2415, n.

143, 403. David's psalms translated. This refers to the old version by Sternhold and Hopkins, which later gave way to that by Tate and Brady: cf. 168, 456.

405. Mephibosheth. Samuel Pordage, a minor writer of the time, the son of a Berkshire clergyman who had been ejected from his cure on a charge of intercourse with spirits. He is the reputed author of Azaria and Hushai, a reply to Absalom and Achitophel, and The Medal Revers'd, a reply to The Medal.

407. Uzza. In Tonson's Key (1716) this name is explained as J. H. The initials are thought to mean Jack Hall, a minor poet of the time, though no quarrel between him and Dryden is known. Cf. 908, 229; n. 119, 804.

412. Doeg. Elkanah Settle (1648-1724). On Dryden's quarrel with this writer, v. B. S. xxii, xxviii, xxix. Settle had begun life as a Tory, then turned Whig; he later rejoined his original party. While on the Whig side, he was instrumental in arranging pope-burnings (cf. 122, 123): to this Dryden refers in ll. 451, 452. He sank lower and lower in the literary scale, until, as Scott tells us, "finally he took the prophetic hint conveyed in Dryden's lines, and became, not indeed the master, but the assistant to a puppet show, kept by a Mrs. Mynn, in Bartholomew Fair." He lived to be ridiculed by Pope as well as by Dryden, and died in poverty, a pensioner of the Charterhouse. Cf. 912, 418.

418. He was too warm, etc. Malone (I, 1, 170) cites the following from Flecknoe's Enigmatical Characters, 1658, p. 77, as giving Dryden the idea of this passage:

"For his [a schoolboy's] learning, 't is all capping verses, and fagoting poets' loose lines, which fall from him as disorderly as fagot-stick's, when the band is broke."

In Notes and Observations on The Emperess of Morocco, 1674, p. 2 (v. B. S. xxii) Dryden (?) had already attacked Settle in a similar fashion:

"What stuff may not a silly unattending Audience swallow, wrapt up in Rhime; certainly our Poet writes by chance; is resolv'd upon the Rhime before hand, and for the rest of the Verse has a Lottery of words by him, and draws them that come next, let them make sense or nonsense when they come together he matters not that; and his luck is so bad, that he seldom hits upon any that agree any more, than so many Men of several Languages would do."

444. Transprose. A reference to the title of Settle's poem, Absalom Senior, or Achitophel Transpros'd. This again refers to a jest in the first act of The Rehearsal, where Bayes boasts of his rule of transversion, or putting some one else's prose into his own verse. Johnson replies: "Methinks, Mr. Bayes, that putting verse into prose should be called transprosing;" and Bayes agrees: "By my troth, a very good notion, and hereafter it shall be so."

446. Who makes, etc. Settle's poem just mentioned begins:

In gloomy times, when priestcraft bore the away,
And made heav'n's gate a lock to their own key. —

448. Four and twenty letters. "I" and "j" were accounted one letter; so also were "u" and "v."

459. Og. Thomas Shadwell; v. n. 134, 15.

144, 477. Be thou dull. Apparently the midwife's blessing is confined to these three words, which are printed in italics in the early editions.

524. See where, etc. The following verses describe the Green Ribbon Club, which met at the King's Head Tavern. It included among its members most of the prominent Whigs of the time, and many underlings of the party. v. Pollock, The Popish Plot, pp. 237-239.

535. Arod. "Sir William Waller, son of the parliamentary general of the same name, distinguished himself during the time of the Popish Plot by an uncommon degree of bustling activity." [Scorr.] The charges here brought against him reflect contemporary report.

549. Gehazi. v. 2 Kings v. 20-27.

555. Zaken. An elder or magistrate (used, for example, in Exodus iii. 16). Commentators have stated that the word here means a member of parliament, but either this is incorrect, or Wood (Athenæ Oxonienses, 1721, ii. 419) is wrong in saying that Waller was elected to the Oxford parliament of 1681, the last that had met before the publication of this poem.

145, 574. Who for. v. 107³, 8, n.

592. His absence, etc. In March, 1679, owing to the popular excitement over the Exclusion Bill, the Duke of York, at the king's request, left England, going first to Holland and then to Brussels.

627. Thy thunder. Referring to the Duke of York's earlier naval service against the Dutch: cf. 26.

146, 642. Subjects. So ed. 1; ed. 2 reads Subject's, which may be correct, standing for subject's.

661. Grutch. Cf. grudge (l. 682): the discrepancy is that of the early editions.

689. Our brib'd Jews. Some of the Whig leaders were as corrupt in receiving French bribes as was the king himself. Louis XIV aimed to

- weaken England by playing off one party against another.
- 148, 793. From Hebron, etc. In August, 1679, on the illness of the king, the Duke of York had come to England for a few days, but almost immediately returned to Brussels. In the following October he was permitted to change his place of exile for Scotland, whence he returned in February, 1680. In the next October he was again forced to retire to Scotland, and returned from there only in March, 1682: cf. headnote, p. 132.
811. Jothran. George Legge (1648-91), created Baron of Dartmouth in 1682. He had won distinction in the wars with the Dutch, and later became admiral and commander-in-chief of the fleet. His father had been a noted royalist.
819. Benaiah. "General Edward Sackville, who had served at Tangier with great reputation, both for courage and judgment. He was expelled from the House of Commons for contemptuous words concerning those who believed in the Popish Plot." [Scott.]
- 825-828. While . . . rest. Cf. 132, 14-25.
- 149, 864. Confirm. Ed. 1 reads secure.
- 891-906. Or grant . . . king. These lines are evidently inspired by a passage in The Medal: v. 131, 132, 287-317.
913. An envious festival, etc. On April 20, 1682, the Duke of York was the guest of honor at a dinner given by the Artillery Company of London. The Whigs arranged for the following day a counter demonstration, consisting of a church service, followed by a dinner, in token of thanksgiving for the deliverance of England from Popish wiles. But the privy council meeting on April 19 unexpectedly forbade this gathering. (LUTTRELL, Brief Relation, i. 179.) Scott remarks: "This disappointment, trifling as it may seem, was of great disadvantage to the Whigs. It made them ridiculous, which is more fatal to a political party than any other misfortune."
- 150, 930. For shekel, etc. Tickets had been sold for the banquet at a guinea apiece.
938. Asaph. Dryden. Asaph was one of David's chief musicians: Psalms l and lxxiii-lxxxiii are ascribed to him.
941. Bezalel. Henry Somerset, Marquis of Worcester, and later Duke of Beaufort. Lord President of the Council of Wales (the Kenites' province). Bezalel was the artificer charged with making works of art required for the tabernacle in the wilderness: v. Exodus xxxi. 2-5.
958. His son. Charles Somerset, Marquis of Worcester.
967. Abdael. The Duke of Albemarle, son of General Monk, who had the chief share in restoring Charles II: v. 9, 151, n. Though a man of small gifts, he became Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, here termed the prophets' school.
985. Eliab. Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington, a member of the Cabal ministry, and Lord Chamberlain since 1674.
988. Fortune. Eds. 2 and 3 read Fortunes, probably by a misprint.
994. Othniel's. So ed. 3; eds. 1 and 2 read Othriel's. (For the name, v. Joshua xv. 17.) The Duke of Grafton, second son of Charles II by the Duchess of Cleveland, was married to the Lady Isabella Bennet, Arlington's only daughter. After the defection of Monmouth, the king attempted, as Scott says, "to set Grafton, in opposition to him, in the hearts of the people."
- 151, 1003. Helon. Louis Duras (1640?-1709) Earl of Feversham. He came of a noted French family, but had become an English subject in 1665.
1013. Amri. Heneage Finch, Earl of Nottingham, Lord Chancellor from 1674 to 1682: cf. 112, 188, n. Tate's praise of his legal learning is just.
1025. Sheva. Sir Roger L'Estrange (1616-1704), a noted newspaper writer for the Tory party, and one of the founders of British journalism. He was licenser of the press under Charles II and James II. Sheva was a scribe of David: v. 2 Samuel xx. 25.
1035. So Moses, etc. v. Numbers xxi. 7-9, and cf. 117, 632-635.
1041. Thy laurel grove, etc. "The thunder was anciently supposed to spare the laurel." Scott.
1065. Still Hebron's, etc. v. headnotes, 132, 133.
1066. Remains. Referring to the Duchess of York, who remained behind in Scotland — a peculiar use of the word.
- 152, 1075. Give not, etc. v. 2 Samuel i. 20.
1095. With loud last breaths, etc. "The Gazette says that when the barge put off, the poor sailors, who remained to perish, manned the sides in the usual honorary form, and, indifferent to their own fate, hailed the duke's safety with three cheers." [Scott.]
1100. Urania. A title of Venus; here used of the Duchess of York.
1107. Is. "The grammar requires to read he's." Scott.
1123. Hyblran swarms. The honey from the hills about Hybla, in Sicily, is celebrated by the ancient poets; hence Hyblean swarms means swarms of bees. Cf. 118, 697.
1131. Ziloah. Sir John Moore: v. 130, 181, n. The ruler pair of l. 1133 were the Whig sheriffs, Shute and Pilkington, who are called worse than Cornish and Bethel (v. 117, 585, n.), the sheriffs of the preceding year: their chief offense was in selecting the jury which refused to indict Shaftesbury.
1132. Surges. Eds. 1 and 2 read Syrge, by an evident misprint; ed. 3 reads Syrtes, by a mistaken correction of it.
1135. Ziloah's loyal labors. By unscrupulous political trickery, the court faction, aided by their tool Moore, brought about the election of two Tory sheriffs in September, 1682, as successors to Shute and Pilkington. This was followed by the choice of a Tory lord mayor, also secured by trickery.

- 153, 4. Pennsylvania's air, etc. In 1681 William Penn had received from the king the patent for his colony, and in September, 1682, he had sailed for America.
5. Associators. v. 126², 10, n. Shaftesbury was one of the nine individuals to whom the king made a grant of the province of Carolina in 1663, and he always took an active interest in the colony.
15. Those playhouse Whigs, etc. Apparently a reference to some struggles of the actors against the patentees who controlled them.
24. Charter. The Charter of the City of London had kept it free in large measure from the encroachments of royal authority. In 1683 the king secured its forfeiture.
33. No dull fat fool, etc. A fresh attack on Shadwell: v. n. 134, 15. Apparently the Whig poet was set aside on the union of the companies.
42. Whig sheriffs. Cf. nn. 152, 1131, 1135. The word sheriffs is to be pronounced as one syllable; cf. 56¹, 13; 156², 3.
- 154, 12. The mid gallery. The eighteen-penny place, apparently the special haunt of women of the town; cf. 172², 58.
21. Lackeys. Mr. R. W. Lowe (Life of Betterton, p. 29) says that at this time servants were not admitted to the theater until the end of the fourth act. "While hanging about the entrances and lobbies their noise might be quite audible in the theater."
24. Tom Dove. A bear so called; cf. 899¹, 3, n.
26. Their unpaying masters. For an interesting account of how theater-goers in Restoration times avoided payment of the entrance money, v. Lowe's Life of Betterton, pp. 22-25.
- 155¹, 1. Holy League. Cf. 8, 97-102 and 127¹, 10-12.
6. Sent over, etc. A reference to the French Huguenots who had sought shelter in England.
15. Their pois'ning way. Cf. 103², 46, n.
19. A flail. "A joiner named College made his fortune by inventing a pocket flail, tipped with lead, which was called the Protestant flail, and was to be used by sober citizens to brain 'Popish' assassins." (S. R. GARDINER, Student's History of England, p. 615.)
- 155², 2. Once the cause was lost. The government had for a long time refused to permit the play to be acted, fearing that the assassination of the Duke of Guise might be taken as suggesting that of Monmouth. In the next line Dryden denies, as he does more at length in his Vindication of the play, published in 1683, that any parallel between Monmouth and Guise was intended.
41. London. Cf. 153, 24, n.
43. Ignoramus juries. A reference to the grand jury that refused to indict Shaftesbury, reporting ignoramus. Dryden of course puns on the legal and commonplace meanings of the word.
- 156¹, 23. A Trimmer. v. n. 120, 882.
30. Jack Ketch. Cf. 210, 3, n.
31. Breathe. Ed. 1 reads breath.
38. You Trimmers, etc. It is hard to say whether the quotation ends with this line or continues through the epilogue.
- 156², 8. Marybone. Marylebone Gardens, then a fashionable place of amusement.
14. Pay their four shillings, etc. The price of a box seat; the pit cost but half a crown.
157. RELIGIO LAICI. Of the two issues of this poem published in 1682, that described in the 1886 Catalogue of the Rowfant Library, is probably earlier than the other. Number 315 in the Grolier Club's Catalogue of Original and Early Editions of English Writers from Wither to Prior, 1905. (This assertion contradicts one in An Appendix to the Rowfant Library, London, 1900.) In the latter (Grolier) copy the catch word at the end of the Preface is To, referring to the first complimentary poem To Mr. Dryden, which immediately follows in both issues; in the Rowfant copy it is Religio, referring to the title of the poem itself. This indicates that the complimentary poems were received after the Rowfant copy was already in type; hence it must be the first issue and Grolier Club no. 315 the second. Mr. Beverly Chew, President of the Grolier Club, called the editor's attention to this circumstance.
- Aside from frequent variations in spelling and punctuation, a collation shows only the following differences in reading between the two issues of 1682: 157², 6, (1) ingeniously, (2) ingeniously; 158², 58, (1) its proper, (2) its own proper; 160¹, 36, (1) Papists, (2) Papist; 160², 17, (1) had it been, (2) it had been.
- 158¹, 1. Intitle them to any of my errors. "Father my errors on them." [SAINTSBURY.]
39. Among the sons of Noah, etc. v. Genesis ix. 24-27.
47. Bill of exclusion. A main argument against the Exclusion Bill (v. n. 110, 18) was the injustice done by it to the Duke of York's Protestant children.
- 159¹, 6. The preface of whose creed, etc. "Who-soever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the Catholic faith. Which faith except every one do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly."
- 159², 37. Coleman's letters. Edward Coleman, secretary to the Duchess of York, had carried on a correspondence with Pere de La Chaise, a Jesuit, confessor to Louis XIV, relative to schemes for reestablishing the Catholic religion in England. The discovery of his letters seemed to give at least partial confirmation to Oates's depositions. Coleman was one of the first men to be executed on account of the Popish Plot. Mr. Pollock (The Popish Plot, 1903) defends the justice of this sentence.
56. Mariana, etc. Catholic writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. All but the last (more correctly Simancas) were Jesuits.
59. Campion. Edmund Campian (Campion) and Robert Parsons were English Jesuits, who in 1580-81 tried to spread Catholicism in England. Campian was hanged; Parsons escaped from England. The latter published

- several works, one of them, A Conference about the next Succession to the Crowne of England, under the name of R. Doleman.
- 160¹, 7. Nebuchadnezzar. v. Daniel iv. 28-33.
23. Apology. The full title is, Apologia Roberti Bellarmini S. R. E. Cardinalis, pro responsione sua ad librum Jacobi Magnus Britanniae Regis, cujus titulus est, Triplici Nodo Triplex Cuneus.
24. Ratione directi dominii. "After the manner of feudal tenure." The dominium directum is the right of the feudal lord in land, as distinguished from the dominium utile, or right of the vassal.
46. Father Cres. "Serenus Cressy, an English Benedictine monk, attendant on Queen Catherine. He was the principal conductor of controversy on the part of the Papists, and published many treatises against Stillingfleet and others." [SCOTT.]
- 160², 25. Tyndal. William Tyndal (Tyndale) (1490?-1536), one of the leaders of the English Reformation. He published translations of the New Testament, the Pentateuch, and the Book of Jonah, which, though condemned by Henry VIII, form the basis of the present Authorized Version.
- Lord Herbert*. Edward Herbert, Lord Herbert of Chisbury (1583-1648).
54. Hooker. Richard Hooker (1554?-1600), author of the Ecclesiastical Polity. To his life, by Isaac Walton, is appended a letter from his friend George Cranmer, grand-nephew to the archbishop.
- 161¹, 4. Martin Mar-prelate. Under this title there was issued from a secret press, in the years 1588-90, a series of bitter Puritan pamphlets. The man chiefly responsible for their publication was John Penry, a Welshman, who in 1593 was hanged as a traitor.
5. Marvell. Andrew Marvell, poet and controversialist; cf. 127¹, 6, n.
23. Thus Sectaries, etc. "The court writers at this period were anxious to fix upon the Presbyterians and the Nonconformists in general the antimonarchical principles of the fanatics who brought Charles I to the scaffold." [SCOTT.]
35. Hacket and Coppinger. "In 1591, William Hacket, a former serving man, had his brain turned by enthusiasm, and seduced Coppinger and Arthington, two gentlemen, to sally forth with him into the streets of London, where he proclaimed himself to be the Messiah, and Coppinger and Arthington his prophet of mercy and his prophet of judgment. Hacket was executed; Arthington recanted; Coppinger starved himself to death in jail." [SCOTT.]
40. Queen Elizabeth's birthnight. v. headnote, p. 122; n. 143, 412; 235, 1304, 1305.
44. A Fanatic lord mayor, etc. Cf. nn. 117, 585 and 130, 181.
50. "There is, etc. Preface to Ecclesiastical Polity, viii, 14.
- 161², 8. Maimbourg. The Histoire du Calvinisme of Louis Maimbourg had recently appeared, in 1682. Dryden later (1684), at the command of King Charles, translated the Histoire de la Ligue of the same writer.
59. Ingenious young gentleman. This person, as is known from a complimentary poem by Duke, was named Henry Dickinson. His translation of A Critical History of the Old Testament, from the French of Richard Simon, appeared in 1682. Père Simon was one of the leading biblical scholars of his time.
- 162, 1, 2. Stars: travelers. Apparently travelers is pronounced with a strong secondary accent on the last syllable. Then the rhyme will be of the type desert: art; cf. p. 931.
21. The Stagirite. Aristotle.
28. But vanish'd, etc. Cf. 77¹, 10.
43. Εὔρεκα. So 1683 ed.; the issues of 1682 read εὔρεκα; the correct form is εὕρηκα. The mistake and the meter indicate that Dryden was taught to accent Greek according to the Greek accents, instead of by the Latin rules, as is now usual in England. v. Notes and Queries, series VIII. vii. 451.
- 163, 76. Hast thou, etc. Cf. Job xi. 7, 8.
80. Those giant wits, etc. Christie thinks that the line was suggested by Virgil: cf. 605, 881, 882.
- 164, 193. Son's. On the pleonastic genitive, v. Sweet, New English Grammar, § 2010.
- 165, 213. Th' Egyptian bishop. Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria. Cf. 159¹.
- 224 n. Father Simon. v. n. 161², 59.
241. Junius and Tremellius. "Calvinistic divines of the sixteenth century, who made translations of the Scripture, with commentaries, on which Père Simon makes learned criticisms." [SCOTT.] Cf. 507¹, 16.
- 166, 283. 'T were worth, etc. In this line Testaments is probably to be read Test'ments; or the Creed may possibly be slurred to th' Creed.
291. *Esdra*s. v. 2 Esdras xiv.
312. Socinian. The Socinians were a sect founded in the sixteenth century by the Italians Lælius and Faustus Socinus. They rejected the doctrine of the Trinity, maintaining that Christ was only man, but man by a miraculous conception.
322. In gross. In general, without inquiring into details.
339. For best authority's next rules are best. This is the reading of the first three issues, and seems intelligible in the sense: "The nearest (cf. l. 340) rules of the best authority are best." C. and SS. both read: "For best authorities, next rules, are best." This is somewhat easier to interpret, but is not necessarily an improvement.
346. Arius and Pelagius. Arius, the great heretic of the fourth century, denied the doctrine of the Trinity, asserting that Christ was a created being. His doctrine was condemned, largely through the efforts of Athanasius, at the Council of Nicæa (Nice) in 325. Pelagius, in the next century, is said to have denied original sin and the necessity for internal divine grace, and asserted the entire freedom of the will, and man's perfectibility by his own unaided efforts.

167, 389. If they, etc. Cf. 130, 166.

392. The will produc'd. Cf. 230, 948, n.

419. The fly-blown text, etc. "Perhaps this idea is borrowed from Butler's Hudibras, iii. 2, ll. 1-12.

The learned write, an insect breeze
Is but a mongrel prince of bees,
That falls before a storm on crows,
And stings the founders of his house,
From whose corrupted flesh that breed
Of vermin did at first proceed.
So, ere the storm of war broke out,
Religion spawn'd a various rout
Of petulant capricious sects,
The maggots of corrupted texts,
That first run all religion down,
And after ev'ry swarm its own." [SCOTT.]

168, 456. Tom Sternhold's, etc. v. 143, 402, 403, n; headnote, p. 134; n. 134, 15.

POEMS INCLUDED IN MISCELLANY POEMS, 1684.

The editor has been unable to consult the second edition of this volume.

169¹, 31. Whelstone. v. 53¹, 8, n; and for the introduction of contemporary references into a translation from an ancient writer, cf. 98, 17, n; 196, 35, n.

169². AMARYLLIS. Upon this piece, and upon those on pp. 192-198, v. Pughe, John Drydens Übersetzungen aus Theokrit, Breslau, 1894.

171. PROLOGUE TO THE DISAPPOINTMENT. The 1684 edition of this play has not been accessible to the editor. The text has been collated with a copy made at the British Museum.

172¹, 38. The high dice, and the low. "Loaded dice, contrived some for high and others for low throws." SCOTT.

49. Brings her, etc. "Our author seems to copy himself in this passage. 'His old father in the country would have given him but little thanks for it, to see him bring down a fine-bred woman, with a lute, and a dressing box, and a handful of money to her portion.' The Wild Gallant, act iii, sc. 2." SCOTT.

172², 55, 56. But while, etc. Cf. 900, 41, 42.

58. Our middle galleries. Cf. 154, 12, n.

3. Arius. Lee made Arius the villain of his play: cf. 166, 346, n.

4. A True Protestant. Cf. 124¹, 40, n, and heading to Mac Flecknoe, p. 134.

5. Eusebius. The historian of the Christian Church, who flourished about 300.

8. Trimmer. v. n. 120, 882. In this epilogue Dryden apparently uses the word loosely, as equivalent to Whig.

Addressing Tory. Tories who presented to the king addresses in which they expressed their abhorrence of the acts of the Petitioners. v. n. 112, 179.

10. When Clause was king, etc. This alludes to the rejoicing of the beggars when Clause is chosen their king: v. Fletcher's Beggars' Bush, act ii, sc. 1.

173¹, 22. Teckelites. "The severity of the Austrian government, in Hungary particularly, towards those who dissented from the Roman Catholic faith, occasioned several insurrections. The most memorable was headed by Count Teckely, who allied himself with the Sultan, assumed the crown of Transylvania as a vassal of the Porte, and joined with a considerable force the large army of Turks which besieged Vienna. A similarity of situation and of interest induced the Whig party in England to look with a favorable eye upon this Hungarian insurgent, and they hence gained the nickname of Teckelites." [SCOTT.]

28. Nose. The 1702 ed. reads noise.

32. The last plot. Possibly the Rye House Plot (1683), but more likely the Whig Combination of the same year, for participation in which Lord Russell was executed. The first plot (l. 33) is of course the Popish Plot.

173². TO THE EARL OF ROSCOMMON. Roscommon had prefixed a commendatory poem to the 1683 issue of Religio Laici, so that Dryden is now returning a compliment.

Pope praised Roscommon in the famous couplet:

Unhappy Dryden! — In all Charles's days
Roscommon only boasts unspotted bays.

First Epistle of the Second Book of Horace, 213, 214.

Dryden's spelling here and elsewhere is Roscomon.

14. Tinkled in the close. Christie notes that Marvell had used the expression tinkling rhyme in his verses On Paradise Lost. By his dispraise of rhyme Dryden delicately flatters Roscommon, who in his Essay had advanced similar opinions; cf. n. 178¹, 16.

174¹, 35. Need. In the sense of are needed.

36. His own example, etc. Roscommon translated from Virgil, Eclogue vi, and from Horace, Odes i. 22 and iii. 6, and the Art of Poetry.

41. How much, etc. "Roscommon, it must be remembered, was born in Ireland, where his property also was situated. But the Dillons were of English extraction." SCOTT.

47. Werc. Ed. 1 reads was, a misprint of which Dryden complains in a letter to Jonson, where he also writes: "For my Lord Roscommon's Essay, I am of your opinion that you should reprint it, and that you may safely venture on a thousand more."

60. An English peer. Ed. 1 reads a British Peer. For the reference, v. p. 96. Roscommon had complimented Mulgrave at the opening of his Essay; cf. 179¹, 47, n.

174², 67. Sand. Both early editions place a full stop after this word.

72. Who both. Ed. 1 reads, He both.

74. Infus'd Titan. Prometheus: for the legend, v. 388, 97-112; 414, 22, n. Christie points out that Dryden is indebted to Juvenal, xiv. 34, 35:

Forstam hæc spernant juvenes, quibus arte benigna
Et meliore luto finxit præcordia Titan.

9. Thus Nisus, etc. v. 583, 373-441.

175, 23. Marcellus. A reference to Virgil's celebrated tribute to the nephew of Augustus, the young Marcellus, who died in his twentieth year: v. 609, 1188-1226.

POEMS INCLUDED IN SYLVÆ, 1685. The editor has been unable to consult the second edition of this volume. The motto is Æneid, vi. 143, 144: cf. 596, 215, 216. In the letter quoted Dryden refers to Montaigne, livre iii, ch. 5, Sur des Vers de Virgile. (The editor is here indebted to Professor C. H. C. Wright, of Harvard University.)

175¹, 5 (prose). History of the League. v. n. 161¹, 8.

176¹, 10. Lord Roscommon's Essay, etc. v. 173², n.

27. Dutch commentator. Dryden's dilettante patronizing of men like Franciscus Dousa and Daniel and Nikolaus Heinsius reminds one of certain literary critics of the present day.

176², 8. Our Oglebys. v. 135, 102, n; 748², 40-46.

177¹, 8. A late noble painter. Sir Peter Lely (1618-80), the court painter of Charles II.

50. Hand-gallop. An easy gallop, in which the horse is kept well in hand.

51. Carpet-ground. Ground smooth as a carpet; cf. 310², 11.

52. Synalephas. v. 385².

177², 5. My definition of poetical wit. "From that which has been said, it may be collected that the definition of wit . . . is only this: that it is a propriety of thoughts and words; or, in other terms, thoughts and words elegantly adapted to the subject." The Author's Apology for Heroic Poetry, prefixed to The State of Innocence (1677): v. SS. v. 124.

Dryden really took this idea from Rapin:

"La vertu la plus essentielle au discours, après la clarté, c'est la pudeur et la modestie, comme remarque Demetrius le Phaléréen. Il faut, dit-il, de la proportion entre les paroles et les choses: et rien n'est plus ridicule que de traiter un petit sujet d'un grand style: parce que ce qui est disproportionné, est ou tout-à-fait faux, ou du moins badin et puerile." Reflexions sur la Poétique, part I, § 30.

The source for Rapin is Demetrius Phalereus, De Elocutione, 120: "Fitness must be observed, whatever the subject; or in other words the style must be appropriate, — subdued for humble topics, lofty for high themes." (Roberts's translation.)

18. Hannibal Caro Lived 1507-66: on his translation, cf. 513², 14-19.

23. Tasso, etc. "Not in a letter, but at the end of the first of his Discorsi dell' Arte Poetica." KER.

178¹, 16. Lord Roscommon, etc.

O may I live to hail the glorious day,
And sing loud peans through the crowded way,
When in triumphant state the British Muse,
True to herself, shall barb'rous aid [i. e. rhyme] refuse,
And in the Roman majesty appear,
Which none know better, and none come so near.

Essay on Translated Verse.

26. Breakings. Dryden may use breaking as equivalent to cæsura (metrical pause), but more likely as hiatus (the use of a word ending in a vowel before one beginning with a vowel, without elision): cf. 512¹, 15-35, where Dryden incorrectly uses cæsura in the sense of elision.

44. When Lausus died, etc. The text reads When Lausus fell; v. 927, 226, and cf. 671, 1299, 1300.

178², 29. Our poet and philosopher of Malmesbury. Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679).

179², 47. Essay on Poetry. By the Earl of Mulgrave; cf. 490. Roscommon's Essay begins:

Happy that author, whose correct Essay
Repairs so well our old Horatian way.

Roscommon also, in the same Essay, condemns indecent verses.

180¹, 17. Viper. v. 188, 26. The editor has naturally let the verse stand as the printer left it.

23. Non ego, etc. Ars Poet. 351-353.

But in a poem elegantly writ
I would not quarrel with a slight mistake,
Such as our nature's frailty may excuse.

Roscommon's Translation.

41. Translator of Lucretius. Thomas Creech (1659-1700), whose Lucretius appeared in 1682: cf. 920². "In his translation he omitted the indecible part of the Fourth Book, a deficiency which Dryden thought fit to supply, for which he has above assigned some very inadequate reasons." [SCOTT.]

181¹, 1. His satires, etc. Contrast Dryden's later verdict, pp. 307-316, which is in favor of Juvenal.

4. Any part. Ed. 1 reads no part, but the mistake is corrected in the errata.

8. As difficult, etc. HORACE, Odes, iv. 2. 1-4.

26. Curiosa felicitas. "The felicity gained through diligence." PETRONIUS, Sat. 118.

27. Felicitur audere. "To be happily bold:" v. HORACE, 2 Epistles, i. 166.

33. One ode, etc. v. 199. The present Earl of Rochester was Laurence Hyde: v. 120, 888, n. Dryden distinguishes him from the nobleman mentioned in B. S. xxii, xxv, xxvi.

45. Mr. Cowley. For Dryden's varying estimate of this author, v. 91; 283²; 320¹; 514¹, 53 f; 517²; 744¹, 53 f.

181², 36. Quod nequeo, etc. "What I cannot express, but only feel;" adapted from Juvenal, vii. 56, Hunc qualem nequeo monstrare et sentio tantum.

48. Fungar, etc. HORACE, Ars Poet. 304, 305.

But I must rest contented as I am,
And only serve to whet that wit in you,
To which I willingly resign my claim.

Roscommon's Translation.

185, 138. Store. Ed. 1 places a comma after this word, and a semicolon after more in the next line.

188, 26. The viper, etc. Cf. 180¹, 17.

191, 218. Neither. Possibly a misprint for neither's, as Saintsbury suggests.

253. Nor pierces, etc. "Notice here, what is very unusual in Dryden, an Alexandrine couplet." SAINTSBURY.

260. Who after, match'd, etc. Ed. 1 reads, Who, after match'd, which may possibly be correct. But cf. 180¹, 14-16.

- 192¹, 18. Hand supplies. Ed. 1 reads, Hands supplies.
- 193, 72. Beauties. Ed. 1 reads beauties, which may mean beauty's.
- THEOCRITUS: IDYLLIUM THE TWENTY-THIRD. This piece and the following are probably not by Theocritus.
- 196, 35. Queen Elizabeth. For the introduction of the modern allusion, cf. 98, 17, n; 169¹, 31, n; 199¹, 40; 324, 122; 367, 126.
44. Scarecrow. Ed. 1 reads scar Crow.
- 197, 82. Menalcas. Ed. 1 reads Menelaus, by a ludicrous misprint. The following words apparently mean: "He is a plain yeoman, not Master Menalcas." [SAINTSBURY.] 198. The Earl of Roscommon. v. 173.
- 199¹, 32. Pointed. For the word, cf. 478, 152.
- HORACE, THE TWENTY-NINTH ODE, etc. v. 181¹, 33, n.
- 199², 40. The new Lord May'r, etc. Cf. 152, 1135, n. Dryden inserts political allusions even into his translations. Cf. 98, 17, n; 196, 35, n.
- 201, 14. Trimmer. v. n. 120, 882.
202. THE FAIR STRANGER. The original edition does not separate or number the stanzas.
- 203². SONG. In the text of this song in the Second Part of Miscellany Poems, 1716, lines 3, 4; 7, 8; 9, 10; 13, 14; 15, 16; 18, 19 form single lines. That text furnishes the following variant readings: l. 5, so frequent a Fire; l. 14, and all my; l. 16, so faithful, so faithful a Lover; l. 18, I'll die, I'll die, I'll die. The 1704 text is reprinted without change in the second edition, 1716, of The Fifth Part of Miscellany Poems.
203. THRENODIA AUGUSTALIS. Of the first edition of this poem there were two issues, both of which are owned by the Harvard Library. One of them (the later) is in larger type than the other. The second edition, as a careful comparison has shown, was apparently printed from the same type as the later issue of the first, without resetting, but with a few corrections of the text, apparently due to Dryden himself. The variations between the two issues of the first edition are very minute. The principal ones are as follows: l. 70 (small type) sat, (large type and ed. 2) sate; l. 125 (sm.) then they, (l. and ed. 2) that they; l. 232 (sm.) in which, (l. and ed. 2) on which; l. 259 (sm.) inexhausting, (l. and ed. 2) inexhausted; l. 484 (sm.) The best, (l.) There best, (ed. 2) Their best.
- The text in Poems and Translations, 1701 (ed. 3), disregards Dryden's corrections and restores the readings of the later issue of ed. 1, from which it was evidently set up. But v. n. 206, 188.
- The motto of the poem is Aeneid, ix. 446, 447; cf. 646, 597, 598.
- 204, 7. Niobe. Niobe, stricken with grief for the loss of her children, who were slain by Apollo and Artemis, was turned into stone.
22. No sickness, etc. Charles, who had always been in the best of health, was taken seriously ill on the morning of February 2.
28. This now, etc. Cf. 275, 306.
31. The flaming wall. Christie cites flammanitia mœnia mundi, "the flaming walls of the world" (Lucretius, i. 73).
36. Our Atlas, etc. "Alluding to the fable of Hercules supporting the heavenly sphere when Atlas was fatigued." SCOTT.
70. An iron slumber. Christie cites Virgil's ferreus somnus (Aeneid, x. 745).
80. Heav'n, etc. On February 5, according to Macaulay, the London Gazette announced that the physicians thought Charles out of danger.
- 205, 100. The first, etc. "A very ill-timed sarcasm on those who petitioned Charles to call his parliament." SCOTT. v. n. 112, 179.
- Christie remarks: "The line must mean that these were the first rude petitioners who were well-meaning."
106. His death, etc. v. 2 Kings xx. 1-11; but the parallel is by no means exact.
126. Friends, etc. Eds. 1 and 3 read:
- Each to congratulate his friend made haste.
150. The laboring moon. Cf. 342, 571, 572.
- "When the moon was eclipsed, it was supposed that magicians and witches were endeavoring to bring her down from heaven to aid them in their enchantments, and that she could be relieved from her sufferings by loud noises, beating of brass, sounding of trumpets, &c., to drown the voices of the enchanters." J. D. LEWIS, note on Juvenal, vi. 442.
153. On liking. "To engage on liking (an image rather too familiar for the occasion) is to take a temporary trial of a service, or business, with license to quit it at pleasure." [SCOTT.]
- 206, 164. Never was losing. Eds. 1 and 3 read Was never losing.
173. Th' extremest ways, etc. "The patient was bled largely. Hot iron was applied to his head. A loathsome volatile salt, extracted from human skulls, was forced into his mouth." MACAULAY.
188. Even Short himself. So eds. 1 and 2; ed. 3 reads Even Short and Hobbs. On this Christie well remarks: "Hobbes was a surgeon of eminence at the time of Dryden's death, and had attended Dryden in his last illness; but there is no other known mention of him among the medical men who attended the bedside of Charles II. This is a very suspicious change of the text in Tonson's volume of 1701." As a further proof that the change was not made by Dryden, it may be noted that in the preceding line (187) he remains in the text of ed. 3, but is altered to They in the errata.
- "Dr. Thomas Short was a Catholic and a Tory. To this circumstance he probably owes the compliment paid him by our author." [SCOTT.]
236. Exile. Referring to the duke's enforced absence from England during the excitement over the Popish Plot: cf. 133¹, 22, n.
239. That king, etc. v. 1 Kings ii. 1-9, where David charges his successor Solomon to take vengeance on certain of his enemies.

- 207, 244. Those, etc. A glance at Monmouth, of whom Charles made no mention when on his deathbed.
267. Camillus. Camillus, the Roman general who conquered Veii, went into exile rather than submit to an unjust fine.
288. Still voice. Eds. 1 and 3 read still Sound. For the reference, v. 1 Kings xix. 12.
311. Succession, etc. v. n. 110, 18.
327. Clio. The Muse of History.
- 208, 353. Out of, etc. Cf. 40, 639, n.
354. Geneva weeds. Referring of course to the influence of Calvinism in England. The Presbyterian clergy were driven from the Church of England by the Act of Uniformity of 1662.
364. As when, etc. Dryden had already used this comparison in his Verses to the Duchess: v. 27, 52-57.
371. Choir, like. Ed. 2 reads Quire like; eds. 1 and 3 read Quire of.
372. The Muse, etc. v. Astræa Redux, p. 7.
377. Tho' little, etc. v. 238, 1541, n.
388. Thou Fabius, etc. A reference to Q. Fabius Maximus, the Roman general who, continually avoiding a combat, thwarted Hannibal by his policy of delay. Dryden's praise of the king's statecraft is just. He overcame Shaftesbury and the Whigs by yielding at critical moments and awaiting a change of the public temper.
- 209, 421. For twelve, etc. Charles had been king de jure since the execution of his father, January 30, 1649; he returned to England king de facto on May 25, 1660, and was crowned on April 23 of the next year. Dryden's arithmetic is not quite exact.
430. Long exercis'd by fate. Christie cites Virgil's Iliadis exerceat fatis (Æneid, iii. 182); cf. 554, 243.
435. False heroes, etc. For a similar passage, v. 221, 251-262.
441. The Cyclops, etc. v. 632, 633, 579-596.
447. Alcides. Hercules, the son of Jupiter and Alcmena. In his infancy he strangled two serpents sent against him by the jealous Juno; in maturity, one of his labors was to overcome the Lernean hydra; after his death he was numbered among the gods.
456. Legitimately. In reference to the defeat of the aspirations of the Duke of Monmouth, the illegitimate son of Charles II.
465. As after, etc. Numa was really followed by the martial Tullus Hostilius. Ancus Martius (hence, probably, Dryden's blunder), who succeeded Tullus, led the Romans against the Latins.
494. Strong. Eds. 1 and 3 read great.
- 210, 517. The fasces of the main. v. 10, 249, n. PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO ALBION AND ALBANUS. This opera celebrates the triumph of the royal brothers, Charles and James, over their Whig adversaries. — The editor has been unable to consult the broadside text of the prologue and epilogue.
3. John Ketches. The name of John Ketch (d. 1686), who seems to have been public executioner from 1663 to his death, has become a nickname for his successors in office. Cf. 156¹, 30; 313², 46.
6. Oates. v. 117, 632, n. In May, 1685, Oates was sentenced to so terrific a flogging that it is a wonder he survived. He was reported to have bribed the executioner to inflict the punishment lightly.
- 211¹, 4. Plain Dealing. "From this epilogue we learn, what is confirmed by many proofs elsewhere, that the attribute for which James desired to be distinguished and praised, was that of openness of purpose, and stern, undeviating inflexibility of conduct. He forgot that it was only the temporizing concessions of his brother which secured his way to the throne, when his exclusion, or a civil war, seemed the only alternatives." [SCOTT.] Contrast Dryden's praise of Charles, 208, 388-398, n.
- 211². TO MY FRIEND, MR. J. NORTHLEIGH. These verses have been collated with a copy of the first edition, made at the Bodleian Library. — For the scriptural references, v. Genesis xli. 25-36, 1 Kings iii. 16-28, and The History of Susanna (in the Apocrypha). In the last case there is of course a sarcastic reference to the Presbyterian party.
- TO MRS. ANNE KILLIGREW. The first edition of this poem has the following variant readings: (12) be thy place; (124) gave Shape unto the Name; (128) King the Eye; (139-141):
- As in that Day she took from Sacred hands
The 'Crown; 'mong num'rous Heroins was seen,
More yet in Beauty, than in Rank, the Queen!
- (148) their Progress. Mrs. (Mistress) was in Dryden's time applied both to married and to unmarried women.
- 212, 26. Thy father, etc. Henry Killigrew had written a tragedy, The Conspiracy, published in 1638, and "reprinted in a revised form in 1653, under the title of Pallantus and Eudora." (WARD.)
43. In trine. Cf. 50, 1165, n.
50. And if, etc. An allusion to the fable that bees rested on the lips of the infant Plato.
68. Arethusian. Arethusa was the nymph of a famous well on the island of Ortygia, near Syracuse: cf. 439, 1-7.
- 213, 79. Her father's life. Other writers do not concur in this praise of Henry Killigrew.
82. Epictetus. Dryden apparently confuses Epictetus with Diogenes, who is said to have lit a lantern in the daytime, explaining: "I am looking for a man."
128. Our martial king. James II.
134. Our Phoenix queen. "Mary of Este, as eminent for beauty as rank." [SCOTT.] She had been crowned Queen of England on April 23, 1685.
- 214, 147. To such, etc. Cf. the motto from Martial quoted in the headnote: "For extraordinary beings life is short and old age rare."
162. Orinda. "Mrs. Katherine Philips (1631-64), whom the affectation of her age called Orinda." [Scott.] Her talents as a poetess were praised by Cowley and other eminent men, and, what is important in the present connection, by Anne Killigrew, who addressed some verses to her. Both Mrs. Philips and Anne Killigrew died of the smallpox.

165. Her warlike brother. Henry Killigrew (d. 1712), a captain in the navy, who later became admiral.

180. The Valley of Jehosaphat. v. Joel iii. 2.

A LETTER TO SIR GEORGE ETHEREGE. On Etherege's life, and the date of this Letter, v. Gosse, Seventeenth Century Studies.

2. As map informs. The latitude of Ratisbon is really about 49°: Dryden has followed a mistaken statement of Etherege in his letter to Middleton. The jests that follow are in reply to the same letter.

215. 28. What region, etc. A reference to Virgil's line:

Quæ regio in terris nostri non plena laboris.
Æneid, i. 460.

30. Triptolemus. Ceres gave a chariot drawn by dragons and laden with wheat to her favorite Triptolemus, who rode in it over the earth, spreading among men a knowledge of agriculture.

47. Three holy miter'd Hectors. The three ecclesiastical electors were the archbishops of Treves, Cologne, and Mainz. These, with five temporal lords (the Count Palatine and the rulers of Bohemia, Bavaria, Saxony, and Brandenburg), constituted at this time the college of Electors.

49. Is sunk. The 1702 ed. reads is drunk; the correction is made in the following (fourth) edition of Sylva (1716).

73. The Duke St. Aignan. François de Beauvilliers (1610?-87), a favorite of Louis XIV. A play called Bradamante was attributed to him. — The spelling of the original edition is St. Agnon.

75. His Grace of Bucks. v. B. S. xxi. The Rehearsal is said to have been begun about 1663, though it was acted only in 1671.

7. Bauble. "A truncheon, with a fool's head and cap upon one end. It was carried by the ancient jester." [Scott.]

216. 22. Your author's principle. v. 354, 533-561.

THE HIND AND THE PANTHER. Ed. 3 of this poem usually agrees with ed. 2; its readings, therefore, are ordinarily not recorded here.

The first line of the motto is from Æneid, iii. 96: "Seek your ancient mother;" cf. 552, 127. The second is from Æneid, i. 405: "The true goddess was made known by her stately movement;" cf. 529, 561.

This poem produced a famous and truly humorous reply: The Hind and the Panther transvers'd to the Story of the Country Mouse and the City Mouse, by two young wits, Charles Montagu and Matthew Prior. In it Mr. Bayes and the two gentlemen of The Rehearsal were again brought to life.

Professor Williams's excellent commentary on this poem has assisted the editor in many cases not directly indicated in the following notes. Several of the references cited are due to it. A paper by B. Vildhaut, Dryden's Fable of The Hind and The Panther (Lüdinghausen, 1876), in general of very small value, has given hints for the notes on ll. 1550, 2190.

To the Reader. During the early part of his reign James II showed no tolerance for Protestant Dissenters, and tried to carry out his designs in behalf of the Catholic religion by the aid of his Tory Church of England subjects, who professed the doctrine of passive obedience. He disregarded in behalf of Catholics alone the Test Act of 1673, which excluded from office all men who refused to declare their disbelief in the doctrine of transubstantiation, and to receive the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England. This had hitherto banished every honest Catholic, and most of the Dissenters, from any position under the government, but had not affected some of the less strenuous Dissenters. (The Test Act of 1678, which required of all members of parliament an oath professing disbelief in transubstantiation, but did not require the taking of the sacrament according to the Anglican rites, was aimed against Catholics alone.) Finding that he could not win the support of the Church of England for his dispensing power, James turned for help to the Dissenters, and on April 4, 1687, issued a Declaration of Indulgence, suspending the Test Act and all penal laws against both Catholics and Dissenters, and giving to both the freedom of public worship. By this he hoped to gain the Dissenters to his own side. But the more clear-headed among them saw that this temporary indulgence was only a political trick, and refused to be duped by it.

Dryden in this poem, planned and written while James was carrying out his earlier policy, breathes a spirit of hostility to the dissenting sects, such as the Wolf, the Bear, and the Fox. He hopes for a reconciliation of the Church of England with the Catholic Church (v. 222, 327-330; 244, 245, 1964-2049). The Declaration of Indulgence, issued only a week before The Hind and the Panther was licensed for the press, probably startled Dryden as much as it did the rest of the nation not in the king's confidence. In this prose preface he adapts himself to changed circumstances, praises toleration, and censures those who refused to accept it from a Catholic king. Cf. n. 245, 2090.

216², 22 (prose). I hope, etc. "Most readers will, I think, acknowledge with me the extreme awkwardness with which Dryden apologises for hoping well of those sectaries against whom he had so often discharged the utmost severity of his pen." [Scott.]

217¹, 1. 'T is not, etc. Referring to Louis XIV's revocation, in 1685, of the Edict of Nantes of 1598, which had secured religious freedom in France. A severe persecution of the Huguenots followed.

7. That he has, etc. Scott points out that a similar phrase is found in an actual address of the period.
28. Classical ordination. Ordination by a classis or presbytery; cf. n. 220, 180.
38. Cyrus. v. Ezra i. 1-4.
41. In specie. In kind.
- 217², 1. 'T is evident, etc. In 1685 and 1686 King James ordered published two papers in defense of the Catholic religion, said to have been written by King Charles II, and to have been found in his strong box, and a third paper, said to be by Anne, Duchess of York, the first wife of King James, telling how she came to adopt the same faith. An anonymous Answer to these papers soon appeared, of which Stillingfleet, a learned Church of England divine, was the principal author. This occasioned a Defense of the Papers, in the last division of which, concerning the paper of the Duchess of York, Dryden was concerned. Stillingfleet and his coadjutors then returned to the charge with A Vindication of the Answer to some late Papers (1687), to which Dryden here refers under the title Answer to the Defense of the late King's Papers. Cf. 237, 1454, n.
12. Socrates's. So ed. 1; eds. 2 and 3 read Socrate's.
19. Treatise of Humility. At the end of his Defense Dryden had written: "In the mean time, the spirit of meekness and humble charity would become our author better than his boasts for this imaginary victory . . . but it is the less to be admired that he is such a stranger to that spirit, because, among all the volumes of divinity written by the Protestants, there is not one original treatise, at least that I have ever seen or heard of, which has handled distinctly, and by itself, that Christian virtue of humility." This Stillingfleet terms "a bare-faced assertion of a thing well known to be false, since within a few years such a book hath been published in London." Stillingfleet referred without doubt to A Practical Discourse of Humility, by William Allen, London, 1681. Dryden confuses this with a magnified piece of Duncomb, which turned out to be a translation from the Spanish Jesuit Alonso Rodriguez. Of Duncomb's work the editor can learn nothing: the British Museum Catalogue mentions "A Treatise of Humilitie, translated [by T. B.] into English" from Rodriguez, Rouen, 1631.
33. Matter of fact. Dryden echoes a phrase of Stillingfleet at the opening of the Answer to the Defense of the Third Paper, which concludes his Vindication: "I have now done as to matter of reason and argument: the third paper chiefly relates to matter of fact." But by matter of fact Stillingfleet does not refer to the mere question of the reality of the duchess's conversion. v. Stillingfleet, Vindication, page 102 (SS. xvii. 255). Cf. n. 239, 1604.
42. Mrs. James. Eleanor James, a printer's wife who had published a pamphlet called Mrs. James's Vindication of the Church of England.
- 218, 1. Hind. The Catholic Church. Professor Williams points out that Dryden may have been influenced by scriptural passages such as Genesis xlix. 21; 2 Samuel xxii. 34; Proverbs v. 19.
6. Scythian shafts. "The Scythians tip their arrows with vipers' poison and human blood: for this frightful mixture there is no remedy; it brings death immediately at a slight touch." PLINY, Natural History, xi. 53 (115). Professor Williams cites Ovid's Scythica sagitta (Met. x. 588).
13. Of these, etc. "The Roman Catholic priests executed in England at different times since the Reformation, and regarded as martyrs and saints by those of their communion." SCOTT.
14. Caledonian wood. "Not Scottish, but taken generally for Britain, as Hercynian wood might be for Germany." SAINTSBURY.
15. Vocal blood. Cf. Genesis iv. 10.
19. So captive Israel, etc. v. Exodus i. 7-14.
35. Bear. The Independents, (the predecessors of the modern Congregationalists,) who rejected all ecclesiastical authority above that of the individual congregation, and discarded most forms and ceremonies. Cf. 886, 559-562.
37. Hare. The Quakers, who refused to take oaths of any sort, being guided by Matthew v. 34.
39. Ape. The Freethinkers. "The Earl of Sunderland, one of the principal ministers under Charles II and James II, was supposed to hold such opinions, for he made his change to Popery without even the form of previous instruction or conference. Dryden probably intended a sarcasm at him or some such time-serving courtier, for his occasional conformity with the royal faith, of which there were several instances at the time." [SCOTT.]
- To this Christie replies: "Dryden would hardly wish to offend any Roman Catholic convert, and he was not at all likely at this time to run a risk of offending Sunderland, who was in power. He had flatteringly dedicated Troilus and Cressida to Sunderland in 1679." Finally, Sunderland apparently did not become a Catholic until many months after the date of this poem: v. H. C. Foxcroft, Life of Halifax, i. 508.
41. Lion. The King of England.
43. Boar. The Anabaptists. The sect originated in Germany, where their early history is connected with a revolt of the peasantry. In 1534 they seized the city of Münster, where their rule (ending in June, 1535) was marked by many excesses, which brought the sect into disrepute. The Baptists were severely persecuted in England: some of the Independent congregations seem to have held Baptist views.
44. But whiten'd, etc. "The foam of sanctity refers to the Anabaptist dogma that every true believer attains in this life perfect freedom from sin." WILLIAMS.

53. Reynard. Dryden chooses the Fox for his symbol of the Unitarians: v. nn. 166, 312, 346. The Socinians had had much success in Poland, but had been driven out from the country by a law of 1658. Some of the refugees had been well received by Count Teckely. v. 220, 150-152; 173¹, 22, n.
61. Hence, etc. Cf. 700, 838.
- 219, 71. Whom thou, etc. Cf. n. 226, 675.
72. My thoughtless youth, etc. v. B. S. xxxii.
80. Can I believe, etc. "The Protestant divines took a distinction; and, while they admitted they were obliged to surrender their human judgment in matters of divine revelation which were above their reason, they asserted the power of appealing to its guidance in those things of a finite nature which depend on the evidence of sense, and the consequent privilege of rejecting any doctrine which, being within the sphere of human comprehension, is nevertheless repugnant to the understanding; therefore, while they received the doctrine of the Trinity as an infinite mystery, far above their reason, they contended against that of transubstantiation as capable of being tried by human faculties, and as contradicted by an appeal to them." [SCOTT.]
95. Penetrating parts. This means, as Christie states, "penetrating the parts of matter, instead of separating them. Matter is impenetrable by matter." (Cf. 274, 252.) Impenetrability, in physics, is defined by Webster as "that property in virtue of which two portions of matter cannot at the same time occupy the same portion of space." Dryden illustrates by a reference to John xx. 19, 24-29; and argues that as Christ's body penetrated the closed doors of the room where the disciples were gathered, so it could penetrate the elements of the consecrated host.
121. Proponent. Eds. 1 and 3 have a comma after this word; ed. 2 omits the comma, probably by a misprint, thereby converting proponent into an adjective. Christie, followed by C. D. (under proponent), adopts the reading of ed. 2.
134. Could he, etc. Contrast 111, 118-121.
- 220, 153. Wolf. The Presbyterians.
163. His ragged tail. The Geneva gown of the Presbyterian clergy. — Their close-cropped hair and black skull cap made their ears prominent; to which fact, and to the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, Dryden refers in l. 165.
168. Tho' fear'd, etc. A reference to the temporary power of the Presbyterian party in the days of the Long Parliament, as captain, and under Cromwell, as companion of the spoil.
- 170-173. Full many . . . France. Christie's explanation of this vague passage seems the most natural: Dryden, having styled the Presbyterians wolves, applies to them a story told by William of Malmesbury of King Edgar (about 973): "He designed to exterminate every beast of prey from his kingdom; and commanded Judwall, King of the Welsh, to pay him yearly a tribute of three hundred wolves. This he performed for three years, but omitted in the fourth, declaring that he could find no more." Dryden next identifies them with Wycliffe's brood, who first resisted ecclesiastical authority in mediæval England, and supposes that the last Wycliffite, escaping persecution, started the Swiss reform movement. This is confused enough, but admissible for the purposes of satire. Scott, however, sees in the first two lines a reference to the story told by Bede, of the destruction (about 603) of twelve hundred Welsh monks of Bangor, as a punishment for their resistance to St. Augustine, and refusal to acknowledge him as their archbishop.
177. Antipathy to kings. Wycliffe, as Professor Williams notes, was accused of complicity in the rising of Wat Tyler.
180. Zuinglius. Ulric Zwingli (1484-1531) began to preach a reformed religion in Switzerland in 1516. John Calvin (1509-64) spent his life after 1536 for the most part in Geneva. The latter, in his Institutes, gave clear form to the presbyterian organization of church government, according to which ecclesiastical authority rests in a presbytery (otherwise called classis or class, l. 189), or assembly of presbyters (elders).
182. In Israel, etc. Dryden in the following lines draws on a work by Peter Heylyn, first published in 1670, Aërius Redivivus; or, The History of the Presbyterians, containing . . . their Oppositions to Monarchical and Episcopal Government . . . and their Imbroilments of the Kingdoms and Estates of Christendom in the Pursuit of their Designs. In his preface Heylyn writes: "I know that some out of pure zeal unto the cause would fain intitle them to a descent from the Jewish Sanhedrim, ordained by God himself in the time of Moses. And that it might comply the better with their ends and purposes, they have endeavored to make that famous consistory of the seventy elders not only a coördinate power with that of Moses, and after his decease with that of Moses, and princes of that state in this public government, but a power paramount and supreme, from which lay no appeal to any but to God himself; a power by which they were enabled not only to control the actions of their kings and princes, but also to correct their persons." Heylyn denies that the Sanhedrim had any such authority, but adds: "And yet I shall not grutch them an antiquity as great as that which they desire, as great as that of Moses or the Jewish Sanhedrim." He then sarcastically attributes the origin of Presbyterianism to the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram against Moses and Aaron (Numbers xvi. 1-35); a hint which Dryden follows in ll. 184-189.
189. Class. Cf. 217¹, 28, n; n. 220, 180.
197. O happy pair, etc. Cf. 160, 161, nn.
204. Your native kennel, etc. The citizens of Geneva had been under the temporal as well as the ecclesiastical authority of a bishop. But, after they adopted the reformed religion (1535), their city, famous as the home of Calvin, was regarded as the cradle of Presbyterianism. As they made choice of a republican form of government, our author infers that democracy is most congenial to their new form of religion. — The territories of the little state were bounded by its ramparts and the lake, which Dryden contemptuously calls a puddle. [Scott.] Professor Williams, with more probability, interprets the wall as the Alps

209. Tweed. Scotland. "If Dryden had looked to his own times, he would have seen that the Scottish Presbyterians made a very decided stand for monarchy after the death of Charles I; and even such as were engaged in the conspiracy of Baillie of Jerviswood, which was in some respects the counterpart of the Rye House Plot, refused to take arms, because they suspected that the intentions of Sidney, and others of the party in England, were to establish a commonwealth." [Scott.]

210. Effects. Ed. 1 reads affects.

211. Drawn, etc. v. 112, 227, n.

212. As, where, etc. Cf 872, 873, 1-45, and 241, 1806, n.

221, 222. Dogs, etc. Professor Williams aptly quotes from Lyly's Euphues (ed Arber, p. 61): "The dog . . . eateth grasse and findeth remedy."

235. From Celtic woods, etc. This probably refers back to ll 170, 171, though Scott, Christie, and Williams think that there is an allusion to the persecution of the Huguenots in France: cf. n. 217¹, 1. The whole passage, through l. 307, refers undoubtedly, as Professor Williams suggests, to "the partial toleration granted in Scotland, February, 1687."

"A few days later James made his first hesitating and ungracious advances towards the Puritans. He had determined to begin with Scotland, where his power to dispense with acts of parliament had been admitted by the obsequious Estates. On February 12, accordingly, was published at Edinburgh a proclamation granting relief to scrupulous consciences. Even in the very act of making concessions to the Presbyterians, James could not conceal the loathing with which he regarded them. The toleration given to the Catholics was complete. But the indulgence vouchsafed to the Presbyterians, who constituted the great body of the Scottish people, was clogged by conditions which made it almost worthless. For the old test, which excluded Catholics and Presbyterians alike from office, was substituted a new test, which admitted the Catholics, but excluded most of the Presbyterians. The Catholics were allowed to build chapels, and even to carry the host in procession anywhere except in the high streets of royal burghs; but the Presbyterians were interdicted from worshipping God anywhere but in private dwellings: they were not to presume to build meetinghouses: they were not even to use a barn or an outhouse for religious exercises; and it was distinctly notified to them that, if they dared to hold conventicles in the open air, the law which denounced death against both preachers and hearers, should be enforced without mercy. Any Catholic priest might say mass, but the privy council was directed to see that no Presbyterian minister presumed to preach without a special license from the government. Every line of this instrument, and of the letters by which it was accompanied, shows how much it cost the king to relax in the smallest degree the rigor with which he had ever treated the old enemies of his house." MACAULAY, ch. vii (abridged).

271. Coronation day. "Which is usually distinguished by an act of grace, or general pardon." Scott.

280. And blood, etc. v. Genesis iv 1-10.

283. The mighty hunter. Nimrod. v. Genesis x. 9.

284. The blessed Pan. Jesus Christ. In the glosse on the Shepherd's Calendar for May, Spenser explains great Pan of his text as follows: "Great Pan is Christ, the very God of all shepherds, which calleth himselfe the greates and good shepherd." The gloss further explains that the idea originated in a connection that was made between the crucifixion of Christ, and a story told by Plutarch in his treatise, Why the Oracles Cease to Give Answers.

289. British Lion James II.

222, 321 Shards. Here undoubtedly in the sense of dung, found in provincial English: v. E. D. D. under cowshard.

326. To them, etc. "In Scotland, large conventicles were held in the mountains and morasses by the fiercest of the Covenanters, whom persecution had driven frantic. These men, known now by the name of Cameronians, considered popery and prelacy as synonymous terms" [Scott.]

327. Panther. The Church of England.

338. The Wolf, etc. v. n. 237, 1454.

339. Tho' unpolluted, etc. Christie notes a resemblance to Juvenal, xiii. 209, 210: "He who meditates any secret wickedness within himself incurs the guilt of the deed."

342. Spirits of a middle sort. Professor Williams cites in illustration:

Those argant fields more likely habitants,
Translated Saints, or middle Spirits hold,
Betwixt the angelical and human kind.

Paradise Lost, iii. 460-462.

344. Down. So ed. 1: eds. 2 and 3 read done

351. A Lion, old etc. "Henry VIII's passion for Anne Boleyn led the way to the Reformation." [Scott.]

Henry was born in 1491, met Anne Boleyn in 1522, began open negotiations for a divorce from Catherine of Aragon in 1527, was secretly married to Anne about January 25, 1533, and received a formal divorce from the archiepiscopal court in May of that year.

354. Cov'ring, etc. Cf. 567, 247-250.

361. The fruit, etc. "The following lines refer to the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII." [WILLIAMS.] 367. Where marriage, etc. "The marriage of the clergy, licensed by the Reformation." SCOTT.
- 223, 385. Travailing. It is impossible to say whether the word here means laboring or traveling.
393. Yet, etc. "The king being owned the head of the Church of England, contrary to the doctrine of the other Reformed Churches." SCOTT.
402. A creature, etc. Referring to the Minotaur, half man and half bull, confined in the Cretan Labyrinth: cf. 594, 33-46; 722, 325-369.
410. In doubtful points, etc. The Catholics believe that in the Eucharist the bread and wine are transformed into the body and blood of Christ (transubstantiation); the Lutherans, that the body and blood of Christ are really present in, with, and under the elements (consubstantiation); the Calvinists deny entirely the real corporeal presence of the body and blood of Christ, teaching that they are present only spiritually, to be enjoyed by believers only. The doctrine of the Church of England, as expressed in Article 28, is practically Calvinistic; it admits a real (spiritual) presence, but does not exactly define the manner of that presence. The last part of the Article discountenances worship of the sacrament, which was regarded as idolatrous:
- "The Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another, but rather it is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death; insomuch that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ, and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ. Transubstantiation, or the change of the substance of bread and wine, in the Supper of the Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ; but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions. The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. And the mean whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper is faith. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshiped."
417. Her novices, etc. Referring to passages in A Catechism [of the Church of England], that is to say, an instruction to be learned of every person, before he be brought to be confirmed by the bishop.
- "Q. What is the outward part or sign of the Lord's Supper?
- "A. Bread and Wine, which the Lord hath commanded to be received.
- "Q. What is the inward part, or thing signified?

- "A. The Body and Blood of Christ, which are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper."
430. Her wild, etc. Cf. James i. 6.
431. But sure, etc. "The pretensions of the Church of England to loyalty were carried to a degree of extravagance which her divines were finally unable to support, unless they had meant to sign the destruction of their religion by a Catholic king." [SCOTT.]
- In 1675 Danby, the head of the Tory and High Church party, had proposed a bill according to which, "no one was to be allowed to hold office or to sit in parliament unless he would swear that he believed resistance to the crown to be in all cases illegal, and that he would never endeavor to alter the government in Church or State." (GARDINER, Student's History of England.)
435. And seal'd, etc. "Alluding to the fate of the Church and monarchy of England, which fell together in the great rebellion." SCOTT.
442. An Indian wife. "Alluding to the voluntary self-immolation of Hindu widows (suttee)." [CHRISTIE.]
447. And bore, etc. Cf. 889, 34, n.
449. Isgrim. The name of the wolf in the mediæval beast epic of which Reynard the Fox is the hero.
- 224, 460. If she, etc. Cf. 130, 156-166.
497. Thus, etc. "That is, if the Church of England would be reconciled to Rome, she should be gratified with a delegated portion of innate authority over the rival sectaries, instead of being obliged to depend upon the civil power for protection." SCOTT.
- 225, 531. The sovereign Lion, etc. "Alluding to the exercise of the dispensing power." [SCOTT.]
- Scott thinks that a reference to the Declaration of Indulgence is also intended, but this is impossible, unless the passage be a late addition to the poem. Cf. n. 216 (To the Reader).
537. The ten-horn'd monster. "The ten-horned monster (v. Revelation xvii) was usually explained by the reformers as typical of the Church of Rome." [SCOTT.]
540. Certitude of sense. v. n. 219, 80.
552. The Hind had seen him first. "There was a classical superstition, that, if a wolf saw a man before he saw the wolf, the person lost his voice. (Cf. 438, 73, 74.) Dryden has adopted, apparently without authority, the converse of this superstitious belief." [SCOTT.]
554. Suffis'd. So eds. 1 and 2; ed. 3 reads suffic'd.
563. Her friend, etc. "Although the Popish Plot was made the pretense of persecuting the Papists in the first instance, yet the high-flying party of the Church of England were also leveled at, and accused of being Tanti-vies, Papists in masquerade, etc." [SCOTT.] Cf. 124, 40, n; 111, 108, n.
579. The younger Lion. "James II, then Duke of York, whom Shaftesbury and his party involved in the odium of the Plot." SCOTT.
580. Your priestly calves. "Plunket, the titular primate of Ireland, Whitebread, provincial

- of the Jesuits, and several other Catholic priests, suffered for the alleged plot." [SCOTT.]
- 226, 602. The Test. The Test Acts had removed any ambiguities in the Church of England's doctrine concerning the Eucharist. Cf. n. 216 (To the Reader).
635. Cannon. So in eds. 1, 2, 3; the pun with cannon is obvious.
639. Subterranean Rome. The Catacombs; cf. Evelyn's Diary, April 11, 1645. [CHRISTIE.]
651. For fallacies, etc. "Dolus versatur in generalibus was an axiom of the Schools." SCOTT. Cf. 242, 35-37.
652. I then affirm, etc. "Dryden does not plead the cause of infallibility so high as to declare it lodged in the Pope alone, but inclines to the milder and more moderate opinion which vests it in the Church and Pope jointly. This was the shape in which the doctrine was stated in the pamphlets generally dispersed from the king's printing press about this time." [SCOTT.]
675. And all, etc. "The Catholics interpret our Savior's promise: 'Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world' (Matthew xxviii. 20), as applicable to their own church exclusively." [SCOTT.]
- 227, 677. But mark, etc. "Dryden, like a good courtier, adopts here the arguments which converted his master, Charles II, and which are contained in the papers found in his strong box." [SCOTT.] Cf. n. 217², 1.
692. Jehu. v. 2 Kings ix. 20.
713. Luther. Cf. n. 223, 410.
722. Arius, Socinus. Cf. nn. 166, 312, 346.
730. To those. The pronoun refers back not to Scripture in the preceding line, but to Scriptures in l. 727.
733. Where piles, etc.
- Infestisque obvia signis
Signa, pares aquilas, et pila minantia pilis.
LUCAN, Pharsalia, l. 6, 7.
735. Sathan. v. Matthew iv. 6.
741. Those first councils. An act of 1559 (1 Eliz. c. 1, § 20) recognized the authority of the "first four general councils" in matters of faith.
742. Sure tradition. "We mean by traditions, ordinances made in the prime of Christian religion, established with that authority which Christ hath left to his Church for matters indifferent, and in that consideration requisite to be observed, till like authority see just and reasonable cause to alter them. So that traditions ecclesiastical are not rudely and in gross to be shaken off because the inventors of them were men." HOOKER, Ecclesiastical Polity, v. 65 (2). Cf. 166, 316-355.
799. Its omen. "The gallows." SCOTT.
800. The Panther's breath. This was one of the current doctrines of the early natural history; v. Steele, Medieval Lore from Bartholomew Anglicus, London, 1905, p. 166.
802. The Blatant Beast. "By the Blatant Beast (see Spenser's Faerie Queene) we are generally to understand slander. But it is here taken for the Wolf, or Presbyterian clergy, whose violent declamations against the Church of Rome filled up many sermons." [SCOTT.]
818. The Wolf, etc. "The Presbyterian Church appeals to the Scripture as the sole rule of faith." [SCOTT.]
- 229, 840. Statutes. James II had suspended these before the poem was published — cf. n. 216 (To the Reader) — but Dryden did not cancel this line. Cf. 240, 1675, n; 243, 1927, n.
858. For purging fires. The doctrine of purgatory, rejected by all the reformed churches, and defended by the Catholics more from tradition than from Scripture.
896. Th' apostles. So ed. 1; eds. 2 and 3 read the Apostles.
- 230, 917. He darkly writ. v. 2 Peter iii. 16.
939. Counsels. Ed. 1 reads councils.
948. Testament. "It is probable that from this passage Swift took the idea of comparing the Scripture to a testament in his Tale of a Tub." SCOTT. Cf. 167, 392.
954. Hungary. "Throughout the seventeenth century Austria and the Turks fought for Hungary." SAINTSBURY.
970. Pronounc'd his words. v. John xviii. 5, 6. Dryden repeats the latter part of the line in 532, 834.
973. Modestly. Ed. 1 reads modesty.
979. Polish diet. In the Polish diets absolute unanimity was required for each decision. Hence they usually ended in anarchy, often in warfare. This was especially the case with those charged with the election of a new king. Armed rebellion (l. 987) was sanctioned by the laws of Poland. The term crown-gen'ral (l. 982), which is a translation of a Polish title (v. N. E. D.), hetman koronny, is particularly apt in this connection. Sobieski had been hetman wielki koronny (great crown-general) before his election to the Polish throne in 1674.
- 231, 988. To Church decrees, etc. "The Church hath power to decree rites or ceremonies, and authority in controversies of faith; and yet it is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's word written, neither may it so expound one place of Scripture that it be repugnant to another." Article xx.
991. Curtana. "This romantic name is given to the sword of mercy, which wants a point, and is said to have been that of Edward the Confessor. It is borne at the Coronation." [SCOTT.]
1026. Consubstantiating Church. The Lutherans; v. n. 223, 410.
1028. The French reform'd. "The Huguenot preachers, being Calvinists, had received classical (v. n. 217¹, 28) and not episcopal ordination; hence, unless reordained, they were not admitted to preach in the Church of England." [SCOTT.]
1030. Donors, etc. Those who give the right to preach must do the ordaining.
1061. Here then, etc. Scott points out that

- much of Dryden's argument is identical with that of a passage in the second paper found in King Charles's strong box.
- 232, 1071. So when of old, etc. Cf. Paradise Lost, iii. 80-273.
1090. What, etc. Cf. Revelation xxi. 2.
- 1101 n. Marks of the Catholic Church. Unity, Sanctity, Catholicity (Universality), and Apostolicity, in expansion of the clause of the Nicene Creed: "I believe in one holy Catholic and Apostolic Church." (The word holy does not occur in all texts of this creed.)
1110. But like, etc. "The magicians imitated Moses in producing the frogs which infested Egypt; but they could not relieve from that, or any of the other plagues. By that of boils and blains they were afflicted themselves, like the other Egyptians." [SCOTT.] v. Exodus viii, ix.
1130. Our sailing ships, etc. As Professor Firth explains, this is "a reference to the practice of transporting criminals to . . . the British colonies."
- 233, 1137. Missioners. Ed. 1 reads Missionaires.
1140. Yet some, etc. Catholic missionaries in the sixteenth century had some success in Japan, but were later driven out and their converts exterminated. Of the Europeans, only the Dutch retained the right to trade with Japan. For the sake of this privilege, according to a current report, they were required to abjure Christianity and to trample on the crucifix. [SCOTT.] Cf. 5, 84, n.
1143. Industrious of. Cf. 784, 53.
1154. For all, etc. "Alluding to the doctrines of Wycliffe and the Lollards, condemned as heresies in their own times, but revived by the reformers." SCOTT.
1159. 'T is said, etc. v. Matthew vii. 24-27.
1171. Monumental arms, etc. Arms put up as a memento, or memorial.
1172. Goliath's sword. v. 1 Samuel xxi. 9.
1175. Standard. "Perhaps used with a reference to the sense given by Bailey for stundils or standards: 'Trees reserved at the felling of wood for growth for timber.'" [WILLIAMS.]
1181. What digits, etc. "Astronomically. There are said to be twelve digits in the diameter of the sun or moon, and the extent of an eclipse is calculated by them." SAINTSBURY.
1202. Sev'n. Ed. 1 reads nine. St. Augustine, the missionary to the English, reached the country in 597. From that date Dryden apparently reckons, in ed. 1, to the time of Henry VIII; in ed. 2, to that of Wycliffe.
- 234, 1214. Joseph. v. Genesis xliii. 29, 30. "The English Benedictine monks executed a renunciation of the abbey lands, belonging to the order before the Reformation, in order to satisfy the minds of the possessors, and reconcile them to the reestablishment of the ancient religion, by guaranteeing the stability of their property. There appeared, however, to the proprietors of these lands, little generosity in this renunciation, in case the monks were to remain in a condition of inability to support their pretended claim: and, on the other hand, some reason to suspect its validity, should they ever be strong enough to plead their title." [SCOTT.] 1223. Skies a. Ed. 1 makes no pause after skies; eds. 2 and 3 insert a colon.
1226. Such were, etc. Alluding to some extraordinary display of the aurora borealis at the time of the battle of Sedgemoor (July 6, 1685), in which King James's troops crushed Monmouth's rebellion. The battle was chiefly fought in the morning, before day-break. [SCOTT.]
1234. Nuntius. v. GLOSSARY.
1251. Content of mind. Cf. 822, 823, 1-30; n. 241, 1806.
1252. A grace cup. N. E. D. defines grace-drink as "the drink taken by a company after the giving of thanks at the end of a meal."
Their common patron. "King James." SCOTT.
1273. So might, etc. The following passage is reminiscent of Virgil: cf. 631, 477-483.
- 235, 1283. Mighty Pan. v. 221, 294, n.
1295. Much malice, etc. Montagu and Prior took this line for a motto of their satire on The Hind and the Panther: v. n. 216 (HIND AND PANTHER).
1302. Mother Hubbard. Spenser's Mother Hubbard's Tale is a political satire, in which the knavish Ape and Fox find the Lion (representing in the allegory Queen Elizabeth) asleep, and usurp his functions as king of the beasts:

The Lyon sleeping lay in secret shade,
His crowne and scepter lying him beside,
And having doft for heate his dreadfull hide.
(Ll. 962-964.)
- Mercury rebukes the Lion for his heedlessness:

"Arise," said Mercurie, "thou sluggish beast,
That here liest senseless, like the corpse deceast,
The whilst thy kingdom from thy head is rent,
And thy throne royall with dishonour blent."
(Ll. 1327-1330.)
1304. That queen, etc. v. headnote, p. 122, and 161, 39-42.
1313. Round eternity. Cf. 4, 18, n.
1315. The Lion's peace. "The Declaration of Indulgence." SCOTT. More probably, unless this line be a late addition to the poem, a reference to the king's earlier use of the dispensing power.
1319. Furry sons. "The clergy wearing the fur hoods of graduates." [WILLIAMS.]
Senate. Convocation. [SCOTT.]
1336. Her faith, etc. "The adherence of the Church of England to the interests of James, while he was an exile at Brussels, and the Bill of Exclusion against him was in dependence, is here, as in other places, made the subject of panegyric. Had the Church joined with the Sectaries, the destruction of the Catholics at the time of the Plot would have been inevitable." SCOTT.
1354. She paid, etc. v. Matthew xxii. 21.
- 236, 1359. I serv'd, etc. "The Church of England complained, with great reason, of the coldness which they experienced from James, in whose behalf they had exerted themselves so successfully." SCOTT.

1415. Some German quarrel. Une querelle d'Allemand is a French phrase for a quarrel picked without cause. Louis XIV, conscious of superior force, could begin such when he chose.

237, 1436. He of, etc. Cf. 223, 431, n.

1454. Your sons of latitude. On the phrase, cf. ll. 1481, 1523. "During the latter years of the reign of Charles II, the dissensions of the State began to creep into the Church. By far the greater part of the clergy were steady in their adherence to the court interest. But a party began to appear, who were distinguished by the name of Latitudinarians, which the High Churchmen conferred upon them. The chief amongst these were Tillotson, Stillingfleet, and Burnet. They distinguished themselves by a less violent ardor for the ceremonies and even the government of the Church; for all those particulars, in short, by which she is distinguished from other Protestant congregations. In 1668 a plan of this party for an accommodation with the Presbyterians was defeated by the uncompromising attitude of the House of Commons. As, on the one hand, the tenets of the moderate clergy approximated those of the Calvinists; so, on the other, their antipathy and opposition to the Church of Rome was more deeply rooted, in proportion to the slighter value which they attached to the particulars in which that of England resembled her. Hence some of the number looked with a favorable eye on the Exclusion Bill, directed against the Catholic Duke of York.

"The party was of course deeply hated by the Catholics, and hence the severity with which they are treated by Dryden, who objects to them as the illegitimate offspring of the Panther by the Wolf, and traces to their Presbyterian origin their indifference to the fasts and ascetic observances of the more rigid High Churchmen, and their covert disposition to resist regal domination. Their adherence to the English communion he ascribes only to the lure of gain, and endeavors to draw an odious distinction between them and the rest of the Church." [SCOTT.]

Dryden had personal as well as public reasons for hostility to Stillingfleet; cf. n. 217², 1.

1462. All that Scorpio claims. "Alluding to the fact that the different parts of the body were assigned to different signs of the zodiac. The old almanacs have a naked figure in front, surrounded by the usual emblems of the signs, which dart their rays on the parts which they govern. What Scorpio claims, if not apparent from the context, may be found there." [SCOTT.]

1467. Think you, etc. "The Huguenot clergy who took refuge in England after the recall of the Edict of Nantes in 1685 did not all adhere to the same Protestant communion. Many conformed to the Church of England; and, having submitted to new ordination, some of them obtained benefices; others joined in communion with the Presbyterians and Dissenters of various kinds." [SCOTT.]

1482. Yielding. Ed. 1 reads east.

1485. Delphic. i. e. ambiguous, and so double-edged. [SAINTSBURY.] "The Δελφική μάχη of Aristotle, Pol. i. 2. 3." [WILLIAMS.]

1487. Some, etc. In the following paragraphs Dryden replies to the Vindication of Stillingfleet and his coadjutors; cf. 217², 1, n. "The three steeples argent obviously alludes to the pluralities enjoyed, perhaps by Stillingfleet, and certainly by some of the divines of the Established Church." [SCOTT.] Professor Williams, however, thinks that "it may refer to three Church dignitaries, such as Burnet, Stillingfleet, and Tillotson, whom Dryden supposed to be the authors of the three parts of the Answer. . . . Argent would then represent their professed purity, in strong contrast with the sable field of their real motives."

1489. Have sharply tar'd, etc. "I must not say the poor Bishop of Winchester is used unmercifully by him, for he calls him that prelate of rich memory [a phrase from Dryden's Defense]. . . . Had he a mind to tell us he was no poet? or that he was out of the temptation of changing his religion for bread?" STILLINGFLEET, Vindication, p. 105 (SS. xvii. 259, 260).

1491. Such who, etc. "If I thought there were no such thing in the world as true religion, and that the priests of all religions are alike [cf. 111, 99], I might have been as nimble a convert, and as early a defender of the royal papers, as any one of these champions. For why should not one who believes no religion, declare for any?" Ibid. p. 2 (SS. x. 208).

1493. Bare lies, etc. "But our grim logician proceeds from immediate and original to concomitant causes [of the English Reformation]; which, he saith, were revenge, ambition, and covetousness. But the skill of logicians used to lie in proving; but this is not our author's talent, for not a word is produced to that purpose. If bold sayings and confident declarations will do the business, he is never unprovided; but if you expect any reason from him, he begs your pardon; he finds how ill the character of a grim logician suits with his inclination. However, he takes a leap from causes to effects; and here he tells us the immediate effects of this schism were sacrilege and a bloody persecution of such as denied the king's supremacy in matters wholly spiritual, which no layman, no King of Israel ever exercised." Ibid. p. 116 (SS. xvii. 277).

Stillingfleet writes these words at the close of an attempt to prove that Henry VIII's desire to divorce Catherine was caused by his tender conscience; and that the English casting off of the papal supremacy had "no relation at all" to the king's marriage to Anne Boleyn. Dryden in his Defense had applied the title grim logician to Stillingfleet (v. SS. xvii. 218), who here retorts it upon him.

1496. 'T is easier, etc. "At the beginning of the Vindication Stillingfleet had said: 'But lest I be again thought to have a mind to flourish before I offer to pass.'" WILLIAMS.
1504. For sundry, etc. v. Stillingfleet, in SS. xvii. 287 f.
1508. Treatise of Humility. v. n. 217², 19.
- 238, 1509. But if, etc. "Stillingfleet's argument: 'Suppose we had not such particular books, we think the Holy Scripture gives the best rules and examples of humility of any book in the world.'" WILLIAMS.
1541. Hudibras. Samuel Butler (1612-80). In 1683 Dryden had written, in a begging letter addressed to Laurence Hyde, Earl of Rochester, First Commissioner of the Treasury: "'T is enough for one age to have neglected Mr. Cowley, and sterv'd Mr. Butler.'" The guilt of neglect, as Scott remarks, belongs to "Charles II and his gay courtiers, who quoted Hudibras incessantly, and left the author to struggle with obscurity and indigence," not to the Church of England, which could have done nothing for the poet unless he had been in orders. Cf. 318², 23, n.
1545. With odious, etc. v. 237², 1491, 1493, nn. Stillingfleet (SS. xvii. 256) complains similarly of "civil and obliging epithets," such as disingenuous, foul-mouthed, and shuffling, which Dryden had bestowed upon him.
1550. Imprimatur. "Stillingfleet's Vindication bears this license: 'Imprimatur. January 10, 1686. Henricus Maurice Rmo P. D. Wilhelmo Archiep. Cant. à Sacris.'" [SCOTT.] According to the law (14 Charles II, c. 33) the licensing power for all books except those on the common laws, history, affairs of state, and heraldry, was delegated to the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, and was thus beyond the immediate control of the king.
1573. Be vengeance, etc. "In the following beautiful lines, the poet, who had complained of Stillingfleet's having charged him with atheism, expresses his resolution [very imperfectly carried out] to submit to this reproach with Christian meekness, and without retaliation." [SCOTT.]
1575. If joys, etc. "In these lines Dryden versifies a sentence from the Duchess of York's paper: 'It will be plain enough to everybody, that I must lose all the friends and credit I have here by it; and have very well weighed which I could best part with. —my share in this world or the next: I thank God, I found no difficulty in the choice.'" WILLIAMS.
- 239, 1600. It now, etc. "The Hind having shown that her influence over Dryden was such as to induce him to submit patiently and without vengeance to injury and reproach, now calls upon the Panther to exert her authority in turn over Stillingfleet, for his irreverent attack upon the royal papers. Upon a careful perusal of the Answer and Vindication of that divine, it is impossible to find any grounds for the charge of his having reviled Charles II or the Duchess of York. Dryden, however, like the other Catholics, was pleased to interpret the impugning and confuting the arguments used by the king and duchess into contempt and disrespect for their persons." [SCOTT.]
1602. Shimei. v. 117, 585, n.
1604. Your son, etc. "In the beginning of the controversy, Stillingfleet had spoken dubiously of the authenticity of the paper ascribed to the duchess. In his Vindication he fully admitted that point, and insisted only upon the weakness of the reasons which she alleged for her conversion. This Dryden compares to a defeated vessel, bearing away under the smoke of her last broadside. (Cf. 217², 29-43.)
- "The person whom he states to have counseled Stillingfleet is probably Burnet; and the score which he paid is the severe description given of him under the character of the Buzzard (250, 2415 f). Dryden always seems to have viewed the Answer to the royal papers as the work of more than one hand. In his Defense (SS. xvii. 252) he affirms that the answerer's 'name is Legion, but tho' the body be possess'd with many evil spirits, it is but one of them who talks.'" [SCOTT.] Cf. 217², 9.
1621. Leap. v. n. 237, 1493.
1625. Procession. The word is especially applied to the ecclesiastical processions of the Catholic Church; hence Dryden's sarcastic in Protestant procession.
1627. Rodriguez. v. n. 217², 19.
1631. My altars, etc. Cf. Isaiah vi. 6.
1638. Make himself a saver. "This apparently means 'to indemnify himself for damages.' A metaphor from bowls. Cf. Middleton, No Wit, No Help like a Woman's, ii. 3. 82: 'Yet if my bowl take bank, I shall go nigh to make myself a saver. Here's alley-room enough.'" WILLIAMS.
1649. Some, etc. Some among her sons may deserve to have their characters described in satire.
- 240, 1675. Your bloody, etc. The penal laws, though they were not strictly enforced, had never been abrogated. [SCOTT.] Cf. 225, 531, n; 229, 840, n; 243, 1927, n.
1683. By education, etc. Cf. 116, 535-538.
1713. The Scallows' fortune, etc. "The general application of the fable of the Swallows to the short gleam of Catholic prosperity during the reign of James II is sufficiently manifest. But it is probable that a more close and intimate allusion was intended to an event which took place in 1686, when the whole nation was in confusion at the measures of King James, so that the alarm had extended even to the Catholics, who were the objects of his favor. The following account is quoted from Ralph (History, 1744, p. 933), who cites as his authority Secret Consults, etc. of the Roman Party, p. 59:
- "'While the nation was in a manner stunned with these outrageous proceedings,

we are told there was a general meeting of the leading Roman Catholics at the Savoy, to consult how this favorable crisis might be most improved to the advantage of their cause. Father Petre had the chair, and at the very opening of the debates it appeared that the majority were more inclined to provide for their own security than to come to extremities with the Protestants. Notwithstanding the king's zeal, power, and success, they were afraid to push the experiment any farther. The people were already alarmed; the soldiery could not be depended upon; the very courtiers melted out of their grasp; all depended on a single life, which was already on the decline; and if that life should last yet a few years longer, and continue, as hitherto, devoted to their interest and service, they foresaw insurmountable difficulties in their way, and apprehended disappointments without end. Upon these considerations, therefore, some were for a petition to the king, that he would only so far interpose in their favor that their estates might be secured to them by Act of Parliament, with exemption from all employments, and liberty to worship God in their own way, in their own houses. Others were for obtaining the king's leave to sell their estates and transport themselves and their effects to France. All but Father Petre were for a compromise of some sort or another; but he disclaimed whatever had a tendency to moderation, and was for making the most of the voyage while the sea was smooth and the wind prosperous. All these several opinions, we are farther told, were laid before the king, who was pleased to answer that, before their desires were made known to him, he had provided a sure retreat and sanctuary for them in Ireland, in case all those endeavors which he was making for their security in England should be blasted, and which as yet gave him no reason to despair.

"It will hardly, I think, be disputed that the fable of the Swallows about to cross the seas refers to this consultation of the Catholics; and it is a strong instance of Dryden's prejudice against priests of all persuasions, that, in the character of the Martin, who persuaded the Swallows to postpone the flight, he decidedly appears to have designed Petre, the king's confessor and prime adviser in state matters, both spiritual and temporal. The name of Martin may contain an allusion to the parish of St. Martin's in which Whitehall and the royal chapel are situated. But should this be thought fanciful, it is certain that the portrait of this vain, presumptuous, ambitious, bigoted Jesuit, as given by Burnet, is exactly that of the Martin. Burnet describes him as 'one Peter, descended from a noble family, a man of no learning, nor any way famed for his virtue, but who made all up in boldness and zeal.'

"The close correspondence of the fable with the real events may be further traced. The Raven (l. 1769) may be conjectured to mean Tenison, within whose parish Whitehall was situated, and who stood in the front of battle during all the Roman Catholic controversy. As Petre is the Martin who persuaded the Catholics not to leave the kingdom, his preparations for maintaining their ground there are also noticed. Lines 1823-1825 allude to the numerous schools and religious establishments which the Jesuits prepared to establish throughout England. The chapel which housed them (l. 1834) is obviously the royal chapel, where the priests were privileged to exercise their functions even during the subsistence of the penal laws. The transient gleam of sunshine (ll. 1844-1854) which invited the Swallows forth from their retirement, is the Declaration of Indulgence. The Irish Catholics, with the sanguine Talbot (Tyrconnel) at their head, may be the first who hailed the imaginary return of spring; they are painted as the Swifts (ll. 1841, 1842).

"I cannot help thinking that our author, still speaking in the character of the English Church, describes himself as the foolish Cuckoo (l. 1853), whose premature annunciation of spring completed the Swallows' delusion. Perhaps he intended to mitigate the scornful description of Petre by talking of himself also as a Protestant would have talked of him. The foreign priests and Catholic officers whom hopes of promotion now brought into England are pointed out by the foreign fowls of l. 1879.

"The fable concludes in a prophetic strain by indicating the calamities which were likely to overwhelm the Catholics as soon as the death of James, or any similar event, should end their temporary prosperity. It is well known how exactly the event corresponded to the prophecy, even the circumstance of the rabble rising upon the Catholic priests was most literally verified. In most of the seaport towns they watched the coasts to prevent their escape; and, when King James was taken at Feversham, the fishermen by whom he was seized were employed in lying in wait for the fugitive priests." [Scott.]

The editor has been unable to verify all the details in the above note by Scott. Despite the fact that the Panther is supposed to be expressing the sentiments of the Church of England, it is probable that Dryden, himself a moderate Papist, had a personal antipathy for Petre and the Jesuit party in the Catholic Church; in ll. 1945-1948 the Hind admits the partial justice of the Panther's satire. — It is so surprising to find the court poet Dryden making a thinly disguised attack on the king's favorite counselor that Scott's identification of the Martin with Petre must be regarded as not absolutely beyond doubt. It is improbable, furthermore, that an allusion to the Declaration of Indulgence is intended in ll. 1844-1854; if so, that passage must be a late addition to the poem: cf. n. 216 (To the Reader) and 243, 1953, n.

1728. Endued, etc. "Cf. divinae particulam auræ: Horace, 2 Satires, ii. 79." [WILLIAMS.]
- 241, 1732. And time, etc. Christie suggests that this phrase may be due to Horace's simul inversum contristat Aquarius annum (1 Satires, i. 36): cf. 406², 4 (Song).
1750. A mack'el gale. "A strong breeze such as mackerel are best caught in." N. E. D.
1759. As Martins, etc. "Perhaps another scoff at Martin Luther." WILLIAMS.
1769. A Raven, etc. Cf. 437, 18, 19.
1776. Signs. Ed. 1 reads sign.
1783. The Sibyl's hand, etc. v. 558, 561-577.
1788. Chelidonian. From χελιδών, a swallow. There is a reference to the fable of Icarus, who was drowned in the Ægean Sea, a part of which was called from him the Icarian.
1791. The wiser sort. Probably dramatic; the Church of England would naturally welcome a migration of the English Catholics to France.
1806. Truth in dreams, etc. Dryden had been reading Chaucer: v. 824, 138-155; cf. 220, 212, n.
- 242, 1814. Nostradamus. A famous French Jewish astrologer (1503-66), who published his prophecies in the form of rhymed quatrains. Cf. 260², 1; 82², 23.
1832. Ahaz' dial, etc. v. 2 Kings xx. 8-11; Joshua x. 12-14: cf. 205, 106-109; 37, 472.
1834. A chapel, etc. A chapel of ease is "a chapel built for the convenience of parishioners who live far from the parish church." N. E. D.
1843. Gibeonites. v. Joshua ix. 23.
1859. St. Martin's day. November 11.
1860. "Who but", etc. This turn of phrase may be another sign of Dryden's reading of Chaucer: cf. 757, 381; 765, 426; Cant. Tales, A 1870 (original of the latter passage).
1874. Marriage-off'rings. Ed. 1 reads marr'age offsprings.
1878. Lucina. The goddess in the Roman mythology who presides over childbirth.
- 243, 1887. Need. So eds. 1 and 2; ed. 3 reads needs, a proof that the adverbial need was already giving place to needs.
1898. But birds, etc. "A parody on Lee's famous rant in Edipus :
 May there not be a glimpse, one starry spark,
 But gods meet gods, and jostle in the dark " "
 SCOTT. Cf. SS. vi. 219.
1925. Poll'd. This word, found in eds. 1, 2, 3, seems to have caused needless trouble to commentators, and emendations to pulled or poled have been suggested. Poll, to clip or strip, a word used often of pruning trees, gives an excellent sense.
1927. The laws, etc. A law of Queen Elizabeth (27 Eliz. c. 2), confirmed under James I (1 Jac. I, c. 4), provided that any Jesuit or other Catholic priest found in England should be liable to the penalties of high treason; that is, to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. Any one harboring such a person the same law made guilty of felony, and liable to the death penalty.
1931. And there, etc. "It is a vulgar idea that a dead swallow, suspended in the air, intimates a change of wind by turning its bill to the point from which it is to blow." SCOTT.
Corps are. v. general note, p. 931.
1949. An old fanatic author. "John White, a Puritan member of the Long Parliament, had been very active in the ejectment of the clergy. In order to encourage and justify these violent measures, he published his famous treatise, The First Century of Scandalous Malignant Priests, made and admitted into benefices by the Prelates (1643), a tract which contains, as may be inferred from its name, a hundred instances of unworthiness, which had been either proved to have existed among the clergy of the Church of England, or had been invented to throw a slander upon them." [SCOTT.]
1953. The sunshine, etc. "The Hind intimates that, as the sunshine of Catholic prosperity, in the fable, depended upon the king's life, there existed those among her enemies who would fain have it shortened. But from this insinuation she exempts the Church of England, and only expresses her fears that her passive principles would incline her to neutrality." SCOTT. This passage is an additional proof that no allusion to the Declaration of Indulgence is intended in ll. 1844-1854: cf. n. 240, 1713.
- 244, 1961. Pardelis. So eds. 1, 2, 3: pardalis is Latin (from the Greek) for a female panther.
1966. If, as, etc. The following passage is in support of the earlier policy of James II, cf. n. 216 (To the Reader). By making a declaration of his intention of maintaining the Church of England, the king hoped he could induce his Tory parliament to repeal the severe penal laws against the Catholics, and the Test Acts of 1673 and 1678. The conduct of the Church of England, in retaining the sanguinary penal laws of Elizabeth and James I, however laxly they might be enforced, is shown to be more cruel than that of Louis XIV, who in 1685 had revoked the Edict of Nantes, which, since 1598, had secured toleration for the Huguenots. Cf. n. 217¹, 1.
1983. Curst, etc. v. 1 Kings xii. 6-11.
1992. The Test. The Test Act of 1678 — v. n. 216 (To the Reader) — had been brought forward at the height of the excitement over the Popish Plot. The Duke of York with difficulty secured the exemption of himself from its provisions. Shaftesbury, who had supported the Test Act of 1673, was particularly prominent in promoting this later measure, which Dryden, with much reason, represents as a prelude to the effort of the Whigs, in the Exclusion Bill of the next year, to set aside the succession of the Duke of York to the throne. "Though the Test Act was devised by a statesman whom they hated, and carried by a party whom they had opposed, the High Church clergy were not the less unwilling to part with it, when they found the advantages

- which it gave them against the Papists in King James's reign." [SCOTT.]
2009. More just, etc. v. Matthew xxvii. 3-5.
2013. Oates. v. n. 117, 632. Bedloe was a scoundrel whose false testimony in the time of the Popish Plot excitement was second in importance only to that of Oates.
2020. The painted, etc. "The poet alludes to the enchantress Duessa (Falsehood), who, when disrobed by Prince Arthur, was changed from a beautiful woman into a loathsome hag (Faerie Queene, I. viii. 46-50)." [SCOTT.]
- 245, 2027. Miter'd, etc. The Anglican bishops retain their seats in the House of Lords; the Catholic peers, though spiritually kindred to the king, are excluded.
2029. Metal. Eds. 1, 2, 3 read mettle; but the two words, etymologically the same, were not in Dryden's time separated in spelling.
2033. Atheists, etc. Who could freely deny transubstantiation, and therefore sit in parliament. Some of them might even feel justified in occasionally taking the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England, as prescribed for office-holders by the Test Act of 1673. Cf. n. 216 (To the Reader).
2038. To the Church. Ed. 1 reads from the church.
2048. Toby's rival, etc. "The fiend in the Book of Tobit, who haunted Raguel's daughter, is frightened away by fumigation, by Tobias, her bridegroom." [SCOTT.] v. Tobit viii. 1-3.
2053. Butt and peace. The phrase is taken from Dryden's version of The Tempest: v. SS. iii. 166, 167, 191; it had evidently become proverbial. The sense is, "to have what one wants without fighting for it." Cf. 264¹, 35.
2055. In forma pauperis. As a pauper, who was allowed writs and subpoenas gratis, and had counsel assigned him without fee.
2060. Methinks, etc. v. 611-615, 68-352.
2084. When first, etc. During the first months of the reign of James II the readiness of the nation to trust and oblige him seemed unbounded.
2090. In vain, etc. It is impossible to say just what portions of Dryden's poem were written after the Declaration of Indulgence; v. n. 216 (To the Reader). Ll. 2090-92 would naturally, but not necessarily, have preceded it; l. 2105 contains a probable, but not a certain allusion to it; ll. 2186 f unquestionably followed it: v. nn. 247, 2190, 2240; 251, 2527. Perhaps ll. 2050-2185 are Dryden's attempt at a transition from one point of view to the other.
- 246, 2103. Then Conscience, etc. Lord Halifax (cf. n. 120, 882), for example, published a pamphlet, A Letter to a Dissenter, urging the Dissenters to side with the Church of England, and not to be misled by the pretended toleration offered them by the king. But this may have been later than Dryden's poem.
2107. Th' associating name. A reminiscence of the times of Shaftesbury: cf. 126³, 10, n.
2112. O Proteus, etc. v. 483, 484, 557-598.
2117. Immortal pow'ra, etc. v. 819, 554-556; 843, 335, 336.
2119. Conscience, etc. Scott points out that the arguments in this speech are versified almost literally from a contemporary tract.
2133. Possess, etc. Cf. 308², 19: v. Luke xxi. 19.
2140. Your, etc. Cf. 225, 531, n.
2150. Wishing, etc. "That is, wishing the accession of the Prince of Orange, then the presumptive heir of the crown." SCOTT.
2159. Your neighbor nation. Holland.
2170. Your friends oppress'd. The refugee Huguenots, whom James II had at first welcomed and protected, and the persecution of whom he had publicly denounced. In this he was not sincere: v. MACAULAY, ch. vi.
- 247, 2190. She gave her up, etc. A plain intimation of the king's abandonment of hope for a reconciliation between the Catholic Church and the Church of England.
2200. A plain good man, etc. James II, portrayed as he wished himself to be known.
2218. Coward. So eds. 1 and 2; ed. 3 reads cowards.
2235. The fabric. "The Catholic chapel at Whitehall." SCOTT.
2240. Doves. "The clergy of the Church of England, and those of London in particular. The virulent and abusive character which our author here draws of the clergy, and particularly those of the metropolis, differs so much from his description of the Church of England in the person of the Panther that we may conclude it was written after the publishing of the Declaration of Indulgence, when the king had decidedly turned his favor from the Established Church. Their quarrel was now irreconcilable, and at immediate issue; and Dryden therefore changes the tone of conciliation with which he had hitherto addressed the heretic Church into that of bitter and unrelenting satire. Dryden calls them Doves, in order to pave the way for terming them, as he does a little below (l. 2358), birds of Venus, as disowning the doctrine of celibacy. The popular opinion that a dove has no gall is well known." [SCOTT.]
2245. Salt. "Perhaps with reference to the state endowments of the Established Church (salarium, originally 'salt-money')." WILLIAMS.
- 248, 2247. Bound by promise. "His Majesty being dead, the duke, now King James II, went immediately to Council, and . . . told their Lordships that . . . he would endeavor . . . to maintain the government both in Church and State, as by law established, its principles being so firm for monarchy, and the members of it showing themselves so good and loyal subjects. . . . This being the substance of what he said, the Lords desired it might be published, as containing matter of great satisfaction to a jealous people upon this change, which his Majesty consented to." Evelyn's Diary, Feb. 4 (6), 1685.
2254. Harpies. v. 554, 555, 276-347.
2259. Dan, etc. Cf. 1 Samuel iii. 20.
2271. Melancholy. "Burton (Anat. Mel., pt. i, sec. 2, mem. 2, subs. 1) includes pigeons among fowl whose flesh is 'hard, black, un-

- wholesome, dangerous, melancholy meat." WILLIAMS.
2289. Domestic poultry. "The Catholic clergy maintained by King James." [SCOTT.]
2300. The bird, etc. "The cock is made an emblem of the regular clergy of Rome, on account of their nocturnal devotions and matins." [SCOTT.]
2318. Sister Parlet. The nuns; v. 823, 68.
2320. Restiff. Ed. 1 reads restless.
- 249, 2325. Undress. Ed. 1 reads undrest. At the end of the verse eds. 1, 2, and 3 read pleas, which modern editors have changed to please. Please may have been what Dryden intended, although N. E. D. cites no instance of the spelling pleas for please later than 1503, and the expression make her pleas in the sense of plead her cause seems intelligible.
2326. A lively faith, etc. A sarcasm upon Article XII: "Albeit that Good Works, which are the fruits of Faith, and follow after Justification, cannot put away our sins, and endure the severity of God's Judgment; yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively Faith; insomuch that by them a lively Faith may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit."
2336. An hideous figure, etc. "The Roman Catholic pamphlets of the time are filled with complaints that their principles were misrepresented by the Protestant divines." [SCOTT.]
2339. Some Egyptian. Ed. 1 reads, an Egyptian.
2346. There, etc. "The worship of images, charged upon the Romish Church by Protestants as idolatrous." SCOTT.
2350. No Holland emblem. "The Dutch seem to have been remarkable for emblems, of which their old-fashioned prints and figured pantiles are existing evidence." [SCOTT.]
2361. A law, etc. v. n. 243, 1927.
2370. Shibboleth. v. n. 244, 1992 and n. 216 (To the Reader). On the word, v. Judges xii. 6.
2387. For those, etc. The idea of these lines goes back to Greek literature. Lycurgus, In Leocratem, 92, quotes a similar saying from "some of the old poets."
2392. The Meccan prophet. "The foolish fable of Mahomet accustoming a pigeon to pick peas from his ear, to found his pretensions to inspiration, is well known." [SCOTT.]
- 250, 2415. Buzzard. "Gilbert Burnet, well known as a historian, was born in Scotland in 1643. Being ordained, he obtained the living of Saltoun, in East Lothian. While in this living he drew up a memorial of the abuses of the Scotch bishops, and was instrumental in procuring the induction of some moderate Presbyterian divines into vacant churches. To measures so unfavorable for Episcopacy Dryden seems to allude in ll. 2418-2421. He was next created Professor of Divinity at Glasgow; but, as his active temper led him to mingle much in political life, he speedily distinguished himself rather as a politician than as a theologian. In 1672 he was made one of the king's chaplains, and was in high favor both with Charles and his brother. He enjoyed much of the countenance of the Duke of Lauderdale; but a quarrel taking place between them, the duke represented Burnet's conduct in such terms that he was deprived of his chaplainry, and forced to resign his professor's chair and abandon Scotland. (He later had an opportunity of revenging himself upon Lauderdale; v. n. 2473.) During the time of the Popish Plot he again received a portion of the royal countenance. He was then preacher at the Rolls Chapel (v. n. 142, 396), and enjoyed a high degree of public consideration. By a too frank letter to King Charles, in reproof of the faults of his character and government, he forfeited his favor, at least for a time. This freedom, with his Low Church tenets, gave also offense to the Duke of York, who was moreover offended with him for some interference in the affair of the Exclusion. At length his devotion to Lord Russell drew upon him the full resentment of both brothers. After a final breach with the court he went abroad, and settled in Holland at the court of the Prince of Orange. Here he did not fail, with that ready insinuation which seems to have distinguished him, to make himself of consequence to the prince, and especially to the princess, afterwards Queen Mary. From this place of refuge he sent forth several papers relating to the controversy in England; and the clergy, who had formerly looked upon him with some suspicion, began now to treat with great attention and respect a person so capable of serving their cause. He was consulted upon every emergency; which confidence was no doubt owing partly to his situation near the person of the Prince of Orange, the Protestant heir of the crown. He stood forward as the champion of the Church of England in the controversy with Parker, Bishop of Oxford, who advocated the repeal of the Test Act (v. l. 2486). In the History of his own Time he talks with complacency of the sway which circumstances had given him among the clergy, and of the important matters which fell under his management; for he was admitted into all the secrets of the English intrigues. These insinuations of Burnet's importance may, from the very satire of Dryden, be proved to have been well founded. This acquired importance of Burnet is the alliance between the Pigeon house and Buzzard which Dryden rebukes, believing, or wishing to make others believe, that Burnet held opinions unfavorable to Episcopacy. — This active politician had a very important share in the Revolution, and reaped his reward by being advanced to the see of Salisbury. He died in 1715." [SCOTT.]
- In Dryden's time the word buzzard was often applied to a stupid, blundering, ignorant person.
2436. Son of Anak. v. Numbers xiii. 33.
2437. Like those, etc. Cf. 18, 48-50.

2445. His profit. Ed. 1 reads ambition.
 2466. His praise, etc. "This applies to the sketches of character introduced by Burnet in his controversial tracts." [SCOTT.]
 2468. A Greek, etc. Imitated from Virgil's timeo Danaos et dona ferentis (Æneid, ii. 49).
 2469. Sev'n, etc. The Anglican Church retains only two (baptism and the Lord's Supper) of the seven Catholic sacraments.
 2473. But he, etc. In 1675 the House of Commons attacked the Duke of Lauderdale, the king's representative in Scotland, seeking his removal from office. Burnet, being summoned before a committee of that body, had testified that he had heard Lauderdale say "he wished the Presbyterians in Scotland would rebel, that he might bring over the Irish Papists to cut their throats." Burnet also gave other information of a private character unfavorable to Lauderdale. He defends himself against the charge of treachery, but admits that his conduct "had an ill appearance." Dryden's account is much exaggerated.
 251. 2482. An Indian muck. "To run amuck is a phrase derived from a practice of the Malays. When one of them has sustained an insupportable calamity, he intoxicates himself and rushes into the streets, stabbing every one he meets, until he is cut down or shot, like a mad dog." [SCOTT.] Amuck was originally an adjective; it was falsely understood as a muck.
 2497. Their patron's promise. v. n. 248, 2247.
 2521. A gross idolater. Burnet had merely reiterated the usual Protestant charge, that transubstantiation was an idolatrous doctrine. Cf. n. 223, 410.
 2527. A doom. The Declaration of Indulgence: v. n. 216 (To the Reader).
 2530. License. Eds. 2 and 3 read Licence; ed. 1 reads licens'd. This is doubtless a misprint, though it might be made into sense by placing a semicolon after infring'd, and commas after but and oppress.
 2537. Fowl of nature. Wild birds, explained in ll. 2541-2549; cf. 842, 278.
 2549. Rubicon. A reference to Cæsar's famous passage (b. c. 49) of the Rubicon, the boundary of his province, by which he entered Italy and began war on the Senate.
 252. 2552. Shiloh. v. Genesis xlix. 10.
 2554. Dionysius. "The tyrant of Syracuse, who, after being dethroned, is said to have taught a school at Corinth." [SCOTT.]
 2560. And arts, etc. "In the Declaration of Indulgence James expressed his conviction that persecution was unfavorable to population and trade." WILLIAMS.
 2562. The smiths, etc. In carminibus Appius ait fabrum esse quemque fortunæ. (From the opening chapter of a piece attributed to Sallust, Epistola (Secunda) ad Caesarem de Republica Ordinanda.)
 2572. Two Czars, etc. Peter the Great and his half-brother Ivan, at this time joint rulers of Russia. Dryden prophesies discord between the High and Low Church parties in the Anglican body. Compare the conclusion of The Medal, 131, 287 f.
 2577. Benting times. Times when pigeons are reduced to feed on bents, a sort of coarse grass.
 2580. College of the bees. Probably nothing but a reference to Virgil: cf. 477, 478, 92-156; 848, 218.
 SONG FOR ST. CECILIA'S DAY. Saintsbury notes: "In Dryden's copy of Spenser, preserved at Trinity College, Cambridge, the note, Groundwork for a Song on St. Cecilia's Day, is set against F. Q. VII. vii. 12."
 17. Jubal. v. Genesis iv. 21.
 253. 52. Organ. St. Cecilia is by tradition the patron saint of music, and an angel is said to have visited her while she was still on earth. But the editor cannot discover Dryden's authority for making her the inventress of the organ, or for representing that she drew an angel to her by its notes. Cf. 733, 161-170.
 63. Untune. When this world and the heavenly bodies are destroyed, the music of the spheres will cease; thus Musica (the blast of the divine Trumpet) will untune (make incapable of harmony) the sky. The antithesis of music shall untune continues that of the dead shall live, the living die, and is typically Drydenian in style. Thus the universal frame ends, as it began, from harmony. Cf. 88. xviii. 312.
 EPIGRAM ON MILTON. "These lines were perhaps suggested by the distich written by Selvaggi in honor of the youthful poet, while he was at Rome, which Dryden has very happily amplified:
 Græcia Mæondem, jactet sibi Roma Maronem; Anglia Miltonum jactat utrique parem."
 MALONE, I, i, 206.
 4. Majesty. "Impressive stateliness of character, expression, or action" (N. E. D.); hence not a repetition of loftiness.
 BRITANNIA REDIVIVA. The heir of James II, the Princess Mary, was married to a Protestant, William, Prince of Orange. By the birth of a son to James her right to the throne after her father's death was set aside, and a Catholic succession seemed assured. Hence the exultation of the Catholic party, which Dryden expresses in this poem.
 The motto is Georgus, i. 498-502; cf. 453, 668-675. Puerum, which has been substituted for juvenem of the original, of course refers to the infant prince, and perjuria to the false testimony of Oates and others, in consequence of which many innocent Catholics lost their lives. Cf. 255, 256, 146-164.
 There are no significant variations of text in the two editions of 1688. The folio copy lacks the imprimatur that is found in the quarto, so that it is probably the later of the two.
 254. 5. The day. June 10, 1688, of the old style corresponds to June 20 of the calendar now in use; Dryden here speaks of it as the longest day in the year.

9. Son. This word is a misprint for sun; the error was not discovered until after the page was printed. The quibble on sun, son is unworthy of Dryden at this period; cf. 25¹, 47, n.
35. Holy violence. Referring to the claims of the Catholics that the prince was sent in answer to their prayers; cf. 9, 139–144.
37. And late, etc. In imitation of Horace's, Serus in cælum redeas (Odes, i. 2. 45).
52. For see, etc. The opponents of James doubted the genuineness of the child; Dryden affects to believe that the doubts were confined to the Commonwealth party.
55. Alcides. v. 209, 447, n.
65. The manna, etc. v. Numbers xi. 4–6.
80. The sign. A reference to the legend that Constantine the Great (272–337) beheld in the heavens, before his elevation to the throne, a luminous cross, with the inscription, crux vince (conquer by this). Adopting for his standard the symbol of Christianity, he triumphed over his enemies; as emperor, he favored and protected the Christians; shortly before his death he was himself baptized. So Dryden suggests that James's adoption of Catholicism was an omen of Christian success in the war going on between the German Empire and the Turks, in which the English king was much interested.
- 255, 84. Sylvester. The present Pope of Dryden's note, Innocent XI, was in reality opposed to the policy of James II, and disliked the Jesuits, whose influence was predominant with the English king.
86. Large of his treasures. Christie notes the imitation of Virgil's largus opum (Æneid, xi. 338). Innocent XI had given large sums to aid the German Empire in its war with the Turks.
89. The former, etc. Constantine spent part of his youth in Britain. A mistaken opinion was current that he was born there, and that his mother was a British princess.
91. Whose exile, etc. Cf. nn. 145, 592; 148, 793.
94. Moon-ey'd. Purbblind. The king's brief attempt to conciliate the Dissenters having failed, Dryden resumes his natural antipathy to them.
97. Shipurack. v. 151, 152, 1065–1098, and headnote, p. 133.
102. The surviving eight. v. Genesis vii. 13.
118. Born, etc. The birth took place at about ten o'clock in the morning, in the presence of numerous witnesses.
121. Eaglet. v. 3¹, 11, n.
128. Not, etc. v. 532, 822–833.
152. Rebellion. "The great Civil War." SCOTT.
- 256, 154. Plagues. v. 48, 1066, n.
156. Fire. Cf. 44–51.
157. Plots. v. 111, 108, n.
Test. v. n. 216 (To the Reader); 244, 1992, n.
158. Worse. The deaths of Catholics executed for supposed complicity in the Plot.
165. Enough, etc. "All the queen's former children died in infancy." SCOTT.
169. Enough, etc. "The year 1688, big with so many events of importance, commenced very unfavorably, with stormy weather, and an epidemical distemper among men and cattle." SCOTT.
176. Araunah's, etc. Dryden's reference should be to 2 Samuel xxiv. 18–25.
183. Year! The exclamation point is not found in the editions of 1688.
184. Five months, etc. "During the five months preceding the birth of the Chevalier de St. George, James was wholly engaged by those feuds and dissensions which tended to render irreparable the breach between him and his subjects. Dryden, like other men of sense, probably began to foresee the consequences of so violent and general irritation; and expresses himself in moderate and soothing language, both as to the past and future. Nothing is therefore dropped which can offend the Church of England." [SCOTT.]
190. Conscience, etc. Cf. 246, 2117, 2118.
199. Rome. The Latin words in the footnote mean, "lest enemies should entice away the gods by incantations." When the gods had deserted a city, it was thought to be doomed; cf. 542, 471–474; 15, 19–22.
216. Esian race. Cf. headnote, p. 133.
- 257, 237. Gigantic brood. Dryden's note exaggerates stories told, not of the giants, but of the Aloeidae, Otus and Ephialtes, who, when only nine years old, threatened the Olympian gods with war, and would have succeeded in their rebellion had they been allowed to reach manhood. Cf. 604, 784 f.
257. Mercy, etc. v. Matthew xiv. 31.
- 258, 296. Amalek. Cf. 27¹, 28, n.
304. But you, etc. "The address to the queen has all the smoothness with which Dryden could vary the masculine character of his general poetry, when he addressed the female sex, and forms a marked contrast to the more majestic tone of the rest of the piece." [SCOTT.]
306. Beyond, etc. Cf. 40, 639, n; 208, 353.
- 259, 15. Jove, etc. Cf. 655, 167.
21. When, etc. "An allusion to the gradual exclusion of French wine, owing to the war, which culminated, ten years later, in the Methuen treaty and the establishment of port as the staple drink." [SAINTSBURY.]
By the Methuen treaty (Dec. 27, 1703) England agreed to admit Portuguese wines on payment of two thirds of the duty imposed on French wines.
41. Horses, etc. "Alluding to the act for disarming the Catholics, which provided that no Papist should keep a horse or horses above the value of five pounds." [SCOTT.]
- 260, 36. And make, etc. "Alluding to the addresses upon the Revolution." SCOTT.
1. Nostradame, etc. Cf. 242, 1814, n.
4. Our vast expenses. Owing to the elaborate scenery required for an opera.
- 261¹, 34. Our blacks. "It was the fashion, at this time, to have black boys in attendance, decorated with silver collars." [SCOTT.]
46. Selling, etc. v. 136, 181, n.
47. Dumfounding, etc. "Explained by a stage direction in Shadwell's Bury Fair (act iii,

- sc. 1), where 'Sir Humphrey dumfounds the count with a smart rap on the shoulders.' The humor seems to have consisted in doing this with such dexterity that the party dumfounded should be unable to discover to whom he was indebted for the favor." [SCOTT.]
- 261¹, 17. Julian's. "Julian, who styled himself Secretary to the Muses, made a dirty livelihood by copying and dispersing lampoons at Will's Coffee-House." [SCOTT.] Cf. 921. Interloping. Cf. 128, 41, n.
20. The first, etc. "The poetasters of that age were so numerous and so active that the most deplorable attempt at wit or satire was usually answered in one which was yet worse. Parody and personal abuse were the implements of this warfare, which sometimes extended to answers, replies, rejoinders, rebutters, and surrebutters, all only distinguished by malignant scurrility." SCOTT. Cf. 308², 39-42.
262. MERCURY'S SONG TO PHÆDRA. The intrigue between these characters is of Dryden's own invention; Phædra is one of Alcmena's slaves.
- 263¹, 31. Height. This spelling, contrasting with height six lines later, is a fair sample of the inconsistencies of the early editions. Cf. leafs, leaves (460, 498, 515); been, bin (829, 515, 549); elfs, elves (872, 3; 873, 34).
- 263². Mr. Williams. "This was quite in character. Cibber says of Williams (Apology, ch. vi), that his industry was not equal to his capacity, for he loved his bottle better than his business." SCOTT.
- 264¹, 10. Cork. "The taking of Cork was one of the first exploits of the renowned Marlborough. The assault began on September 25, 1690, and the city surrendered on September 28." [SCOTT.]
35. Peace and the bull. Cf. 245, 2053, n.
- 264², 11. He, etc. Shovel-board was played by sliding coins or metal weights over a long smooth table. The highest score was gained by making the coin hang over the edge of the table; if it went the merest trifle further, it fell into the box, or trough placed to catch it. To score at all, the piece must cross a line drawn about four feet from the end of the table; this is apparently what is meant by laying the piece. v. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes.
- 265¹, 37. Ottobuoni. Cardinal Ottoboni became pope in 1689, as Alexander VIII, and died on February 1, 1691. He had been hostile to France, and friendly to the German Empire, hence to England as well. The policy of his successor was naturally a matter of much speculation. — This reference settles the date of presentation of King Arthur; Innocent XII, Alexander's successor, was elected on July 12. Mrs. Bracegirdle. Anne Bracegirdle (1663?-1748), a beautiful and talented actress, and "a woman well reputed," spoke this indecent epilogue.
- 266¹. EPITAPH ON ERASMUS LAWTON. The text is from a copy of the inscription courteously furnished to the editor by the Reverend William Woodward, Rector of Great Cawthor.
- 268². THE LADY'S SONG. The text in Buckingham's Works reads Ladies (for beauties) in l. 1 and the (for our) in l. 7.
269. EPITAPH ON DUNDEE. The text in Poetical Miscellanies has the following variants: (5) Scotland and Thee; (6) Nor wou'dst thou her; (7) dying did support.
- ELEANORA. For the motto, cf. 596, 194-197: the original edition, after Æneid, reads only "l. 6;" in the last line it reads Duis.
- 269¹, 5 (prose). Ovid. v. Tristia, i. 1.
- 269², 10 (prose). My disease. The gout, according to Malone, who cites no authority for his statement.
- 270², 4. Dr. Donne. Cf. 283², 22-45; 317¹, 43-51; n. 736, 20. Donne states in a letter to George Gerrard (?): "Since I never saw the gentlewoman, I cannot be understood to have bound myself to have spoken just truth; but I would not be thought to have gone about to praise anybody in rhyme, except I took such a person as might be capable of all that I could say. If any of those ladies think that Mistress Drury was not so, let that lady make herself fit for all those praises in the book, and it shall be hers." Gosse, Life and Letters of John Donne, i. 302.
- 271¹, 24. The dragon's teeth. Alluding to the legend of Cadmus, who, having slain a dragon, sowed its teeth, whereupon armed men sprang up, who immediately fell to fighting and slew one another, leaving only five survivors.
33. An elected Speaker of the House. The Speaker of the House of Commons has not the right to take part in debates.
- 272, 71. Pharaoh, etc. v. Genesis xli.
- 273, 181. So subjects, etc. A reproach to the English, who had driven into exile James II.
193. Her children, etc. "Lady Abingdon had six sons and three daughters." [SCOTT.] On Charity, cf. Spenser, Faerie Queene, I. x. 4, 16, 29-33.
197. Anchises. v. 606, 921 f.
201. Cybele. The mother of Jupiter and other deities; cf. 639, 94, 127; 640, 142.
- 274, 207. And as, etc. Apparently a loose reference to Exodus xvi. 11-31.
252. Bodies. Cf. 219, 95, n.
273. Orb. Cf. 1, 27, n.
- 275, 299. Her Savior's time. The age at which he is said to have been crucified.
325. Courtier. Christie well compares 132, 20-23.
339. The third errand. "Enoch and Elijah were the two former instances, though the chariot is not especially mentioned in Enoch's case." [SAINTSBURY.] v. Genesis v. 24; 2 Kings ii. 11.
- 276, 7. Would wonder, etc. Cf. 275, 295-298.
23. Thus then, etc. Cf. 275, 303-305.
- 278, 9. The Spanish nymph. Apparently a reference to the "Spanish plot" of Southerne's play; cf. B. S. xviii.
11. But tel, etc. Cf. 734¹, 21, 22.
18. Nokes. A celebrated actor of low comic parts; cf. 61¹, 7; n. 60², 1.

27. Copy, etc. Etherege died early in 1691; Wycherley survived until 1716.
- 279², 22. Mr. Fuller. "William Fuller was an informer who pretended to make discovery of a formidable plot by the Jacobites against the government. The House of Commons, finding him unable to produce the witnesses to whom he referred, on February 24, 1692, declared him 'a notorious impostor, a cheat, and a false accuser.' He was prosecuted by the attorney general and punished by the pillory; notwithstanding which he did not profit by Mrs. Bracegirdle's legacy, for in 1702 he was sentenced to the same painful elevation for publishing more false statements." [SCOTT.]
- 280¹. Mrs. Bracegirdle. Cf. 265¹, n. In Henry the Second she played the part of Rosamond, who dies of a draught of poison given her by Queen Eleanor.
- 280², 20. Haynes. "The facetious Joe Haynes became a Catholic in the latter part of James II's reign. But after the Revolution he read his recantation of the errors of Rome, in a penitentiary prologue." [SCOTT.] Cf. 70¹, 45, n; 900², 47, n.
22. Chapels of ease. Cf. 242, 1834, n.
281. TRANSLATIONS FROM JUVENAL AND PERSIUS. The editor has been unable to consult the second edition of this work. The first motto is Juvenal, i. 85, 86: cf. 324, 130-132. The second is Martial, iv. 29. 7, 8: "Persius is more often noticed for his one book of Satires than the empty Marsus for his whole Amazoniad." — The following notes make almost no attempt to explain the substance of Juvenal and Persius, to comment on Dryden's deviations from the literal sense of the Latin, or to correct errors in his commentary — The headings of Dryden's notes are taken literally from the original edition. In a few cases, as 334, n. 10, they differ from the reading of the text. Cf. n. 418 (VIROIL). This edition also follows the original in omitting the headings of certain notes.
- 282¹. Dorset. Charles Sackville (1638-1706), Earl of Dorset, to whom in 1668 Dryden had dedicated An Essay of Dramatic Poesy. He became Lord Chamberlain in 1689 and held the office until 1697. v. 412, 48, n.
12. The delight, etc. Cf. 113, 318, n.
- 283¹, 37. Themistocles. Every Greek general in the Persian wars voted for himself as the most deserving, but the majority assigned the second place to Themistocles. v. Herodotus, viii. 123.
41. Longo, etc. VIRGIL, Aeneid, v. 320, with a change of proximus to proximi: cf. 583, 420.
51. Lyric poems. "These lyrical pieces, after all, are only a few smooth songs, where wit is sufficiently overbalanced by indecency." SCOTT.
- 283², 4. The best, etc. Said of Dorset by Rochester, in An Allusion to the Tenth Satire of the First Book of Horace. On Rochester. v. B. S. xxii, xxv, xxvi: cf. 744², 11; 515¹, 46-48.
- "The satires of Lord Dorset seem to have consisted in short lampoons, if we may judge of those which have been probably lost from such as are known to us." [SCOTT.]
22. Donne. Pope probably took from this passage the hint for his Satires of Dr. John Donne, Versified. On Donne, cf. 270², 4, n.
38. He affects, etc. This passage probably suggested the title metaphysical poets, which Dr. Johnson gave to Donne, Cowley, and their school.
47. Cowley. v. 181¹, 45, n.
- 284¹, 32. Cicero. Tusc. Disp. v. 16: Cicero, however, there passes over fame, as a matter of small consequence.
33. Virgil. Cf. 567, 252-254.
35. Epicurus. v. Lucretius, vi. 58 f.
- 284², 25. At rovers. To shoot at rovers is, according to C. D.: "(a) To shoot an arrow for distance or at a mark, but with an elevation, not point-blank; or to shoot an arrow at a distant object, not the butt, which was nearer. (b) To shoot at random, or without any particular aim." Cf. 812, 77.
28. The Rehearsal. v. B. S. xxi. Davenant and the Howards were attacked in The Rehearsal as well as Dryden.
- 285¹, 47. A shilling, etc. "The four scepters were placed saltire-wise upon the reverse of guineas, till the gold coinage of his present majesty." SCOTT. "The bath is the chemist's bath, used for gilding." [KER.]
- 286¹, 2. Eighteen thousand lines. Really about fourteen thousand.
5. Martial. Epigrams, viii. 18.
- 286², 10. Of your Lordship in the latter sort. Ker emends to In your . . . of the . . .; a reasonable but not a certain correction.
- "Would it be imagined that, of this rival to antiquity, all the satires were little personal invectives, and that his longest composition was a song of eleven stanzas? The blame, however, of this exaggerated praise falls on the encomiast, not upon the author; whose performances are, what they pretend to be, the effusions of a man of wit; gay, vigorous, and airy." JOHNSON, Life of Dorset.
50. Tasso. Professor Ker points out that Dryden is indebted to Tasso's Lettere Poetiche, published with the first edition of his Discorsi in 1587, and probably also to Segrais' preface to his Traduction de l'Énéide and to Rapin's Reflexions sur la Poétique, ii. 13.
- 287¹, 15. Owen's Epigrams. The Latin epigrams of John Owen (1560?-1622) won popularity both in England and on the Continent; cf. 515¹, 27.
32. St. Lewis, etc. Epic poems by Le Moyne, Chapelain, and Georges de Scudéry, all published in the years 1654-58: cf. 491², 4 f.
- 287², 5. But Prince Arthur, etc. Dryden's statement is without foundation in fact.
26. His event is not prosperous, etc. An idea reflected from René Le Bossu, Traité du Poème Epique, ii. 17.
30. Mr. Rymer's work. "Mr. Rymer had promised to favor the public with 'some reflections

- on that Paradise Lost of Milton's, which some are pleas'd to call a poem, and assert rhyme against the slender sophistry wherewith he attacks it.' But this promise, which is given at the end of his Tragedies of the Last Age Considered and Examined, he never filled up the measure of his presumption by attempting to fulfil." [SCOTT.]
- On Dryden and Rymer, cf. B. S. xxiii, xxiv; n. 382 (Ex. Poet.); 383², 21, n; 410, 47, n; 412², 48, n; 741¹, 50, n.
39. A flat of thought. Cf. 181², 5-12.
53. The rule of Horace. Ars Poet. 47, 48.
- 288¹, 6. Hannibal Caro. Cf. 177², 18, n; 513², 14 f.
- 288², 42. Boileau. v. 914, 620-663.
48. Two victorious monarchies. v. Daniel vii. The four beasts were interpreted as the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman monarchies.
- 289¹, 9. Ariosto, etc. v. Orlando Furioso, xiv. 75-81; cf. 710², 53 f.
13. Tasso. Jerusalem Delivered, ix.
37. Boileau. Boileau rather implies this than directly states it.
- 289², 23. Philosophy. Here used, as often, like the modern science, in the sense of "the study of natural objects and phenomena."
39. Daniel. v. Daniel x. Professor Ker notes that Cowley, with whom Dryden was of course familiar, had already used this passage in his Discourse by way of Vision concerning the Government of Oliver Cromwell.
41. Platonic philosophy. "Dryden was thinking of the Platonic opinion about daemons as intermediary between heaven and earth. The idea of tutelary angels was familiar with the Platonists of Dryden's time." [KER.]
- 290¹, 9. St. Michael. v. Daniel x. 21; xii. 1.
- 290², 16. Virgil. "The most Platonic passages in Virgil, and those of which Dryden was probably thinking, are the Fourth Eclogue and the Sixth Book of the Æneid." KER.
53. Satan. v. Job i. 6, 12; ii. 6.
- 291¹, 17. Milton. v. Paradise Lost, iii. 634 f. and Arg. "To every sphere of the heavens there is assigned an intelligence, or intelligences, which are angels." [KER.]
50. Don Pedro, etc. "Dryden refers to Don Pedro of Castile in his Vindication of The Duke of Guise (1683), with Mariana as authority. A relation quoted from Mariana shows that Dryden's projected poem might have been enlivened with modern applications to English politics, besides those which he indicates in this account of his design." [KER.] v. SS. vii. 182-184.
52. One year. Contemporary critics made this the limit of the action of an epic poem; v. Bossu, op. cit. iii. 12.
- 291², 16. King Charles II. Cf. B. S. xxvi, xxvii; 208, 370-382; n. 238, 1541.
- 292¹, 15. Ne, forte, etc. HORACE, Ars Poet. 406, 407: "Let not by any chance the Muse skulked in the lyre, and the singer Apollo, cause you shame."
43. Curiosa felicitas. v. 181¹, 26, n.
- 292², 9. Ut sibi, etc. Ars Poet. 240-242: "That every one hopes to do the same, but sweats much and toils in vain, attempting the same."
28. Cena dubia. TERENCE, Phormio, 342: "a hesitating banquet."
41. Miniature. F reads menature.
- 293¹, 35. Aristotle. v. Poetics, 26. Dryden, in his Apology for Heroic Poetry (1677) [SS. v. 114], had praised heroic poetry as "the greatest work of human nature" and cited Aristotle as his authority. Now he cites Aristotle correctly, but opposes him. Cf. 490¹, 35, n.
51. Homer. The time analysis of the Iliad here given may be due to Bossu, who, however (op. cit. ii. 18), gives the figures as forty-seven and eleven.
- 293², 5. The instruction, etc. The idea is common; Rapin entitles a chapter of his Reflexions sur la Poétique, "La fin de ce poème [le poème épique] est d'instruire les grands," and writes in it: "La poésie héroïque . . . ne donne des leçons qu'aux grands pour gouverner les peuples." See also Sidney (Apologie for Poetrie, ed. Arber, pp. 46, 47) and Davenant (Preface to Gondibert). Davenant writes: "Nor is it needful that Heroick Poesie should be levell'd to the reach of common Men: for if the examples it presents prevail upon their Chiefs, the delight of Imitation . . . will rectify by the rules which those Chiefs establish of their own lives, the lives of all that behold them; for the example of life doth as much surpass the force of Precept as Life doth exceed Death." Cf. 494¹, 34, n.
27. Vida. The De Arte Poetica of the Italian Marco Girolamo Vida (1489?-1566) was counted an authority. On Bossu, v. B. S. xxiv.
45. Casaubon. Isaac Casaubon (1559-1614), De Satyrica Græcorum Poesi et Romanorum Satira, Paris, 1605. (Page references in these notes are to that edition.) This is by far the most important in a scholarly sense of the sources of Dryden's Discourse.
- Heinsius*. Daniel Heinsius, De Satyra Horatiana (printed with his edition of Horace). Here cited from the Elzevir edition of 1629.
46. Rigaltius. Rigaltius (Nicolas Rigault, 1577-1654), De Satyra Juvenalis, published in his edition of Juvenal, 1616, and often reprinted. The editor has used the text included in the Leyden Juvenal of 1695.
- Dacier*. André Dacier, Præfatio in Horatii Satiras, printed with the edition of Horace in usum Delphini. (Professor Ker notes that Dacier's translation of Horace was published in the years 1681-89, and contained a Preface sur les Satires d'Horace, which was published in English in 1692, in Gildon's Miscellany Poems. Only the Latin form of this preface has been accessible to the present editor.) Notes and illustrations by Dacier are also found in the Delphin Horace.
- The Dauphin's Juvenal*. The Delphin editions (so called because they were prepared in usum Delphini, for the use of the Dauphin)

- of the Latin writers, with their copious notes, seem to have been those regularly used by Dryden.
52. Julius Scaliger. An Italian scholar (1484–1558), whose Poetices Libri Septem, i. 12, gives the etymology of satire referred to on the next page.
- 294¹, 36. Hook'd nose. Casaubon quotes from Isidorus: Satyri homunciones sunt aduncis naribus (l. i, c. 2, p. 85).
- 294², 1. Aristotle, etc. What follows, to 295², 26, is a free epitome of the first chapter of Casaubon, with some hints from Dacier.
- 296¹, 1. Libertasque, etc. HORACE, 2 Epistles, i, 147–155.
10. The law, etc. Dryden found this law in a note by Dacier on this passage, in the Delphin Horace. It is not genuine, being made up on the basis of Cicero, Rep. iv, 10 (12).
24. Thespis, etc. In this paragraph Dryden follows Casaubon (l. i, c. 5), but in mentioning dramatic contests at the Olympic games he makes a blunder that is all his own!
48. The story, etc. Appended to the 1605 edition of Casaubon's work is Cyclops Euripidae Latinitate donata a Q. Septimo Florente Christiano. One may doubt whether Dryden had read the original.
- 296², 44. The definition, etc. v. Casaubon, l. i, c. 3, pp. 130, 131.
- 297¹, 1. Silli. v. Casaubon, l. ii, c. 3, pp. 281–287. The editor cannot find that Casaubon anywhere derives σίλλοι from Σειληνός.
- 297², 5. Dacier. Whom Dryden now proceeds to follow, even in the quotations from Quintilian (Inst. Orat. x. 1. 93) and Horace (1 Satires, x. 66).
20. Than that satire. The careless repetition of than is probably due to Dryden rather than to the printer.
27. Σάθυ. Scaliger, Poet. i. 12; quoted, according to Ker, in the preface to the Delphin Juvenal; σάθυ should be σάθυ.
40. Casaubon. l. ii, c. 4, pp. 317 f. The following discussion is mainly from the same writer, with some hints from Dacier.
- 298¹, 3. Prémices. A French word.
11. Lancibus, etc. Georgics, ii. 194, 394.
21. Tack'd bills. "When a measure was tacked to a money bill, so as to force its acceptance in the House of Lords." KER.
33. Porphyrius. Casaubon (l. ii, c. 4, pp. 319, 323) gives the name correctly. Porphyrio; Dryden is misled by his frequent references to Porphyrius, as l. i, c. 2, pp. 82, 83.
- 298², 8. Tarsians, etc. From Casaubon, l. i, c. 5, pp. 201, 202.
10. Scaramucha. "The Italian comedy had been much in favor in Paris from the time of Charles IX; the most famous of all Scaramouches, Tiberio Fiorelli, was still alive when Dryden was writing this essay." [KER.] Scaramouche is a boaster and clown who is in mortal fear of the agile Harlequin. C. D. (Names.)
18. Perhaps, etc. This sentence seems not to be from Casaubon or Dacier, and is probably a guess by Dryden. It is contradicted in the next sentence.
39. Soldiers, etc. Dryden here draws on Heinsius (p. 17), who quotes the Latin verses from Suetonius.
- 299¹, 15. In the Tuscan language, etc. From Dacier, who refers to Livy, vii. 2.
31. Livius Andronicus. v. Casaubon, l. i, c. 1, pp. 238 f.
- 300¹, 1. The people, etc. On what follows, v. Dacier, and Casaubon (l. ii, c. i, pp. 241 f.).
- 300², 7. As Scaliger observes. The editor cannot find that Scaliger observes this, but Aristotle (Poetics, iv. 8) and Rigaltius do.
14. Horace, etc. Dacier says that Horace copied Ennius, but he says nothing about Virgil's doing so.
42. Persius. v. 378, 20–26; 381, n. 3. This story seems not to be quoted by Dacier or Casaubon in the essays that Dryden is following.
54. Of Pacuvius, etc. In the following paragraphs Dryden follows Dacier.
- 301¹, 18. Quid, etc. 2 Satires, i, 62, 63.
24. Quintilian. Cf. 297², 13; n. 297², 5.
39. Ennius and Pacuvius. This is Dacier's view; Casaubon makes Lucilius the first follower, in Latin satire, of the spirit of the Greek Old Comedy: v. n. 301², 1.
- 301², 1. Dacier, etc. Dryden here follows Dacier in a total misinterpretation of Casaubon, who says distinctly: "Differentia præcipua Lucilianæ satiræ ab Enniana non fuit in genere carminis" (l. ii, c. 3, p. 273). The conclusion of Dryden's paragraph (l. 54 f.) is translated almost literally from Dacier: "Douzam quoque F[ilium] fefellit iste Diomedis locus. Hoc non eo dixi quod errorem levem tantorum virorum notare gaudeam, sed solum ut demonstrarem, quanta cum cura et cautela eorum opera legere oporteat, ubi de re agitur obscura adeo et antiqua." This is instructive as to Dryden's general methods of work. Casaubon's real doctrine is that Lucilius differed from Ennius in subject matter and manner of treatment: "Nam spectavit quidem ad doctrinam morum utraque hæc satira, sed Lucilius multo magis quam Ennius personis adhesit. . . . Qua in re . . . visus dictusque fuit, mutato genere metri et facie poeseos, præcam Atheniensium comædiam retulisse." From this to the view of Dacier is not a long step.
- 302¹, 19. Varronian satire. The account of this topic is taken from Casaubon (l. ii, c. 2, pp. 256–270) and Dacier.
30. Quintilian. Inst. Orat. x. 1. 95.
- 302², 4. Academics. Acad. i. 2.
31. Σπουδαγέλοιοι. Rather, "blending jest with earnest."
- 303¹, 12. Petronius. The reference is to a supplement to Petronius published at about this time, which Bentley styles, in the introduction to his Dissertation upon Phalaris, "that scandal to all forgeries:" Pet. Arb. Satyricon cum fragmentis Albæ Græcæ recuperatis anno 1688, Col. Agr. 1691. Other editions were

- published at London, Paris, and Rotterdam in 1693 (Graesse, Trésor de Livres Rares).
22. Mock deification. The Apocolocyntosis, or Pumpkinification, a satire on Claudius.
27. Barclay's Euphormio. John Barclay (1582-1621), most famous as the author of the Argenis, adapted the style of Petronius to the needs of his own time. His first work, Satyricon, was published under the name of Euphormio Lusitinus.
- A volume. "Most probably the Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum." KER. This was a collection of satirical letters in dog-Latin, published in 1515-17, of which Crotus Rubianus and Ulrich von Hutten were the chief authors.
- 303², 2. Satyr. In the present volume the spelling satire is substituted, since the general practice of the edition is to employ modern spelling.
10. Rigaltius. Dryden greatly expands the hint taken from this critic.
- 304¹, 10. Sir Matthew Hale. This judge (1609-76) was universally celebrated for his justice and integrity. — F reads Hales, which perhaps should have been retained, as rather Dryden's error than the printer's.
33. Casaubon. His edition of Persius, with Prolegomena, to which Dryden constantly refers in the following pages, was published in 1605; Stelluti's in 1630.
- 304², 5. More corrupted. "This is a strange mistake in an author who translated Persius entirely and great part of Juvenal. The satires of Persius were written during the reign of Nero, and those of Juvenal in that of Domitian and later. This error is the more extraordinary, as Dryden mentions, a little lower, the very emperors under whom these poets flourished." [SCOTT.]
14. A Scotch gentleman. "David Wedderburn, of Aberdeen (1580-1646), whose edition of Persius, with a commentary, was published posthumously at Amsterdam, 1661." [SCOTT.]
34. A young man. Persius is said to have died in his twenty-eighth year (A. D. 62), and Lucan in his twenty-sixth (A. D. 65).
- 305¹, 16. Imitatio. "Casaubon's edition is accompanied cum Persiana Horatii imitatione." SCOTT.
- 305², 17. Even Horace. Casaubon does add this of Horace, Prolegomena, p. 8 (in Duesbner's edition, Leipzig, 1833). Most of the learning in this paragraph Dryden takes direct from these Prolegomena.
24. Cornutus. Cf. 372², Arg.
47. Holyday. Barten Holyday (1593-1661) was born at Oxford. His Persius appeared in 1618, his Juvenal not till 1673. v. 321.
- 306¹, 29. Χελώνης. Properly, tortoise; Dryden adapts the proverb rather than mistranslates it.
- 307¹, 11. Bishop of Salisbury. Burnet; cf. 250, 2415, n. Dryden here mentions his Discourse of the Pastoral Care (1692) with apparent respect.
- 307², 11. But Horace, etc. "Dryden alludes to the beautiful description which Horace has given of his father's paternal and watchful affection, in 1 Satires, vi. Wycherley, the friend for whom he wishes a father of equal tenderness, after having been gayest of the gay, applauded by theaters, and the object of a monarch's jealousy, was finally thrown into jail for debt, and lay there seven long years, his father refusing him any assistance." [SCOTT.]
- 308¹, 2. Non nostrum, etc. VIRGIL, Ec. iii. 108, slightly altered; cf. 427, 167, 168.
11. He who says, etc. v. Odes, iv. 2. 1-4.
- 308², 19. Possess'd, etc. Cf. 246, 2133, n.
40. Lampooners. Cf. 261², 20, n.
- 309¹, 28. Juvenal is the more delightful. Contrast 181¹, 1, 2, written only seven years before. Dryden in his earlier work quotes Horace more often than Juvenal.
- 309², 23. Ne sententiæ, etc. Sat. 118. Bossu, Traité du Poëme Epique, vi. 4, 5, dwells on this idea at length.
44. Omne, etc. PERSIUS, i. 116, 117; cf. 361, 227-230.
- 310¹, 54. Plain Dealer. Wycherley, author of the comedy of that name.
- 310², 11. On carpet-ground. Cf. 177¹, 51, n.
- 311¹, 10. Non tu, etc. Ec. iii. 26, 27; cf. 425, 36, 37.
- 311², 37. Dion Cassius. Dion, liv. 27, tells the anecdote of Sisenna, but makes no such express intimation as Dryden would have us believe. Dryden presumably is quoting, as usual, from some secondary authority.
- 312¹, 8. Primus, etc. TACITUS, Annals, i. 72. This paragraph is based on the notes to this passage in the Delphin Tacitus, where are found the quotations from Suetonius (Augustus, 55) and "Aurelius," used by Dryden.
49. Aurelius. Dryden evidently regards this person as a Roman historian. As the form of citation in the Delphin Tacitus indicates, he was really a commentator, Louis (Ludovicus) d'Orleans, who published at Paris, in 1622, Novæ Cogitationes in Libr. Annalium C. Cornelii Taciti, qui extant. The editor of the Delphin Tacitus somewhat abbreviated the note by d'Orleans in transferring it to his own edition.
- 313¹, 22. Heinsius, etc. This is in accord with Heinsius's general theory of the connection between Roman satire and Greek dramatic poetry.
31. Scruul, etc. PERSIUS, i. 114, 115; cf. 361, 223-226.
34. Ense, etc. JUVENAL, i. 165, 166; cf. 326, 251-253.
38. "Thy chang'd, etc. Dryden has been making extensive use of Holyday's preface to his translation of Juvenal and Persius, Oxford, 1673. The passage here put in quotation marks is not taken literally from him, but represents his general sense.
55. Stapylton. Cf. 79¹, 15, n. Stapylton had published a translation of the first six satires of Juvenal in 1644, and a complete version in 1647.
- 313², 46. Jack Ketch. Cf. 156¹, 30; 210, 3, n.
55. Too witty, etc. "This is a strange averment, considering the Poetical Reflections on Absalom and Achitophel by a Person of Honour, in composing and publishing which the Duke of Buckingham showed much resentment and very little wit." [SCOTT.]

This tract is assigned to Buckingham only on the evidence of Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses. On Buckingham, cf. 116, 544, n.

314¹, 27. Ense rescindendum. Cf. 109², 33, n.

314², 12. Sarmentus, etc. v. 1 Satires, v, vii.

26. Mr. Swan. Professor Ker points out that the fame of this punster is preserved by Swift, Dennis, and others, as well as by Dryden.

315², 4. Noble similitude. Dacier took this similitude, along with most of his other material that is of any value, from Casaubon (l. i, c. 2, pp. 62-64), who, however, uses it in a different connection. It goes back ultimately to Plato, Symposium, 215 A.

49. The words of Virgil. Cf. 583, 405-412.

316¹, 30. Nomen, etc. Georgics, iii. 47, 48; cf. 465, 81, 82.

37. Maidwell. This may have been Lewis Maidwell, who published, in 1705, An Essay upon the Necessity and Excellency of Education.

316², 12. Quicquid, etc. Juvenal, i. 85, 86; cf. 324, 130-132.

28. Satire, etc. Heinsius, p. 54.

317¹, 13. Grande sophos. "An oversight for the grande aliquid of Persius, i. 14. Grande sophos, 'the loud bravo,' occurs three times in Martial." [KER.] Dryden took the mistake, if it must be called such, from Rigaltius, who speaks (p. 2, col. 1) of the grande Persii sophos.

50. Donne. Cf. 270², 4, n.

317², 30. Mascardi. Professor Ker traces the reference to his Discorso del' Unità della Favola Drammatica, in his Prose Volgari, 1630.

32. Guarini. The Pastor Fido of Guarini (1537-1612), published in 1590, and the Aminta of Tasso are the most famous of the Italian pastoral dramas; cf. 420², 4-11.

318¹, 47. Persius, etc. Dryden is again indebted to Casaubon's Prolegomena.

318², 23. Hudibras. v. 238, 1541, n. Dr. Johnson states in his Life of Dryden, without citing any authority, that Butler "is said" to have joined Buckingham in the attack on Dryden in The Rehearsal. If this be true, Dryden had evidently fully forgiven him.

51. Such a little instrument. "Dryden, in his Letter to Sir George Etherege (v. 214, 215), has shown, however, how completely he was master even of a measure he despised." [SCOTT.]

319¹, 30. Tassoni. (F reads Tassone.) Alessandro Tassoni (1565-1635) published his Secchia Rapita (The Rape of the Bucket) in 1622.

Boileau. The first four cantos of his Lutrin (Lecturn) were published in 1674, the remaining two in 1683.

32. Merlin Coccaius. The assumed name of Teofilo Folengo (1491-1544), an Italian poet who wrote in macaronic (burlesque Latin) verse. Badus is the hero of his comic epic Macaronæa.

37. Stanza of eight. Cf. 741¹, 34, n.

46. Scarron. Paul Scarron (1610-60), the first part of whose Virgile Travesti had appeared in 1648.

319², 3. Nec, etc. Æneid, iv. 365-367 (cf. 570, 522-525), which Boileau imitated in his Lutrin, near the opening of the second canto. He later canceled the passage containing these verses, which do not appear in the editions subsequent to 1682. In the second line of the quotation horloger is a mistake of Dryden or the printer for l'horloger.

19. Admiranda, etc. Georgics, iv. 3-5, 208, 209; cf. 476, 3-7; 480, 303-305.

41. Turns of words, etc. Cf. 385², 5 f; 513¹, 7 f; 744¹, 25 f. See Professor C. H. Herford's introduction (§ 24) to Spenser's Shepherds Calender, London, 1895; and Puttenham, The Arte of English Poesie (ed. Arber), p. 213.

48. Mackenzie. "Sir George Mackenzie (1636-91) of Rosehaugh was Lord Advocate for Scotland during the reigns of Charles II and his successor. His works are voluminous, and upon various subjects, but chiefly historical and juridical. He left, however, an heroic romance, Aretina, a poem called Calia's Country House, and some essays on moral subjects. His having been the zealous agent of the crown during the cruel persecution of the fanatical Cameronians renders him still execrated among the common people of Scotland. But he was an accomplished scholar, of lively talents and ready elocution, and very well deserved the appellation of a noble wit of Scotland." [SCOTT.]

50. Sir John Denham. Cf. 91; 512², 5; 514¹, 52, n; 744², 52, n.

320¹, 12. Cowley. Cf. 181¹, 45, n.

40. Walsh. William Walsh (1663-1708), critic and minor poet. Dryden had written a preface for his Dialogue concerning Women, published in 1691: v. SS. xviii. 1-7. He is known in literary history as the friend of Pope as well as of Dryden. The life of Walsh in Anderson's British Poets states that in 1692 he published A Collection of Letters and Poems, Amorous and Gallant; the present editor has been unable to find any other mention of this book. Walsh's Preface, as printed in the same collection, does not contain any such statement as is here referred to by Dryden. For another mention of Walsh, v. 708², 36.

53. Heu, etc. Met. xv. 88-90; cf. 881, 125-128.

320², 5. Tum, etc. CATULLUS, lxiv. 143-148.

14. Si, nisi, etc. Heroides [xv.] 39, 40, with a change of facie into forma. This epistle is of doubtful authenticity.

22. Cum, etc. Georgics, iv. 488, 489; cf. 485, 702-705.

30. Prosodia. Cf. 512¹, 36-42.

43. Abraham. v. Genesis xviii. 23-33.

321², 17. Pulverulenta, etc. Æneid, viii. 596, misquoted; the first word should be quadripedante.

323, 14. The Centaurs' fury. v. 857-863, 292-705.

62. Thrice concocted blood. Professor Saintsbury thinks that this is a reminiscence of the phrase my thrice decocted blood, in the last line of some verses headed Ignoto, attributed to Marlowe.
- 324, 122. S—ll. Shadwell: v. B. S. xxviii, xxix; 134, 15, n: cf. 196, 35, n.
- 327, 24. Basket, etc. Cf. 344, 703.
- 334, 39 (Arg.). Sir C. S. v. 136, 163, n.
- 335¹, 26. Every vice, etc. The metaphor is from dicing; a loader is a doublet.
- 335², 31. Venerably. F reads ven'rably.
- 336, 55. Bachelor. Batchelour in F; but the forms bachiler, batcheler, in use in Dryden's time, will account for the rhyme. Perhaps one of them should have been printed in the text.
90. Secure . . . of. Safe from finding.
- 337, 153. Grisly. F reads griesly.
184. A fire. So F: perhaps we should read a fire.
- 339, 278. Ζωή και ψυχή! Life and soul. (ψυχή in the text of the present edition is a mistake for ψυχή.)
- 341, 479, 480. Knows . . . drain. The discrepancy in number is a sign of Dryden's carelessness.
- 342, 538. Fame. Dryden introduces a Virgilian reference not found in his original: cf. 567, 252-274.
571. Tabors, etc. v. n. 205, 150
- 343, 578. Mood and figure. Terms of formal logic.
586. Priscian. A Roman grammarian of the fifth century: the mention of him here is of course an anachronism on Dryden's part.
- 344, 675. Ice. F reads yce.
688. Runs. Contrast smile in the next line; the careless grammar shows Dryden's haste in writing, or heedlessness in reading proof. Cf. 479, 264-266; 400, 1031, n.
703. Basket, etc. Cf. 327, 24.
- 345, 736. Adulter. F reads Adul'ter.
805. His mother's love. "Hippomanes is a lump of flesh on the forehead of a newborn foal which the dam was supposed to tear off with her teeth. It is also applied to a humor which runs from mares [v. 470, 443]. In any case, it was supposed to stimulate the sexual passions, and also to drive people mad." J. D. Lewis, note on Juvenal, vi. 133.
- 347, n. 33. Sicilian tyrants. Cf. 369, nn. 5, 6.
- n. 49. Linus. A mistake of Dryden or the printer for Lynceus.
- 348, 41. The pair of sages. Democritus and Heraclitus; cf. 442², 3, n.
76. Heaven. F reads Heav'n.
- 349, 135. Plays least in sight. "An obscure phrase. If, as one would think, it equals keeps out of the way, this would not go very well with met." [SAINTSBURY.]
- 351, 279. "Death, etc. The quotation marks, emphasizing the aphorism, are retained from F.
- 352, 359. Shoulder pains. F reads Shoulders pain.
- 353, 435. Fever. F reads Favour.
- 355, n. 23. Phædria. A blunder for Phædra, either by Dryden or by the printer.
- n. 24. Patius. A mistake for Pratus.
- n. 25. Hostia. i. e. Ostia.
- THE SIXTEENTH SATIRE OF JUVENAL. The authenticity of this satire has been questioned.
- 356¹, 4 (Arg.). Standing army. Dryden loses no opportunity of expressing his dislike of a standing army, the establishment of which was an important part of King William's policy. Cf. 489², 39, n: 743², 2; 777, 672; 799, 596-601.
- 360, 194. The Mimallonian crew. Cf. 725, 608.
199. Evion. The cry of the Bacchantes.
- 364, 102. Phlegm. F reads feam, which might well have been retained, to mark the rhyme.
- 365, n. 6. Esculapius. F reads Esculapius. On the story here told of Alexander, cf. 751, 133, 134. The passage in Sir Thomas Browne to which Dryden refers is, as Professor Saintsbury shows: "I do think that many mysteries ascribed to our own inventions have been the courteous revelations of spirits." (Religio Medici, i. § 31.)
- n. 7 (l. 2). Treasures . . . was kept. The slip in grammar is perhaps only a printer's error, but cf. 400, 1031, n.
- 367, 126. Conquest and Gibbons. On William Gibbons (1649-1728), v. 709¹, 13; 785, 82; cf. 196, 35, n.
- 370, 6 (Arg.). Lucan, etc. In Pharsalia, i. 33-38, Lucan explains that, if civil war were needed to secure the happy reign of Nero, he makes no complaint: "If such be the reward, even crimes and sin are pleasing." The compliment has sometimes been regarded as sarcastic.
- 35 (Arg.). Casaubon. Casaubon's theory has not been accepted by modern scholars.
- 371, 50. "Say, etc. F gives no indication of the changes of speakers in this line. In general, it is somewhat difficult to settle the position of quotation marks in this satire: they are not used in F.
- 372, n. 7. This note, and a few words from the following, are here omitted, — the only case of expurgation in the present edition.
- Dr. Busby*. Richard Busby (1606-95), headmaster of Westminster School from 1638. Though famous for his severity, he was beloved by his pupils.
- 374, 80. Dodder'd. F reads Doddard. v. GLOSSARY.
- 375, 212. Bethlem's, etc. v. 131, 285, n.
- 376, 215. Brown george. "A loaf of a coarse kind of brown bread." N. E. D.
- 377, n. 21. Sedley. v. 136, 163, n. Sedley founded his Bellamira on Terence's Eunuchus.
382. EXAMEN POETICUM. The mottoes are Georgica, iv. 100, 101, 157: cf. for the first, 478, 152, 153; the second means: "They place in the center what they have sought for." The quotations are appropriate for a book of which the title is, A Poetic Swarm of Bees.
- The dedication of this volume was not successful financially, and bade fair to involve Dryden in difficulties with the government.

In a letter to Tonson of August 30, 1693, he writes:

"I am sure you thought my Lord Radclyffe wou'd have done something: I gness'd more truly, that he cou'd not; but I was too far ingag'd to desist; though I was tempted to it, by the melancholique prospect I had of it. . . .

"About a fortnight ago I had an intimation from a friend by letter, that one of the Secretaries, I suppose Trenchard, had inform'd the Queen, that I had abus'd her Government, (those were the words) in my Epistle to my Lord Radcliffe; and that thereupon, she had commanded her Historiographer, Rymer, to fall upon my plays; which he assures me is now doing. I doubt not his malice, from a former hint you gave me; and if he be employ'd, I am confident 't is of his own seeking, who, you know, has spoken slightly of me in his last critique: and that gave me occasion to snarl againe." v. n. 383², 21. After this, however, Rymer never fell upon Dryden's plays, at least in print.

Lord Radcliffe. "Lord Radcliffe was the eldest son of Francis, Earl of Derwentwater. He married Mary Tudor, a natural daughter of Charles II by Mary Davies." [SCOTT.]

382¹, 20. The same parts, etc. There was a story, mentioned for example by Settle in his Absalom Senior, that Dryden once wished to enter the priesthood. This Dryden elsewhere denies; cf. 748², 61 f.

382², 23. The best poet, etc. The Earl of Dorset, v. n. 282. The following quotation is from a satirical epistle by Dorset, To Mr. Eduard Howard, on his Incomparable, Incomprehensible Poem, called The British Princes:

Wit, like tierce claret, when 't begins to pall,
Neglected lies, and 's of no use at all;
But, in its full perfection of decay,
Turns vinegar, and comes again in play.

(Howard, against whom Dorset's wit was directed, was Dryden's brother-in-law; cf. 907, 192.)

383¹, 2. Zoili and Momi. The name of Zoilus, a Greek grammarian famous for his attacks on Homer, became proverbial as that of a carping critic. Momus was a mythical personage, the personification of mockery and censure; cf. 901, 13 f.

4. He who, etc. Dryden may refer to Carvilius Pictor, who, according to Donatus, wrote a book called Aneidomastix.

20. Petronius, etc. Sat. 118-124. Dryden may be indebted to Rapin, Reflexions sur la Poetique, ii. 15.

27. Scaliger. Scaliger attacks Homer in his Poetices Libri Septem, v. 3; in the following book (called Hypercriticus) he attempts to mend Claudian, and censures Lucan, as Dryden states: Interdum mihi latrare, non canere videtur.

57. Non ingeniis. 2 Epistles, i. 88, 89, quoted inaccurately, from memory: "He does not support buried genius, but attacks our writings; us and our writings he maliciously dislikes."

383², 21. But there is, etc. The following passage refers to Rymer — cf. B. S. xxiii, xxiv; n. 382 (Ex. Poet.) — who in 1692 (v. Malone, I, 2, 30: title-page reads 1693) had published a new critical work, A Short View of Tragedy, its Original, Excellency, and Corruption, with some Reflections on Shakespeare and other Practitioners for the Stage, in which he continued his depreciation of the English school of tragedy. In his first chapter he gives an account of the Persæ of Æschylus, and sketches a plan for a similar English tragedy, to be called The Invincible Armado. He concludes his chapter: "If Mr. Dryden might try his pen on this subject, doubtless to an audience that heartily love their country, and glory in the virtue of their ancestors, his imitation of Æschylus would have better success, and would pit, box, and gallery far beyond anything now in possession of the stage, however wrought up by the unimitable Shakespeare." But, in this seemingly complimentary passage, pit, box, and gallery is a phrase that Buckingham had made famous by putting it into the mouth of Mr. Bayes in The Rehearsal (act i), and the covert condemnation of Dryden's praises of Shakespeare, and of his actual dramatic performance, is sufficiently pointed.

In a letter to Dennis, dated by Malone in March, 1694, Dryden writes: "You see what success this learned critick has found in the world, after his blaspheming Shakespeare. Almost all the faults which he has discover'd are truly there; yet who will read Mr. Rymer, or not read Shakespeare? For my own part I reverence Mr. Rymer's learning, but I detest his ill-nature and his arrogance. I indeed, and such as I, have reason to be afraid of him, but Shakespeare has not." (Malone, I, 2, 35.) Cf. 287², 30, n.; 410, 47, n.; 412², 48, n. Dryden seems later to have become reconciled to Rymer: v. 741¹, 50 f.

56. Quantum mutatus. "A reference to the Epistle Dedicatory of Rymer's Short View (to Lord Dorset): 'Three, indeed, of the epic (the two by Homer and Virgil's Æneids) are reckon'd in the degree of perfection, but amongst the tragedies, only the Ædipus of Sophocles. That by Corneille, and by others, of a modern cut, quantum mutatus.'" KER. This is a direct attack on the Ædipus of Dryden and Lee, made more cutting by being addressed to Dryden's favorite patron; cf. 282, n.; 412, 48, n.; 413, 49.

384¹, 14. Perrault. Charles Perrault (1628-1703) in his Parallèle des Anciens et des Modernes (1688-96) maintained the superiority of the modern writers of France to those of Greece and Rome. He was opposed by most of the great literary men of France, above all by Boileau.

22. A chorus. Rymer's Short View begins: "What reformation may not we expect now that in France they see the necessity of a chorus to their tragedies? . . . The chorus was the root and original, and is certainly always the most necessary part of tragedy."

33. Poetry and good sense. The close coupling of these two expressions is characteristic of Dryden and of his time.
- 384², 5. Horace. 1 Satires, x. 1-8.
- 385¹, 11. Propriety. v. 177², 5, n.
19. Mr. Chapman. See his poem To the Reader, prefaced to his Iliad, and his prose Preface.
34. Sandys. v. 88¹, 4, n; 740², 40.
- 385², 5. Turns, etc. Cf. 319², 41, n; 513¹, 7 f; 744¹, 25 f.
48. Musas, etc. "To worship soverer Muses;" cf. 75², 24, n; 512¹, 36, n.
- 386¹, 8. Congreve. Congreve really translated two selections, Priam's Lamentation and Petition to Achilles for the Body of his Son Hector, and The Lamentations of Hecuba, Andromache, and Helen, over the Dead Body of Hector.
28. Runs off her bias. "Said of a bowl that does not run true." KER. Cf. 136, 189, n.
- 386², 40. Sir Samuel Tuke. Dryden quotes A modest . . . own, from the prologue to Tuke's Adventures of Five Hours.
- 387, 5. And add, etc. "This odd phrase merely means, 'Let them go on unbroken.'" SAINTSBURY.
80. Frozen Wagon. "The constellation of the Great Bear (Charles's Wain)." SAINTSBURY.
- 390, 227. Louvre. Dryden here translates admirably the conceit of Ovid, whose word is Palatia, the palace of the Cæsars. Had he been well disposed to the English government, he would doubtless have used Whitehall instead of Louvre; cf. 132, 21.
- 392, 417. The stag, etc. "Dryden, not Ovid, is answerable for the speed of the stag's exertions in the water." [SCOTT.]
- 393, 489. Our father. Dryden is somewhat inaccurate: Deucalion was the son of Prometheus, and Pyrrha the daughter of Epimetheus, the brother of Prometheus. Deucalion had addressed Pyrrha as sister only as a mark of tenderness.
- 395, 680. Follow, not. The comma is not found in the 1693 ed.; Ovid has non insequor hostis.
- 396, 718. As when, etc. Cf. 38, 521-528.
- 400, 1031. Cease. The form of the verb is affected by the plural immediately preceding: cf. 439, 38; 558, 568; 589, 869; 634, 732; 813, 115, n; 858, 339. The construction is probably due rather to carelessness than to any settled principle of grammar. Cf. 344, 688, n.
- 402, 109. Daughter of the Sun. Pasiphaë: cf. 432, 68-86; 594, 33-46; 601, 604; 722, 325-369.
- 403, 208. Rites, etc. The 1693 ed. punctuates as follows: Rites, . . . Love: . . . Marriage, . . . aid; . . .
- 405, 112. Latter. Perhaps this should be emended to later.
166. And she's. So SS.; the 1693 ed. reads and is, which certainly cannot be correct.
- 406², 4 (Song). Invert the year. Cf. 241, 1732, n. VENI CREATOR SPIRITUS. Cf. headnote, p. 919.
7. Uncreated light. v. Genesis i. 3, in contrast to i. 1, 7.
8. Paraclete. So in 1693 ed.; cf. Paraclete, l. 39.
- 410, 1. As. A comma should be inserted after this word.
9. Provided, etc. "This seems to be an allusion to the pretended dukedom of Marine, in Beaumont and Fletcher's Noble Gentleman, which had been revived (in an altered form) in 1688, by Durfey, under the title of A Fool's Preferment; or, The Three Dukes of Dunstable.
- Gent.* Hark you, sir: the king doth know you are a duke.
- Mar.* No! does he?
- Gent.* Yes, and is content you shall be; but with this caution,
That none know it but yourself; for, if you do, He'll take it away by act of parliament.
- Mar.* Here is my hand; and, whilst I live or breathe,
No living wight shall know I am a duke.
Act v (near close)." [SCOTT.]
47. Shakespeare's critic. Rymer: v. 287², 30, n. Rymer's own tragedy, Edgar; or, The English Monarch (published 1678, reprinted in 1691 and 1693) was a complete failure; it was never acted.
- 411¹, 2. The poet's dead. Cf. Prologue, l. 34.
7. Dalinda. The hoodwinking of the foolish Sancho by the crafty Dalinda (who of course speaks this epilogue) forms the underplot of the play.
- 411², 25. The fire, etc. There is a possible reminiscence of Milton's:
— yet from those flames
No light; but rather darkness visible. —
Paradise Lost, l. 62, 63.
- 412¹, 7 (CONGREVE). Janus. The god Janus was fabled to have reigned as king in Italy, having his city near the hill Janiculum. Here he hospitably received Saturn, who was fleeing from his son Jupiter, and from whom he learned husbandry and other arts. Cf. 630, 425-432; 631, 467-470. Dryden here assigns to him a part that belongs rather to Saturn himself.
- 412², 14. Second temple. Referring to the rebuilding of the Jewish temple on the return from exile. v. Ezra v, vi. It was inferior to the temple of Solomon: v. Haggai ii. 1-3.
15. Vulturnus. The most famous Roman writer on architecture.
30. Wycherley. Called Manly in allusion to the name of the hero of his comedy, The Plain Dealer.
32. Nor. The 1694 ed., by an evident misprint, reads Now; Nor is found in the collected edition of Congreve's works, 1710.
35. Fabius. Scipio, on his return to Rome after successes in Spain, against the Carthaginians, was elected consul, though below the legal age. His policy of carrying the war into Africa was opposed by the old Fabius, who was in part moved by jealousy of the youthful conqueror. Dryden has either made a blunder in his allusion, or he wishes to imply that, had Scipio been as charming as Congreve, Fabius might have rejoiced in his success, instead of envying it.
39. Romano. Dryden has made a serious mistake: Giulio Romano (1492-1546) was younger than Raphael (1483-1520), and was his pupil, not his master.

48. Tom, etc. "Thomas Shadwell [v. 134, 15, n], who at the Revolution was promoted to Dryden's posts of Poet Laureate and Historiographer Royal, was succeeded in his office of Laureate by Nahum Tate, and in that of Historiographer by Thomas Rymer. Our author was at present on bad terms with Rymer; to whom, not to Tate, he applies the sarcastic title of Tom the Second. [Cf. 383², 21, n; 410, 47, n.] The Earl of Dorset, although as Lord Chamberlain he was obliged to dispose of Dryden's offices to persons less politically obnoxious, bestowed at the same time such marks of generosity on the abdicated Laureate that Dryden here honors him with the title of his patron." [SCOTT.] Cf. 282, n; 291², 22-44.

- 413, 69. His providence. Christie notes that Dryden (Defense of the Epilogue of The Conquest of Granada, SS, iv. 233) condemns Jonson for his ill syntax in writing, "Tho' Heaven should speak with all his wrath at once;" and that he himself, in l. 63 of this poem, uses she referring to Heav'n.

TO SIR GODFREY KNELLER. The title of this epistle in Poems and Translations, 1701, is, To Sir Godfrey Kneller, Principal Painter to his Majesty. That text furnishes the following variants, in addition to those mentioned in the headnote: (73, sidenote) presented to; (95) But oh; (114) Yet not; (145) If yet; (146) 'T is only.

Kneller (1646-1723), born at Lübeck, settled in England in 1675, where he remained until his death.

- 414, 22. Prometheus. Prometheus stole fire from heaven and gave it to mortals; according to another legend, he created men out of earth and water: cf. 174², 74, n; 388, 97-112. Dryden here mingles classical mythology and Scripture in an almost mediæval fashion.

54. Bantam's embassy. "Eight ambassadors from the King of Bantam were in England in 1682, and were treated with distinction by Charles II. Their faces were well known by portraits and engravings." [CHRISTIE.]

73. Shakespeare. "This portrait was copied from one in the possession of Mr. Betterton, and afterwards in that of the Chandos family. The copy presented by Kneller to Dryden is in the collection of Earl Fitzwilliam, at Wentworth House." [SCOTT.]

78. Teucer. Teucer, the best archer of the Greeks, sheltered himself behind the shield of Ajax; v. Iliad, viii. 266-272.

96. Jacob's race. v. Genesis xxvii.

- 100, 101. Thou, etc. This couplet is displeasing, in view of Dryden's earlier adulation of Charles II.

- 415, 145. That yet, etc. "Mr. Walpole says that where Sir Godfrey 'offered one picture to fame, he sacrificed twenty to lucre; and he met with customers of so little judgment that they were fond of being painted by a man who would gladly have disowned his works the moment they were paid for.' The same author gives us Sir Godfrey's apology for preferring the lucrative, though less honorable line, of portrait painting. 'Painters of history (said he) make the dead live, and do not begin to live themselves till they are dead. I paint the living, and they make me live.' Anecdotes of Painting (Works, 1798, vol iii, p. 359). Dryden seems to allude to this expression in ll. 150-154." [SCOTT.]

Walpole quotes Kneller's apology from "the author of the Abregé."

- 416¹. ODE ON PURCELL. Perhaps the last three words of l. 12 should be made into a separate line, to point the rhyme of admir'd and retir'd. Know (l. 20) is printed knew in the separate text of 1696 and in Orpheus Britannicus, but appears as know in the text with music of 1696: cf. rhyme with below. The text with music of 1696 furnishes the following further variants: (6) Heav'nly Lays; (12) the matchless man; (21) turn'd the jarring Spheres; (24) Musick from on high.

PREFACE AND EPILOGUE TO THE HUSBAND HIS OWN CUCKOLD. According to Malone, John Dryden the younger was born in 1667 or 1668 and "probably went to Rome with his elder brother [Charles] about the end of the year 1692." He became an officer of the Pope's household, and seems never to have returned to England. He is said to have died in 1701. Cf. headnote, pp. 281, 282.

- 416², 26 (prose). Two authors. "Probably Southerne and Congreve." SCOTT.

- 417, 13 (Epil.). Third day, etc. Cf. 108, 15, n.

- 418, 36. For tho', etc. Cf. 480, 303.

TRANSLATION OF VIRGIL. In the following notes, the first and second editions are called F1 and F2. When they agree, they are cited as FF. Dryden writes in a letter to Tonson: "You cannot take too great care of the printing this [second] edition exactly after my amendments; for a fault of that nature will disoblige me eternally" (Malone, I, 2, 63). From another letter we know that he "bestow'd nine entire days" on his work of revision (Ibid. 61). Accordingly F2 is made the basis of the present text: its readings are rejected only (a) when they seem evidently due to the printer's carelessness rather than to Dryden's correcting hand; or (b) in a few cases where the change, though probably due to Dryden himself, is obviously a perversion of the text rather than an improvement. Cf. notes on 481, 354; 505¹, 4; 601, 614. Dryden was of course as capable of error in correcting his own work as in other things.

In the errata of F1 occurs the statement: "There are other errata, both in false pointing and omissions of words, both in the preface and the poem, which the reader will correct without my trouble. I omit them, because they only lame my English, not destroy my meaning."

The motto on the title-page is Æneid, ii. 724: "He follows his father with unequal steps."

The headings of some of Dryden's own notes do not correspond exactly with the text of his translation; these discrepancies are here preserved: see, for example, 601, 586, 587, and Dryden's note (p. 712). Cf. n. 281.

419¹. Hugh, Lord Clifford. "The son of Lord Treasurer Clifford, a member of the Cabal administration." [SCOTT.] Cf. 70², n.

6. A narrow choice. "Dryden alludes to his religion and politics. I presume, Hugh, Lord Clifford, was a Catholic, like his father, and entertained the hereditary attachment to the line of Stuart, thus falling within the narrow choice to which Dryden was limited." SCOTT.

18, 19. Pollio . . . Varus. "The well-known patrons of Virgil." [SCOTT.] v. 428, 14; 431, 13. This passage indicates that Dryden was indebted to the elder Clifford for his appointment as Poet Laureate in 1670: v. B. S. xxi.

419², 12. Great climacteric. "The sixty-third year of human life." [WEBSTER.] Cf. 441², 15.

24. He found, etc. "In his prose you come upon passages that persuade you he is a poet, in spite of his verses so often turning state's evidence against him as to convince you he is none. He is a prose-writer, with a kind of Æolian attachment. For example, take this bit of prose from the dedication of his version of Virgil's Pastorals: 'He found . . . better music.' This is charming, and yet even this wants the ethereal tincture that pervades the style of Jeremy Taylor, making it, as Burke said of Sheridan's eloquence, 'neither prose nor poetry, but something better than either.'" LOWELL, Essay on Dryden.

51. Manlius. "Manlius, contrary to the general orders of his father, Manlius Torquatus, engaged and slew a Tusculan noble: his father caused his head to be struck off for disobedience." [SCOTT.]

420¹, 42. In medio, etc. Cf. 426, 60, 61.

420², 6. Shepherds. FF read Shepherd's.

9. Guarini's Pastor Fido. Cf. 317², 32, n.

12. Piscatory Eclogues. Referring to the Eclogæ Piscatorie of the Italian poet Sannazaro (1458-1530). Malone states that they were published, "together with some pieces of Fracastorius and other Italians who have written Latin poetry, by Bishop Atterbury (then a student of Christ Church), in 1681."

18. Fontenelle. Petit de Julleville says of the Pastorales of Fontenelle (1657-1757): "Fontenelle, bel esprit, sec et prosaïque, était l'homme le moins fait pour célébrer la nature et faire parler les bergers." (Leçons de Littérature Française, ii. 141.) In the controversy as to the literary merits of the ancients and the moderns, Fontenelle took the side of the latter.

24. Si Pergama, etc. Æneid, ii. 291, 292; cf. 541, 387, 388.

54. Nec, etc. HORACE, Odes, iv. 4. 31, 32. F1 reads Aquilam Columbæ.

421, 2. Ti'rus. FF read Tity'rus. So in 436, 76; 438, 28.

26. By croaking from the left. F1 reads, With frequent Croakes.

422, 56, 57. What, etc. F2 puts question marks after both these lines; F1 puts one after the second of them.

89. Britons. F1 reads Britians; F2, Britains.

425, 1. Swain. F1 reads Groom.

15. Cropp'd. SS. reads cropt; FF read crept.

426, 88. By turns. F1 reads In turns.

97. My, etc. F1 reads:

With pelted Fruit, me Galatea pyles.

427, 143. Dog-foxes. So SS.; FF read Dog Foxes.

428. THE FOURTH PASTORAL. This piece and The Ninth Pastoral, as is known from a letter of Dryden to Tonson (Malone, I, 2, 52), were printed from Dryden's wife's copy of Miscellany Poems, 1684, the text of which Dryden corrected for his complete Virgil.

3, 4. Delight, etc. The 1684 text reads:

Delight not all, if thither I repair,
My Song shall make 'em worth a Consul's care.

6. Saturnian times. Cf. 630, 425-432.

28. Serpent's. FF read Serpents.

42-44. Another, etc. The 1684 text reads:

Another Argos on th' Iberian shore
Shall land the chosen Chiefs:
Another Ielen other Wars create,
And great Achilles shall be sent to urge the Trojan
Fate.

58. Ready. The 1684 text reads awful.

59. Seed. The 1684 text reads Stem.

63. In crowding ranks. The 1684 text reads stand crowding to 429, 70. In verse. The 1684 text reads with me.

75. The nauseous, etc. The fourteen-syllable line is doubtless intended to symbolize the long qualms and travel of the mother; cf. 129, 94, n.

5. Whether, etc. Dryden has not translated Virgil's line, Tu maior; tibi me est æquum parere, Menalca. Possibly a couplet translating it, on which the whether . . . or depended, disappeared in transcribing the manuscript or in printing; the use of whether . . . or in a direct question is hard to parallel in Dryden. Or the poet may have wished to give only four lines to Mopsus, to correspond with the four given to Menalcas.

430, 104. On both are. F1 reads, On each is.

432, 61. Yet few, etc. This line is not found in F1.

68. The Cretan queen. Pasiphae: cf. 402, 109-120, 594, 33-38, 601, 604; 722, 325-369.

75, 76. Tho' lab'ring, etc. In place of these two lines F1 reads:

The tender and untry'd the Yoke he fear'd.
The soft and white as flakes of falling Snow;
And scarce his budding Horns had arm'd his brow.

434, 97-100. These rhymes, etc. In place of these four lines F1 reads:

I've heard: and, Thyrus, you contend in vain:
For Corydon, young Corydon shall reign,
The Prince of Poets, on the Mantuan Plain.

435, 9. Whether. FF read Whither.

19. Scarce, etc. The text of F1 reads:

Scarce from our upper World the Shades with-
drew, —

- which is changed in the errata to the form here printed.
- 436, 88. Complaints. F1 reads Complaint.
107. Straight. At once (translating the Latin modo).
437. THE NINTH PASTORAL. v. n. 428 (FOURTH PASTORAL). This piece is not ascribed to Dryden in Miscellany Poems, 1684, but is attributed to him in the third edition of that work, published in 1702.
- 7 (Arg.). Pastoral. The 1684 text reads Eclogue.
- 10 (Arg.). Mæris . . . Lycidas. The proper names are not found in the argument of the 1684 text.
9. Furies. The 1684 text reads Devil.
10. Your, etc. The 1684 text reads:
- Good Gods, I heard a quite contrary Tale.
- 438, 22, 23. Now, etc. The 1684 text reads:
- Now Heaven defend! could barbarous rage prevail
So far, the sacred Muses to assail?
26. Praise — that. The 1684 text reads praise that.
43. Free. v. GLOSSARY, and cf. 375, 212.
46. Varus. FF read Varus.
56. On. The 1684 text reads to.
- 439, 91. Request. The 1684 text reads entreat.
38. Drown. Cf. 400, 1031, n.
44. Browse. FF here read Brouze, possibly to point the rhyme; in l. 114 they have browz'd.
- 440². Philip, Earl of Chesterfield. "Philip Stanhope, second Earl of Chesterfield (1633–1713), was a man of considerable talent and political activity, and enjoyed at the court of Charles II several offices, but was now retired." [SCOTT.] Since he had refused to coöperate in the Revolution, had not taken office under William III, and had declined to join the Association in support of William's title, he was one of the small circle of patrons from whom Dryden could select: cf. 419¹, 6, n; 487¹, n. In his youth he had been notorious for dissipation; cf. 441², 43 f. A letter written to him in 1658 by the Lady Elizabeth Howard, later Dryden's wife, has been thought to imply a dishonorable intimacy between them: v. SS. i. 74, 75; cf. B. S. xvii.
- 3 (prose). Quod, etc. Æneid, ix. 6, 7; cf. 638, 7, 8. In the second line of the quotation F2 reads auderit (misprint).
- 441¹, 18. Majesty. F1 reads M —.
44. Horace, etc. Dryden apparently thought that the editions of Horace were arranged in chronological order. In reality, the Satires were, generally speaking, the earliest of the poet's works.
- 441³, 7. The gleanings, etc. v. Judges viii. 2.
12. Jam, etc. Æneid, vi. 304; cf. 599, 420, 421.
15. Great climacteric. v. 419², 12, n.
- 442¹, 5. Principles. Component parts of the body, elements.
30. Dignum, etc. "A man worthy of praise the Muse forbids to die." HORACE, Odes, iv. 8. 28.
42. Digito, etc. "To be pointed at with the finger, and to have people say of him, 'That is he.'" PERCIUS, i. 28; cf. 359, 60, 61.
- 442¹, 3. Heracitus. A Greek philosopher (about 535–475 B. C.), proverbial for his melancholy. He was called "the weeping philosopher" in contrast to Democritus, "the laughing philosopher." Cf. 108¹, 23, n; 348, 41 f.
33. Scipio. Scipio Africanus, the conqueror of Hannibal, in his later years was accused of corruption. He disdained to answer the charges brought against him, and avoided punishment by retiring to his villa at Liternum.
- 443¹, 27. Res, etc. "Wealth gained not by labor, but by inheritance." MARTIAL, x. 47. 3.
33. Qui, etc. "Who has lost his purse." 2 Epistles, ii. 40. Horace tells the story of a soldier, who, after losing his purse, performed prodigies of valor, by which he gained wealth. Once rich, he refused to venture his life further.
52. You, etc. "The second Earl of Chesterfield, * in the latter part of his life, passed much of his time at an elegant villa near Twickenham." MALONE.
- 443², 5. Corycian. v. 478, 479, 186–217.
12. O fortunatos, etc. Georgics, ii. 458, 459; cf. 462, 639–642.
36. Et securo, etc. Georgics, ii. 467, with a change of at to et; cf. 462, 655, 656.
- 6 (Arg.). Compliments. FF read complements.
- 444, 51. Whatever, etc. The following passage is somewhat incoherent, and the punctuation of it is difficult; FF punctuate as follows: (51) obtain, (52) Reign; (54) Mind, . . . above. (55) Retreat, (56) Seal, (57) remove, (58) above.
63. And grant. F1 does not contain these words: for their insertion, cf. 517¹, 2–5.
- 445, 93. Deucalion. v. 392–394, 424–556.
- 447, 212. Deep-mouth. SS. emends to deep-mouthed, perhaps correctly.
- 448, 298. Astræa's Balance. The Balance is of course the symbol of justice; cf. n. 7 (ASTRÆA REDUX).
302. Linseed. FF read Lineseed.
310. Maia. FF read Maja.
337. Southern. "This must be a mistake of the pen or press." [SCOTT, following CAREY.]
- 449, 364. To float, etc. F1 reads:
- The Meads to water, and to fence the Field.
- 452, 614. Früh. In italics in FF, as an unusual word.

- Nor Lightning flash'd from so serene a Sky.
657. Across. F1 reads along.
- 454, 25. Bay. So SS.; FF read Bays.
- 455, 139. And . . . lives. — F1 prints And . . . lives? The errata state: "The note of interrogation is false at the end of the line; it ought to be a period." F2, however, has a comma, which, as the Latin text shows, is undoubtedly correct.
- 456, 207. Rage. So F1; F2 reads Land.
214. Stupendous. FF read stupend'ous, which perhaps should have been retained, as marking a pronunciation stupendjus, the ancestor of the familiar stupenjus. Cf. n. 908, 281.
- 457, 289. Surlly. F1 reads spleenful.

306. The land that joins Vesuvius. F1 reads, Vesuvian Nola.
- 458, 330. Strail. FF read streight.
- 348, 349. Show: yew. For the rhyme, cf. 462, 628, 629.
- 459, 421. In smoky. F1 reads with smoky.
457. (Let me dare to sing). F1 reads (so sweet Poets sing).
- 460-467. Then . . . rise. F1 reads:
 Earth knew no Season then, but Spring alone:
 On the moist Ground the Sun serenely shone:
 Then Winter Winds their blustering Rage forbear,
 And in a silent Pomp proceeds the mighty Year.
 Sheep soon were sent to people flow'ry Fields,
 And salvage Beasts were banish'd into Wilds.
 Then Heav'n was lighted up with Stars; and Man,
 A hard relentless Race, from Stones began.
- 460, 472. When, etc. F1 reads:
 When Infant Nature was with Quiet crown'd.
489. Sturdy. F1 reads strugling.
- 498, 515. Leafs; leaves. So FF: cf. 263¹, 3f, n.
525. At Athens, etc. Cf. 294, 295.
540. Honest face. A translation of caput honestum; cf. 602, 668; 732, 52. This use of honest in the Latin sense of comely, beautiful, is apparently unusual in English of Dryden's time; N. E. D. cites no instance of it later than 1566.
- 461, 576. Nor, etc. "It is probable that Dryden meant to give the sentence a different construction from what it now presents, but, having changed his purpose, forgot to alter the beginning." [SCOTT.]
462. 615. Hear'nly. F1 reads thoughtful.
637. Centaurus'. v. 857-863, 292-705.
671. Astræa. v. n. 7 (ASTRÆA REDUX).
676. Poet's. F1 reads Virgil's.
- 463, 714. Nor, etc. F1 reads:
 Nor with a helpless Hand condoles the Poor.
730. Pop'lar. So F1: F2 reads popular. The passage gives Dryden an opportunity to show his power as a satirist.
731. Or. F1 reads By.
464. THE THIRD BOOK OF THE GEORGICS. Variants found in The Annual Miscellany for the Year 1694 (v. headnote, p. 413) are here marked 4M. It is curious to see that, in ll. 131-233, Dryden, in revising his work, usually returned to the readings of 4M.
- 465, 39. Brūons. Translating Britanni; 4M and FF read Britains.
74. Taygetus. This word, correctly Ta-y'-ge-tus, Dryden apparently pronounced as three syllables, Tay-ge'-tus.
93. Fleck'd. 4M reads steak'd.
- 466, 131. Trumpets. So 4M and F2; F1 reads Trump.
142. Polluz. So 4M and F2; F1 reads Castor.
143. God of Thrace. Mars; cf. 766, 524-529.
145. Grim. So 4M and F2; F1 reads old.
150. Neighb'ring. F1 reads neighbo'ring; 4M and F2, neighbouring. The present text, to be consistent, should read neighbouring.
159. Hasty. So 4M and F2; F1 reads faintly.
162. And his. So 4M and F2; F1 reads with his.
166. Heaving. 4M and F1 read beating.
- 171, 172. And now, etc. So 4M and F2; F1 reads:
 And now aloft; and now alow they fly,
 Now seem to sink in Earth, and now to touch the Sky.
180. Lapithæ. For the story of their combat with the Centaurs, v. 857-863, 292-705.
Add the. So 4M and F2; F1 reads added.
- 467, 203. The longing. So FF; 4M reads th' expect-ing.
223. Close involve. 4M and F1 read, there en-close.
- 224, 225. The male, etc. So 4M and F2; F1 reads:
 No more of Coursers yet: We now proceed
 To teeming Kine; and their laborious breed.
- 4M has a side-note: Here the Poet returns to Cows.
233. Noontide. So 4M and F2; F1 reads Evening.
244. Io's punishment. v. 396-400, 769-1041.
256. Smooth the. 4M and F1 read harrow.
- 468, 298. Untried in. 4M and F1 read Guillless of.
316. Impels the flying car. 4M and F1 read Sustains the goring spurs.
- 469, 357. And rough, etc. In Examen Poeticum (v. headnote, p. 382) is an anonymous piece headed, Amor Omnibus Idem; or, The Force of Love in All Creatures, being a translation of some verses in Virgil's Third Georgick, from verse 209 to verse 285, to which Dryden, in his Postscript to the Reader, refers in terms of high compliment: v. 708², 57 f. But he fails to state that from this piece he took three whole lines (469, 402, 470, 431, 448), and suggestions for many others, for his own translation. The following excerpts will make the matter plain:
 Rough on the flinty Ground all Night he lies.
 [Cf. 469, 357.]
 'Tis with this Rage the Lyonsess is stung,
 When o're the Forrest (mindless of her Young)
 She sternly stalks: 'Tis then the shapeless Bear
 With fierce desire does to the Woods repair,
 And wide Destruction makes.
 [Cf. 469, 381-386.]
 See how the Winds the trembling Stallions fray,
 When first to their sugacious Nostrills they
 The distant Female's well known scent convey!
 [Cf. 469, 391, 392.]
 The Sabine Bour does then prepare to wound,
 And whets his foamy Tusks, and paws the Ground:
 His Sides against the rugged Trees does tare,
 And hardens both his Shoulders for the War.
 [Cf. 469, 397-402.]
 What does the Youth in whose enraged Veins.
 [Cf. 469, 403.]
 — whilst from the Throne
 Of Heav'n its loud Artillery rattles down
 On his devoted Head.
 [Cf. 469, 408.]
 'T were long to tell the spotted Linx's Wars,
 By Love excited: Or the furious Jars
 Of prowling Wolves, or Maatives head-strong Rage:
 Ev'n tim'rous Stags will for their Hinds engage.
 [Cf. 469, 470, 415-418.]

With Rage incens'd they struck their Master dead,
And on his mangled Limbs by piecemeal fed.

[Cf. 470, 424.]

When Spring's soft Fire their melting Marrow
burns
(For 'tis in Spring the lusty warmth returns)
They to the tops of steepest hills repair,
And with wide nostrils snuff the Western Air,
Wherewith conceiving, (wonderful to tell)
Without the Stallions help their Bellies swell.

[Cf. 470, 428-483.]

Till from their lustful Groins at last does fall
Their Off-spring, which the Shepherds rightly call Hippomanes: A slimy, poisonous Juice,
Which muttering Step-Dames in Inchantments
use,
And in the mystick Cup their powerful Herbs infuse.

But time is lost, which never will renew,
Whilst ravish'd, we the pleasing Theam pursue.

[Cf. 470, 428-483.]

403. The youth. Leander, as a side-note in 4M indicates: cf. 193, 23, n.

470, 443. Hippomanes. v. n. 345, 805.

453. What oil. 4M and FF read what Oyl. If the text is right, it must refer to the student's midnight oil, an idea without warrant in the Latin. What toil would be an easy emendation.

472. Cote. 4M and F1 read Cot.

488. Shiv'ring. 4M and F1 read wretched.

490. Rugged. So FF; 4M reads barren.

471, 491. Bleating kids. 4M and F1 read Family.

501. Flow'r. FF read Flower; here altered to flow'r to conform to pow'r above.

510. Creaking. So FF; 4M reads the shrill.

519. To the. So FF; 4M reads in the.

549. West allies. So FF; 4M reads, — Western Sons.

472, 587. Dutch. Dryden here departs slightly from his original for the sake of gratifying his animosity against the Dutch: cf. 5, 84, n; 71, 72.

473, 637. Painful. So FF; 4M reads sweating.

673. Them. 4M and F1 read 'em.

683. Oint. So FF; 4M reads noint.

474, 742. Or. In the sense of before.

475, 808. Phocæ. So FF; 4M reads Sea-Calves.

476, 27. Proud. F1 reads loud.

478, 137. With ease, etc. v. B. S. xxxv, xxxvi. 139. Shap'd to his size. F1 reads, Large are his Limbs.

162. High-flying. Cf. 125¹, 6, n.

479, 226. And, common sons, beneath. FF read, And common Sons, beneath.

253. Labor'd. F1 reads strokes of.

257. Busy. F1 reads native.

266. Pics. Cf. 344, 688, n.

480, 305. Grandsires' grandsons. This is probably an error for grandsires' grandsires, which is adopted by SS.; Virgil has avunculus avorum.

318. Quarrel. So F1; F2 reads Quarrels.

481, 354. And worms, that shun the light. So F1; F2 reads And Lizards shunning Light, a reading also found in the errata to F1. "As lizards have been mentioned in the preceding couplet, the correction itself seems erroneous." [SCOTT.]

366. Man. F1 reads us.

482, 437. Then, etc. Cf. 886, 539-544.

471. Thy hate pursues. F1 reads thou hat'st.

484. Softly. Dryden's construction is confused, but the antithesis with loud shows that the fault is his and not the printer's. SS. reads lofty.

492. Turn the wheel. Dryden's mention of the spinning wheel here is an anachronism, of course without warrant in the original.

495. Sisters'. FF read Sister's.

483, 553. The Vestal fire. That is, the fire of Vesta:

Ter liquido ardentem perfundit nectare Vestam.

484, 589. Will seem. F1 reads he seems.

590. Imitate. F1 reads imitates.

591. Break. F1 reads Breaks.

592. Or hiss a dragon. F1 reads, A Dragon hisses. Dryden's alteration of this line introduces confusion, but has nevertheless been followed, since the poet evidently attempted to change the general construction of the passage. It would be attractive to emend stares to stare and to read snare in the line above.

594. Attempt. F1 reads attempts.

486, 744. Had. So FF; perhaps a misprint for has.

747. And, etc. In place of this line F1 reads:

With one continu'd Tenor still complains;
Which fills the Forrest and the neighb'ring Plains.

On revision Dryden evidently disliked the jingle, complains: plains.

487¹, 801. His. F1 reads their.

811. Arms. So F1; F2 reads Arts, an evident misprint caused by the arts of the following line.

TO THE MOST, etc. The main sources for this Dedication are the following two books:

Le Bossu, René, Traité du Poëme Epique, Paris, 1675. (Here cited by book and chapter.)

Segrais, Jean Regnaud de, Traduction de l'Eneide de Virgile, Paris, 1668. (Cited by the pages of vol. i of that edition.)

The first of these works, though now completely forgotten, was at the time a standard authority in literary criticism. Dryden had previously been much indebted to it: v. B. S. xxiv: 293², 27; n. 287², 26; n. 291¹, 52.

Segrais (1624-1701) was a poet and prose writer of some eminence, a member of the circle of Mme. de La Fayette.

Besides these main sources, Dryden seems to have been somewhat indebted to the following two books:

Dacier, André, La Poétique d'Aristote, traduite en François, avec des remarques critiques sur tout l'ouvrage, Paris, 1692. (Cited by edition of Amsterdam, 1733. Dacier is the same scholar whose work on Horace Dryden used in his Discourse concerning Satire: v. 293², 46, n.)

Rapin, René, Reflexions sur la Poétique. (v. B. S. xxii, xxiii. Dryden had not read this book for a long time, and quotes from memory:

v. 513¹, 30, n. It is here cited by book and chapter of the edition of Amsterdam, 1709.)

John, Lord Marquis of Normanby. v. n. 120, 877. Mulgrave had been a staunch adherent of James II, and during most of the reign of William III was a member of the opposition. In 1696 he, like Chesterfield (v. 440², n), refused to join the Association for the support of William as the "rightful and lawful king," against Jacobite attempts.

1. A heroic poem, etc. The idea is a commonplace; cf. Rapin, ii. 2, 4.

7. The least, etc. Cf. Bossu, ii. 6: "Les épisodes sont les parties nécessaires de l'action, étendus avec des circonstances vrai-semblables." The idea of convenient might be deduced from Rapin, ii. 8, though it is not directly stated there.

487², 11. Novels. Used in the sense of tale, short story; cf. 747², 56.

Ariosto. "The early editions, by an absurd and continued blunder, read Aristotle. Ariosto, and indeed all the heroic Italian poets, Tasso excepted, have checkered their romantic fictions with lighter stories. But neither Ariosto nor his predecessors, Boiardo and Pulci, ever entertained the idea of writing a regular epic poem after the ancient rules. On the contrary, they often drop the mask in the middle of the romantic wonders which they relate, and plainly show how very far they are from considering the narrative as serious. It was, therefore, consistent with their plan to admit such light and frivolous narratives as might relieve the general gravity of their tale, which resembled an epic poem as little as a melodrama does a tragedy." [SCOTT.]

25. Bossu. Op. cit. ii. 8: in general, Bossu is never weary of berating Statius.

48. Prepense. So in SS.; FF read propense.

488¹, 3. Siege. After this word F1 has the following passage: I can think of nothing to plead for him, but what I verily believe he thought himself; which was, that as the Funerals of Anchises were solemniz'd in Sicily, so those of Archemorus should be celebrated in Candy. For the last was an Island; and a better than the first, because Jove was born there.

38. Divina, etc. "Particle of the divine air." HORACE, 2 Satires, ii. 79. Cf. 240, 1728.

45. Within the year. BOSSU (iii. 12) assigns a year as the limit of duration of an epic poem.

488², 7. For which. "A real slip in grammar, it being impossible to adapt it to practic'd." SAINTSBURY.

13. Corneille, etc. See his Troisième Discours — Des Trois Unités.

41. Chymical medicines. "Essences, strong medicines given in small doses; e. g. opium, arsenic, tartar emetic. Galenical decoctions are vegetable remedies, simples, given generally in a large drench. The terms belong to a controversy between the Spagirists or Paracelsians, who used chemical medicines, and the School of Paris, which imposed an oath on its pupils never to use anything of the kind." [KER.]

"We, like subtle chymists, extract and refine our pleasure; while they, like fulsome Galenists, take it in gross." SHADWELL, Epsom Wells, act i.

47. One reason of Aristotle's Poetics, xxvi.

489¹, 29. The courage, etc. "The cant of supposing that the Iliad contained an obvious and intentional moral was at this time established among the critics." [SCOTT.] BOSSU insists that an epic poem is really a fable, teaching a moral just as do the fables of Æsop.

39. The manners of the hero. Dryden's discussion of this topic comes from Bossu, i. 12; iv. 4, 5, 9.

489², 13. Ill habits, etc. The idea is found in Dacier, pp. iv, 87.

25. Quinquina. Peruvian bark, producing quinine; its use was still a novelty in England, dating only from 1655.

39. A subject . . . may lend, etc. This is a bit of sarcasm at the expense of William III, and of the national debt, founded in 1693; cf. 356¹, 4 (Arg.), n.

490¹, 4. Tryphon the stationer. "Bibliopola Tryphon, a character twice mentioned by Martial (iv. 72; xiii. 3); Dryden probably means Tonson." SCOTT.

7. Ruelle. "Properly the space or lane between the bed and the wall; later, the reception of visitors at the lady's toilette; then, generally, any party of ladies and gentlemen that pretended to wit." [KER.] The word is common in the French literature of Dryden's time.

13. The fine woman, etc.

— ut turpiter atrum

Desinat in piscein mulier formosa superne.

HORACE, Ars Poet. 3, 4.

18. Speciosa miracula. "Picturesque marvels." Ibid. 144: cf. 503¹, 32.

20. Antiphanes. So F1; F2 reads Antiphanes.

26. Ne Hercules contra duos. "Not even Hercules against two at once." The saying is first found, in literature, in Plato, Phædo, 89 C.

35. But I have more than once, etc. Cf. 293¹, 47 f. SS. iv. 24, 25. But in An Essay of Dramatic Poesy Dryden seems to agree with Aristotle: v. SS. xv. 369.

490², 11. Puny. "i. e. puisane, junior." [KER.]

42. Anonymous. F1 prints this word in italics.

491¹, 18. Scaliger the Father. "On the contrary, Scaliger in the epistle before his Poëtices Libri Septem says: Nam et Horatius Artem quum inscripsit adeo sine ulla docet arte ut satyree propius totum opus illud esse videatur." [KER.]

42. The next, etc. Longo sed proximus intervallo. Æneid, v. 320. Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered was first published complete in 1581.

52. Fortunam, etc. "The fortune of Priam I will sing, and the noble war." HORACE, Ars Poet. 137. This bad opening line, attributed by Horace to a "cyclic writer," was by some commentators ascribed to Mævius, on whom v. 427, 141. [KER.]

- 491¹, 4. Le Moyne, etc. Cf. 287¹, 32, n.
16. Machining persons. "Supernatural, who come ex machina." [SAINTSBURY.]
30. The style, etc. Bossu (vi. 7) merely says that the expression of both epic poetry and tragedy should be on a high level, "belle, noble, et élevée."
38. Volat, etc. "The irrevocable word flies away." HORACE, 1 Epistles, xviii. 71.
- 492¹, 22. Macrobius. A Roman grammarian of the early part of the fifth century. A large part of his Saturnalia is given up to the criticism of Virgil.
24. Tannequy le Fèvre. (1615-72.) One of the most famous critics of his time, otherwise known as Tanaquillus Faber. An edition of Virgil with notes by him appeared at Saumur in 1675.
25. Valois. "Dryden perhaps means the Vale-siana, ou les Pensées critiques, historiques et morales, et les Poésies Latines de Monsieur de Valois Conseiller du Roi et Historiographe de France, 1694. There are a few notes on Virgil in this collection." [KER.]
- Another*, etc. As Professor Ker indicates, this was probably St. Evremond (1613-1703), a distinguished French critic and satirist, who since 1661 had been living in exile in London. Dryden wrote a supplement to a Character of him, published with a collection of St. Evremond's Miscellaneous Essays, London, 1692. In it he refers to St. Evremond's strictures on Virgil, and attempts to refute some of them: v. SS. xviii. 14-16. His attitude there is more conciliatory than in the present essay: cf. 499¹, 17 f; 506, 23 f.
30. But let, etc. Taking a general notion from Bossu (i. 11), Dryden justifies it by historical reflections, apparently of his own composition. The blunder of making the Greeks of Homer's time in danger from the Assyrian or Median (or, as Dryden first wrote it, Persian) monarchy is all his own.
33. Homer's [moral], etc. Dryden's treatment of this topic is mainly from Bossu, i. 8.
- 492¹, 7. Quicquid, etc. "Whatever be the folly of the kings, the Achæans are the sufferers." HORACE, 1 Epistles, ii. 14.
13. Median. F1 reads Persian.
27. Assyrian or Median. F1 reads Persian.
47. The cause of religion, etc. Another of Dryden's sneers at the Revolution. Cf. 493¹, 8 f. 46.
- 493¹, 14. Staro, etc. "I was well; but, endeavoring to be better, I am here." MALONE.
48. His own son. Plutarch states in his Brutus that Cæsar regarded Brutus as his son by his intrigue with Servilia.
50. Dante. v. Inferno, xxxiv. This is the only allusion to Dante in Dryden's works which even implies personal acquaintance with him. Elsewhere (173¹, 19; 741¹, 41; SS. vii. 233) he merely mentions him as a refiner of the Italian language.
- 493¹, 23. Secretisque, etc. Æneid, viii. 670: the first words should be secretisque pios: cf. 637, 889, 890; 713¹, n. 1156.
47. Montaigne's principles. v. Essais, iii. 9. But the editor cannot discover that Montaigne anywhere expresses the preference for Venice that Dryden attributes to him.
- 494¹, 34. The moral, etc. Dryden takes his general idea from Bossu, i. 11: "Il [Virgile] devoit leur faire perdre cette vieille aversion qu'ils avoient pour la monarchie, les persuader de la justice et du bon droit d'Auguste, leur ôter l'envie de s'opposer à ses desseins, et leur donner de l'amour et de la vénération pour ce prince." But Bossu regards the Æneid as written primarily for the instruction of Augustus and future Roman emperors; the people are only "le second objet de sa morale."
42. The receiv'd opinion, etc. Bossu (i. 11) and Segrais (pp. 31-35) agree that Virgil took from tradition the idea of Æneas's coming to Italy. Segrais cites reasons from Bochart for believing that Æneas was never actually in Italy. — Samuel Bochart (1599-1667) was a French Protestant theologian and philologist. His most famous work was a Geographia Sacra. He was called the most learned man of his time.
- 494¹, 5. I doubt not but it was, etc. This sentence is incoherent; the words it was are superfluous. They are here retained, as a mark of Dryden's general carelessness in correcting his work.
32. Memmi. A Mummius, not a Memmius, destroyed Corinth.
41. Genus, etc. "The irritable race of bards." 2 Epistles, ii. 102. "I suspect our author spoke from recollection of some of his own satirical strokes." [SCOTT.] Cf. 714, n. 1020.
44. Animamque, etc. "He lays down his life to inflict a wound." Imitated from Virgil, Georgics, iv. 238; cf. 480, 344-347.
- 495¹, 1. A descendant of Æneas. Cf. 85, 38, n.
11. As Augustus, etc. v. Bossu, i. 11; iv. 9; the first of these chapters is Dryden's general authority on this page.
- 43-46. Neither . . . Book. F1 reads: Neither has he forgotten Atis, in the Fifth of his Æneis, the Son of Polites, youngest Son to Priam; who was slain by Pyrrhus, in the Second Book. Atis, then, the Favourite Companion of Ascanius, had a better Right than he; tho' I know he was introduc'd by Virgil, to do Honour to the Family, from which Julius Cæsar was descended by the Mothers side. In the errata of F1, however, Dryden makes the following statement: "Where Atys is mention'd as having a claim by succession before Æneas, my memory betray'd me; for, had I consulted Virgil, he calls not the son of Polites by the name of Atys, but of Priamus. 'Tis true he mentions Atys immediately afterwards, on the account of the Atian family, from which Julius Cæsar was descended by his grandmother, as I have there mention'd." Cf. 545, 718; 588, 734, 741.
51. An elective king. In writing this whole passage Dryden probably had in mind the circumstances of the Revolution of 1688. This is particularly marked in the sentence:

- "Æneas, tho' he married the heiress of the crown, yet claim'd no title to it during the life of his father-in-law" (495³, 27-30).
- 495³, 30. Pater, etc. Æneid, xii. 192 (the first word is Dryden's slip for socer); cf. 692, 287.
54. Sacra, etc. Æneid, ii. 293; cf. 541, 389, 390.
- 496¹, 6. Regnum immeritum. Dryden's mistake for gentem immeritam.
10. An ode. Odes, iii. 3.
- 496², 24. The author of the Dauphin's Virgil. Ruseus (Charles de La Rue — 1643-1725); cf. 507¹, 18; 507², 27. In his argumentum to the Æneid, Ruseus has the words: Segresius, in egragia præfatione in Gallicam Æneidos interpretationem. On the Delphin editions, cf. n. 293², 46.
- 497¹, 18. Takes notice. So F1; F2, by an evident misprint, reads takes no notice.
21. Bossu. Op. cit. iv. 5.
43. Virgil, etc. From Segrais, pp. 37 f. Quotation marks are not used in FF.
- 497², 34. Homer, etc. According to the mediæval view, Homer wrote lies, favoring his countrymen the Greeks. The apocryphal accounts of the Trojan war attributed to Dares Phrygius, a priest of Hephæstus in Troy, and Dictys Cretensis, a follower of Idomeneus, were thought to be more historically accurate. v. Chaucer, House of Fame, 1464-1480 (Skeat), and cf. 501², 52, n: 827, 391, n.
41. Stimulus, etc. Æneid, xi. 282-292; cf. 677, 435-448.
- 498¹, 16. They who, etc. v. Segrais, pp. 40-43. Dryden's translations merely give the general sense of his authority, in abridged form. He mingles some small material of his own with what he takes from Segrais.
27. Proxima, etc. Æneid, x. 513; cf. 663, 715, 716.
36. Invulnerable. Achilles is not invulnerable in Homer; Dryden follows Segrais in this mistake.
- 498², 4. Godsmith. Used in a different sense in 110, 50.
5. Warluck. "The Scots, about Dryden's time, had many superstitions concerning individuals whom they supposed to be shotproof, by virtue of a satanic charm. The famous Viscount Dundee [v. 269] was supposed to be invulnerable to bullets of lead. But the word warlock [the more common spelling] means a male sorcerer in general, and has not, as Dryden seems to suppose, any reference to this particular charm." [SCOTT.]
35. Grecian. So F1; F2 reads Grecians, which is possibly an error for Grecian's.
- 499¹, 17. Of St. Swithen. F1 reads of a St. Swithen. Professor Ker shows that Dryden is probably thinking of a passage in Perrault (cf. 384¹, 14, n). The day of St. Swithen (the usual spelling) is July 15. "The vulgar, to use Gay's account, believe:
How, if on Swithen's feast the welkin lowers,
And every pent house streams with hasty showers,
Twice twenty days shall clouds their furies drain,
And wash the pavements with incessant rain.
(Trivia, l. 183-186.)" SCOTT.
- One of these censors. "Dryden was thinking (with grief) of St. Evremond, Réflexions sur nos Traducteurs, 1673." [KER.] Cf. 492¹, 25, n: just below Dryden refers to his own Character; v. SS. xviii. 15, 16.
22. Extemplo, etc. Æneid, i. 92, 93; cf. 523, 135, 136.
37. Moyle. Walter Moyle (1672-1721), politician and student. He contributed to the translation of Lucian published in 1711. Dryden compliments him in his Life of Lucian prefixed to that work, and in his Parallel of Poetry and Painting: v. SS. xviii. 79; xvii. 315.
40. Death. FF place a period after this word.
- 499², 4. Parce, etc. Æneid, i. 257, 258; cf. 526, 350, 351.
19. Tua, etc. Æneid, x. 632; cf. 665, 894, 895.
22. Si mora. Ibid. 622-627; cf. 665, 879-887. Dryden, by a queer mistake, inverts the order of his two quotations; Juno's flattery follows her husband's verdict instead of preceding it.
31. Troje, etc. Ibid. 469-472; cf. 662, 659-662.
42. Sir Robert Howard. v. B. S. xvii; 11, 12; cf. 715², n. 662. Dryden follows Howard's idea in his translation; cf. 526, 357.
44. That I. F1 omits that.
- 500¹, 1. With exact. F1 reads with an exact.
24. Segrais, etc. Op. cit. pp. 38-40.
45. Vultus, etc. Æneid, i. 572, 573; cf. 532, 803-805.
- 500², 9. Doctor Cudworth. "Dr. Ralph Cudworth (1617-88), author of The True Intellectual System of the Universe, 1678." [MALONE.]
46. Fata, etc. Æneid, iv. 440; cf. 572, 637.
- 501¹, 1. Curam, etc. Ibid. 332, 395; cf. 570, 481, 482, 571, 570.
3. Humanly. FF read humanely, which may mean either humanly or humanely.
18. His two translators. "Robert et Antoine le Chevalier d'Agneaux, frères, de Vire en Normandie. Their translation of Virgil was first published in 1582." [KER.]
28. Orpheus. v. 486, 754-759.
52. Was of. F1 reads was also of.
53. Was also. F1 omits also.
- 501², 17. Conversation. Here used, of course, in the sense of close acquaintance.
37. Discourse. "I am afraid this passage, given as a just description of love, serves to prove that Dryden's ideas of the female sex and of the passion were very gross and malicious." [SCOTT.] Cf. 716¹, n. 100; 1016¹.
52. Dares Phrygius. Not Dares Phrygius, but Dictys Cretensis (De Bello Trojano, iii. 15) tells the story to which Dryden refers: cf. 497², 34, n; 827, 391, n.
- 502¹, 30. Varium, etc. Æneid, iv. 569, 570; cf. 574, 819.
32. Ever was. F1 reads was ever.
49. Notumque, etc. Æneid, v. 6; cf. 577, 578, 7-9.
54. Their queen. So F1; F2 reads the Queen.
- 502², 6. Sir Henry Wotton. Walton, in his Life of Sir Henry Wotton, tells how Wotton wrote in a German's album "a pleasant definition of an ambassador, in these very words: Legatus est vir bonus peregre missus ad mentiendum rei

- publica causa*; which Sir Henry Wotton could have been content should have been thus Englished: "An ambassador is an honest man, sent to lie [i. e. sojourn] abroad for the good of his country." But the jest would admit of an ill construction, and through the "malignant pen" of a Catholic writer became an occasion of scandal against the government of King James I.
13. Bocaline. "Trajano Boccalini (1556-1613) published his Ragguagli di Parnaso (News of Parnassus) in 1612-13, at Venice; the book was translated into English by Henry Cary, Earl of Monmouth, in 1656 (Advertisements from Parnassus in two Centuries, with the Politick Touchstone . . .). There were many imitators of Boccalini, but for this one it is perhaps unnecessary to make researches." [KER.]
40. Segrais. Op. cit. pp. 28-31.
48. Ovid, etc. Since 1666 Dryden has changed his opinion: cf. 25²; also 744¹, 4-10.
53. Is for. So F1; F2 reads as for.
- 503¹, 1. I have translated both. v. 98-101.
22. Nothing, etc. Aristotle does not state this in so epigrammatic a form, but implies it in Poetica, xxv; Dryden follows Segrais: "On ne doit appeller faute, dit Aristote, que celles qui se font contre l'art qu'on professe. jusques-là mesme qu'il y a des ignorances affectées qui ont bonne grace."
31. Else are. F1 reads are else.
32. Splendid miracles. Speciosa miracula; cf. 490¹, 18, n. Segrais does not name Ovid, but clearly has him in mind when he writes: "Pourquoi le [Virgile] condamnera-t-on d'avoir fait une fiction contre l'ordre du temps si on permet bien quelquefois aux autres poëtes de faire mesme contre l'ordre de la nature?"
42. Tasso. The discourse referred to, as Professor Ker points out, is the second, Dell'Arte Poetica. Segrais mentions Tasso, but not his Discorsi, which Dryden had probably himself read. Cf. 286², 50, n.
- 503², 15. In the mean time, etc. What follows, to the end of the paragraph, seems to be original with Dryden.
24. Nec pars, etc. "Nor of the whole work is any part more read than the tale of a love not made lawful by marriage." Tristia, ii. 535, 536, somewhat incorrectly quoted.
53. Pulchramque, etc. "Devoted to thy wife, thou buildest a fair city." Æneid, iv. 266, 267.
- 504¹, 14. Augustus. "The Emperor Augustus divorced Scribonia, his second wife, in order to make room for his marriage with Livia. But the argument of our author from the Æneid seems far-fetched." Scott.
24. Neque, etc. Æneid, iv. 337, 339; cf. 570, 489, 490.
40. Saith. F1 reads says.
45. I have detain'd, etc. In this paragraph Dryden follows very closely Segrais, pp. 24-27. His illustration from Raphael (505¹), however, seems to be original; in 1695 he had published a translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting, with a critical preface of his own.
50. Hath. F1 reads has.
- 504², 1, 9, 16, 22, 29, 30, 44. Hath. F1 reads has.
3. Strange. "Mr. Malone reads strong, but strange here seems to signify alarming or startling." [Scott.] The present editor thinks Malone's emendation was very likely correct.
9. Scaliger. Op. cit. v. 2.
10. Saith. F1 reads says.
16. Solomon. v. Ecclesiastes i. 9.
31. Quid, etc. "Why do you deny me water? The use of water is free to all." OVID, Mét. vi. 349.
- 505¹, 4. Him so like him. So F1. That is, Æneas so like Augustus. F2 reads, him so like her; evidently Dryden was confused in making this change, if it be due to him and not to the printer.
8. Æneadum genetrix. "Mother of Æneas's race," the opening words of Lucretius's poem De Rerum Natura.
26. Horace. O imitatores, servum pecus: "Imitators, ye servile herd." 1 Epistles, xix. 19.
38. Cain. v. Genesis iv. 16.
53. Cities had. So F1; F2 reads Cities have.
- 505², 1. It. Not found in F1.
17. Androgeos. So F1; F2 reads Androgeus.
38. Orpheus and Eurydice. Cf. 485, 486, 655-761.
51. Hath. F1 reads has.
- 506¹, 18. Is so. F1 omits so.
23. Another French critic, etc. "St. Évremond again, Sur les Poëmes des Anciens, 1685." [KER.] Cf. 492¹, 25, n; 499¹, 17, n.
40. Similitudes, etc. The frequent similes of Dryden's heroic plays were ridiculed in The Rehearsal (act ii, sc. 3):
"BAYES. Now, here she must make a simile.
"SMITH. Where's the necessity of that, Mr. Bayes?
"BAYES. Because she's surpris'd. That's a general rule: you must ever make a simile when you are surpris'd; 't is the new way of writing."
[Chloris speaks a simile parodying one in The Conquest of Granada.]
Dryden acknowledges this fault in his preface to Troilus and Cressida (1679), where he has already adopted the view expressed here. — "No man is at leisure to make sentences and similes, when his soul is in an agony." v. SS. vi. 278. He probably drew from Bossu (vi. 3), who writes: "Il est rare qu'elles [comparaisons] soient naturelles et vraisemblables dans la bouche d'une personne passionnée;" and quotes with disapprobation some verses from Seneca's Medea.
- 506², 35. Ac, etc. Æneid, i. 148-156; cf. 524, 213-225.
- 507¹, 3. Nunc, etc. "Now was not the place for such things." HORACE, Ars Poet. 19, with a change of his to hiac.
10. Macrobius. Cf. 492¹, 22, n.
Pontanus. His edition of Virgil was first published at Augsburg in 1599.

16. Junius and Tremellius. v. 165, 241, n.
23. What follows, etc. From this point through 508¹, 40, Dryden draws most of his material from Segrais, pp. 48 f.
31. Bossu, etc. Bossu himself (iii. 12) inclines to reduce the action of the Æneid to a single campaign, making it begin in summer and close before the end of autumn of the same year, but admits that his reasons are not conclusive.
42. He has made, etc. This is really Bossu's view (cf. the previous note), which Dryden remembered vaguely and mixed up with his present subject. Really, Segrais gives the action nearly a year and includes winter in it: v. 507², 41 f. The passage shows Dryden's extreme carelessness.
47. Ronsard. In the preface to his Franciade (1572).
- 507², 40. Quinetiam, etc. Æneid, iv. 309: cf. 569, 570, 447, 448.
- 508¹, 7. Ten months. F1 reads three Months, but has the following statement in the errata: "— towards the bottom of this page here [sic] is a gross error, which is easily corrected by reading ten months instead of three; the sense will direct you to the place." This gives an interesting glimpse of Dryden's methods of work. The sentence From which . . . three months (507², 51–508¹, 7), as it stood in F1, was correct, though carelessly expressed. Three months referred only to landing in Italy, and making the war, and was taken from Segrais' phrase: "Le reste [the action after Æneas's arrival in Italy] peut s'estre passé en moins de trois mois." (Cf. 508¹, 44.) Reading over his own work, Dryden took as the subject of may be judg'd all the phrases from arriving through making the war, instead of only the last two of them, and hence changed three into ten.
20. These, etc. This sentence seems to be original with Dryden.
40. Aurora, etc. Æneid, vii. 26, 27, 32–34; cf. 610, 611, 34–49.
- 508², 10. Cum subito, etc. "When cloudy Orion, suddenly rising from the waves." Æneid, i. 535.
26. Dum pelago, etc. "While winter and watery Orion spend their rage on the sea." Æneid, iv. 52.
- 509¹, 4. For Virgil then. F1 reads then for Virgil.
8. Than Apollo. So F1; F2 reads than from Apollo.
18. Iname, etc. The view expressed in this sentence was the usual one in Dryden's time: v. Bossu, v. 5, and cf. 913, 587–619. Segrais (p. 11) seems to differ: "Les anciens ont crû que pour ce sujet il falloit encore se servir de l'entremise des dieux, ne pouvant établir autrement la vray-semblance de ces grands événemens qui touchent l'imagination, mais contre qui le jugement se revolteroit d'abord s'il n'estoit captivé par une foy aveugle." This corresponds to the following paragraph of Dryden.
36. O nimium, etc. Æneid, v. 870, 871; cf. 593, 1135, 1136.
38. But machines, etc. v. Segrais, in note on l. 18 above. Rapin (i. 23) writes: "Le changement de Niobé en rocher est une aventure qui tient du merveilleux: mais elle devient vray-semblable, dès qu'une divinité à qui ce changement n'est pas impossible, s'en mêle."
48. Guardian angels. Cf. 288¹–291¹; 749¹, 14–25.
50. No heroic poem, etc. Segrais (p. 12) was of the same opinion: "Quelques modernes ont voulu mettre les enchantemens en sa [i. e. des dieux] place; et il faut du moins avouer qu'ils ont esté plus raisonnables que ceux qui n'ont voulu ny dieux, ny anges, ny saints, ny enchantemens. On le void par la ressemblance qu'ont tous ces ouvrages qui pour entretenir le merveilleux n'ont que des prodiges de valeur et des aventures fortuites entassées les unes sur les autres."
- 509², 4. Tasso, etc. Gerusalemme Liberata, xviii. 92–97.
10. Camilla. Cf. 715², n. 312.
46. Not have. F1 reads not to have.
47. Εἴχωρ. F1 reads εἴχωρ; the correct word is εἴχωρ.
54. Nec, etc. "Let not a god intervene, unless the difficulty be worthy a rescuer." Ars Poet. 191. Bossu (v. 5) emphasizes the contrast between the drama and epic poetry in the use of machines.
- 510¹, 35. Non, etc. Inaccurately quoted from Æneid, xii. 894, 895: the first words should be, Non me tua fervida terrent Dicta, ferox. Cf. 706, 1295, 1296.
42. Milton, etc. v. Paradise Lost, iv. 990–1015.
45. St. Gabriel. F1 reads St. Michael.
46. Satan. FF read Sathan.
52. Jupiter, etc. Æneid, xii. 725–727; cf. 703, 1054–1057.
54. Letum. FF read lethum, which should have been retained in the text, as in 499², 22.
- 510², 3. Damnabis, etc. Eclogues, v. 80; cf. 431, 126.
7. Daniel. v. Daniel v. 27.
21. Impar pugna. "An unequal fight." Æneid, xii. 216.
26. Imparibus, etc. "With the fates against him, with unequal strength, with the gods unfavorable." Apparently a line made up by Dryden; cf. Æneid, xii. 149, 218.
- 511¹, 11. O soror, etc. Æneid, xii. 632–634; cf. 701, 918–921.
38. Ornari, etc. This line Dryden earlier took for the motto of Religio Laici; cf. 157, n.
40. Sermoni propiora. HORACE, 1 Satires, iv. 42.
41. But Virgil, etc. Cf. 286¹, 5.
47. What he says, etc. v. 558, 561–577.
- 511², 7. Cæsura. "Here used for elision of vowels, called synalepha in 385², 11." [KER.] This is a blunder on Dryden's part; a cæsura is really a metrical pause in the verse.
- 512¹, 12. Si plura, etc. "If there are many beauties in a poem, I shall not be offended by a few blots, which carelessness has let drop, or against which human nature has failed to guard." Ars Poet. 351-353, slightly changed at the beginning.

35. Et, etc. Ecloques, iii. 6.

36. Nobis, etc. v. n. 75², 24, n; cf. 385², 46 f. In the epigram referred to, Martial complains that Roman poets cannot use the same metrical licenses as those of Greece.

46. Malherbe. Dryden makes too bold a deduction from Boileau's verses in L'Art Poétique, i: Enfin Malherbe vint, et, le premier en France, Fit sentir dans les vers une juste cadence.

Malherbe (1555-1628) was in some respects the founder of the classic French literature; the use of pauses, however, is known in the earliest French poems.

51. Dic, etc. Ecloques, iii. 106, 107; cf. 427, 163-166.

512², 5. Cooper's Hill. By Sir John Denham; cf. 514¹, 52, n. Dryden's praise of the couplet he quotes made it famous among eighteenth-century critics.

42. Ten syllables. "Dryden probably judged hastily, from the decasyllabic verse of Ronsard's Franciade (1572), that the Alexandrine was not of long standing in French poetry." [KER.] Dryden is of course wrong in speaking of feet in French or Italian poetry. — Rapin writes (ii. 16): "Le genre de vers qu'il [Ronsard] a pris n'est pas assez majestueux pour un poème héroïque."

54. Pondere, non numero. "By weight, not by number."

513¹, 1. The French, etc. Rapin (i. 31) develops the thought: "La pureté du style qu'on cherche en nôtre langue affoiblit la poésie."

7. The turn, etc. Cf. 319², 41, n; 385², 5 f; 744¹, 25 f.

18. Ignoscenda, etc. Georgics, iv. 489; cf. 485, 704, 705.

25. Semivirumque, etc. "A bull half a man, and a man half a bull." Ars Amat. ii. 24, with the order of the hemistichs reversed. "The story, as told by Seneca, is, that some of Ovid's friends having requested him to leave out of his works three verses which they should name, he agreed, provided he might save three, pointed out by himself. The lines, being put by both parties into the hands of arbitrators, proved the same. One of them was that cited by our author. Controversie, ii. 2 (10), 12." [MALONE.]

30. One of their own great authors. Rapin (ii. 20) complains that French tragedy depends not on terror and pity, but on galanterie. "Peut-être que nôtre nation, qui est naturellement galante, a été obligée par la nécessité de son caractère à se faire un système nouveau de tragédie, pour s'accommoder à son humeur. . . . C'est aussi peut-être par la galanterie que nôtre siècle s'est avisé de sauver la faiblesse de son génie, ne pouvant pas soutenir toujours une même action par la grandeur des paroles et des sentiments." Professor Ker thinks, however, that Dryden has St. Evremond in mind.

36. Triumvir and proscriber. The two nouns are in italics in FF.

44. His exile. Cf. 88, 89¹.

49. Non fu, etc. "Augustus was not so holy or so benign as the trumpet of Virgil proclaims; his having had good taste in poetry wins him pardon for the unjust proscription." Orlando Furioso, xxxv. 26, from the words of St. John to Astolfo. (Dryden's spelling of the Italian is here retained.) On the whole passage, cf. 745¹, 13-18.

513², 3. Spenser. By the allegorical scheme of his poem, Spenser really is truer to the fundamental tenet of Bossu (cf. n. 489¹, 29) than is any other great epic poet.

12. The two brothers. v. 501¹, 18, n.

14. Hannibal Caro. Cf. 177², 18, n; 288¹, 6.

20. Le Clerc. "Jean Le Clerc (1657-1736) in Bibliothèque Universelle et Historique, t. ix. p. 219 (de l'Année 1688): Essai de Critique, où l'on tâche de montrer en quoi consiste la Poésie des Hébreux." KER.

31. Tho' perhaps, etc. Dryden jestingly compares himself to these voluminous poets, whom he somewhat unjustly despised. On Wither (the correct form of the name), cf. SS. xv. 288.

45. Doctor Morelli. "Dr. Henry Morelli, one of the College of Physicians in our author's time." [MALONE.]

514¹, 4. Sorti, etc. Æneid, x. 450; cf. 662, 633. Dryden is probably wrong here; Pallas's words, "My father is able to bear either fate," are in reply to a taunt of Turnus, translated in 661, 625.

24. Sic ait, etc. Ibid. 473; cf. 662, 665, 666.

48. Your Lordship. This refers to a translation published anonymously in Sylva (1685) under the title, Part of Virgil's 4th Georgick, Englished by an unknown hand. It is reprinted in Sheffield's Works, 1723.

50. Lord Roscommon. His translation of the Sixth Eclogue was included in Miscellany Poems, 1684; cf. 168.

52. Sir John Denham. Denham translated The Destruction of Troy (from Æneid, ii), and The Passion of Dido for Æneas (from Æneid, iv): cf. 91; 319², 50; 512², 5; 744², 52, n.

55. Mr. Waller, etc. Waller translated Æneid, iv. 437-583; Cowley translated Georgics, ii. 458-540. On Cowley, cf. 181¹, 45, n.

514², 23. A former dissertation. His Parallel of Poetry and Painting, included in his preface to his version of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting (cf. n. 504¹, 45): v. SS. xvii. 328. Cf. 742², 20-24.

30. And I have. FF read and have; the insertion of I seems necessary.

38. Segrais, etc. Segrais (pp. 2-4) distinguishes his three classes according to the predominance in them of memory, wit (esprit), or judgment. The first class judges by words, the second by figures or by fine thoughts (belles pensées), the third by the general structure of a work (discours). Dryden's three classes are founded on conceits, bombast, and true elevation of style: compare his own literary development, as sketched in B. S. xxxii. Taking his general conception from Segrais, Dryden develops it independently.

48. Mob. The word, as Professor Ker notes, was just coming into use at this time.
- 515¹, 14. Mançanares. Professor Ker thinks that for his illustration Dryden is indebted to Bouhours, Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugène: II. La Langue Française.
27. Owen's Epigrams. v. 287¹, 15, n.
30. Paste. So FF; SS. and K. read taste. Cf. 738¹, 40; 798, 503.
47. A wil, etc. Lord Rochester: cf. 744², 11; and, on Rochester's relations with Dryden, v. B. S. xxv, xxvi; 283², 4, n.
54. He chose, etc. Dryden now draws on a later section of Segrais (pp. 45-48), entitled: "Qu'il faut tascher de la netteté seulement aux esprits relevez, et que ç'a esté la maxime de Virgile."
- 515², 18. Imagination. "Imagination has been degraded in meaning since Dryden explained its functions in the Account of Annus Mirabilis; what here is called imagination is there called fancy, or invention and fancy." KER. Cf. 25.
23. Marini's Adone. Published at Paris in 1623. The affectation of its style was proverbial. Marini (or Marino) (1569-1625) had some influence on English literature; Crashaw's Sospetto d'Herode is a free translation from him.
27. Mobilitate, etc. Æneid, iv. 175; cf. 567, 253, 254.
40. Entellus. v. 586, 605-613.
45. Nec, etc. "I care not for the gifts." Æneid, v. 400.
- Dampier.* "His New Voyage round the World came out in this year Dampier is speaking of Quito, in the year 1684: 'I know no place where gold is found but what is very unhealthy' (ch. vi.)." [KER.]
- 516¹, 12. Mr. Creech. Cf. 180¹, 41, n. Creech's version of Manilius was a new book, being printed in this same year, 1697.
25. Phylarchus. "Phylarchus was Jean Goulu de St. François; his criticism of Balzac's style appeared in 1627, Lettres de Phylarque à Ariste où il est traité de l'éloquence française. Dryden refers, not quite accurately, to a passage in Letter xxi." [KER.] Balzac was regarded as the model of French prose style in the earlier seventeenth century.
42. Articles. Dryden expands a hint taken from Segrais (p. 64): "J'ay resolu d'enfermer le plus de sens que je pourrais en aussi peu de paroles que le desir de la netteté et la contrainte de notre langue, qui ne peut oublier les articles, me le pourroit permettre."
- 516², 15. Ambergis. FF read Ambergreece.
37. Yet I may, etc. Cf. Segrais (pp. 65, 66): "Enfin mettant en usage tous les matériaux de ce divin auteur, j'ay voulu donner l'Enéide en françois, comme j'ay conçu qu'il l'eust donnée luy-mesme, s'il fust né sujet de nostre glorieux monarque; mais en reconnoissant toujours que j'estois bien éloigné de la sublimité de son genie."
- 517¹, 5. A Pindaric. "Now more commonly called an Alexandrine. Pope had perhaps this passage in his memory when he composed the famous triplet descriptive of Dryden's versification:
- Waller was smooth; but Dryden taught to join
The varying verse, the full resounding line,
The long majestic march, and energy divine.
(First Epistle of the Second Book of Horace, 287-289.)" SCOTT.
10. Chapman. "Triplets in Chapman's Odyssey, e. g. iv. 27, v. 361, vi. 351." [KER.]
12. Mr. Cowley. Professor Ker aptly quotes from Johnson's Life of Cowley: "Cowley was, I believe, the first poet that mingled Alexandrines at pleasure with the common heroic of ten syllables. . . . Of triplets in his Davidis he makes no use, and perhaps did not at first think them allowable; but he appears afterwards to have changed his mind, for, in the verses on the government of Cromwell, he inserts them liberally with great happiness." Cf. 181¹, 45, n.
39. But at, etc. Cf. 417¹, 24-34. "Cowley was forced abroad by the ill fate of the royal party in the civil wars." [SCOTT.]
55. Hemistichs. Cf. 110, 87, n; 922, 48, n. Dryden has changed his mind since writing Absalom and Achitophel.
- 517², 15. Him, or any. So F1, but with no comma; F2 reads him any.
29. Quem, etc. Æneid, iii. 340. "Whom to you, while Troy was already -- smoking, Creusa brought forth."
39. Misenus, etc. Æneid, vi. 164, 165. "Misenus the son of Æolus, than whom none was more excellent at rousing heroes with his trumpet -- and kindling war by his song."
- 518¹, 2. Nile v. 394, 565-572; cf. 130, 167-174, 896, 553.
8. Boecace, etc. See his Conclusion dell' Autore, appended to the Decamerone. [KER.]
45. Hammer'd money, etc. v. 131, 229, n. At this time there was great confusion and distress in England through the circulation of clipped hammered coins: v. Macaulay, ch. xxi. Dryden himself was a sufferer: see his letters to Tonson, SS. xviii. 126, 128. [KER.]
- 518², 24. He instances, etc. v. Segrais, p. 60.
26. Cupid. Dryden's slip for Ascanius: v. 534, 969-974 (ll. 691-694 of the Latin).
30. Give. FF read gives, doubtless a misprint.
42. Quem, etc. Adapted from Horace, Odes, iv. 2: "Whoever is eager to emulate him, poises himself on wings waxen by the craft of Dædalus, and, [falling,] will give his name to the glassy sea."
49. Aude, etc. Æneid, viii. 364, 365; cf. 631, 479, 480.
52. I condemn. "Nevertheless, our author, long before undertaking the translation of Virgil, had given a noble paraphrase of these lines in the Hind's address to the Panther." [SCOTT.] v. 235, 1283-1285.
- 519¹, 5. Florimel. v. Faerie Queene, V. iii. 22-24.
54. The late Earl of Lauderdale. Richard Maitland (1653-95), fourth Earl of Lauderdale. Since the Revolution he had been living abroad, mainly in France, as an exile. His translation of Virgil was published posthumously in London.

- 519², 30. Two other worthy friends. These were Addison and Knightly Chetwood. That Addison wrote An Essay on the Georgics is known from Tickell's preface to Addison's collected works, 1721, and from Steele's preface to The Drummer. Dryden, in a letter to Tonson concerning the second edition of the Virgil, clearly indicates that Chetwood wrote the Preface to the Pastorals: "I have also written this day to Mr. Chetwood, and let him know, that the book is immediately going to the press again. My opinion is, that the printer should begin with the first Pastoral, and print on to the end of the Georgiques, or farther, if occasion be, till Dr. Chetwood corrects his preface, which he writes me word is printed very false." (Malone, I, 2, 62, 63; SS. xviii. 139.) Malone (III, 547) states, without giving grounds for his opinion, that Chetwood also wrote the Life of Virgil, and Addison the arguments in prose.

36. Caus'd. F1 reads occasion'd.

52. The proper terms. Cf. 24², 36, n. Dryden has now adopted the view typical of the pseudo-classic period, which remained unchanged until the rise of the romantic school.

- 520¹, 10. Four preliminary lines.

Ille ego, qui quondam graeci modulatus avena
Carmen, et, egressus silvis, vicina coegi
Ut quamvis avido parentem arva colono,
Gratum opus agricolis; at nunc horrentia Martis.

These lines are rejected as spurious by most editors of Virgil.

42. Of the opinion. F1 omits the.

43. Tucca and Varius. Servius tells a story that, since Virgil had left his Aeneid imperfect, Augustus bade the poet's friends Tucca and Varius edit the work, adding nothing, but destroying what was superfluous; and that they therefore retrenched the four preliminary lines of which Dryden speaks.

- 520², 21. Place, but. FF read, place. But; and, in the next line, Translation: Want.

42. Sixth Pastoral. Cf. 514¹, 50, n.

Pharmaceutria. Dryden refers to one of the two translations of Eclogue viii in Miscellany Poems, 1684; "by Mr. Stafford" and "by Mr. Chetwood;" probably to the former: v. 710¹, n. PAST. VIII.

43. Orpheus. v. n. 514¹, 48.

- 521¹, 1. Erichthonius. Cf. 466, 467, 177-184. The story to which Dryden alludes goes back to a note by Servius on that passage.

20. Your noble kinsman. "Their mothers were half-sisters." [SCOTT.]

39. For want. F1 reads for your want.

52. Ad clerum. "i. e. addressed to the learned. A Latin sermon preached before the Clergy assembled in Convocation, or in the Universities for degrees in divinity, is entitled Concio ad Clerum." MALONE.

- 523, 102. Tuscan. FF here and often read Thusan, but Tuscan is also found, as 640, 186. FF have many similar variants, not recorded in these notes. It is difficult to decide which of them are significant; perhaps Alethes (524, 172), for example, should be corrected to Aletes.

- 525, 249. Piery. F1 reads smoking.

- 526, 342, 343. One: throne. This rhyme was probably already somewhat archaic when Dryden wrote.

357. Know, etc. Cf. 499², 42, n.

365. Iulus. FF read Julus.

- 527, 394. Repay. F1 reads reward.

428. Ledge of rocks. F1 reads hollow Rock.

- 530, 622. Fated. F1 reads fatal.

671. Procession. F1 reads Precession.

- 531, 734. Lowly. F1 reads humble.

748. A land, etc. Cf. 554, 221, n.

- 532, 763. Drive. F1 reads drives.

773. Augment. F1 reads prevent.

834. "He, etc. Cf. 230, 970.

- 533, 842, 871. Shipwreck'd; shipwrack'd. So FF.

873. Claim? So SS.; FF read claim! Many similar cases occur later, as 574, 774, 776; 575, 866; 577, 975; 596, 185; 602, 620; 609, 1163; 639, 89; 645, 531, 539; 675, 270; 681, 770; 704, 1153; 706, 1261, 1263. Contrast 665, 918, n.

905. Cost. So FF; SS. closes the parenthesis after work in the next line.

- 534, 949. As. F1 reads That.

- 535, 1000. The hero. F1 reads his Father.

- 536, 26. And. F1 reads With.

45. Monster fabric. F1 reads fatal Engine.

52. Laocoon. So printed in FF; the word can be pronounced as three syllables wherever it occurs in Dryden: cf. 539, 267, 281; 540, 301.

- 538, 210. Adjur'd. So F1; F2 reads abjur'd.

- 540, 324. God's. FF read Gods; but Virgil's dei jussu shows that a singular is intended.

354. Pelides. F1 reads foul Treason.

- 541, 416. And. F1 reads The.

- 542, 477. Bold. F1 reads fierce.

- 544, 646. Rais'd on spires. Cf. 731, 29.

- 545, 660. Yield. So F1; F2 reads yields, an evident misprint.

- 546, 761. Obey'd. Followed by a comma in FF.

763. A headless carcass, etc. This is the last line of Denham's Destruction of Troy; cf. 514¹, 52, n. In the footnote FF read Derhan, by a misprint.

- 548, 934. Slake. So SS.; FF read shake.

- 549, 970. Hallow'd. F1 reads hollow'd.

- 551, 18. Cleave. F1 reads tempt.

40. Terror. F1 reads Horror, corrected to Terrour in the errata.

53. With gore. F1 reads with purple Gore.

- 553, 142. Imperial. F1 reads Immortal.

- 554, 221-224. A land . . . name. Cf. 531, 748-751. The repetition occurs also in the Latin.

- 555, 356. The Sun's. F1 reads Phæbus.

- 558, 527. Veer, etc. This line is difficult to understand; Professor Saintsbury wishes to emend veer to ware. But possibly sea and land may be taken as the subject of veer: "Let sea and land depart (shift their direction) to the starboard."

568. Are display'd. Cf. 400, 1031, n.

- 559, 593. He gave me license. He let me go.

refuse? (153) comply: (154) Jove, . . . Des- tiny. (155) forbid, . . . Command, (156)
Land. (157) Trojan, . . . Line, (158) Leagues,
 . . . join? The rearrangement in the text follows SS., and is in accord with the Latin original. Doubt (154) is used half in its usual sense, half in that (common in Shakespeare) of apprehension, dread; hence it is followed first by lest and then by or.
- 566, 230. Or see, etc. F1 reads:
 Or see the Lyon from the Hills descend.
- 567, 271. Things done, etc. The fourteen-syl-labable line may be meant to symbolize the tattling of the goddess. Cf. 129, 94, n.
293. Enrich'd. So SS.; FF read enrich, which may possibly be what Dryden wrote: cf. 400, 1031, n.
303. Blood of. F1 reads offer'd.
- 568, 360. God begins. So F1; F2 reads Gods begins, an evident misprint.

- 570, 471. Hyarba. Here and in 567, 283; 564, 51, the text follows FF. If FF are printed as Dryden intended, his usage varies between Hyarba and Hyarbas.
- 572, 603, 604. Bind . . . wind. F1 reads binds
 . . . winds.
631. My death, etc. F1 reads:
 My Death shall leave you of my Crown possess'd.
- 574, 780. 'T is true. F1 reads Tis true; — F2 reads Tis true? After this line F1 has the following, omitted in F2:

- 577, 22 (Arg.). Who is. F1 reads who was.

reus, "bound by my vow (in case my request is granted)." Cf. 757, 427.

Demoleus.
- 583, 404. Silver-studded. So SS.; FF read Silver'd studded.
- 584, 450, 451. Had brib'd, etc. F1 reads (cf.
 922, 77, 78):
 Had brib'd the Judges to protect his Claim;
 Besides Diorea does as loud exclaim.
479. Gauntlet-fight. FF read Gauntlet fight, suggesting, by the small letter, that fight be
- taken as a verb; it is, however, far more natural to regard it as a noun.
- 587, 689. Feather'd. F1 reads pointed.
690. Augurs. FF read Augures.
707. Give. So F1; F2 reads gave.
- 588, 743. Place. "Dryden here uses place for eminence of rank. Ascanius was the last in order, but the first in dignity; this, by the way, is an Ovidian point superinduced upon the simplicity of Virgil — Extremus, formaque ante omnes pulcher, Iulus." [Scott.] Cf.
 513¹, 7 f.
770. Ways. So F1; F2 reads Wave.
- 589, 838. Fire. F1, probably by a misprint,

18. Fly. F1 reads shun.
- 594, 29. Those. F1 reads these.
34. The Cretan queen. Pasiphae; cf. 402, 109, n.
49. Assay'd. F1 reads essay'd.
53. Eager. F1 reads Prepar'd.
- 596, 243. Son of. F1 reads Son to.
- 597, 285. Glitt'ring. FF read glittering, which should have been retained in the text; but in
 l. 312 FF have glitt'ring.
- 598, 381. Malignant light. Mistranslating lucē
maligna, "the scanty light." Cf. 794, 116.
402. Geryon. The name is properly Ge'ryon or Gery'ones; Dryden here and in 628, 267 mistakenly writes Gery'on.
- 599, 419. Freights. So F1; F2 reads frights.
435. Wond'ring. So F1; F2 reads wand'ring.

- 601, 558. She sails. So SS.; FF read he sails.
604. Pasiphae. Cf. 402, 109, n.
605. Phadra's ghost. Cf. 723, 381; 725, 576;
 729, 851.
606. There. F1 reads Chast. Dryden accents incorrectly Laoda'mia instead of Laodami'a:
 cf. 730, 7, n; 854, 44, n.
608. Caneus. Cf. 856, 857, 234-287; 787, 53.
614. Sees. So F1; F2 reads runs. The change, even if made by Dryden himself, is an evident deterioration of the text.
- 603, 733. Lo. So F1. F2 reads Lt.
- 604, 784. Th' Alean twins. Cf. 257, 237, n.
- 605, 892. The choir. So F1; F2 reads their Choir.
- 606, 931. Gods. F1 reads Gods; F2 reads God's.

 misprints are frequent in this part of F2.

- 607, 1057. Your. F1 reads our.
1062. The seal. F1 reads his Seal.

 should be substituted. Nephew is used in the sense of descendant; cf. 845, 499.
1090. Nisus. FF read Nisus, which may be a misprint for Nisa's, representing Nysa of the Latin.

1111. He shall, etc. F1 reads:

For fighting Fields his Troops he shall prepare.

610, 1237, 1238. True . . . lies. These lines are not found in F1; but in the Notes, at the head of the note on l. 1235 (cf. 714) occurs the statement: By the carelessness of the Amanuensis, the two next Lines are wanting, which I thus supply out of the Original Copy, — (text as printed.) In F2 this statement is of course omitted.

7 (Arg.). Others. So F1; F2 reads other.

28. Which. So F1; F2 reads With.

38. Sate. So F1; F2 reads sat.

611, 84. High. F1 reads great.

612, 142. Thy. So F1; F2 reads the.

179. Blest. So F1; F2 reads best.

617, 549. Wreathes. F1 reads crowns, corrected in the errata to wreaths.

554. Suff'ring. F1 reads passive.

716. Was. So F1; omitted in F2 by a misprint.

620, 745. Around. F1 reads above.

621, 857. Shot. F1 reads came.

622, 910. His ample. So F1; F2 reads the ample.

925. Pomp. F2 has a colon after this word; F1 has no pause at all.

946. Dewy. F1 reads rosie, changed in the errata.

623, 1015. Semethis. So FF; perhaps merely a misprint for Sebethis.

1022. And. F1 reads All.

624, 1036. Wounds. So F1; F2 reads wound.

1047. Altars. So F1; F2 reads Allar.

1075. The more, etc. F1 reads:

The more the Winds his kindled Course inspire,
The more with fury burn'd the blazing Fire.

1097. The nobler Pallas. Cf. 728, 782.

625, 20. Fate. FF place a period after this word, and a colon after name (l. 22).

23. Mischief. F1 reads Mischiefs.

627, 183, 184. Maia. FF read Maja.

326. Beheld. So FF; SS. emends, perhaps correctly, into behold.

349. Thoro'. F1 reads thorough; F2, through.

352. Wond'ring. So F1; F2 reads wand'ring.

353. Behold. So F1; F2 reads Beheld.

928. Th' ethereal. F1 reads th' Ætherial; F2, the Ætherial.

638, 1 (Arg.). Æneas. FF read Æneas's, but forms occurring in verse show that Dryden did not make an extra syllable of the genitive ending after a final s, even though he wrote (or Tonson printed) an —'s.

640, 163. Myriads . . . men. F1 reads Millions . . . Troops.

643, 415. Gate. FF punctuate this and the succeeding lines as follows: Gate . . . vows, . . . Ascanius, . . . years, — a punctuation which is retained from Sylvæ (1685), except that there no comma is found after vows. The present editor follows SS. in an almost certain emendation. The long inversion involved in the original punctuation seems entirely unlike Dryden's style.

644, 504. Prevent. F1 reads outwent.

645, 527. At the length. "At length." SAINTSBURY.

646, 588. Bor'd. v. GLOSSARY.

654, 107. Takes. F1 reads makes.

655, 140. Fatal. F1 reads bloody.

656, 247. Asium. The word is here retained from FF, though it is probably a mere blunder for Clusium, caused by careless handwriting.

657, 284. Arn'd, etc. "This conceit is not Virgil's." [SCOTT.]

658, 368. Courage. F1 reads Anger.

388. Ardent. F1 reads equal.

660, 503. Mingled. F1 reads crowded.

520. Trust, etc. The antithesis of feet and hands is Dryden's, not Virgil's.

- 669, 1155. Sharpen'd. F1 reads cruel.
- 670, 1270. Wood. Translating silvam; the play on words in iron wood is doubtless unintentional.

1311. To the sword his throat applied. F1 reads, to his Throat the Sword apply'd, changed in the errata.
1312. The crimson stream, etc. Dryden repeats this couplet, with a slight change, in 707, 1376, 1377. The jingle of distain'd, disdainful is sufficiently disagreeable.
14. Besmeared with. F1 reads distilling.
- 672, 66. Needless. F1 reads needful.
90. Breathless. F1 reads lifeless.

"From the high praise here given to these verses, which greatly exceeds their merit, I suspect that the concealed translator was our author's friend, George Granville, afterwards Lord Lansdowne [cf. 733]. The poem which immediately preceded this in Eramen Poeticum was written by him." [MALONE.]

24. Par maniere d'acquit. "For form's sake." "A passage in a letter from our author to Jacob Tonson, dated by Malone, February, 1698, lets us know yet more plainly, that to the niggard disposition of this bookseller we owe that the Notes, as here acknowledged, were rather slurred over than written with due care: 'I am not sorry that you will not allow any thing towards the Notes; for to make them good, wou'd have cost me half a yeare's time at least. Those I write shall be only marginall, to help the unlearned, who understand not the poetically fables. The Prefaces, as I intend them, will be somewhat more learned. It wou'd require seaven yeares to translate Virgil exactly. But I promise you once more to do my best in the four remaining books, as I have hitherto done in the foregoing. — Upon triall I find all of your trade are sharper, and you not more than others; therefore I have not wholly left you. Mr. Aston does not blame you for getting as good a bargain as you cou'd, though I cou'd have gott an hundred pounds more: and you might have spared almost all your trouble, if you had thought fit to publish the proposals for the first subscriptions; for I have guineas offer'd me every day, if there had been room; I believe, modestly speaking, I have refus'd already 25. I mislike nothing in your letter therefore, but onely your upbraiding me with the publique encouragement, and my own reputation concern'd in the notes; when I assure you I cou'd not make them to my mind in less than half a year's time.'" 4. But Cupid, etc. Latin heroic poetry is written in hexameters; Latin elegiac poetry in couplets, the hexameter alternating with the pentameter: hence the term unequal (l. 34), which, however, is Dryden's, not Ovid's.

730, 7. Hippodamia's. Dryden accents incorrectly, Hippodamia instead of Hippodamia: cf. 601, 606, n. For the story, v. 857, 292 f.

731. ALEXANDER'S FEAST. On September 3, 1697, Dryden wrote in a letter to his sons at Rome: "I am writing a Song for St. Cecilia's Feast, who, you know, is the patroness of musick. This is troublesome, and no way beneficial; but I could not deny the Stewards of the Feast, who came in a body to me to desire that kindness, one of them being Mr. Bridgman, whose parents are your mother's friends." Notwithstanding this statement, which shows that Dryden had begun work on his poem nearly three months before St. Cecilia's Day, an apocryphal story has been often repeated, that he wrote Alexander's Feast at a single sitting. (The tale goes back to Warton, Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope, § 8, where it is given on fifth-hand authority. Against it also is a statement in a lost letter by Dryden, referred to by Birch - see Malone, I, 1, 236 - that he spent almost a fortnight in composing and correcting the poem.) According to another story (first printed by Derrick), which may be true, Dryden ultimately received forty pounds for his work (Ibid. 287).

Malone relates that Lord Chief Justice Marlay, when a young man, frequented Will's Coffee-House, and, "Alexander's Feast, not long after its appearance, being the theme of every critic, young Marlay, among others, took an opportunity of paying his court to the author; and happening to sit next him, congratulated him on having produced the finest and noblest ode that had ever been written in any language. 'You are right, young gentleman,' replied Dryden, 'a nobler ode never was produced, nor ever will.'" (Ibid. 476, 477.)

It would be interesting to know Dryden's direct source for the incidents of this poem. Athenæus (576 D) writes: "Did not Alexander the Great keep with him Thais the Athenian courtesan, of whom Clitarchus relates that she was the cause of the burning of the palace in Persepolis?" The same writer (538 F) speaks of Timotheus as one of the flute-players at the marriage feast celebrated by Alexander after his capture of Darius. Suidas (under Τιμόθεος) relates that

Alexander was extremely fond of music, and that Timotheus so moved him by his strains, that, as he was listening to him, he jumped up to arms. (This Timotheus of Alexander's time must be distinguished from the great musician and poet Timotheus, who died in B. C. 357.) But Dryden is not likely to have read either Athenæus or Suidas.

Burton relates: "Timotheus the musician compelled Alexander to skip up and down and leave his dinner" (Anatomy of Melancholy, ii, § 2, mem. 6, subs. 3). This passage may be the germ of Dryden's ode. Burton's authority is Cardan, De Subtilitate, xiii: Alterum Timothei, qui modo mulato Alexandrum coegit alacritate impulsus exilire e convivio.

On St. Cecilia, v. n. 253, 52.

9. Thais. Dryden originally wrote Lais; in a letter to Tonson he cautions him: "Remember in the copy of verses for St. Cecilia, to alter the name of Lais, which is twice there, for Thais; those two ladies were contemporaries, which caused that small mistake." (Malone, I, 2, 60.)

29. Sublime, etc. Cf. 544, 646; 579, 115.

30. Olympia. The name of Alexander's mother was Olympias; the change to Olympia may be either a blunder or a deliberate alteration to avoid accumulation of sibilants. [SAINTSBURY.]

40. Affects to nod. Cf. 655, 153, 154.

732, 49. The jolly god, etc. Lines 49-60 might well be inclosed in quotation marks, which are not used at all in the original editions.

52. Honest face. Cf. 460, 540, n; 769, 100.

57. Soldier's. Ed. 1 and that in Fables read Soldiers, but Soldier's is found in l. 62, making it clear that a singular is intended.

67. Battles. The early texts read Battails.

107. The many, etc. Cf. 775, 545, n; 777, 665.

733. To Mr. GRANVILLE. In 1695 several of the leading actors, including Betterton and Mrs. Bracegirdle, seceded from the United Patentees (cf. headnote, p. 153), whose theater was in Drury Lane, and established a house of their own in Lincoln's Inn Fields. Granville's play was acted by Betterton's company. Dryden's references, in this poem, to the rivalry between the two houses, brought forth a retort from George Powell, the principal actor at the theater in Drury Lane, in the preface to an anonymous tragedy, The Fatal Discovery, published in 1698. The following extracts are reprinted from Malone (I, 1: 311, 312):

"—Here I am afraid he makes but a coarse compliment, when this great wit, with his treacherous memory, forgets that he had given away his laurels upon record twice before, viz. once to Mr. Congreve [p. 412] and another time to Mr. Southerne [p. 278, but Powell exaggerates]. Prythee, old Edipus, expound this mystery! Dost thou set up thy transubstantiation miracle in the donation of thy idol bays, that thou hast them fresh, new, and whole, to give them three times over? . . .

"— For the most mortal stroke at us, he charges us with downright murdering of plays, which we call reviving. I will not derogate from the merit of those senior actors of both sexes, of the other house, that shine in their several perfections, in whose lavish praises he is so highly transported; but, at the same time, he makes himself but an arbitrary judge on our side, to condemn unheard, and that under no less a conviction than murder, when I cannot learn, for a fair judgment upon us, that his reverend crutches have ever brought him within our doors since the division of the companies. 'Tis true, I think, we have revived some pieces of Dryden, as his Sebastian, Maiden Queen, Marriage à la Mode, King Arthur, etc. But here let us be tried by a Christian Jury, the Audience, and not receive the bowstring from his Mahometan Grand Signiorship. 'Tis true, his more particular pique against us, as he has declared himself, is in relation to our reviving his Almanzor [The Conquest of Granada]. . . . I confess, he is a little severe, when he will allow our best performance to bear no better fruit than a crab vintage. Indeed, if we young actors spoke but half as sourly as his old gall scribbles, we should be all crab all over."

This is a peculiar diatribe, since it is obvious that all Dryden's strictures, with the exception of the crab vintage (l. 38), refer to the senior actors at Lincoln's Inn Fields. The text of the poem contained in The Genuine Works in Verse and Prose of the Right Honourable George Granville, Lord Lansdowne, 1736, contains the following notes: (on l. 35) "Mr. Betterton's Company in Lincoln's-Inn Fields"; (on l. 38) "Drury Lane Play-House." As these do not occur in the 1698 edition of Heroic Love, they can scarcely be due to Dryden himself.

The following passage in Downes's Roscius Anglicanus (ed. Knight, 1886, p. 46) will serve as a commentary on ll. 19-22: "In the space of Ten Years past, Mr. Betterton to gratify the desires and Fancies of the Nobility and Gentry; procur'd from Abroad the best Dances and Singers, as, Monsieur L'Abbe, Madam Sublini, Monsieur Balon, Margarita Delpire, Maria Galha and divers others; who, being Exorbitantly Expensive, produc'd small Profit to him and his Company, but vast Gain to themselves." Apparently the Drury Lane Company adopted similar devices to win favor: v. Epilogue to Farquhar's Love and a Bottle.

734¹, 21. And, etc. Cf. 278, 11.

29. Itys. Slain by his mother Procne, and offered by her as food to his father Tereus.

TO MY FRIEND MR. MOTTEUX. This epistle is in large part a feeble reply to Collier's Short View: v. B. S. xxxvi; n. 734¹, 18; and cf. 742¹, 13-22; 745¹, 29 f; 749¹, 30 f; 873, 61-68; 890, 1-41; 899 (Eptl.). Collier's book had a great and salutary influence on the morals of the English stage: Dryden seeks to confuse the issue by likening him to the Puritans, who in 1642 had suppressed the theater entirely. Collier himself was a Tory, an High Churchman, and a fanatical adherent of James II.

734², 4. Solomon. Ed. 1698 reads Salomon.

18. Their faults, etc. "The poet here endeavors to vindicate himself from the charge of having often, and designedly, ridiculed the clerical function." Scott. This had been one of the charges pressed most vigorously by Collier against Dryden: cf. 745¹, 23 f; and, for the grounds of the accusation, 111, 99; 111, 128, n; 492², 46-49.

19. Rebellion, etc. "Cf. 1 Samuel xv. 23: 'For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft.'" [CHRISTIE.]

35. His tripled unity. v. B. S. xviii, xix.

735¹. EPIGRAM ON TONSON. Faction Display'd, a satirical poem first published in 1704, and attributed to William Shippen, contains the following passage:

Now the Assembly to adjourn prepar'd,
When Bibliopolo from behind appear'd,
As well describ'd by th' old Satyrick Bard;
With leering Looks, Bulfac'd, and Freckled fair,
With two left Legs, and Judas-colour'd Hair,
With Frowzy Pores, that taint the ambient Air.

In regard to this epigram, Malone (I, 1, 525) tells the following anecdote, the source of which the present editor has been unable to discover:

"On another occasion, Tonson having refused to advance him a sum of money for a work on which he was employed, he sent a second messenger to the bookseller, with a very satirical triplet; adding, 'Tell the dog that he who wrote these lines can write more.'"

LINES TO MRS. CREED. Mrs. Creed was the daughter of the Sir Gilbert Pickering mentioned in B. S. xvi. Of this Sir Gilbert Pickering both Dryden and his mother were own cousins (Malone, I, 1, 28).

Christie notes that "skilful would do as well" as well-wrought to fill up the gap in the third line.

735². THE MONUMENT OF A FAIR MAIDEN LADY. The text on the monument in Bath Abbey reads but seem'd in l. 29. The other variations mentioned by Christie do not occur in the Fables or in the copy of the inscription sent to the editor by the Rector of Bath.

736, 20. For marriage, etc.

But like a lampe of balsamum, desir'd
Rather t' adorne then last, shée soone expird,
Cloth'd in her virgin-white integritie;
For marriage, though it doe not stain, doth dye.
DONNE, A Funerall Elegie (ed. Grosart, l. 127; Riverside ed. p. 97).

Cf. 270², 4, n.

FABLES. Dryden received from Tonson only £300 for this volume, of which £268, 15s. were paid to him at the time of contract, and the remainder to his heirs on the publication of a second edition in 1713.

The motto is from Æneid, v. 55-57: "Now are we near the ashes and the bones of our parent, surely, I think, not without the purpose and the guidance of the gods." The reference of course is to the translations from Chaucer in the volume.

The following excerpts from a letter of Wordsworth to Sir Walter Scott, November 7, 1805, are of special interest in connection with the Fables:

"I was much pleased to hear of your engagement with Dryden; not that he is, as a poet, any great favourite of mine. I admire his talents and genius highly, but his is not a poetical genius. The only qualities I can find in Dryden that are essentially poetical, are a certain ardour and impetuosity of mind, with an excellent ear. It may seem strange that I do not add to this great command of language; that he certainly has, and of such language too, as it is most desirable that a poet should possess, or rather, that he should not be without. But it is not language that is, in the highest sense of the word, poetical, being neither of the imagination nor of the passions—I mean of the amiable, the ennobling, or intense passions. I do not mean to say that there is nothing of this in Dryden, but as little, I think, as is possible, considering how much he has written. You will easily understand my meaning, when I refer to his versification of Palamon and Arcite, as contrasted with the language of Chaucer. Dryden has neither a tender heart, nor a lofty sense of moral dignity. Whenever his language is poetically impassioned, it is mostly upon unpleasing subjects, such as the follies, vices, and crimes of classes of men, or of individuals. That his cannot be the language of imagination, must have necessarily followed from this; that there is not a single image from nature in the whole body of his works, and in his translation from Virgil, whenever Virgil can be fairly said to have his eye upon his object, Dryden always soils [spoil?] the passage.

"—I think his translations from Boccaccio are the best, at least the most poetical, of his poems. It is many years since I saw Boccaccio, but I remember that Sigismunda is not married by him to Guiscard (the names are different in Boccaccio in both tales, I believe, certainly in Theodore, &c.) [Really, only in the latter tale.] I think Dryden has much injured the story by the marriage, and degraded Sigismunda's character by it. He has also, to the best of my remembrance, degraded her still more, by making her love absolute sensuality and appetite; Dryden had no other notion of the passion. [Cf. n. 501², 37.] With all these defects, and they are very gross ones, it is a noble poem. Guiscard's answer, when first reproached by Tancred, is noble in Boccaccio, nothing but this: Amor può molto più che ne voi ne io possiamo. This, Dryden has spoiled. He says first very well: 'The faults of love by love are justified,' and then come four lines of miserable rant, quite à la Marin" (v. 135, 78, n). (KNOTT, Life of Wordsworth, 1839, vol. ii, pp. 27-29.)

737¹. The Duke of Ormond. "James Butler (1665-1745), second Duke of Ormond, was second son of the gallant Earl of Ossory, and grandson to the great Duke of Ormond (v. n. 120, 817), to whose honors he succeeded in 1688. After being favored by King William, and holding high office under Queen Anne, he entered into relations with the Pretender, and in 1715, soon after the accession of George I, he was impeached of high treason. He consulted his safety by flying abroad, and passed the remainder of his life in exile." [SCOTT.]

740², 5. Of the expense. So F; SS. reads in the expense. The original phrase is confused, but probably by Dryden's error rather than the printer's.

11. A certain nobleman. "This was, I suppose, our author's old foe, Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, the tardy progress of whose great

But Boccaccio was the first author to give the octave its rank as the Italian measure for heroic verse [319¹, 38]." KER.

50. Mr. Rymer. On this critic, v. B. S. xxiii, xxiv; 287², 30, n. He is the source of Dryden's misinformation in this passage as to Chaucer, who was strongly affected by French and Italian literature, but not at all by Provençal.

"— And they, with us, that would write verse, as King Richard, Savary de Maulcon, and Rob. Grostead, finding the English stubborn and unweildy, fell readily to that of Provence, as more glib, and lighter on the Tongue. But they who attempted verse in English, down till Chaucers time, made an heavy pudder, and are always miserably put to 't for a word to clink: which commonly fall so awkward, and unexpectedly as dropping from the Clouds by some Machine or Miracle.

"Chaucer found an Herculean labour on his Hands: And did perform to Admiration. He seizes all Provençal, French or Latin that came in his way, gives them a new garb and livery, and mingles them amongst our English: turns out English, gowty, or superannuated, to place in their room the foreigners, fit for service, train'd and accustomed to Poetical Discipline.

"But tho' the Italian reformation was begun and finished well nigh at the same time by Boccace, Dante, and Petrarch. Our language retain'd something of the churl; something of the Stiff and Gothish did stick upon it, till long after Chaucer.

"Chaucer throw in Latin, French, Provençal, and other Languages, like new Stum to raise a Fermentation: In Queen Elizabeth's time it grew fine, but came not to an Head and Spirit, did not shine and sparkle till Mr. Waller set it a running." A Short View of Tragedy, 1693, pp. 78, 79.

"Rymer knew something about Provençal poetry, and something about Chaucer, and through Dryden and Pope has made it a matter of traditional belief that Chaucer belongs, in some way or other, to 'the Provençal School.' Dryden seems not to have distinguished between Provençal and old French." [KER.]

"My thoughts at present are fix'd on Homer: and by my translation of the first Iliad, I find him a poet more according to my genius than Virgil, and consequently hope I may do him more justice, in his fiery way of writing; which, as it is liable to more faults, so it is capable of more beauties than the exactness and sobriety of Virgil. Since 't is for my country's honour as well as for my own, that I am willing to undertake this task, I despair not of being encourag'd in it by your favour, who am,

50. Impiger, etc. HORACE, Ars Poet. 121.

53. Quo fata, etc. VIRGIL, Æneid, v. 709: "However much the fates may drag us to and fro, let us follow them."

743¹, 3. Longinus, etc. On the Sublime, ch. xii. Dryden knew the work in Boileau's translation; v. B. S. xxiii.

10. A new machine. "Dryden's memory had misplaced the dream of Agamemnon, which in the second book comes before the Catalogue of the Ships." KER.

43. Chaucer's stories, etc. Dryden's information on this topic is sadly at fault. There is no evidence that Chaucer was acquainted with the Decameron. He drew the plot, and much of the detail, of Palamon and Arcite from Boccaccio's epic the Teseide. The story of Griselda he took from Petrarch, whose source was Boccaccio. The main source of his Troilus and Criseyde was Boccaccio's poem Il Filostrato. Though the direct originals of The Wife of Bath's Tale and The Cock and the Fox are unknown, Chaucer certainly did not invent the plot of either of them; the first story is probably of Celtic origin, the second is found in the mediæval beast epic of Reynard the Fox.

 57. Inopem, etc. Metamorphoses, iii. 466: "Plenty has made me poor."
 744¹, 2. Bartholomew Fair. By Ben Jonson. Dryden apparently remembers vaguely the general course of the action of the play, and the words of Littlewit at the opening of it: "A pretty conceit, and worth the finding! I have such luck to spin out these fine things still, and, like a silkworm, out of myself. . . . When a quirk or a quiblin does 'scape thee, and thou dost not watch and apprehend it, and bring it afore the constable of conceit, . . . let them carry thee out o' the archdeacon's court into his kitchen, and make a Jack of thee, instead of a John."

 16. Nimis poeta. "Too much a poet." The source is not Catullus, but Martial, iii. 44.
 21. Auribus, etc. "Fitted to the ears of that time." Tacitus (Dialogus, 21) describes an oration of Calvus as auribus iudicium accommodata.
 29. 'T is true, etc. This refers to a passage in Speght's preface to his edition of Chaucer, published in 1598 and 1602, reprinted in 1687, quoted by Scott: "And for his [Chaucer's] verses, although in divers places they seem to us to stand of unequal measures, yet a skilful reader, who can scan them in their nature, shall find it otherwise." Modern study of the pronunciation of English in Chaucer's time has shown the correctness of Speght's view, which is now universally accepted.
 51. Harrington. "Sir John Harrington's translation of the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto appeared in 1591." [KER.]
 52. Our numbers, etc. Rymer's summary of the contents of chapter vi of his Short View of Tragedy, from which an excerpt has already been given (n. 741¹, 50) contains the passage: "Chaucer refin'd our English. Which in perfection by Waller. His Poem on the Navy Royal, beyond all modern Poetry in any Language. Before him our Poets better expressed their thoughts in Latin."
 But, as Christie points out, Dryden had already written, in the dedication of The Rival Ladies (1664):
 "— But the excellence and dignity of it [rhyme] were never fully known till Mr. Waller taught it; he first made writing easily an art; first show'd us to conclude the sense most commonly in distichs, which, in the verse of those before him, runs on for so many lines together that the reader is out of breath to overtake it. This sweetness of Mr. Waller's lyric poesy was afterwards follow'd in the epic by Sir John Denham, in his Cooper's Hill, a poem which, . . . for the majesty of the style, is, and ever will be, the exact standard of good writing." (SS. ii. 137.) Cf. 91¹; 319², 44 f; 512², 5; 514¹, 52, n.

54. I need, etc. The little that Dryden says of Chaucer's life is of course inaccurate; correct accounts are now easily accessible.
 745¹, 13. Augustus, etc. Cf. 513¹, 35-52.
 22. The tale of Piers Plowman. Referring to The Plowman's Tale, a spurious poem included in all editions of Chaucer from 1542 to 1775, when Tyrwhitt rejected it from his Canterbury Tales.
 31. The scandal, etc. Cf. 734¹, 18, n.
 52. Scandalum magnatum. "Words spoken in derogation of a peer, a judge, or other great officer of the realm. This was distinct from mere slander in the earlier law, and was considered a more heinous offense." BOUVIER, Law Dictionary.
 745², 7. A king of England. "It is almost unnecessary to mention their names — Henry II and Thomas à Becket." SCOTT.
 13. Dr. Drake. Dr. James Drake wrote, in answer to Collier, a work called The Antient and Modern Stages Survey'd; or, Mr. Collier's View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage set in a true light, published anonymously in 1699.
 21. Prior lesit. "He was the aggressor."
 47. Baptista Porta. Giambattista della Porta (1543? 1615), Neapolitan physician. His De Humana Physiognomia Libri IV was published in 1586.
 746¹, 19. My enemies. Collier and Blackmore, and possibly Milbourne also; cf. 734 (To MOTTEUX), n; 748², 27, nn.

 25. Receiving. So SS. and K; F reads receiring.
 26. The late Earl of Leicester. Philip Sidney (1619-98), third Earl of Leicester, to whom Dryden had dedicated Don Sebastian in 1690. He was the elder brother of Algernon Sidney.
 747¹, 31. My lord, etc. For evidences of Dryden's earlier reading of Chaucer, v. 220, 212, n; 241, 1806, n; 242, 1860, n. He may have been prompted to it by the appearance of a reprint of Speght's Chaucer in 1687; cf. n. 744², 29.
 43. Mulla, etc. HORACE, Art. Poet. 70-72: "Many words that now have declined shall be born again; and others, which are now in honor, shall fall, if usage will it, on which depend the judgment and the law and the rules of our discourse." In the first line nunc is Dryden's error for jam; in the same line F reads renascuntur.

- 747¹, 6. Some old Saxon friends. The most distinguished Saxon student of Dryden's time was George Hickes (1642-1715), but the editor can find no evidence that he was a friend of Dryden. Professor Ker conjectures that "Dryden was probably thinking particularly of Rymer."
21. Grandam gold. Professor Ker points out that Dryden uses the phrase old grandam-and-aunt gold in The Wild Gallant (act iv, sc. 1; SS. ii. 93).
31. Facile, etc. "It is easy to add to what is already invented."
38. Mademoiselle de Scudéry. The famous French writer of chivalric romances (1607-1701): cf. B. S. xix. "Her huge romances, Artamenes and Clelia, were in my childhood still read in some old-fashioned Scottish families, though now absolutely forgotten, and in no chance of being revived." [SCOTT.]

- 748², 27. M—. Luke Milbourne (1649-1720), a clergyman of the Church of England, had himself planned a translation of Virgil. He attacked Dryden's version in Notes on Dryden's Virgil (1698), where he fortified his criticisms by specimens of his own verses. Scott states (SS. xi. 76) that he also attacked Dryden's "person, and principles political and religious." Cf. 785, 87.
- B*—. Sir Richard Blackmore (1650?-1729), physician and poet, had written two epic poems, Prince Arthur (1695) and King Arthur (1697). In a passage of the preface to the former (quoted by Malone, III, 647-649) he attacked Dryden for the indecency of his writings, resulting from his "irreligion and folly." In A Satyr against Wit, dated 1700, but probably published in the previous year, he renewed the charge. (Among the books mentioned in the Term Catalogue for Hilary Term, 1700, is A Satyr upon a late Pamphlet entitled A Satyr against Wit.) Dr Johnson gives a specimen of Blackmore's railery in this poem, and states that in a later edition of it, angered by Dryden's reply, he omitted a compliment to the poet which had mitigated the satire of the first edition. Cf. 785, 83; 899¹, 16, n.
41. Ogleby. v. 135, 102, n: cf. 176², 3-9.

47. "The zeal, etc. v. Psalm lxxix. 9; John ii. 17.
- 749², 20. Seneffe. F reads Senneph. "The battle of Seneffe in Flanders, in which the Prince of Condé was opposed to the Prince of Orange, was fought on August 11, 1674. Condé, not content with having defeated the rear guard of the enemy, in attempting to destroy the remainder of the Prince of Orange's army, who had left his flank exposed as he decamped, lost a great number of men." [MALONE.]

29. Demetri, etc. HORACE, 1 Satires, x. 90, 91: "You, Demetrius and Tigellius, I bid lament among the chairs of your scholars." Blackmore had once been a schoolmaster.

TO THE DUCHESS OF ORMOND. "Lady Mary Somerset, second wife of the duke. She was second daughter of Henry Somerset, first Duke of Beaufort." [SCOTT.] Cf. 150, 941, n.

- 4 (verse). A doubtful palm. "Dryden here says of Chaucer in reference to Virgil what Juvenal said of Virgil in reference to Homer: 'The composer of the Iliad shall be sung, and the lays of high-sounding Maro, which make the palm of victory doubtful' (Satires, xi. 180, 181)." [CHRISTIE.]

- 750, 14. Plantagenet. Scott thought that the reference was to Blanche, first wife of John of Gaunt, Chaucer's patron, the fourth son of Edward III. Like her husband, this lady was a Plantagenet, being the daughter of Henry, Duke of Lancaster, the grandson of Edmund, brother of Edward I. But Professor Craik is doubtless right in rejecting this supposition. "The explanation" given by Scott, he writes, "leaves the principal part of the passage entirely unexplained. Chaucer's Plantagenet here is clearly not the Duchess Blanche, but Joan, daughter of Edmund of Woodstock, Earl of Kent, second son of Edward I by his second wife, Margaret of France, famous as the Fair Maid of Kent, married for the third and last time to Edward the Black Prince, by whom she was the mother of Richard II, having been previously the wife, first (it is understood) of Thomas Holland [later Earl of Kent], . . . secondly, of William Montague [Montacute], Earl of Salisbury (making the three contending princes), and commonly believed to be the Countess of Salisbury from whom the Order of the Garter, according to the well-known story, derived its name." (History of English Literature, 1871, vol. ii. pp. 116, 117.)

The fact that the Fables volume includes a version of The Flower and the Leaf, with its compliment to the Order of the Garter (v. 852, 546-558), is an additional argument in favor of Professor Craik's explanation.

29. Platonic year. "A cycle imagined by some ancient astronomers, in which the heavenly bodies were supposed to go through all their possible movements and return to their original relative positions (after which, according to some, all events would recur in the same order as before)." N. E. D.

30. O true Plantagenet, etc. "John of Gaunt had by his mistress, Catharine Swynford, whom he afterwards married, three sons and a daughter, who were legitimated by act of parliament. John de Beaufort, the eldest of these, was created Earl of Somerset, and from him the ducal family of Beaufort are lineally descended. The patent of the first duke, the father of this Duchess of Ormond,

- bears to be in consideration of his services, and of his most noble descent from Edward III." [SCOTT.]
46. Etesian. Properly, a name applied by Greek and Latin writers to certain annual winds, especially those that blow for forty days during the dog-days. Dryden uses it here of a gentle, steady breeze. N. E. D. quotes from Phil. Trans. xiv. 561 (1684): "These Eastern Winds (which I call our English Etesians)."
48. Portunus. Cf. 8, 121, n; 582, 314, 315.
51. The land, etc. Cf. 10, 251, n.
59. Nor hear the reins. Christie aptly cites Neque audit currus habenas. (VIRGIL, Georgics, i. 514.)
62. As Ormond's harbinger. The Duchess of Ormond went to Ireland in April, 1697, and her husband followed in October. (LUTTRELL, Brief Relation, 1857, vol. iv, pp. 214, 288.)
64. The waste, etc. "Alluding to the wars of the Revolution in Ireland." SCOTT.
65. Pales. The god (goddess?) of flocks and shepherds; Ceres, the goddess of agriculture: cf. 464, 1; 787, 7, 8.
70. As when, etc. Cf. 107¹, 1 f.
- 751, 101. Nor dare, etc. "She seems to have been just recovered from a fever." SCOTT.
125. Young Vespasian. Titus Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus, better known, as a Roman emperor, by his first name. During the siege of Jerusalem, which he directed, he sought to spare the temple, and he mourned its destruction.
130. The table of my vow. The tabula votiva of Horace (Odes, i. 5. 13; 2 Satires, i. 33). Persons saved from shipwreck used to hang up in the temple of Neptune or some other appropriate divinity a picture representing their escape; cf. 703, 1114, 1115.
131. Morley's. "Dr. Christopher Love Morley, a physician of eminence." SCOTT.
133. The Macedon, etc. Alexander the Great; cf. 365, note 6. The story is told by several writers, as Quintus Curtius, ix. 8.
- 752, 162. Elisa. Another name of Dido; cf. 12, 65.
- PALAMON AND ARCITE. On this and Dryden's other translations and adaptations from early English, see Lounsbury, Studies in Chaucer, ch. vii; Schöpke, Ueber Dryden's Bearbeitung Chaucer'scher Gedichte (in Anglia, ii. 314-353, iii. 35-58); Tupper, Dryden and Speght's Chaucer (in Modern Language Notes, xii. 347-353).
12. With Love, etc. Repeated in 897, 518.
- 753, 115. His pennon. "The poet here introduces a distinction well known in heraldry. The banner was a square flag, which only barons of a great lineage and power had a right to display. The pennon was a forked streamer borne by a knight: Theseus carried both to the field, each bearing a separate device. Chaucer says:
And by his baner born is his pennoun."
SCOTT.
- 754, 175. To do th' observance, etc. Cf. 760, 44, which translates Chaucer's:
And, for to doon his observance to May.
204. Was one partition, etc. "This may mean that the tower and the palace had a party wall in common, or that the tower was part of the outer wall of the palace." SAINTSBURY.
- 755, 222. Shady walks between. A reminiscence of Milton:
— a pillared shade
High overarched, and echoing walks between.
Paradise Lost, ix. 1106, 1107.
230. Thick of bars. Cf. 5, 55, n. Chaucer's words are thikke of many a barre.
- 756, 301, 308. Council. So F; in Dryden's time council and counsel were not yet carefully distinguished: cf. 816, 367.
358. Perithous. Dryden seems always to use this form in place of the correct Pirithous; cf. 787, 50.
361. Man. F places a full stop after this word.
- 757, 404. Extremest line. Professor Saintsbury explains this as outermost region. Perhaps it is easier to suppose that Dryden was seeking to draw a metaphor from the two poles of the earth, where day and night are each six months long.
427. Guilty of their vows. "A Latinism, voti reus; cf. 582, 307, n." [CHRISTIE.]
- 758, 500. Or Mars, etc. "Dryden has introduced Mars and the quartil; they are not in Chaucer." [CHRISTIE.] Cf. 18², 13, n; 50, 1165, n.
515. Beholds, etc. "This play of words, which is truly Ovidian, does not occur in Chaucer, nor is it in conformity with our author's general ideas of translating him: v. 743², 45 f; 744¹, 25 f." [SCOTT.]
- 759, 552. Argus. v. 398, 399, 856-1003.
- 760, 12. In causes. "One of Dryden's frequent scholasticisms; in their causes would have been clearer." SAINTSBURY.
34. Style. Christie thinks that the word is used here in the sense of the Latin stylus, and refers for support to 151, 1051. His argument is not convincing.
- 761, 88. And angry, etc. Cf. 521, 2.
89. Curs, etc. Chaucer has simply, "Alas, that day that I was bore." Warton thinks that Dryden remembered Job iii. 3 f.
93. Cadmus, etc. Cf. 542, 436.
- 115, 116. Of such, etc. This couplet (with the readings times leave and That burnt) concludes a short poem by Carew, A Cruel Mistress. Warton noted Dryden's appropriation of it.
149. And Jove, etc. Cf. 727, 714, 715.
- 764, 364. The proverb, etc. Amare et sapere vix deo conceditur. "To love and to be wise is hardly granted to a god." From Publilius Syrus.
383. Lover's. F reads Lovers.
- 765, 414. The bars. "The palisades of the lists." [SCOTT.]
- 766, 483. Sigils. Cf. 853, 606, n.
489. Down-look'd. With a downcast glance.
498. Citheron. Cf. 770, 145, n.

515. Below. So F; but the sense requires above.
 527. Thrace. Cf. 466, 143.
 548. Strait. F has streight, which, as often, obviously stands for strait, not straight.
 767, 565. Soft smiling. So SS.; F reads soft, smiling.
 580. Sat. So F; it might be better to substitute sate, to point the rhyme.
 600. Conquest. This is personified, Conquest, in Chaucer; Dryden has confused the passage by prefixing the article.
 614. Two geomantic figures. Chaucer wrote
 And over his heed ther shynen two figures
 Of sterres, that been cleped in scriptures,
 That oon Puella, that other Rubeus.
 On this Speght comments, partially incorrectly: "The names of two figures in geomancy, representing two constellations in heaven. Puella signifieth Mars retrograde, and Rubeus Mars direct." This is sufficient to explain Dryden's rehandling of the passage; for an explanation of the subject matter, see Skeat's note on Cant. Tales, A 2045.
 623. Calisto. A nymph of Diana, who was seduced by Jupiter. When her guilt had been discovered by Diana, as they were bathing, Juno turned her into a bear, in which form she was nearly slain by her son, Arcas. Jupiter, to avert this crime, gave mother and son places in the skies, as the constellations of the Great and the Little Bear. (F reads Calistho; the correct form is Callisto. Cf. p. 76, where Calisto is retained from the early editions.)
Manifest of shame. Cf. 112, 204, n.
 627. Actæon. A hunter who chanced to see Diana bathing. She changed him into a stag, and he was torn in pieces by his own dogs.
 631. Daphne. v. 394, 606 f.
 634. The Caledonian beast. This is an error, by Dryden or the printer, for Calydonian; cf. 787, 1, n. On the story, v. 787-792.
 768, 639. The Volscian queen. v. 624, 1094 f; 681-688, 753-1256.
 661. So princes, etc. Dryden's complaint, not Chaucer's; cf. 414, 100, n.
 8. Such chiefs, etc. Cf. 623, 975.
 31. Pruce. Prussia. SCOTT.
 769, 100. Their honest god. Cf. 460, 540, n; 732, 52.
 104. Posts. The editions of 1700 and 1713 read Pots. The emendation to posts, adopted by all modern editors except Professor Saintsbury, seems practically certain; cf. 897, 561.
 770, 129. Creator Venus, etc. Dryden here mingles Lucretius with Chaucer; cf. 182, 1-27. Spenser also imitates the same passage, v. Faerie Queene, IV. x. 44-47.
 145. Thou gladder, etc. This line is directly from Chaucer; the island Cythera, not the mountain Cithæron, was really sacred to Venus. Cf. 766, 498.
 146. Increase of Jove. Cf. 256, 208, and Dryden's footnote.
 147. Adonis. Cf. 725, 577; 811, 382, n.
 771, 201. But such, etc. Dryden here remembers Juvenal, vi. 314.

- 773, 381. Leadén. "His planetary metal." SAINTSBURY.
 388. Outridden. Dryden has "most ridiculously mistaken" (Tyrwhitt) the sense of Chaucer's outrède (al-rede in Skeat's text), which really means surpass in counsel.
 389. Trin'd. v. 50, 1165, n.
 774, 411. Bought senates, etc. "This line, containing a political allusion to the events of the Revolution, is Dryden's exclusively." [SCOTT.]
 426. Chronos. i. e. Saturn's.
 442. Leaning, etc. Cf. 9, 154.
 775, 545. Many. In this substantive use of many there is probably confusion with the noun meiny, retinue; cf. 732, 107.
 777, 665. The people, etc. Cf. 732, 107.
 672. The standing army. Cf. 356¹, 4 (Arg.), n.
 689. Popularly low. Cf. 118, 689.
 778, 757, 758. Destroy'd: void. The repetition of this rhyme just below (ll. 766, 767) is a sign of Dryden's haste in writing.
 779, 787. Spirit's. F reads Spirits.
 844-853. But . . . know. Dryden has modified Chaucer's lines into a passage that gives expression to his own sceptical temperament, which, however, did not preclude acceptance of the doctrines of the Catholic Church. On the concluding couplet, cf. 164, 165, 208-211.
 780, 891. With words, etc. Here Dryden adds a touch of sarcasm not found in Chaucer.
 781, 927. Mourning Bride. The italics (retained from F) point the compliment to Congreve's tragedy The Mourning Bride, acted and published in 1697.
 960. Mountain-ash. So F.
 982. Swoond. F reads Suoond.
 985. While, etc. In this description Dryden follows Chaucer closely, but compare also 675, 281-303.
 782, 1066. A drop. Cf. 811, 384.
 783, 1074. Reckless. F reads Reckless.
 1144. Eros and Anteros. Here understood by Dryden as the gods of Love and Reciprocal Love.
 784. To JOHN DRIDEN. This country gentleman was the second son of Sir John Driden, baronet, the elder brother of Erasmus Dryden (or Driden), the poet's father (Malone, I, 1, 321). He was born in 1635; he represented the county of Huntingdon in parliament in 1690, and from 1700 till his death in 1708.
 Some interesting information as to this poem is contained in Dryden's letters. His former antagonist, Charles Montagu (v. n. 216. HIND AND PANTHER), was now First Lord of the Treasury, and a prominent member of the ministry to which John Driden of Chesterton, as is evident from ll. 127-134, 171-194, of the poem, was opposed. Desiring his patronage for his projected translation of Homer, the poet wrote to him in October, 1699, inclosing the epistle to his cousin:
 "Sir,
 "These verses had waited on you with the former [those To the Duchess of Ormond], but that they wanted that correction which I have given them, that they may the better endure the sight of so great a judge and poet. I am now in feare that I have purg'd them out of their spirit; as our Master Busby us'd to whip a boy so long, till he made him a confirm'd blockhead. My cousin Driden saw them in the country; and the greatest exception he made to them was, a satire against the Dutch valour in the last war. He desir'd me to omit it, (to use his own words) out of the respect he had to his Sovereign. I obey'd his commands, and left onely the praises, which I think are due to the gallantry of my own countrymen. In the description which I have made of a Parliament-man, I think I have not only drawn the features of my worthy kinsman, but have also given my own opinion of what an Englishman in Parliament ought to be; and deliver it as a memorial of my own principles to all posterity. I have consulted the judgment of my unbyass'd friends, who have some of them the honour to be known to you; and they think there is nothing which can justly give offence in that part of the poem. I say not this, to cast a blind on your judgment, (which I could not do, if I in-deavour'd it,) but to assure you, that nothing relating to the publique shall stand without your permission; for it were to want common sense to desire your patronage, and resolve to disoblige you: And as I will not hazard my hopes of your protection, by refusing to obey you in any thing which I can perform with my conscience or my honour, so I am very confident you will never impose any other terms on me." (Malone, I, 2: 90, 91, the remainder of the letter is given in n. 742¹, 23.)

For other notices, see the excerpts on p. 737. Malone (I, 1, 325-327) mentions a tradition, of which he doubts the accuracy, that the noble present to which Dryden refers was the sum of five hundred pounds. Lines 7-13 of the poem, according to Scott, are added to John Driden's epitaph in the church at Chesterton.

43. But you, etc. "Sir Robert Driden inherited the paternal estate of Canons Ashby, while that of Chesterton descended to John, his second brother, to whom this poem is addressed, through his mother, daughter of Sir Robert Beville." [SCOTT.]

53. Industrious of. Cf. 233, 1143.

785, 75. Pity, etc. "It is a pity that the generous kind, etc." [CHRISTIE.]

82. Gibbons. Cf. 367, 126, n: 709¹, 13.

83. Maurus. Cf. 748², 27, n: 899¹, 16, n. The editor cannot find that Blackmore rob'd and murder'd Maro's Muse, and thinks that in l. 85 he may be confused with Milbourne. — "The fourteen-syllable line is of course used intentionally, and, as it were, pictorially. The sweep of the verse is as vast as that of Maurus." [SAINTSBURY.] Cf. 129, 94, n.

87. M-l-r-ne. Milbourne: cf. 748², 27, n.

107. Garth. "Sir Samuel Garth (1681-1719), the ingenious author of The Dispensary (1699).

Although this celebrated wit and physician differed widely from Dryden in politics, being a violent Whig, they seem, nevertheless, to have lived in the most intimate terms. Sir Samuel had the honor to pronounce a Latin oration at the funeral of our poet. Garth's generosity consisted in maintaining a Dispensary for issuing advice and prescriptions gratis to the poor. This was highly disapproved of by the more selfish of his brethren, and by the apothecaries. The resulting disputes led to Sir Samuel's humorous poem." [SCOTT.]

109. The viper's brood.

Thou mak'st th' Ingratefull Viper (at his birth)
His dying Mother's belly to gnaw forth.

SYLVESTER, Dubartas his First Weeke (Sixth Day, ll. 250, 251).

118. Produce. F has periods after both this word and bear (l. 122); after wit (l. 124) it has an exclamation point, and after found (l. 126) a question mark. SS. and C. retain the period after produce and place a colon after bear.

786, 140. Munster. Cf. 30, 145, n.

142. Our foes, etc. "A very bloody war had been recently concluded by the Peace of Ryswick in 1697. The House of Commons were averse to a renewal of the conflict, and, from fear of tyranny, were jealous of every attempt to maintain any military force. In 1698 the army was reduced to 7000 men, and in 1699 William saw himself compelled to dismiss his faithful and favorite Dutch guards. — The subsequent lines point obliquely at these measures, which were now matter of public discussion. Dryden's cousin was one of the Whig faction that opposed the king on the question of the army. As for the poet, his Jacobitical principles assented to everything that could embarrass King William. But, for the reasons which he has assigned in his letter to Montagu, he leaves his opinion concerning the disbanding of the army to be inferred from his panegyric on the navy, and his declamation against the renewal of the war." [SCOTT.] Cf. 356¹, 4 (Arg.), n.

152. Namur. The capture of Namur in Belgium by William III in 1695 had led up to the Peace of Ryswick two years later.

188. Your gen'rous grandsire. Malone, and Scott following him, stated, apparently without other evidence than this poem, that this was Sir Robert Beville, maternal grandfather of John Driden of Chesterton. Christie writes, on the other hand: "The laborious and accurate Mr. Holt White, in his MS. notes, ascertained that Sir Erasmus Dryden, the common grandfather of the two cousins, is referred to; and he refers to a list in Rushworth's Historical Collections (i. 473), where occurs the name of Sir Erasmus Draiton, as one of those sent to prison on account of the loan money, and liberated on the eve of the general election for Charles I's third parliament, 1628."

787, 1. Calydonians. F reads Caledonians (and

- in l. 77 Caledonian), but prints Calydon in the argument just above, and Calidon in l. 364.
 2, 44, 227. Meleagrus . . . Meleagros. So F.
 7, 8. Ceres . . . Pales. Cf. 750, 65, n.
 50. Perithous. Cf. 756, 358, n.
 53. Cæneus. Cf. 856, 857, 234-287; 601, 608.
 790, 237. Plexippus. F reads Plizippus, probably by a misprint.
 791, 288. Brother's. So F; in l. 296 F reads Brothers.
 792. SIGISMONDA AND GUISCARDO. On this and on Dryden's other adaptations from Boccaccio, see Wieruszowski, Untersuchungen über John Drydens Boccaccio-Paraphrasen, Bonn, 1904.

Sigismonda and Guiscardo is from the first tale of the fourth day of the Decameron. The only essential change that Dryden has made in the plot is his introduction of a marriage between the hero and heroine. (v. n. 736 (FABLES) for Wordsworth's opinion on this.) Wieruszowski thinks that the main aim of our argument-loving poet in this alteration was to provide Sigismonda with a new plea in her defense of her act; v. 797, 402-420. Perhaps Dryden, despite the coarseness of ll. 147-172, really thought the change made the tale savor less of immodesty: cf. 746¹, 25; and, for a similar change in Cymon and Iphigenia, v. n. 890 (CYMON).

Scott's criticism on the tale may be added to Wordsworth's: "— Dryden . . . made Boccaccio's story his own, and told it in his own way. One gross fault he has engrafted upon his original: I mean the coarseness of Sigismonda's character, whose love is that of temperament, not of affection. This error, grounded upon Dryden's false view of the passion and of the female character, and perhaps arising from the depravity of the age rather than of the poet, pervades and greatly injures the effect of the tale. Yet it is more than counterbalanced by preponderating beauties. Without repeating the praise, elsewhere given to the majesty of the poet's versification, and which this piece alone would be sufficient to justify, the reader's attention may be solicited to the colors with which Dryden has drawn a mind wrought up to the highest pitch of despair. Sigismonda is placed in that situation in which, above all others, the human disposition seems to acquire a sort of supernatural strength or obstinacy; for although guilty of a crime, she is punished in a degree far exceeding the measure of the offence. In such a situation, that acuteness of feeling, which would otherwise waste itself in fluctuations betwixt shame, fear, and remorse, is willingly and eagerly turned into the channel of resistance and recrimination; and perhaps no readier mode can be discovered of hardening the human heart, even to the consistency of the nether millstone. It is in this state that Sigismonda resolutely, and even joyfully, embraces death, in order to punish her father, and rejoin her lover. The previous arguments with Tancred sufficiently, and, in

- the circumstances, naturally, intimate the tone of her mind, and are a striking instance of Dryden's power in painting passion wrought up to desperation." [SCOTT.]
- 793, 66. The royal maid. "Dryden constantly forces the rhyme for the sake of a word. But he very seldom, as here, forces a word for the sake of a rhyme. Sigismonda was not a maid." [SAINTSBURY.]
- 794, 116. Malignant light. Cf. 598, 381, n.
 154. Nothing wanted. "Nothing was wanting." [CHRISTIE.]
- 795, 242. So, like, etc. Cf. 115, 445-454.
 796, 306. Thrice, etc. Christie points out the imitation of Paradise Lost, i. 619-621:
 Thrice he assayed, and thrice, in spite of scorn,
 Tears, such as angels weep, burst forth: at last Words interwove with sighs found out their way.
 332. The guest, etc. Saintsbury points out the influence of Lucretius; cf. 185, 126-134.
 798, 503. One paste, etc. Cf. 738¹, 40.
 799, 597. The soldier. Cf. 356¹, 4 (Arg.), n.
 802, 14. Manufactur'd mass. F reads Manufacture Mass, which, though retained by SS., seems to the present editor unintelligible.
 803, 90. Pallas. "To whom the olive was sacred." SCOTT.
 805, 41. Parrots. "These are of Dryden's introduction." [SCOTT.]
806. CYNRAS AND MYRRHA. Cf. 722, 319-324.
 809, 272. The bell. "The Zodiac." SAINTSBURY.
 811, 382. The babe. Adonis: cf. 725, 577; 770, 147.
 354. The drop. Cf. 782, 1066.
 812, 77. At rovers. Cf. 284², 25, n.
 813, 115. Dispose. The verb is apparently made plural by the influence of those in the preceding line; cf. 400, 1031, n.
- 815, 295. Falchion. F reads Faulchion.
 816, 328. He said, etc. "'What a difference,' he [Tennyson] would add, 'between Pope's little poisonous barbs, and Dryden's strong invective! And how much more real poetic force there is in Dryden! Look at Pope:
 He said, observant of the blue-eyed maid,
 Then in the sheath return'd the shining blade.
 Then at Dryden:
 He said: with surly faith believ'd her word,
 And in the sheath, reluctant, plung'd the sword.'" HALLAM TENNYSON, Alfred, Lord Tennyson, 1898, vol. ii, p. 287.
367. Council. Cf. 756, 301, n.
 377. Cæneus. Cf. 856, 857, 234-287; 601, 608; 787, 53.
- 817, 385. Counsels. F reads Councils; cf. 756, 301, n.
- 820, 634. Inbibing. "Not drawing flavor from, but giving it to; a sense now obsolete." SAINTSBURY. But apparently either sense will fit this passage: the original gives no aid in determining which to prefer.
 666. And of, etc. Cf. 129, 94, n.
- 822, 3. Dell. F reads Cell; the emendation was suggested, but not adopted, by Christie. Perhaps Dale (Chaucer's word) was what Dryden really wrote.

- 823, 21. Poynant. F reads paynant, probably by a misprint.
35. Holidays. F reads Holy-Days; the same spelling is often found elsewhere.
43. The cock. So Aldine and Riverside editions; F, followed by SS. and C., reads a Cock, which can hardly be correct.
65. Some lines, etc. "The exact object of this curious fling is not obvious. The cousinhood of William and Mary will not do, for many reasons. Perhaps the Hapsburgs and the 'Austrian lip' are glanced at." SAINTSBURY
- 824, 104. Sprite. F reads Spright.
106. Shrovetide. "The recognized and privileged time for cockfighting, and pelting cocks with sticks, especially in schools." SAINTSBURY. Cf. 87¹, 7, n.
136. Afeard. F reads affer'd; Chaucer has asferd.
146. The canting style. "In technical terms;" used with a bit of sarcasm at doctors, not at Puritans.
161. Humor. Cf. 6, 100, n.
162. Cato. The reference is to a work in easy Latin, used as a schoolbook in the middle ages, Dionysii Catonis Disticha de Moribus ad Filium. It has no connection with either of the two famous Catos of Roman history; hence ll. 203, 204, which are Dryden's addition to the story.
- 825, 187. Under. F reads over, an obvious mistake.
188. Because, etc. Cf. 436, 105.
202. For Homer, etc. Dryden's addition; cf. 813, 91-93.
254. For sacred, etc. Cf. 552, 80.
- 826, 279. Found. F reads bound.
300. Waiting, etc. Cf. 10, 223, 224.
328. A mob, etc. "There may be room to suspect that the line should run:
A court of cobblers, and a mob of kings, — as better expressing the confusion of ideas incident to dreaming." SCOTT.
- 827, 391. The wife, etc. This vision Chaucer found, not in Homer, but in Dares Phrygius: cf. 497¹, 34, n; 501¹, 52, n.
417. In principio. "In the beginning," a reference to the opening words of the Gospel of John, which begin the "second Gospel," ordinarily read at the close of Mass.
418. Mulier, etc. "Woman is man's undoing," a mediæval saying that Chaucer is supposed to have taken from Vincent of Beauvais.
- 828, 460. Man, etc. Dryden's addition to the story; cf. 111, 170, n.
473. And Heav'n, etc. "An allusion to Homer's allegory of the two tuns (Iliad, xxiv. 527 f), used by Achilles in consolation to the afflicted Priam." [WARTON.]
479. Book of Martyrs. The Catholic Dryden introduces a sarcastic reference to John Foxe's Acts and Monuments, commonly known as the Book of Martyrs, a favorite book with the English Protestants, and a work of which the accuracy is by no means equal to its anti-Catholic enthusiasm.
480. A fox, etc. "Indulging, as usual, his political antipathies, Dryden fails not to make the fox a Puritan." SCOTT.
499. O hypocrite, etc. "According to the romantic history of Charlemagne, Gano, or Ganelon, betrayed the Christian army at the battle of Roncesvalles, where Orlando and the peers of France were slain. The pun upon Gallie (Latin gallus, a cock), which is renewed in deriving the cock from Brennus and Belinus (l. 636), is entirely Dryden's." [SCOTT.]
- 829, 515, 549, 559. Bin, been. Cf. 263¹, 31, n.
523. I cannot, etc. Dryden, true to his taste for argument in verse, expands the following passage; and, true to his Catholic faith, makes plain his preference for the free will solution: cf. 877, 424. In ll. 517-522 there is a sneer at Calvinism; cf. 116, 539, n.
524. Bradwardin. Thomas Bradwardine (1290?-1349), Archbishop of Canterbury. His work On the Cause of God earned him the title of Doctor Profundus, and remained a theological authority for ages. Austin is of course St. Augustine.
555. With a mischief to their kind. A mild curse — "deuce take 'em!"
565. Silence, etc. An expression of Dryden's own principles after the Revolution.
- 830, 599. So profane. So SS. and C.; F reads to prophane.
636. Brennus and Belinus. Brennus was the leader of the Gauls who overran Italy in B. C. 390. Belinus (or Belenus) was a divinity of the Gauls.
652. Solar. "That is, born under the influence of the sun. This addition to Chaucer well illustrates Dryden's interest in astrology." [SAINTSBURY.]
- 831, 686. Native. "In astrology, the person whose scheme of nativity is calculated." [SCOTT.]
603. Gaufride, etc. "Gaufride, or Geoffrey de Vinsauf, bewailed the death of Richard I in would-be plaintive hexameters, in which he particularly exclaims against Friday, the day on which that hero was shot by Bertrand de Gurdun." [SCOTT.] Chaucer's compliment is of course ironical.
728. Talbot with the band. "Probably Dryden took Talbot in its sense of dog, and then band will be as in bandog, 'the chained hound.'" [SAINTSBURY.]
742. Jack Straw, etc. "Dryden has given Jack Straw the national antipathies of the mob in his own time. The gathering cry one and all he also takes from modern London." [SCOTT.]
750. And inflated box. "Blew into musical instruments of boxwood;" or inflated may be taken as a participle.
- 832, 759. Yours, etc. "This excellent parody upon Virgil is introduced by Dryden, and marks his late labors." [SCOTT.] Cf. 707, 1357, 1358.
790. So loyal subjects, etc. Another utterance of the Tory Dryden, capable of being applied to the events of the English Revolution.
806. A peace, etc. This closing speech of the cock was added to the story by Dryden.

THEODORE AND HONORIA. This story is from the eighth tale of the fifth day of the Decameron. Dryden has altered the names of the characters, changing Nastagio degli Onesti into Theodore, the daughter of Paolo Traversaro into Honoria, and Guido degli Anas-taggi into Guido Cavalcanti. The last name is found in the tenth canto of Dante's Inferno, but Dryden is more likely to have taken it from the ninth tale of the sixth day of the Decameron. — In the plot the English poet makes but one essential change, greatly expanding (ll. 340–409) the description of the inward struggle of Honoria, which Boccaccio treats very summarily, in about ten lines.

Byron's praise of this tale is well known:

Sweet hour of twilight! — in the solitude
Of the pine forest, and the silent shore
Which bounds Ravenna's immemorial wood,
Rooted where once the Adrian wave flow'd o'er,
To where the last Cæsarean fortress stood,
Evergreen forest! which Boccaccio's lore
And Dryden's lay made haunted ground to me,
How have I loved the twilight hour and thee!

The shrill cicadas, people of the pine,
Making their summer lives one ceaseless song,
Were the sole echoes, save my steed's and mine,
And vesper bell's that rose the boughs along;
The specter huntsman of Onesti's line,
His hell-dogs, and their chase, and the fair throng
Which learn'd from this example not to fly
From a true lover, — shadow'd my mind's eye.

Don Juan, iii. 105, 106.

1. Romanian lands. Boccaccio's phrase is, In Ravenna antichissima città di Romagna.

835, 193. Stern. F reads Stern'd.

220. Would. "Used purposely here as expressing desire." [SAINTSBURY.]

836, 228. Destruction. F reads Distruction.

268. Mastiffs. F reads Mastiffs, which may be either nominative or possessive, since the apostrophe is ordinarily not used in plural possessives.

280. Close. F reads clos'd.

838, 425. Beware. Since Dryden frequently shifts tenses in successive lines (as, for example, in 530, 31, 32; 859, 407, 408), this may be taken as a present tense: cf. 832, 799.

CYX AND ALCYONE. The words "out of . . . Metamorphoses" do not occur in the heading in F; they are supplied from the table of contents, which, however, has Tenth instead of Eleventh.

839, 51. And present, etc. "And, being present, fear nothing except what I actually suffer."

54. Starlike. Ovid's sidereus; Cyx was the son of Lucifer, the morning star.

842, 278. Beast of nature. Wild beasts (fera); cf. 251, 2537.

311. Renew. F reads renews, doubtless a misprint.

844, 395, 396. Her nurse, etc. The punctuation follows SS.; F has no stop after cause, and places commas after Cries and Griefs.

845, 495. Sev'n days, etc. These are the "haleyon days" (cf. 7, 144; 10, 236) of winter, when the sea is calm and the kingfisher sits brooding on her nest. Other authors give their number as fourteen.

THE FLOWER AND THE LEAF. The words out of Chaucer do not occur in the heading of this poem in F, but are found in the table of contents.

Modern students of Chaucer do not regard the original of this poem as one of his works. It probably dates from the middle of the fifteenth century, and seems to have been written by a woman (cf. 851, 471). It is in a seven-line stanza, rhyming a b a b b c c (rhyme royal). Dryden is freer in handling this poem than in any other of his adaptations from early English, except of course The Character of a Good Parson; ll. 480–501, which identify the companies of knights and ladies with fairies, are his addition to the story.

29. The balmy dew. "That is, sleep." [SAINTSBURY.]

846, 46. The painted birds. Christie notes the borrowing from Virgil: pictæ volucres, Georgics, iii. 243.

53. And wanted, etc. "One prognostic was missing to add to the others that announced the spring." [SAINTSBURY.]

847, 129. Her opposite. "The goldfinch." [SAINTSBURY.]

155. A train, etc. "The mass of the Fathers (Justin, Athenagoras, Irenæus, Clement, Tertullian, Origen, Lactantius, Sulpicius, Ambrose, Nazianzen) hold that, though Satan fell from the beginning, the Angels fell before the deluge, falling in love with the daughters of men." NEWMAN, Apologia, ch. i (London, 1887, p. 29). Cf. Genesis vi. 2.

158. Less. "That is, a comparison less." [SAINTSBURY.]

159. Of a kind. "Of one kind; uniform." [SAINTSBURY.] After kind F has a comma, retained here and in SS.; C. deletes it.

848, 228. Trumpets. "In the sense of trumpeters. These and other warlike musicians long held some part of the character of heralds and of ancient minstrels. They were distinguished by collars and tabards, and often employed on messages, during which their persons were sacred." [SCOTT.]

233. Charge. "Bearings." [SAINTSBURY.]

257. The rivets, etc. "The joints of the armor were riveted with nails after the warrior had put it on." [SCOTT.]

264. Henchmen. "Personal attendants, who followed the knights in battle, and never quitted their side. Before a battle the henchmen carried, as in the text, the arms of the knight ready for use." [SCOTT.]

849, 297. Coursers. F reads Courses.

850, 345. On arow. F reads on a-row.

353. Masters. F reads Master's.

360. Lea. F reads Lay, a spelling which helps to explain rhymes such as sea: way, 27, 42.

851, 493. Demogorgon. "Demogorgon, one of the more apocryphal deities of mythology, has not much propriety here, except as supplying a name of excellent sound." [SAINTSBURY.]

852, 535. Nine worthies. "The common list of the nine worthies comprehends: Hector, Pompey, and Alexander, pagans; Joshua,

- David, and Judas Maccabeus, Jews; and Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Boulogne, Christians; but it is sometimes varied." SCOTT.
542. Who bear the bows, etc. "This is a mistake of Dryden, who was misled by the spelling of his text of the old English; bowes here, but boughes in line corresponding to 849, 282. The bow, though the youth trained to chivalry were taught to use it, made no part of a knight's proper weapons. But it is curious how Dryden, having fallen into an error, finds out a reason for his false reading, by alleging that the bows were borne as an emblem of strength of arm, valor, and victory." [SCOTT.]
- 853, 606. Sigils. "Planetary or other signs, used as talismans." [SAINTSBURY.] Dryden's addition; cf. 766, 483.
- 854, 24. Ostent. "Dryden probably took this term (it is not in Ovid) from Chapman (Iliad, ii. 280), which, considering his previous condemnation of that translator (386², 21-29), was unkind." [SAINTSBURY.]
36. Yet, etc. Yet, despite this prodigy, the navy did not weigh anchor.
44. Iphigenia. Dryden accents incorrectly, Iphig'nia instead of Iphigen'ia; cf. 601, 606, n; 730, 7, n; 895, 419.
- 855, 98. Heroes. Possibly this should be changed to heroes.
- 856, 203. The bird. "The swan." SCOTT.
236. These. So SS.; F reads Those. On Cæneus, cf. 601, 608; 787, 53.
- 857, 294. The cloud-begotten race. "The Centaurs, a people of Thessaly, said to be begotten by Ixion, on the cloud which he took for Juno." SCOTT.
307. And little wanted, etc. "The translation is somewhat obscure; it means: 'All wished her joy, and it had nearly happened that all had wished it in vain.'" [SCOTT.]
- 858, 339. Supply. Cf. 400, 1031, n.
- 861, 578. Strange, etc. Habit and dress are ordinarily synonyms. Scott thinks that here the former applies "to the furniture of the horse," but suggests as an alternative that it "means his mode of life." N. E. D. gives no instance of habit used in any such sense as trappings of a horse.
- 862, 607. Divin'd. F reads demin'd.
634. Beast. F reads Breast; the emendation was suggested, but not adopted, by Saintsbury.
- 863, 742. Tow'r'd. F reads tour'd.
- 864, 811. Warrior. So SS.; F reads Warriors; perhaps warriors would be a better correction.
- 868, 254. Phthia. F reads Pthya.
- 869, 395. The spy. Dolon, whom Diomedes and Ulysses surprised setting out to explore the Greek camp: v. Iliad, x. 299-464; cf. 695, 520-529.
- 871, 501. Counsels. So SS.; F reads Counsel, probably by a misprint.
- 872, 609. A flow'r. The hyacinth. This flower was fabled to have sprung from the blood of the beautiful youth Hyacinthus, a favorite of Apollo, and accidentally slain by him. It bore on its petals the Greek letters AI, an exclamation of woe, symbolising the grief of Apollo for his loss. The same letters begin the name Aias, Ajax.
- THE WIFE OF BATH, HER TALE. On this poem Professor Lounsbury writes:
- "This is essentially a fairy story. In Chaucer the heroine is a young and beautiful woman who has by unmentioned, but evidently malignant agency been transformed into a foul, ill-favored crone. It is implied, though not asserted, that in this condition she must remain until some one can be prevailed upon to receive her as a bride with all her deformity, and ignorant of the transformation that is to restore her to her true shape. It is for this end, therefore, that she is laboring solely. But in Dryden's version she is no mere passive sufferer from a wrong inflicted by a malign and hostile influence possessed of preternatural power. She is herself a proficient in magic art. She has the infernal world at her command. When her offer is accepted by the knight, she spreads her mantle on the ground, and transfers him with furious rapidity to King Arthur's court, while his horse is also brought thither by some devil subject to her will [v. 875, 253-265]. The alteration was objectionable because it was false to the original, false to the belief upon which the original was founded, and false to the central idea of the story. The beautiful woman of Chaucer, suffering from the influence of malignant hate, becomes in Dryden a practitioner of the black art, leagued with the powers of the lower world, and sharing in the privileges with which subservience to their will is rewarded." Studies in Chaucer, iii. 176, 177.
- Though this criticism is just, it merely shows Dryden's lack of knowledge and appreciation of mediæval literature. His contemporaries, if they noted his addition to the original, were probably pleased by it.
3. Elfs. On the discrepancy with elves (873, 34), cf. 263¹, 31, n.
28. Friars. F reads Fry'rs.
- 873, 61-68. Then courts, etc. An oblique reply to Collier (v. B. S. xxxvi; n. 734 (Mortreux); cf. 899 (Epl.).
73. Geneura. Guinevere.
80. Corring, etc. This line is Dryden's addition, and is very characteristic of him.
84. Speaker. The speaker of the House of Commons was so called because in the old days he was the spokesman of the Commons in their communications with the Crown. The older sense of the word survives here.
104. But, not, etc. The 1700 ed. reads But not to hold our Proffer in Scorn; that of 1713 inserts turn'd after Proffer. Some emendation is necessary, and that suggested in the text seems as likely as any.
- 874, 156. Wineas, etc. "Ovid, indeed, tells the story in the Metamorphoses, lib. xi. But how will the fair reader excuse Chaucer for converting the talkative male domestic of Midas into that king's wife?" SCOTT.

194. Bütör. F reads Biltour.
Bumps. The name given to the cry of the bittorn. "That a bittorn maketh that mugient noise, or as we term it, bumping, by putting its bill into a reed, . . . is not so easily made out. For my own part, though after diligent enquiry, I could never behold them in this motion." SIR THOMAS BROWNE, Pseudodoxia Epidemica, iii. 27, § 4.
- 875, 245. Kerchief. "I do not remember another example of this synecdoche, though the similar, but much less graceful, petticoat, is of course common." SAINTSBURY.
 Chaucer has:
 — the proudeste of hem alle,
 That wereth on a coverchief or a callye.
- 876, 340. À la mort. F reads a-la-mort. This phrase was once completely naturalized in English, and felt as all amort; the italics of F show, however, that Dryden regarded it as still French.
- 877, 374. Ah benedicite, etc. The following passage, through l. 457, is greatly altered and expanded from Chaucer. Dryden owes much to Lucretius; cf. 191, 208-236. Line 436, however, is from Horace; cf. 490¹, 13, n.
387. Earth. "That is, his earthly part, body." [SAINTSBURY.]
424. The will is free. Cf. 829, 523, n.
- 878, 431. Whichever. One of the two.
434. Sodom blue. "That is, the blue flame of sulphur, wherewith Sodom perished." [SAINTSBURY.]
448. Servius Tullius. The sixth king of Rome, the son of a female captive, who was a slave in the family of Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth king. — F reads Tullus, probably by a misprint.
450. Fabricius. One of the poor and honest heroes of the Roman republic, famous for his exploits in the war against Pyrrhus. (Added to the story by Dryden.)
471. The ragged beggar, etc. From Juvenal, as Chaucer indicates; cf. 348, 33, 34.
- 879, 534. Pygmalion. Added to the story by Dryden; v. 801-806.
543. Often as they. So SS.; F reads often they.
3. Sate. F reads sat, but cf. rhyme.
16. Alcides. Hercules; cf. 628, 266-270.
- 881, 160. Cov'itous. F reads covet'ous.
- 882, 260. Tiphys. The helmsman of the ship Argo; cf. 885, 505.
- 883, 304. Flou'rets. F reads Flourets.
339. The rolling chair. "The rolling chair, or gocart, and the stick are not in Ovid." SAINTSBURY.
 Dryden's addition here of concrete detail to Ovid's vague aliquo conamine is in contrast with his general tendency to abstraction.
343. Years. F places a comma after this word. SS., a colon.
- 884, 434. Hurt by Hercules, etc. Cf. 857, 292 f, and 863, 706-710.
- 885, 505. Tiphys. Cf. 882, 260, n.
- 886, 530. But this, etc. Cf. 481-487, 401-806.
541. Hollow. So SS.; F reads hallow, which may be a misprint for either hollow or shallow.

550. Backward. That is, walking backward, referring to the crab's gait.

583, 592. Amomum . . . casia, cinnamon . . . nard. All these words are in italics in F.

586. Centuries. F reads Cent'ries.

887, 658. Birth. So SS.; F reads Breath, but cf. rhyme.

888, 702. Nor purple feathers, etc. "Alluding to the plan of fastening bright feathers to a string to frighten game." SAINTSBURY.

THE CHARACTER OF A GOOD PARSON. "This piece may be considered as an amende honorable to the reverend order whom Dryden had often satirized, — cf. 734 (MOTTEUX), n; 734², 18, n; 111, 99; 492², 46-49, — and he himself seems to wish it to be viewed in that light (v. 745², 26-35). With a freedom which he has frequently employed elsewhere, though to a less extent, Dryden has added the last thirty-five lines, in which, availing himself of the revolution which in Chaucer's time placed Henry IV on the throne, he represents the political principles of his priest as the same with those of the non-juring clergy of his own day. Indeed the whole piece is greatly enlarged upon Chaucer's sketch." [SCOTT.]

As we know from a letter (printed on p. 737), Dryden wrote this poem at the suggestion of Samuel Pepys, the diarist. To the poet's letter Pepys replied as follows:

"Friday, July 14, 1699.

"SIR,

"You truly have obliged mee; and possibly in saying so, I am more in earnest then you can readily think: as verily hoping from this your copy of one GOOD PARSON, to fancy some amends made mee for the hourly offence I beare with from the sight of soe many lewd originalls.

"I shall with great pleasure attend you on this occasion, when ere you'll permit it: unless you would have the kindness to double it to mee, by suffering my coach to wayte on you (and who you can gayne mee y^e same favour from) hither, to a cold chicken and a sallade, any noone after Sunday, as being just stepping into the ayre for 2 days. I am most respectfully

Your honor^d and obed^t Servant,
 S. P." (Malone I, 2, 86.)

The writer of the preface to the 1711 edition of Expostulatoria, a work attributed to Bishop Thomas Ken (1637-1711) applies to Ken Dryden's Character of a Good Parson. (The editor here follows the account of Ken by the Rev. William Hunt in D. N. B., which, however, gives the title of Ken's work as Expostularia.) The age of the parson, his writing of hymns (ll. 21-24), and his principles as a non-juror, all circumstances added to Chaucer by Dryden, favor this view, but external evidence is lacking.

19. For, letting down, etc. Dryden's addition; cf. 782, 1024, 1025. The idea of the chain of love goes back to Boethius; v. Skeat's note on Cant. Tales, A 2991-93.

889, 34. To threats, etc. "A reference to the well-known fable of The Sun, the Wind, and the Traveler." SAINTSBURY. Cf. 223, 447.

97. Zebedee. v. Mark x. 35-45.

98. Not but, etc. "This passage is obviously introduced by the author to apologize for the splendid establishment of the clergy of his own community. What follows applies, as has been noticed, to the non-juring clergy, who lost their benefices for refusing the oath of allegiance to King William." SCOTT.

103. Reflecting, etc. v. Exodus xxxiv. 29-35; cf. 118, 649, n.

890, 115. An odious name. "How odious, Burnet found when his Pastoral Letter urging it was burnt by order of the Commons, January, 1693. The flattering priest below is, however, pretty certainly William Sherlock, Dean of St. Paul's, whose Case of the Allegiance due to Sovereign Powers, etc., appeared in 1690 or 1691. See Macaulay, ch. xvii, xix." [SAINTSBURY.]

CYMON AND IPHIGENIA. This story is from the first tale of the fifth day of the Decameron. Dryden's principal alteration of the plot is that he makes Iphigenia respond to Cymon's love, so that she, as well as her father, regrets the previous contract to Pasimond (v. l. 251). The aim, as Wieruszowski conjectures, is probably to create some moral justification for the hero's acts. Cf. the similar change of Sigismonda and Guiscardo; v. n. 792.

This poem was reprinted in the third edition (1702) of Sylvæ (The Second Miscellany).

1-41. Old, etc. This passage is a reply to Collier's attack: v. B. S. xxxvi, and 734 (MORTUUX), n, and references given there. Christie just remarks: "Unable to make a good defense, Dryden resorts to abuse; and, a Roman Catholic convert, he denounces the marriage of Protestant clergymen."

39. Ormond. Cf. 749² (ORMOND), n.

891, 67. And Cymon, etc. "Era chiamato Cimone, il che nella lor lingua sonava quanto nella nostra bestione."

106. The fanning wind, etc. The fourteen-syllable verse is used purposely to give a suggestion of prolonged repose; cf. 129, 94, n.

892, 132. As barren grounds, etc. Dryden's addition; cf. 445, 122-136.

894, 322. Who now, etc. Cf. 757, 381; 765, 426; 242, 1860, n.

895, 400. The rude militia. "Dryden willingly seizes the opportunity of being witty at the expense of the militia of England." [SCOTT.]

419. Iphigenia. On the accent, cf. 854, 44, n.

424. So passive, etc. A sarcastic allusion to the Church of England, which in time of stress had not adhered to its doctrine of passive obedience; cf. 236, 1428; 237, 1432-1437; 244, 1956-1960.

427. To dismiss, etc. "That is, to shake him off altogether." [SAINTSBURY.]

897, 518. With Love, etc. Repeated from 752, 12.

557. Retir'd. F, followed by SS. and C., places only a comma after this word, and has no pause after troop in the next line. Lines 558, 559, mean clearly: "His soldiers . . . all determined to fight, and all begged for (demanded) their accustomed work (fighting)." (N. E. D., however, does not cite any instance of fix used in the sense of determine earlier than 1788.)

568. These lead, etc. Cf. 129, 94, n.

898, 622. Grind. F reads grin'd, which may possibly mean grinn'd.

PROLOGUE . . . FROM THE PILGRIM. "Cibber informs us that Sir John Vanbrugh, who cast the parts, being pleased with the young actor's [Cibber's] moderation in contenting himself with those of the Stuttering Cook and Mad Englishman, assigned him also the creditable task of speaking the epilogue, which, as it was so much above the ordinary strain, highly gratified his vanity. Dryden himself, on hearing Cibber recite it, made him the further compliment of trusting him with the prologue also; an honorable distinction, which drew upon him the jealousy of the other actors (Apology, ch. viii)." [SCOTT.]

899¹, 3. Tom Dove. "The savage amusement of bear baiting was much in fashion in England during the seventeenth century. Tom Dove seems to have been a bear of great celebrity." [SCOTT.] Cf. 154, 24.

16. Maurus. Blackmore. Cf. 748², 27, n; 785, 83. Blackmore took a B.A. from Oxford in 1674 and an M.A. in 1676, but had his medical degree from the University of Padua. He had just published — since Dryden wrote his preface to the Fables — A Paraphrase on the Book of Job; as likewise on the Songs of Moses, Deborah, David; on four Select Psalms, some Chapters of Isaiah, and the Third Chapter of Habakkuk, mentioned in the Term Catalogue for Trinity Term, 1700. In 1687 he was admitted fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, under the charter of James II.; in 1697 he was knighted by William III. (The name is spelled Marus in the 1700 text, but cf. 785, 83.)

899², 35. Hopkins. Cf. 143, 403, n.

41. At leisure hours, etc. In his preface to King Arthur (1697) Blackmore states that Prince Arthur was written "by such catches and starts, and in such occasional, uncertain hours, as the business of my profession would afford me." He continues: "And therefore for the greatest part that poem was written in coffee-houses, and in passing up and down the streets, because I had little leisure elsewhere to apply to it." Cf. 741², 33 f.

EPILOGUE. This is largely a reply to Collier; v. B. S. xxxvi, and 734 (MORTUUX), n; cf. 873, 61-68. (Collier in 1699 had published A Defense of the Short View, etc., in answer to attacks on his work by Congreve and Vanbrugh.)

900¹, 21. Misses. In italics in 1700 text.

41, 42. For while, etc. Repeated from 172, 55, 56, with the alteration of two words.

900², 47. Oates. v. 117, 632, n. Dryden here alludes to his continual appendixes to his information concerning the Popish Plot.

Haynes. "The allusion seems to be partly to Bryan Haines, the Tory evidence against Shaftesbury and College, a fellow almost as infamous as Oates; but chiefly, by way of equivoque, to the wicked wag Joe Haynes [Haines], the comedian, who, amongst other pranks, chose, during the reign of James II, to become Roman Catholic. Whether he took this step from any serious prospect of advantage, or to throw ridicule on the new converts, is somewhat dubious; at least his apostasy was not founded upon conviction, for, after the Revolution, he abjured the errors of Popery, spoke a penitentiary prologue, and reconciled himself to the Church and theater of England." SCOTT. Cf. 70, 45, n; 280², 20, n.

11. St. Hermo. "The electric appearances, sometimes seen on the masts or yards of a ship during stormy nights, called by sailors in the Mediterranean the Lights of St. Elmo. They are supposed to presage the safety of the vessel and the termination of the storm." [SCOTT.]

20. Charms. The 1700 text reads Charm, but cf. rhyme.

901. THE SECULAR MASQUE. "The moral of this emblematical representation is sufficiently intelligible. By the introduction of the deities of the chase, of war, and of love, as governing the various changes of the seventeenth century, the poet alludes to the sylvan sports of James I, the bloody wars of his son, and the licentious gallantry which reigned in the courts of Charles II and James, his successor." [SCOTT.]

Janus is introduced here as the god of beginnings; Chronos, as the god of time; and Momus, as the personification of mockery and censure. Cf. 383¹, 2, n.

902, 82. But since, etc. "There seems here to be a secret allusion to the exile of the beautiful queen of James II, so much admired by the Tory poets of the time." SCOTT. Cf. 268, The Lady's Song.

903. POEMS ATTRIBUTED TO DRYDEN. The notes on pp. 903-919 have been made as brief as possible.

Among the titles on pp. 920, 921, should have been included —

THE HAPPY SHEPHERD

a ballad, the first two verses of which the British Museum Catalogue (under Shepherd, p. 184) ascribes to Dryden. This, as the editor learns from a correspondent at the British Museum, is a broadside (single sheet), undated, but, as is shown by an advertisement on the reverse of the leaf, published in the reign of King William (1689-1702). "There is no evidence from the ballad itself that Dryden is the author, nor indeed does the MS. list of contents at the beginning of the volume in which the ballad is bound, suggest Dryden's name." The ballad contains seven stanzas, of which the first two, and the title, are as follows:

THE HAPPY SHEPHERD:

OR;

The Young Gallants Courtship to his Coy Lady:

To a pleasant New Tune, Sung in the last New OPERA.

How blest are Shepherds, how happy their Lasses, while Drums and Trumpets are sounding Allarms;
Over our lowly sheds all the storm passes,
and when we dye, 'tis in each others Arms:
All the Day on our Herds and Flocks employing,
All the Night on our Flutes, and in enjoying.

(2)

Bright Nymphs of BRITAIN, with graces attended, let not your Days without pleasure expire;
Honour 's but empty, when your youth is ended,
all Men will praise you, but none will desire:
Let not Youth the away without contenting,
Age will come time enough for your repenting.

PROLOGUE . . . FROM THE INDIAN QUEEN.

On Howard, v. B. S. xvii. The Indian Queen, as might be inferred from the Epilogue, was presented with much magnificence. Pepys writes that it "for show, they say, exceeds Henry the Eighth."

903², 17. Will. 'T will in original edition.

904¹, 3 (A Song). Do. CGD reads do's.

3 (Enjoyment). So o'er-blest. CGD reads so over blest.

9. Whilst. CGD reads While.

904², 14. His soul. CGD reads His flying Soul.

19, 20. "O now, etc. CGD reads:

Oh! now my dear let us go.
Dye with me Damon, for now I dye too.

21. Sweet. CGD reads secret.

A SONG. The "A" of the heading is not found in CGD.

905. LINES ON SETTLE'S EMPRESS OF MOROCCO. If, as Settle himself asserts (Malone, II, 273), Shadwell had a hand in Notes and Observations on The Empress of Morocco, that pamphlet must have been written before the disagreement between Dryden and Shadwell referred to in nn. 74², 53 (pp. 944 and 1031).

AN ESSAY UPON SATIRE. It has seemed needless to give full text variants for this poem. The text printed in Sheffield's Works, 1723 (a collection edited by Pope), differs considerably from that given here.

906, 30. Armstrong. Cf. 74², 22, n.

56. Monmouth. Cf. 110, 18, n.

Sir Carr. Sir Carr Scrope, courtier and minor poet. He contributed a version of Sappho to Phaon to the cooperative translation of Ovid's Epistles in which Dryden had a leading share (cf. pp. 88-101).

61. The royal mistresses. The Duchess of Cleveland (cf. headnote, p. 20) and the Duchess of Portsmouth (cf. headnote, p. 202).

74. Ayles—y. Robert Bruce, Earl of Aylesbury.

76. D—by's. Thomas Osborne, Earl of Danby.

907, 89. Nokes. Cf. 60², 1, n.

102. Machiavel. The Earl of Shaftesbury; cf. 111, 150, n. The 1702 text reads Matchiavel, which illustrates the pronunciation of the name in Dryden's time.

122. Earl of E—x. Arthur Capel, Earl of Essex (1631–83).
145. Tropos. "This was the infamous Lord Chief Justice Scroggs. At first he stickled hard for the Popish Plot; but, finding that ceased to be the road to preferment, he became as eager on the other side." [SCOTT.] Scott gives no authority for this identification, which is at least doubtful. Mr. Pollock has recently defended the reputation of Scroggs. (The Popish Plot, 1903, pp. 352–359.)
180. D—et. Dorset; cf. 282¹ (DORSET), n.
186. Swell'd by contact. So SS.; the texts of 1702 and 1703 read Suckl'd by contract; the line is not found in the 1723 edition.
192. Ned Howard. "Alluding to Dorset's verses To Mr. Edward Howard, on his Incomparable, Incomprehensible Poem, called The British Princes." [SCOTT.] Howard was Dryden's brother-in-law.
194. Mul—ve. The Earl of Mulgrave, author of the poem.
210. Sid. Sir Charles Sedley (Sidley); cf. 136, 163, n. The texts of 1702 and 1703 read Sid—y; that of 1723 has Sid.
- 908, 229. Hewet. Cf. 78¹ (EPIL. MAN OF MODE), n. Jack Hall. Cf. 143, 407, n.
230. For's want. So in the 1703 text; that of 1702 reads for's meer want.
243. Killigrew. Thomas Killigrew (1612–83), dramatist, theatrical manager, and wit. He was the uncle of the Mrs. Anne Killigrew whose talents are celebrated by Dryden; v. 211–214.
244. Bessus. Cf. 80¹, 8; n. 79², 1.
266. Thought's. The texts of 1702 and 1703 read Thought; the line is not found in the 1723 edition.
281. Stupendous. So in 1703 text; the 1702 text reads stupendious. Cf. n. 456, 214.
- THE ART OF POETRY. The variant readings of this poem are omitted from these notes.
21. Dubartas. Josuah Sylvester (1563–1618) is chiefly known in literature by his translation of Du Bartas his Divine Weekes and Workes. The work was popular among the translator's contemporaries, but after 1660 it was comparatively little read; cf. n. 32, 235, on p. 1031.
- 909, 90. The Mock-Tempest. This play, by Thomas Duffet, was acted at the Theater Royal, in ridicule of the performance at the Duke's Theater of Shadwell's operatic version of Dryden and Davenant's adaptation of Shakespeare's Tempest; cf. n. 74², 53. Duffet also wrote parodies of Settle's Empress of Morocco and Shadwell's Psyche.
98. Bumbast. On the discrepancy with bombast (910, 160), cf. 263¹, 31, n.
101. Nor, etc. "Thus an injudicious poet, who aims at loftiness, runs easily into the swelling puffy style, because it looks like greatness. I remember, when I was a boy, I thought imitable Spenser a mean poet in comparison of Sylvester's Dubartas, and was rapt into an ecstasy when I read these lines:

Now when the winter's keener breath began
To crystallize the Baltic ocean;
To glaze the lakes, to bridle up the floods,
And periwig with snow the baldpate woods.

I am much deceiv'd if this be not abominable fustian, that is, thoughts and words ill-sorted, and without the least relation to each other." DRYDEN, Dedication of The Spanish Friar (1681); SS. vi. 407, 408.

For the lines quoted (somewhat incorrectly) by Dryden, v. Sylvester, Dubartas his Second Weekie (Fourth Part of the First Day. ll. 184–187).

115. Fairfax. As a matter of fact, the translation of Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered by Edward Fairfax (d. 1635) was not published until 1600, after the death of Spenser (1552?–99). Dryden's views on literary history are generally not to be relied on.

126. Their mock Gondibert. Cf. 24², 22, n. A group of wits, including, it is said, Denham and Donne, issued in 1653 two successive satires on Gondibert, entitled Certain Verses written by severall of the Authors Friends, to be re-printed with the second edition of Gondibert, and, The Incomparable Poem Gondibert Vindicated, etc. Professor F. N. Robinson writes to the editor that the first of these volumes (which alone is in the Harvard Library) contains no poem called The Mock Gondibert, "though two of the pieces might be not inappropriately so characterized." The name Mock Gondibert was probably composed in imitation of The Mock-Tempest in l. 90. — Davenant in his Preface noted the errors of his predecessors in epic poetry, and praised his own originality. He constructed his poem, for example, on the model of a drama, "proportioning five books to five acts, and cantos to scenes."

- 910, 251. Randal. "It is difficult to guess who is meant. Certainly the description does not apply to Thomas Randolph, whose pastorals are rather ornate, and duly garnished with classical names. Probably Dryden, if he filled up this name, was contented to speak at large, from a general recollection, that Thomas Randolph, the 'adopted son' of Ben Jonson, had written pastorals." [SCOTT.]

- 912, 418. S—. Settle: v. B. S. xxii, xxix; 143, 412, n; 905. "These concluding lines are probably Dryden's, being marked with his usual inveteracy against Elkanah Settle, and his peculiar sense of that bard's presumption in prefixing an engraving of his portrait to The Empress of Morocco — a circumstance which Dryden took more to heart than was necessary, or becoming: David Logan was the engraver of this offensive plate." SCOTT.

This note is here retained as a sample of the less admirable side of Scott's editorial work. The real frontispiece of The Empress of Morocco is an exterior view of the Duke's Theater, engraved by Sherwin. Mrs. C. S. Whipple writes to the editor in regard to the private library of Mr. Robert Hoe of New York: "Mr. Hoe owns fifteen of Settle's works [including The Empress of Morocco], in none of which is a portrait."

- 913, 526. Artamène. Ed. 1683 reads Artamen. The reference is to Artamène ou Le Grand Cyrus, a romance written by Mlle. de Scudéry, but published under the name of her brother Georges de Scudéry.

555. Your bully poets, etc. "I have sometimes wonder'd, in the reading, what was become of those glaring colors which amaz'd me in Bussy d'Ambois upon the theater; but when I had taken up what I suppos'd a fallen star, I found I had been cozen'd with a jelly; nothing but a cold, dull mass, which glitter'd no longer than it was shooting; a dwarfish thought, dress'd up in gigantic words, repetition in abundance, looseness of expression, and gross hyperboles." DRYDEN, Dedication of The Spanish Friar (1681); SS. vi. 404.

Bussy d'Ambois and The Revenge of Bussy d'Ambois are the most famous tragedies of George Chapman (1559?-1634), the translator of Homer.

- 914, 620. In vain, etc. Cf. 288², 37 f.

- 915, 793. Otter. "A whimsical character in Jonson's Epicæne," SCOTT.

828. When, etc. "In the Volpone; or, The Fox (act v, sc. 2) of Ben Jonson, Sir Politic Would-be, a foolish politician, disguises himself as a tortoise, and is detected on the stage: a machine much too farcical for the rest of the piece." [SCOTT.]

- 916, 891. Herringman. v. B. S. xvii, xviii, xxv; 135, 105.

917. ON THE YOUNG STATESMEN. The names in this poem not spelled completely are Danby, Sunderland, Godolphin, Lory [Laurence Hyde], the last three of whom are the young statesmen, in power in 1679-80.

And Holy Ghost with both in Nature One;
Whose equal Pow'r unites the Three
In one eternal Trinity.

ADDITIONS AND CORRECTIONS

- 28, 14. Wazing. O reads wexing in both text and side-note.

- 32, 235. The elephant, etc.

But, his [the elephant's] huge strength, or subtle Wit, cannot Defend him from the sly Rhinocerot:

Who (never with blinde fury led) doth venter

Upon his Foe, but (yer the lists he enter)

Against a Rock he whetteth round about

The dangerous pike upon his armed snout:

Then buckling close, doth not (at random) hack

On the hard Curass on his Enemy's back;

But under 's belly (cunning) findes a skin,

Where (and but there) his sharpened blade will in.

SYLVESTER, Dubartas his First Weekes (Sixth Day, ll. 52-61).

- 51, 7. Dead Colors. Cf. 741², 48, n.

591, SONG IV. The text of this song printed in WD supplies the following variants: (3) by your; (9) dam your; (11) as pale; (16) by anger; (18) Physician; (20) Puts; (21) rowseth; (22) its onely; (23) guide to; (26, 28) do fall.

- 73², 30. Macbeth. The fact that Dryden was now in the employ of the King's Company is sufficient reason for his slur on Davenant's Macbeth, which was acted at the Duke's Theater, the house of the rival company.

- 74², 53. Tempests. At the time of writing the note on this line, an excellent article by Mr. William J. Lawrence, "Did Thomas Shadwell write an Opera on The Tempest?" (Anglia, xxvii. 205-217), had escaped the editor's attention, nor did he discover his oversight until it was too late to recast the note. Mr. Lawrence shows that Herringman's 1674 edition of The Tempest, previously regarded as merely a second edition of Dryden and Davenant's version of the play, really represents Shadwell's opera. He reprints from Egerton MS. 2623 a prologue and epilogue to this opera, probably by Shadwell himself, which were not included with it on its publication. The prologue has every appearance of being a reply to Dryden's Prologue at the Opening of the New House, March 26, 1674 (pp. 73, 74). From this he argues that Shadwell's operatic Tempest must have been produced, not in 1673, but "sometime in April, 1674." Hence, he reasons, Dryden's concluding line,

Machines and tempests will destroy the new, — cannot refer to Shadwell's Tempest, but probably is a fresh allusion to Davenant's Macbeth; cf. 73², 30, n; 74², 22, n.

This argument is but partially convincing. The passage:

'Tis to be fear'd, etc. —

may refer to The Tempest, not as an opera already produced, but as one known to be in preparation; and which, the King's Company correctly apprehended, would win their rivals still more success than Macbeth. This supposition would make it even clearer why Shadwell chose to reply to this particular prologue in that written for his own opera.

- 135, 87. Dekker. In the preface to Notes and Observations on The Empress of Morocco (cf. B. S. xxii) the following passage occurs: "I knew indeed that to write against him [Settle], was to do him too great an honor; but I consider'd Ben Jonson had done it before to Dekker, our author's predecessor, whom he chastis'd in his Poetaster under the character of Crispinus, and brought him in vomiting up his fustian and nonsense."

216. THE HIND AND THE PANTHER. Shortly before the present volume went to press, the editor received from Professor W. H. Williams, of the University of Tasmania, some pages of manuscript notes to this poem, supplementary to those in his printed edition. These were sent "with Professor Williams' compliments, hoping they will not be too late for Professor Noyes to use as he thinks fit." From them the following material is selected, with grateful acknowledgments to Professor Williams. (The editor is responsible for some trifling additions to Professor Williams' references.)

- 223, 390. Burnish'd. Cf. Greene, Frier Bacon, x. 62: "And fortie kine with faire and bur-nish heads." [Burnish, of a stag, means to rub the dead skin, or "velvet," from his horns; it is also applied loosely to the annual renewal of the horns: v. N. E. D. Hence burnished, of cattle, apparently in the sense of "having bright, fresh horns." EDITOR.]

- 233, 1172. Goliath's sword. Cf. 157², 5-15.

- 239, 1638. Make himself a saver. Cf. Jonson, Epicæne, iii. 1: "To make you good again, and, as it were, a saver in the main."

- 240, 1703. Half-read gentleman. Cf. Locke, Conduct of the Understanding, § 3: "A country gentleman, who, leaving Latin and learning in the university, removes thence to his mansion house, and associates with neighbors of the same strain, who relish nothing but hunting and a bottle; with those alone he spends his time, with those alone he converses, and can away with no company whose discourse goes beyond what claret and dissoluteness inspire."

- 241, 1745. Or dream, etc. Cf. Fletcher, The Night-Walker, i. 1. 2, 3:

In what old hollow tree, or rotten wall,
Hast thou been, like a swallow, all this winter?

- 242, 1816. One casual truth, etc. "It is the peculiar and perpetual error of the human intellect to be more moved and excited by affirmatives than by negatives." BACON, Novum Organum, i. 46.

- 249, 2392. The Meccan prophet. Cf. Massinger, The Renegado, iv. 3:

He taught a pigeon to feed in his ear,
Then made his credulous followers believe
It was an angel, that instructed him
In the framing of his Alcoran.

253. EPIGRAM ON MILTON. On a flyleaf bound up with a copy of the first edition of Paradise Lost, 1667, now owned by Mr. Beverly Chew of New York, there is a manuscript text of these lines, signed John Dryden, and written in a hand which, after comparison with undoubted autographs of the poet, Mr. Chew is inclined to regard as Dryden's own.

GLOSSARY

THIS Glossary is for the most part compiled from the New English Dictionary; quotations from that work, however, are not indicated, except in a few special cases. It is designed merely to assist the reader, not to provide material for the study of Dryden's language. It includes (a) words the meaning of which might perplex persons unfamiliar with seventeenth-century English; (b) words which Dryden employs with a different accent from that now in common use; (c) a few words like boatsman, fauchion, haulser, which would probably cause no difficulty to the reader, but which by their unusual form might seem misprints when found in the text.
